"No, sir, 'cause I was going to tell you about Pete, and ask you to flog me for both. You see, he's a poor little fellow that 'ain't got any father and mother. All his folks are up in New York, and I've been trying for an awful while to get him there. He ain't strong enough to be flogged, sir, indeed he ain't, and I can take a double dose just as well as not."

* Begun in No. 336, HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE.

"So he wants to go to New York, does he?" and, strangely enough, the Captain seemed now to be more interested than amused, while even the mate ceased his angry pacing to and fro that he might listen. "Are all your people in New York, too?"

"No, sir; I ain't got any anywhere."

"Then what reason have you for making the voyage?"

"What reason have I?" repeated Jerry, in amazement. "Why, what would happen to Pete if I wasn't along to take care of him? I have to look out for him just like I would for a baby, 'cause, you see, the boys all pick on him."

"When did you stow away?"

"Last night, sir."

"And you want me to flog you for what both have done, eh?"

"Well, to tell the truth, sir, I can get along just as well as not without any flogging; but if you're going to pay us off that way, I do want you to give it all to me."

During this conversation Pete had not said a word; he had been feeling so sick that he hardly paid any attention to what the Captain said, and standing on deck had made him so much worse that, as Jerry ceased speaking, he half fell, half leaned against the rail, looking so ill that Jerry at once forgot everything else.

"Don't look that way, Pete! What's the matter with you? They shan't do anything to you, 'cause if the Captain says he won't give me all the flogging, we'll go right ashore."

"He's only seasick a bit; that's all," said the Captain, kindly, "and you don't look as if you were much better off. The cook will see to you both, and by morning you'll be howling for breakfast."

"You won't flog him, will you, sir?" begged Jerry, as he tried unsuccessfully to aid Pete to stand upright. "Just look at him now, and see how sick he is; besides, if he was well, there ain't enough of him to satisfy a man who really wants to flog a boy. I won't even yip, no matter how hard you hit me."

"He shan't be hurt, and I will settle with you presently. Here, Abe," he added, calling to the cook, "see to these two youngsters. You've been croaking about wanting a boy to help you, and now you've got two."

The cook, who had not ventured from the galley since the boys had rolled down the deck, now came aft, looking very much relieved in mind. Lifting Pete in his arms as if he had been but an infant, he said to Jerry: "There's a spare bunk in the forecabin, and you'd both better turn in for a while."

Several of the crew came down to see the stowaways, and took advantage of the time below to smoke their pipes, which was by no means agreeable to the sick boys. The vessel seemed to rear and plunge more violently than before, the foul odors of the forecabin appeared suddenly to have become stronger, and nowhere, ashore or afloat, could have been found two more thoroughly wretched boys than Silent Pete and Jerry Hicks.

From that time until the next morning no one paid very much attention to the stowaways, who believed themselves to be dangerously ill, and then, very much to their own surprise, they felt almost well. When he awoke, Pete's first thought was one of surprise that he felt so much better bodily, and his second was for the safety of his violin.

"Jerry! Jerry!" he called, awakening his friend after some difficulty. "Do you suppose Sweetness is safe? She has been in there alone all night."

Jerry did not stop to question whether the instrument had suffered from neglect, but leaping from the berth, without feeling any inconvenience whatever from his stomach, even though the brig was tossing about more wildly than on the day before, he ran into the fore-peak, returning a few moments later with the violin still wrapped in its newspaper covering.

Pete uttered a little glad cry of joy as he found that Sweetness had sustained no damage, even though it had been alone all night, and without thinking that he might disturb the men who were sleeping, he played low, sweet strains of music that seemed to comfort him and delight Jerry. It was while he was thus engaged that the companionship was darkened for an instant, and the voice of the cook was heard calling:

"Below there, you stowaways! The Captain's orders are that you turn out and get something to eat."

Jerry was perfectly willing to obey, for he had just begun to discuss in his own mind the question of whether or no he had better make an attack on what yet remained of the fruit with which Felix had provided them, and even Pete was disposed to leave his violin in order to obey the Captain's commands.

The cook, who was evidently well pleased by the almost ravenous appetites which the boys displayed, watched them attentively, putting additional food into the mess-kid at every opportunity, and urging them to eat, until, had they accepted all his invitations to "fill themselves up," they would have laid the foundation for a very severe attack of indigestion. As it was, Jerry struggled manfully to eat more than he wanted, but finally the time came when he was forced to desist, and he whispered to Pete:

"I've just about stuffed myself, and even if the Captain himself should come along now and tell me to eat another slice of pork, I couldn't do it. But say, Pete, this ain't more'n half as bad as we thought it would be, is it?"

"It wasn't very nice yesterday," replied Pete, in a low tone, "and we don't know yet what the Captain is going to do with us."

"What's that you're whispering about?" asked the cook, who chanced to look out just at that time. "Haven't you had pork enough?"

"Yes, we have," replied Jerry, decidedly, thus preventing the cook from piling the mess-kid high with food once more. "Pete was talking about the Captain. What do you suppose he'll do with us?"

"I reckon he won't more'n kill you," said the cook, with a laugh. "Didn't I tell you he was a reg'lar South-down lamb?"

"That's what you said. But see here; what kind of a lamb is that?"

The cook looked at the boy for a moment, and then, shaking his head sagely, he said, with a very poor attempt at a threatening tone, "You'll find out soon enough."

"Well, I reckon I can stand it," said Jerry, with a sigh of apprehension; and then, as he saw Pete look alarmed, he added, quickly, "Now don't you go to fussing, old man, 'cause the Captain and I'll fix that all right."

"Is this the boy that can fiddle?" asked the cook, who remembered the boasts Jerry had made regarding his friend's musical abilities.

"I reckon you'll say so when you hear him," replied Jerry. "Pete, you go and get your fiddle, so's to show 'em what you can do when you touch her up once."

Pete did not need a second invitation. In fact, he had at that moment been thinking of Sweetness, and he started to get the violin, while Jerry proceeded to make himself better acquainted with the brig and those in charge of her.

"What's the Captain's name?" he asked of the cook.

"Frank Sproud, and there's mighty few that sails out of New Orleans as can hold a candle to him. The first mate is Sam Harding; he comes from the same town me and the Captain does; but this is his first voyage on the Clio, and I reckon it'll be the last, for he and the old man don't hitch up very well together. Jethro Downs is the second mate, and he's been on the Clio three years now; he'll likely go in Sam's place next voyage."

"OH, YOU STOWED AWAY IN THE FORE-PEAK, DID YOU?"

"What's your name?"

"Me? Why, I thought everybody knowed that I'm Abe Green. Abraham, some folks call me; but I'm just Abe. I was named for Uncle Abe Slocum, and he allers used to say as how—"

It was destined that Jerry should not know what Uncle Abe Slocum formerly said, for just then Pete reappeared with Sweetness, and Abe entirely forgot that he had begun to tell a story.

Pete never required urging before he would play, for it was more enjoyment to him to hear the tones of his violin than it could possibly be to the most interested listener, and he seated himself by the galley door on the deck, where he was soon unconscious of everything around him save the voice of Sweetness that came responsive to his lightest touch. The cook was an attentive listener, and, since he could not remain idle because of the necessity of preparing dinner, he moved softly about paring potatoes or washing kettles in accompaniment to Pete's playing, the most intense satisfaction beaming from every feature. The men who were at work near the galley were careful not to disturb the musician, and from the man at the wheel to the Captain, every one listened to the music made by the little stowaway.

"It's mighty fine," replied Abe, with a long-drawn sigh of satisfaction. "It beats anything I ever heard, and it don't appear to be any trouble for him to do it."

"Trouble!" repeated Jerry, scornfully. "Why, Pete can play with both eyes shut better'n the most of 'em can with spectacles. I tell you what it is, that little fellow has got more music in him than a whole storful of pianos."

"What are you going to do in New York?"

"Just find his folks: he's been wanting to do that ever since his mother died."

"And when you do find 'em, I suppose you think they'll give you a lift to pay for what you've done for him."

"No, sirc, I don't think anything of the sort, and I don't want anything of the sort. If I can find Pete's folks,

"I'll leave him with 'em, after I know they'll treat him good, and then I'll get back to New Orleans somehow, for I don't reckon I'll like New York very much."

"What! Didn't you want to leave New Orleans?" asked the cook in surprise.

"Indeed I didn't. You see, I've always lived there, and the fellows know me. I'd rather be there than any place I ever heard of; but Pete had to find his folks, and that's all there was to it."

It is probable that the Captain was thinking of the stow-aways, for, a few moments later, he called the boy into the cabin, and as Jerry started to obey, he whispered to the cook:

"I'm going to catch it now; and if he cuts up very rough with me, you keep Pete from getting into any trouble, won't you? There's no knowing what he might try to do if he saw 'em laying it onto me."

"I guess you won't get quite killed," replied Abe, grimly; "but I'll look out for the boy if I see him doing anything that looks like mutiny, for I don't want him to murder us all just to save your back."

Brave as Jerry naturally was, he actually trembled as he left the galley, for he was positive that he would receive a severe flogging at the very least, and there are few boys who can calmly contemplate such an undesirable proceeding. To his great surprise, however, when he entered the cabin he saw no instrument of torture. The Captain was seated at the table with writing materials in front of him, and his voice was far from sounding blood-curdling as he said to Jerry:

"Now, my lad, I want you to tell me why you stowed away, where you live, and all about yourself and the boy who is with you. Tell nothing but the truth, for I shall make it particularly hard for you if you lie to me."

Jerry looked immensely relieved at this mild way of opening the interview, and without any hesitation he told the simple story of himself and Pete, concluding by saying:

"If I could have got the money to pay for our tickets, I wouldn't have stowed away; but we didn't earn much more'n enough to buy us something to eat, though we have got pretty near a dollar and a quarter we can give you. You see, we had to come, sir, for poor little Pete's been fussing to get to New York ever since his mother died."

"Do you know where his people live in the city?"

"No, sir; we don't know nothing about it except that they live in New York; but I can find 'em, because I'll keep at it all the time till I do."

"You may stay on the brig," said the Captain, after a pause; "but I don't want you to get the idea that boys can stow away on my vessel and not suffer for it. If you had run away from home, or come on board simply for the fun of making a voyage, I would flog you severely, and then put you ashore at Key West. But if you have told me the truth, I can't say that I blame you very much for what you have done. I will carry you to New York; but I expect that you will do all the work you can while you are on board. Tell the cook I say you are to help him, and see to it that you do enough to pay for what you and Pete eat. That's all."

Jerry was so much surprised at this unexpected termination of the interview, that he could only stammer, "Thank you, sir," and he left the cabin to report to the commander of the galley.

"Well, you're alive yet?" asked Abe, as Jerry came on deck looking quite as astonished as he did happy. "The old man didn't threaten to pickle you, did he?"

"The Captain is just as good as he can be. He's going to let Pete and me stay on board, and I'm to help you. Only think, Pete, he never said a word that was ugly, and all you'll have to do is to fiddle and eat! If this ain't the biggest kind of luck, then I don't know what to call it."

The little musician made no other reply than to lay his hand affectionately on Jerry's cheek, after which he seated himself on the deck again, and drew from Sweetness such a song of thanksgiving without words that even Mr. Harding came near the galley to listen.

"I tell you what it is, old man," said Jerry, while they were eating dinner in the galley, after he had waited on the Captain's table, "we've struck it fat. I just wish Felix could see us now. Why, it'll be a regular picnic for us till we get to New York. Then we'll find your folks, and everything will come out just as nice as pie."

A SUNNY MORNING IN THE PARK.

DILLY'S EASTER OFFERING.

BY SOPHIE SWETT.

"WHAT are you going to draw, Dilly?" Chatty Arkwright's little plain face looked thin and sharp with anxiety as she asked the question.

"I've been thinking about drawing Crumple and her new calf, but I haven't quite decided," answered Dilly.

Chatty's face rounded and brightened. "I think you draw cows very nicely," she said. "I— Oh, Dilly, I'm so afraid I sha'n't do well! My uncle says that if I win the prize, he will send me to the city to learn to be a real artist."

It was strange to see Chatty eager and flushed with hope; she was usually so pale and dejected. She was lame, and her uncle, her only relative, was a miserly old man. It was a wonder, everybody said, that she had been allowed to go to the Academy, she was so poorly clothed and scantily fed.

"There are only two or three girls whom I am afraid of," continued Chatty. "Sometimes you do a great deal better than I." Her voice trembled.

"How much she cares!" Dilly said to herself, watching Chatty as she stumped away on her crutch. "I didn't think she had any ambition."

Dilly herself had a great deal of ambition. She was fairly tingling to her finger-tips now with the excitement of the contest for the prize that had been offered to her class in the Cherryfield Academy for the best drawing from nature. It was not only the pleasure of excelling that moved Dilly now, although that was very dear to her heart; she wanted the prize, which was five dollars in money, for a particular purpose. She had overrun her allowance, and been bankrupt ever since Christmas, and had been forced to borrow so much of Sydney, her brother, that it would take almost all her next quarter's allowance to pay him. Sydney was not a pleasant person to borrow of. He was very wise and prudent himself, and always "saved up." He said money burned a hole in Dilly's pocket, and he quoted "Poor Richard" maxims, which were very wise and good, of course, but seemed very personal if you had a sweet tooth that would draw you like a magnet to the candy shop, and if your quarter's allowance never could be made to last more than a month. It was a very small allowance, Dilly thought, but Syd said it was large, considering there were nine children, and "it was more than girls needed, anyway, and just see how much Margery saved!"

Margery was fifteen and a half, two years older than Dilly; she had been saving all winter, in spite of Christmas and everything, to give toward the new chancel window that was to be placed in the church. It was expected that the offerings of the coming Easter would amount to enough to buy it. Miss Sylvester, Dilly's Sunday-school teacher, had said that she hoped her pupils would deny themselves, and make their Easter offerings as large as possible. If Dilly didn't get the prize, she wouldn't have a single cent for an Easter offering.

She went to the barn as soon as she reached home to take another survey of old Crumple and her new calf, and make up her mind as to their picturesque possibilities.

She seated herself upon an inverted cask and went to work at once. Crumple was a very obliging model, but the new calf was frisky and would not keep still. He had a queer, scraggy body, set up on four knobby, stilt-like legs. He had no tail to speak of, and seemed to be all ears.

It was a warm afternoon in March, the first spring-like day of the year. The great barn doors were wide open, letting in a flood of sunshine, and the hens and turkeys—regularly let out by Abram, the "hired man," for a Wednesday and Saturday half-holiday—were wandering in and out, clucking and scratching, their spirits evidently elated by the feeling of spring in the air. The old gobbler spread his wings until they scraped the floor, and strutted majestically before Dilly, as if to show her how much more worthy he was of being put into a picture than old Crumple and her calf, and the pert young bantam rooster was so anxious to bring himself into notice that he perched upon the ladder and persisted in crowing as shrilly as if it were five o'clock in the morning, although his mother and the other matrons loudly clucked scorn at him.

Syd came in, and began to reckon, with a piece of chalk on a barrel-head, the probable expense of keeping three guinea-pigs which had been offered him as pets; they were bewitchingly curly-tailed, and Syd wanted them—he was but a boy, although he had such a prudent mind—but he couldn't make the figures come small enough, and he renounced the guinea-pigs with a great sigh.

"Oh, Syd, I can't draw him, he is so ugly!" said Dilly, laying her pencil down and echoing his sigh.

"He looks somehow as if he didn't all belong together—like dissected animals when you get them mixed up," said Syd, surveying the calf with an unprejudiced air.

"I believe I can draw horses better, anyway," said Dilly. "I wish Beauty's coat hadn't grown up and been sold. There never was a colt like Aladdin, anyway."

"That Laddin of yours? Well, he was fair to middlin' for looks."

They both started at the voice. Josh Haight was coming in at the barn door. He was an awkward, hulking fellow of sixteen, generally considered somewhat "foolish," who lived on "the back road," nearly a mile out of the village. He went about doing odd jobs, and was on familiar terms with everybody.

"But I just wish you could see a colt that we've got to our place a-parsterin' for a city gentleman!" continued Josh.

"Oh, is he very pretty?" cried Dilly, eagerly. "And does he look at all like Beauty? Would you let me draw him?"

"I guess there's more'n you that wants to draw 'im," said Josh, shaking his head with an air of great importance. "But you're always kind o' friendly, an' them's uncommon good cherries you've got in your garden."

"You shall have ever so many when they're ripe, Josh," said Dilly, "if you'll bring the colt over here two or three afternoons. I want to sketch him standing beside Beauty."

"Just say it in quarts an' pecks," said Josh, who, although he was foolish, was still a Yankee.

"Five, six quarts—a peck," said Dilly, impatiently.

"I expect it's worth more'n a peck of cherries to draw 'im, but I'm one that likes to do a favor. You mustn't say nothing about it, 'cause mebbe his owner wouldn't want him drawn. I can't bring him reg'lar, but I'll bring him whenever I can. Them cherries must be black-hearts, you know."

He was a prettier colt than Aladdin. Dilly clapped her hands with delight at the first sight she had of him; and when Josh brought him over, his naturally lively spirits were subdued by the strangeness of his surroundings, so that he stood quietly by Beauty's side, and Beauty turned her head with a motherly look toward him, and they both remained in a delightful position long enough for Dilly to make a rough outline sketch.

It was a graceful and spirited sketch.

"I shall succeed! I shall win the prize!" cried Dilly, whirling staid Margery into a wild waltz in which the gobbler pursued them, enraged by Dilly's fluttering red sash, and got himself into difficulty with Sancho, the pug puppy, who was also moved to join in the dance, and there was a general uproar in the barn.

But Dilly sobered down again very soon, and worked on her sketch even by lamp-light.

Josh Haight was as good as his word; he was even better; he brought the pony over four times, because on the third occasion the pony's natural spirit overcame his discretion, and Dilly found it undesirable to finish him with his heels in the air.

Dilly's success was even greater than she had anticipated; she had never drawn anything so well before.

It had become fashionable among the girls not to show their drawings, nor to reveal the subjects to each other. There was mystery in the air, and it added to the excitement. Chatty Arkwright was more worn and pale with anxiety every day, and as Dilly put the finishing touches to her picture, Chatty's face would rise before her and chill all her glowing pride. She couldn't keep Chatty out of her thoughts.

The afternoon before the drawings were to be sent in to the judges, Chatty ran out and called Dilly as she was going by. She had her drawing in her hand.

"I must show it to you, Dilly. I want you to tell me honestly whether you think yours is better or not. You can't understand how much difference it makes to me. There doesn't seem to be any chance for me unless I can be an artist."

Dilly took the drawing into her hand. It was a group of horses and a colt—the colt! Josh Haight's colt. There was no mistaking the long delicate limbs and the graceful, spirited arch of the neck.

"Josh Haight let me go over to his pasture and draw them. Isn't the colt a beauty? Josh promised not to let anybody else draw him. Did you draw the cow and calf? Is yours better than mine?"

The drawing was very well done, but it was not so good as her own; the touch was a little timid; it was not so free and spirited as hers.

There was a pause, in which it seemed to Dilly that her heart's beating was choking her.

"You mustn't ask me; I'm not one of the judges," she said at length, with a little forced laugh, and she thrust the drawing back into Chatty's hands and ran away.

When she reached home she shut herself into her room, and took out the unfinished sketch of Crumple and her calf. "It might as well be finished, anyway," she said to herself.

She was a long time the next morning in making preparations to carry her drawing to the Academy, where there was a holiday, and nothing going on but the examination of drawings, which were all to be handed in before ten o'clock. She kept her two drawings on her table, and kept looking at them while she was dressing. Little Theophilus, the youngest of the nine, watched her, with childish wonder at her unusual silence. When she was ready she laid one of the drawings away in a drawer, shutting her lips as tightly together as she shut the drawer, and took the other in her hand.

It was a beautiful April morning. The next Sunday would be Easter, and everything seemed to know it; but Dilly's face was clouded. When she reached the little bridge over Creeping Brook she heard a shouting behind her. Syd was running after her, waving something in his hand. "You're the *careless*st girl!" he panted. "If Thoffy hadn't seen you take the wrong picture, you might not have got it there in time."

Dilly's heart beat quickly. It was not too late now to win the prize. But—

"I took the one I meant to," she said. "Oh, Syd!"—her voice broke almost into tears now—"I couldn't bear to win the prize away from Chatty Arkwright; it makes so much difference to her!"

"If that isn't the most ridiculous thing I ever heard of!" exclaimed Syd, with tremendous emphasis. "Hasn't she had a fair chance? Is it your fault if she can't draw as well as you can? I can tell you that isn't the way things are done in this world."

It was of no use to argue against Syd's worldly wisdom. She wished she had told Margery. Margery "saved up," but she would have understood.

"I have a right to do as I please, and you have no right to interfere," said Dilly, drawing herself up.

Syd looked thoroughly surprised; it was a new thing for Dilly to be self-asserting; and although his face was like a thunder-cloud, he did not try to hinder Dilly, as, after one last look at her pretty drawing, she tore it—lest her resolution should fail—into little bits, and threw the bits over the railing into Creeping Brook.

"You'll never amount to much," said Syd, turning on his heel.

Creeping Brook was not creeping to-day. It felt spring in every one of its drops, and it swirled the precious pieces around, and tossed them gayly along toward the mill-pond, where the great wheel would suck them down.

Dilly, watching, and choking back the great sob in her throat, did not once think that she had made an Easter offering, but I am sure the Recording Angel did.

Fathers and mothers, sisters and brothers, even uncles, aunts, and cousins, flocked to the Academy hall the next Saturday morning to see the drawings and hear the prize awarded.

It was given to "Miss Charlotte Arkwright for a drawing of horses and a colt." Two or three other drawings received "honorable mention." But not even that was accorded to the sketch of Crumple and her calf.

Dilly's father adjusted his glasses and looked at her somewhat severely, and her mother looked disappointed, and Margery sympathetic. Syd scowled fiercely. But Syd would never tell. He saved up his opinions and all the news he heard as carefully as he saved his pennies.

Dilly caught a glimpse of Chatty Arkwright's radiant face, and her heart glowed.

"I'm glad I did it; if I could choose again, I would do the same thing," she said to herself.

It was somewhat worse at Sunday-school the next day. The Superintendent read the names of those whose Easter offerings had helped to pay for the chancel window; all their nine, down to Thoffy, had given something. Syd had made an Easter offering.

Dilly sat, downcast and shamefaced, feeling as if everybody were looking at her. She was sure that her teacher, Miss Sylvester, who was also the teacher of drawing and painting at the Academy, gave her two or three curious glances.

"Do you know," said one of the girls in Dilly's class to another, a few days after, "that Miss Sylvester has sent Dilly Dowden a beautiful Easter card that she painted herself? There are angels' heads on it, and a passion vine, and the text is, 'Inasmuch as ye did it unto one of the least of these my brethren, ye did it unto me.' She didn't send any other girl a card. I don't understand it."

Dilly didn't understand what that card meant. Could Miss Sylvester know?

Dilly met Josh Haight one day, and asked him if he had ever told anybody that she drew the colt.

"No, never, sure as you're born," said Josh, stoutly, "except, maybe, I did kind o' let it out to Miss Sylvester. She was a-ridin' by, and, says she, 'Is that the colt that Chatty Arkwright drew?' And, says I, 'She drew him, but twan't nothin' to the way that the doctor's daughter drew him; you'd a thought he was goin' to prance right out o' the pasteboard.' 'Dilly!' says she; 'I suspected.' But she didn't say what she suspected. She kind o' looked as if she wanted to cry. I expect she felt bad; 'cause she didn't get a chance to draw 'im. No, I won't tell nobody else, sure's I hope them cherries to get ripe quick. Blackhearts, you know."

EASTER MORNING IN THE CHILDREN'S WARD.

BY MARGARET E. SANGSTER.

"FOND of flowers? Did you ever see a child who wasn't?" The pretty nurse, with the soft blue eyes and the merry smile, had her hands full of the sweetest things—violets both blue and white, great red roses, yellow daffodils, branches of geranium, snowy azaleas, spicy carnations, fragrant mignonette, and the loveliest Easter lilies. A basket and a note had just been left at the hospital door—a great basket, with heaps of flowers freshly picked, and sprinkled so that they glistened with dew-drops, and the dearest little note, which simply said: "An Easter offering. From children who have everything they want, to children who have not so much."

"Children who have everything they want!" said the pretty nurse, laughing that sweet low laugh, which was just like music. How her white fingers twinkled as with light swift touches she arranged the flowers in clusters and bouquets just large enough for little thin hands to hold!

"You shall come with me, and see the pleasure of our little ones in these exquisite buds and blossoms," she said. "You know that flowers talk to us when we are sick or sad almost as if they had tongues, and I think they have their own messages for these children, who have never had much joy in their little lives. One never can go through a very poor neighborhood without having a dozen eager little hands stretched out with a plea for a flower if one happens to be wearing a bouquet in her belt, and you know our children are brought to us from very poor homes. Did you never see a ragged girl pick up the flowers a maid has thrown away, rescuing them from the ash barrel, and proudly carrying them off, as if she had found a prize? I have, often."

I went from one little bed to another with my gentle friend, whose whole life is a self-denial for Christ's sake. We went first to the cot which held a brown-faced little Italian girl who goes about with an organ man and a monkey when she is well, but who had a fall and was run over in the street, so that when she shall walk again it will be with the aid of a crutch. We let her choose, and it was charming to see how pleased she was with a velvety Jacqueminot rose, so brimming over with delicious perfume, and a lovely spray of geranium.

Her neighbor was little English Alice, who has been suffering with rheumatic fever, and has been so patient that she has won every heart. Her desire was for a bunch of violets, and the kind nurse added a few lilies of the valley, because, as she said confidentially to me, "The child looks like a little lily of the valley herself." A German girl, who used to sell matches and horseradish—you know the morning cry, Horserradish! with a rising inflection and the emphasis on the last syllable—had been here several weeks, and was just beginning to grow a little stronger; her face lighted up when the nurse gave her a red and a white pink and a sprig or two of mignonette. The little boys were as delighted as the girls with their Easter flowers. They laid them on their pillows, touched them lovingly, and felt better from the moment they received them.

To save pennies from one's own little stock of pocket-money, doing without bonbons and nuts; putting a care into the little charity box on the dressing-table, and walking instead of riding to school; performing services for mamma and earning silver pieces to give away—are all bits of self-denial; but the children who chose in this way to buy the Easter flowers for the hospital would have been rewarded had they seen the happiness they conferred.

Possibly you cannot think of a hospital as a cheerful place, and you feel that it would break your heart, if you were ill, to have to go away from home and be nursed by anybody else except your own mamma. On the few occasions when you have been ill, how sweet and tender she has been! caring for you so lovingly, and giving you all her time, letting the others do without her. It was so charming to have mamma all to yourself, it almost made up for the pain and the bitter medicine. But if I could take you to some children's hospitals which I know all about, and where I like to go, you would change your minds as to any want of cheer. Of course there are many little faces there sharp and drawn with pain, but a hospital is a place for the relief of suffering, and the inmates of its wards are so carefully nursed, and so kindly watched by physicians, that they are always hoping to get better. Hoping and yet fearing, for, strange as it seems, the children sometimes cry when they are well enough to go home to their mothers.

The homes of the very poor are not clean and comfortable, and the children of such parents too often are used to blows and abuse. In the children's ward they hear only gentle words; they are treated with love; and although they suffer, there are many pleasant things done to help them forget the pain. The dolls, the toys, the picture-books, the little tray with the invalid's meal temptingly arranged, the prayers morning and evening in the ward, the ladies who come and sing, and the ladies who come and tell funny stories or read beautiful chapters out of God's word—all these make the hospital heavenly to a child who has lived in one room in a crowded tenement. To such a child a clean white bed of his or her own, the wide, clean hospital aisles, the great windows letting in floods of sunshine, the pictures on the walls, and the growing plants and vines, are all parts of a new life, not forgotten when health returns, and with it the roughness of former days.

The Easter flowers give kind Christian women an opportunity to tell the little children in the hospital that wonderful story which is so familiar to you, the beautiful story of the first Easter morning. Even in this land there are children who hear it for the first time. They open wide eyes, and their cheeks glow, as they hear why it is that at Easter the bells ring so joyously, the grand organs peal, and the children in churches and Sunday-schools unite with choirs in singing anthems because the Lord has risen. Sometimes the pretty nurse, with the clean white cap over her smooth hair, and the snowy apron covering her gray dress, takes a child in her lap, and while two or three others cuddle close against her arms, and lay their faces upon her shoulder, she reads from the Holy Book about the mournful day when Jesus was crucified.

They laid Him in a tomb cut out of a rock, and a great stone was rolled up to the door. On the morning of the third day, very, very early, a mighty angel came from heaven and rolled the stone away; but when the disciples and the women who had loved Him arrived at the place, the Lord was not there; He had risen from the sleep of death, and was walking in the garden among the lilies. Ever since, flowers have been symbols of the resurrection. All through the cold, long winter, when the snow falls, and the rivers are frozen, and the winds blow, like the trumpets of a storm-king calling his forces to battle, the flowers are fast asleep. Spring comes tiptoeing in, and up come the snow-drops, the crocuses, and the jonquils. By-and-by hepatica ventures into the warm corner by the fence, and arbutus stirs under the brown pine needles, the grass grows green on the hill-sides, and the blossoms return to the orchards. As one of our sweetest poets has said:

"God does not give us strange flowers every year.

When the spring winds blow through the pleasant places,
The same dear things lift up the same old faces;

The violet is here."

I like to think that as the flowers come back each spring to show us there is no death in nature, that life is always conquering death, so Easter is the pledge that for all who love and serve the Lord there is a life that shall never end—a life of joy beyond the grave. And that is why we are so glad when we exclaim, "The Lord has risen!"

AUTOGRAPHS.

BY CHARLES MERCER HALL.

NEARLY every one has a "hobby," or, as some people call it (rather unfairly, I think), a "craze," for collecting something of little or great value—foreign stamps, birds' eggs, fossils, specimens of ore and rock, relics of various kind, etc.

A "hobby," however, which I have come to think one of the best and most interesting, and for which I threw over everything else long ago, is that of autograph collecting. When one thinks of the millions of people who know how to write, and that no two write exactly alike, it will be seen at once that for this reason a person's handwriting must be characteristic to some extent of the writer. Indeed, a little book was published in London some time ago on the Philosophy of Handwriting, in which the author claimed that the character, disposition, and temperament of a person could, generally speaking, be determined by his handwriting, oftentimes from his signature alone. And again, a few lines of the writing of, say, John Adams, ought surely to possess very much more interest to every one than a piece of a chair he once sat in, for in the writing one has not only a piece of the great man's handiwork, but also a visible expression of some of his thoughts or ideas. Therefore an autograph letter is worth several times the value of a mere signature.

Perhaps I can offer a few words of advice to some of my young friends who are interested in this subject. In the first place I must tell them that politeness is absolutely essential. Whenever possible, a stamped envelope, properly addressed, should be enclosed; this rule must always be followed out, for one cannot expect a great and busy man to take the trouble to address the envelopes, nor yet to spend his income on postage-stamps, to oblige unknown admirers. This advice was given me by the mother of the late Bayard Taylor several years ago. The following form is one that might be used to almost any one:

1 CHESTER AVENUE, WASHINGTON, D. C.,
January 25, 1886.

Sir,—I greatly desire to add your autograph to my collection. If you can spare enough of your valuable time to do so, will you kindly do me the honor of sending me your signature?

Trusting you will pardon the liberty I have taken in troubling you, and hoping to hear from you, I am, sir,

Very respectfully yours,

To—

A form similar to this has brought me dozens of answers. Some answer by return mail, but I have had to wait in one instance nine months, and in two others over a year, ere I received a reply. So I say be patient, and don't be discouraged, and if after a year has elapsed you have received no reply, write again. Some may advise you not to do this, but I can see no objection, as your first note may have been lost or mislaid. I have had this happen several times, and a second letter has brought me a courteous reply.

If one purposes to collect autographs systematically, it is always well to begin in the right way, and classify them according to profession or rank: Presidents, cabinet officers, Senators, members of Congress, royalty, poets, authors, composers, artists, scientists, explorers, inventors, foreign ministers, clergymen, etc., etc. Then it is well to draw a line somewhere, and not allow the collection to include any and all persons. The autographs of all the Presidents, Vice-Presidents, and cabinet officers are valuable, as are most of the Senators, whilst perhaps not fifty of those of the Representatives in Congress are ever worth much more than the paper on which they are written, unless one purposes to get the autographs of each Congress complete. I say this simply as a collector, and with all respect to the honorable gentlemen who serve their country in the lower hall of the Capitol. But if a Representative should introduce a bill or make a speech in Congress which attracts the attention of the whole land, or win fame through some honorable means, then I would say, get his autograph if you can. In the same way the collector can use his discretion as to State officers and city officials. No one, four years ago, ever dreamt that the Mayor of Buffalo would, a short time later on, hold the highest office in the nation's gift.

An autograph collector, to be successful, should read the papers carefully, know as much as possible about the history and literature of his time and of times gone by, and always have a purpose in writing for a particular autograph, not obtaining it merely for the sake of increasing the size of his collection. If he can give the history of the writer of every autograph he possesses, only think what a vast amount of useful information he can store up in process of time, and what interesting anecdotes might be gathered in connection with this delightful labor.

"Perseverance conquers all things." I began my collection not quite ten years ago with the autographs of two English bishops, Lord Nelson, Lord Strafbroke (the oldest living English peer), Sir R. Philimore and Sir Travers Twiss (two great lawyers). A few months later, on coming to America, I was surprised to find the ease with which I obtained the autograph of President Hayes; and spurred on by what I then considered the greatest success possible, I have gradually increased my collection until it now numbers almost six hundred, and contains the names of some of the greatest people we read of in the events of to-day and of the century gone by.

Among my American autographs are those of fifteen Presidents, eight Vice Presidents, and forty cabinet Secretaries; and among the others are to be found the names of John Hancock, William Pinckney, Francis Hopkinson, Robert Morris, the financier of the Revolution, James G. Blaine, Benjamin F. Butler, John C. Calhoun, William H. Seward, General Winfield Scott, General W. S. Hancock, General Sheridan, and the two Shermans, Jefferson Davis, A. J. Dallas, Robert E. Lee, Robert Toombs, Oliver Ellisworth, George F. Edmunds, Captain Eads, Whittier the poet, Mark Twain, Oliver Wendell Holmes, Longfellow, Edison, Robert Fulton, the inventor of the steam-boat, the two Senators Ferry, Captain Gatling, of Gatling gun celebrity, Lieutenant Greeley, of arctic fame, Albert Gallatin, Fitz-Greene Halleck, the late Vice-President Hendricks, George W. Cable, W. D. Howells and Marion Harland the novelists, Andrew Johnson, Rufus King, Benson J. Lossing, Generals McClellan, Meade, and Fitz-John Porter, Nast the caricaturist, Oliver Optic, Admirals Goldsborough and Porter, Bishop Quintard of Tennessee (the only Q in my collection), Representative Roosevelt of New York, Charles Sumner, Francis E. Spinner, whose curious signature we see on so many of the United States Treasury notes, Bayard Taylor, James Russell Lowell, E. B. Washburne, Senators Vance and Voorhees (the "tall sycamore of the Wabash"), Eleazer Wheelock, the founder of Dartmouth College, Chief-Justice Waite, and others.

Among my foreign autographs are those of Matthew Arnold, Arabi Pasha, the Egyptian rebel; Alma-Tadema, Marcus Stone, Sir John E. Millais, and Sir Frederick Leighton, artists; Generals Wolseley, Graham, Evelyn Wood, Redvers Buller, "Chinese" Gordon, and his brother, Sir Henry W. Gordon, who is Commissary-General of the British army, Napier of Magdala, Pombony: Lord Charles Beresford, Captain Sir Lambert Lorraine, R.N., the hero of the Virginus episode of many years ago; Robert Browning, John Bright, Monsignor Capel; Cardinals Newman and Manning; Charles Dickens; Lord Randolph Churchill, Adeline Patti, Oscar Wilde; the Orleans princes Henri, Duc d'Aumale, Philippe, Comte de Paris, Jean, Duc de Chartres, and Frederic, Prince de Joinville; and various others of greater or lesser repute.

AN EASTER FESTIVAL AT WASHINGTON.

WHILE the curious customs belonging to certain seasons in other countries are well known to many of our readers, comparatively few have heard of the egg-rolling carnival that takes place every Easter Monday at the national capital. We evidently have the mother country to thank for the introduction here of egg-rolling, for, as near as the writer can learn, the practice, in all probability, was first brought to Washington by a family from England, in some parts of which country it still exists. Chambers's Book of Days says that the custom of distributing the "pasc" or "pasche ege," which was once almost universal among Christians, is still observed by children and by the peasantry of Lancashire. Even in Scotland, where the great festivals have for centuries been suppressed, the young people still get their hard-boiled, dyed eggs, which they roll about or throw, and finally eat. So it is quite clear that the custom of egg-rolling, so largely enjoyed by the children of Washington, is by no means of local or even of American origin.

For many years the slopes surrounding the Capitol were used by the children for their Easter sport, but as the trampling by thousands of feet did great injury to the terraces, it was found necessary to forbid it there. Moved possibly by a feeling of sympathy with the many anxious little hearts in the threatened breaking up of their cherished day, President Hayes, hearing of the trouble, caused public notice to be given that there was at least one place where egg-rolling might be enjoyed without restraint, and that was in the White House grounds. The invitation so kindly extended was gladly accepted, and in each succeeding year the grassy mounds near the mansion have been thronged with happy children.

The new ground is in many respects better adapted for the sport than the old. That portion of which the children take possession on Easter Monday is directly in the rear of the White House, and the ground is just uneven enough to cause the eggs to roll easily over the grass. There on every Easter Monday may be seen an army of small men and women, but always with baskets full of bright-colored hard-boiled eggs. Mothers, elder sisters, or nurses accompany the younger children, carrying baskets containing lunch; for it is an all-day affair, and mightily offended indeed would the little people be were anybody to suggest leaving before sundown.

"Some in rags, and some in tags,

Though rolling and playing ball with the eggs are the principal amusements of the day, the children do not confine themselves to these alone. There are various little games of their own invention which they play with the eggs, the most popular being one called "picking." Two children knock the smaller ends of their eggs together until one is broken; it then becomes the property of the possessor of the stronger egg, the victor being expected to eat the broken one on the spot. Another sport is to see who can throw an egg the greatest distance. It is safe to say that no one has as yet succeeded in throwing an egg over the Washington Monument.

The eggs do not by any means do all the rolling, however, for the small boys and babies seem to find quite as much fun in rolling themselves down the fresh green slopes as in chasing the eggs.

During the day the children have many visitors. Few residents of Washington who can manage to spare an hour or so fail to visit the grounds, and many hearts are made light by the sight of so many happy little people. Visitors to the capital who are fortunate enough to be in Washington on Easter Monday come to see the sport, and carry away the remembrance of it as one of their pleasantest recollections. friends are always deeply interested spectators. When there were children at the White House, they used to join the throng in the sports, while the elders viewed the amusing scene from the portico.

The presence of the distinguished tenants of the Executive Mansion is always a source of much gratification to the children. Last year, the day being exceptionally fine, a greater number of children than usual came to the place, and it became necessary to secure the doors of the house to keep inquisitive little folks from overrunning it in their efforts to see the new President. They proved the stronger power in the end, however, for President Cleveland finally yielded gracefully, and gave a reception in the East Room, to which only children were admitted. The little ones fairly overwhelmed him in their anxiety to shake him by the hand. One bright-eyed little fellow presented the President with an egg, assuring him that he had "plenty more in his basket." Then they left, happy and contented, and greatly impressed with a sense of their own importance.

OUR POST-OFFICE BOX.

DECATUR, TEXAS.

DEAR POSTMISTRESS.—I send you a story about my pet puleet. I am the little girl who wrote to you about the Busy-Bee Club Christmas before last. Nearly all of our peach-trees are in bloom we have about one hundred and fifty trees, and had a great many peaches last year. I send you some flowers, and also some cedar for all of these have come out already. Bess and I have fifteen young chickens, and have found from six turkey hens thirty-one turkey eggs; we have to scramble through every bit many holes, and over rocks to get to the turkey's nests. I have a horse of my own, a saddle blanket that I made myself, a saddle, and a bridle. I like very much to ride, and my mother, my sister, and myself very often go out riding. I am now nine years old, and have made one of my winter dresses, and am going to make all my summer dresses. To-day I have made a box and put some shelves in it, and we use it for a cabinet; we have a piece of lead ore from Colorado, a piece of petrified wood, and a little white piece of stone shaped like an equilateral triangle. There are a great many petrified shells here. Bess and I have a little room of our own. KATE H.

Here is the little story:

THE LIFE OF PULEET GRAY.

When I first came to this world I was a little bit of a thing. I crept under my mother's wings, and there I staid until my other sisters and brothers came out, and then my mother took us out of the nest, and scratched for us and fed us with worms. Every night some little girls came out and caught my mother and her family, and put us in a box and covered us up tight. My mother chuckled to us and cuddled us up warmly. We went on growing until we grew to be large hens and mothers. One day my mother said she was going to leave us to scratch for ourselves. Oh, what hard work it was! At night we all went up in a tree, and the wind blew, and we could hardly stay up in the tree. At last one day I got up on a nest and laid a pretty yellow egg. Oh, how pretty it looked, lying there in the sunshine! The next day I laid a pretty egg, and the next day I laid a great many. Then I wanted to sit, some little girls caught me and shut me up in a dark place. At last they put me up in my old nest, and put a lot of boards over me. At night they let me off, and I flew up into a tree. The next day I sat, and there I had to stay three long weeks. Then I laid nine pretty little pots of my own. I scratched for them, and covered them with my wings. One night two of them froze to death, and one rainy day one more of them died, and so now I have only six. I need to keep them in a tight box, and after a while I took them up in a tree, and now they go about alone, and I am laying eggs again to have some more pretty little chicks.

BURRO, CANADA.

As I have not seen anything about Bessie in HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE, I thought I will write to you. Bessie is about sixty-four miles north of the city of Toronto. It lies at the head of Kempenfelt Bay, which is about eight miles long, and runs into Lake Simcoe. It is beautifully situated, as it is built on the slope, which is about three-quarters of a mile long, and runs down to the bay, and there is a very fine view of the town from the bay. The Town Council have sent a water-color painting and some very nice plates to show at the College and the Old Exhibition, so if any of the young people go there this summer they can see what a nice place Bessie is. I would like to tell you how we amuse ourselves in this pretty country. You may surely have lots of sleigh-riding, as the snow comes about the middle of November or the first week in December, and does not go away until the last of March. We have good skating on the lake, but there is not too much snow, but when there is, we can go to the skating rink. We have good fun ice-boat-ing, but we do not go so fast as they do on the Hudson River; I am going to try and have a new ice boat for next winter, something like the Scout, and then I shall be able to go faster, but, now the spring is coming on, I am looking to the fun we have down the lake camping. I have a nice little sail-boat, and there are three boys besides myself who go down the lake for a week or two to a place called Starvation Island, about twenty-six miles from Barrie, which is a nice place for camping, there are good fishing-grounds and good hunting, and it is about one mile from the mainland, so that if we run out of provisions it is not far to go for more. This is a nice bay for swimming in. Some nights you can see from fifty to one hundred boys in swimming, but we cannot go in off the Esplanade until the last train goes by, at 8.45, as the track is on the Esplanade. Last summer a young man swam across the bay, which is about one and one-eighth miles. The government is talking about making a canal, called the Trent Valley, and if made, it will come right into Kempenfelt Bay, and that will make things pretty lively. The Town Council have offered to give a bonus and exemption from taxes for a certain time to any one who will start a manufactory here. I have a nice little boat, and I am now trying to get an elevator built, and I think they will do so this summer, so as to have it ready for next winter's use. GEORGE C.

I am writing to tell Pansy that I tried her candy, and think it is very nice indeed, but it would have been better after if I had had her to help me make it. I would like to have had her try a few of mine for chocolate caramels, but I cannot find the receipt any where; I am so sorry, for I know she would have liked it ever so much. I wrote you a letter once before, but it was not printed. I have three brothers and two sisters. One of my brothers is a sailor, and when he was at the south he bought a monkey and a parrot; the monkey was funny, and the parrot flew; the sister the former was very tame, and we would let him go a few sometimes, and he would run up the apple-trees and make such lovely jumps. I grew very fond of him, and he of me; I would sit on my shoulder and let me carry him around, and hang his tail to my finger, and do many other things that I cannot relate. Well, when winter came he missed being out, and he hadn't a large enough cage, and I let would let him loose in the house he would tear everything up, finally we decided to send him to the Zoological Gardens of Philadelphia. It was hard for me to give him up, but I thought it was for his good. Polly is living here, and is a very great pet. She likes to sit on mother's shoulder and pull out her hair-pins. She says "Polly," hops, laughs, whistles, and goes like the other hens. ADDIE.

FORT BIRDWELL, CALIFORNIA.

I am eleven years old. I go to school every day, and study grammar, geography, spelling, arithmetic, and Latin and French. In some of these studies I am in a class, but I expect to know the other did not more about them before the term ends. We have a gymnasium near the school-house. I can get a gun, and I like to shoot. Papa is teaching me to box with boxing-gloves, and many other things. There is a shooting-gallery on one side of the gymnasium, and I shoot there sometimes. I have a gun that will shoot twenty-five cartridges, one right after the other. I go out hunting jack-rabbits, and many other things. REYNOLDS J. B. (an army boy).

I am eleven years old. I go to school every day, and I study grammar, geography, spelling, arithmetic, writing, drawing, and French in the United States. There is a gymnasium close to the school. There are two pair of rings for the monkey, and two pair of rings for the ropes and poles to climb, boxing-gloves, clubs to swing, a trapeze to swing on, and there are parallel poles. A shooting-gallery is attached to the gymnasium. MARK J. L.

MEDINA, MICHIGAN.

MY DEAR POSTMISTRESS.—Although I am not one of YOUR YOUNGEST readers, I enjoy HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE very much, especially the illustrations, which you find finer all the time. The interesting "Jo" reminds me of a girl I know, to whom similar things have happened. In fact, the illustrations resemble her very much. I wish some of the girls to correspond with her, and I have written her a letter, which I hope she will receive. I live in the township of Hudson, in southern Michigan, and one mile and a half from Medina—a pretty little village situated on the plain, consisting of two hundred inhabitants. The homes of many of these are on the banks of the river, and the country about affords lovely subjects for sketching. From the emporium of Medina, I have seen many boats, and I have seen a man, while ploughing, came upon the bones of an Indian. Upon our farm we find many Indian relics, and but a little way off from here, where was once the Indians' council grounds. Besides the view of the village from our house, is a large, open field, where there are boats, and many people visit for fishing. I have seen by two others, and we go there quite often on sketching tours, also a few miles from here to a large, open field, where there are boats, and many people visit for fishing. We never ride in the steamers, but go out in small row-boats, to sketch or listen to western music on the water. Upon its northern western shore, there are many legends. Now is gone the wigwam's welcome peace-pipe's smoke—all the warriors passed away—but the lake still tells of the wigwam's welcome. I would like to correspond with a girl of any age over sixteen. SARAH PHILLIPS (Box 63).

I am a little boy twelve years old. I have taken HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE ever since it was published, and like it very much. I have three canaries; their names are Oliver Twist, Dick, and Jay. I want to New Orleans last spring, and a nice time. LYNN M. B.

BROOKLYN, NEW YORK.

I am thirteen years old, and study music, dancing, and Latin, besides my usual school exercises. I want to tell you about a festival that I was in, on March 31, which was composed of ten dances; the "Swedish Sailor (English)," "Normandy Peasant," "Quadrille (Anglo-Dutch)," "Tyrolean Peasant," "Seven Planets," "Japanese," "Grecian," and "Hungarian Waltz." I was in the Swedish dance, and my brother was in the sailor dance. The director gave us a few rehearsals that I was a little nervous as how it would come off, being myself the first dancer. Much to my relief, however, a little boy couldn't see why he had to go with his partner, and consequently he had to run across the stage to the place he belonged; this excited a great deal of amusement among the spectators. The boys and girls in the Kermis had a great deal of fun in the rehearsals, especially at the end of the dances. They had a carnival last year, and expect to have one here this year.

I am collecting nearly everything, as newspapers, newspaper cuttings, stamps, coins, and numbers of the "Illustrated" and "The Saturday Evening Post." I correspond with boys and girls all over the world. Correspondence in English and shorthand (Pitman's method). ROBERT VAN DERSTINE, 80 Lafayette Avenue.

I am very fond of our paper, and I think "Jo's" opportunity is a very nice story. It is the first of Mrs. Little's stories that I have ever read. I am going to read "Nan." I am very fond of reading and letter-writing and I am also very fond of drawing. My mamma and I are making a book of drawings. I am very fond of reading "Scholar's Companion," and read history. We were all away last summer at Ocean Beach, New Jersey. I had a rented cottage near Shark River, and had a very nice time. I was very happy. I had such a good time when I was away then that I would like to send some money to the school. I have a very nice dog, and many other things. We have a girl horse named Kitty

THE YELLOW DOG.

BY GEORGE COOPER.

I NEVER had a kennel,
I never owned a name,
Yet everywhere I wander
I'm not unknown to fame.

The year round I go tramping
O'er highway, field, and bog,
And no one cares about me,
For I'm a yellow dog.

No nice bell ever tinkled
About my slungy neck,
Nor have I any blanket
My scanty sides to deck.
If anything is missing
When by the faras I jog—
A fowl or leg of mutton—
Oh, it's the yellow dog!

I oft in parlor windows
See pugs and poodles trim;
They perk their silky ears up,
And snarl out, "Look at him!"
For sticks and stones a target,
As if I were a frog,
Oh, life is very stirring
If you're a yellow dog.

So up and down I'm tramping,
But one thing is my gain:
As I'm considered worthless,
I never wear a chain.
Some kindly hand will feed me
While carelessly I jog;
I'm not so black as painted,
Though I'm a yellow dog.

THE CARE OF KITTY CAT.

BY LILLIE E. MORGAN.

AS there ever a greater joy than the possession of a "brand-new" kitty cat like the one in the picture on page 405? New every way: new to you, new to the world, and almost new to itself.

I dare say there are not many little girls who have not known this joy, and who do not remember the delightful feeling when papa comes home with something very much alive in his pocket, and says, "I've brought you a kitty cat"; or when auntie sends a basket from the country, the lid of which keeps bobbing up and down in a mysterious sort of way, while from the well-lined inside come long-drawn-out meows. And oh, the delight of opening the basket, and seeing how its frightened little inmate will cling to you! Dolly's and Birdie's noses are quite out of joint now, and kitty wins first place in your heart as she cuddles up close to your breast in perfect fearlessness.

Just as the possession of kitty is a joy to a little girl, so the danger of its having fits, getting thin and weak, or perhaps dying, is her greatest childish grief; and if any one were to tell her that it was her own fault that her pet was dead, it would almost break her heart; and yet, very likely, it would be true, not because she was unkind to it, but because she was too kind.

Probably if pussy had been with her mamma cat she would not have died, because her mamma would not have given her anything but what was good for her to eat, and would have made her take long sleeps. Well, when a cunning little kitten is taken from its mamma cat, and given to a little girl to care for, she takes the place of its mamma, and if she does not know how to take care of it, she is often very cruel even in her effort to be kind to it. But as the rules for caring for it are very simple and very easily remembered, there is no reason why any little girl should ever be a bad mamma to her kitty cat.

The first thing you must do after you get your kitty is to give her a saucer of milk; but you must prepare it for her. Many little girls, and grown-up ones too, are apt to think it must be new milk, or even cream. Now new milk is too strong for a young kitten, and cream is far too rich. The milk should either be skim-milk or half milk and half water, and it must always be boiled, and for the first three months it must be given warm—remember warm, not hot. And remember, also, you must never, under any circumstances, give her cream; it is bad for full-grown cats, and is sure to make a young kitten very sick, and may perhaps kill it.

Just as soon as kitty has taken her milk, she should be allowed to sleep, unless she wants to play; but usually she will go to sleep after eating. Do not wake her up, for it is natural for kittens to sleep nearly all day for the first few weeks after they are born; that is their growing time, and it is almost as bad for it to be wakened from its growing nap to play, or be carried around in your arms and squeezed almost to death, as it would be for your rose-tree if you should pull it out of the ground every little while to look at its roots.

"But I want my kitty to play with me," you will say.

Very good. You also want your baby brother to play with you; but you have to wait until he grows strong enough to do it. So it is with kitty; every day it is growing stronger, and wants less sleep. While it is only a baby cat you must be patient. About sundown it will waken, even when very young, and want to play; then you can handle it, roll with it, and romp to your heart's content, and it will do you both good, because kitty has had her growing sleep, and it is natural for her to play at that time. If you wait until she wakens naturally from her sleep you will have twice as much fun with her, because she wants to play then.

As kitty grows you will want to give her meat; but do not do it until she is three or four months old—in fact, almost a grown-up cat. Kitty is sharp enough to catch mice if she needs meat, and as that is the kind of meat nature intended her to eat, it will not hurt her; any other kind will make her cross and scratchy, thin and weak.

"But may I give my kitty just a little gravy?"

No, you may not; that is worse for her than the meat; it is too rich, and it has pepper and salt in it, and nature provides pepper for her in the peppergrass which kitty sometimes takes as a medicine, and the milk has all the salt she requires in it.

"May I give her cake and bread, then?"

No; neither cake nor bread—in fact, nothing but milk and water until she is three or four months old, if you want her to be a fine, fat, glossy kitty cat.

When kitty is about two months old you will perhaps want to teach her tricks. For example, if you want her to learn how to jump over your clasped hands, set the saucer of warm milk on the floor, kneel down before it, with kitty by you, clasp your hands, and say, "jump, kitty, jump." Do this before each meal, and do not give her the milk until she does jump, and in a short time she will know the trick perfectly.

After she has finished her meat, kitty will wash her face, and you can teach her very easily now to want to be brushed off also by taking a whisk-broom regularly to sweep her off with. I had a cat which not only came to be swept off after every meal, but would give me no rest if I did not get a cloth and dry him all over if he got wet in the dew or a shower of rain. This same cat I taught to take long walks with me by calling him to come when I went for a ramble; if he got tired, he would lie down in the road and cry to be carried. I spoiled him by carrying the first few times he did it, and never could break him of the habit.

If your kitty should get cross, refuse to play, or take her milk, or lie in her usual warm place, seeking some cooler one, she has fever; if you can take her to the Park, or by running water, she will find the medicine she needs. If not, six drops of aconite in a glass of water will help her wonderfully; set her milk and drinking water out of her way, and give her the medicine regularly every two hours until she seems better; you can easily tell when she is better by her begging for food. But your kitty is not likely to have fits, fever, or weakness if you always remember to let her sleep as much as she wishes for the first three months. For four months at least you must give her nothing but milk and water to eat; be sure the milk has been boiled, and all cream taken off, and be sure it is served warm—not hot. When she is full four months old you can give her a little bit of raw meat once in a while, but no gravies or hot or greasy food, or pepper or salt.

It is not good to confine a kitten to the house all the time. Cats require fresh air, as all other living creatures do, and you should get your kitty into the habit of going out-of-doors for a time every day, and at the same hour every day. If the weather is cold or wet, she will prefer to stay in doors, but, nevertheless, it is better that she should go out for a short time; and if there is some hay or straw for her to nestle in, she will not be cold even in a cold weather. If she will not go willingly, entice her out with some tidbit of warm food.

Remember these rules, and kitty is sure to grow up strong, glossy, and fat.

THE EASTER RABBIT.

BY AGNES CARR SAGE.

THIS Easter morn in the Rhine land,
The German land over the sea,
And forth in the early dawning
Come the children, full of glee—
Fair Lena, and Hilda, and Hensel,
And wee Max, sturdy and bold—
Eager to join in the Easter hunt
For eggs of silver and gold.

For there runneth a sweet old legend,
That when all the world doth sleep,
A dear little long-eared rabbit
From his cosy hole doth creep,
And brings gay rainbow treasures,
Which he hides with his tiny paws
Down deep 'mid the shrubs and flowers,
Like an Easter Santa Claus.

Then away he flits at the gleaming
Of the dancing sun's first ray,
Which bids the children rise and greet
The Resurrection Day.
So with carol and shout and laughter
'Neath the budding trees they pass,
And seek for the gifts of the rabbit
In the long lush moss and grass.

And oh, what bright Easter emblems
Those lowly green nests disclose!
Eggs like the hues of the sunset,
Azure, and yellow, and rose.
While a world of deep awe-struck wonder
Shines in the little one's eyes
As they whisper, "No bird could have laid them
But a bird of Paradise."

FISHES.

BY SARAH COOPER.

IT is not an easy thing to study the every-day life of fishes. Living as they do in the water, and keeping out of sight, our only hope of observing them is from an occasional glimpse, which gives little opportunity to learn their habits and peculiarities. Preserved specimens are not of much help; they serve, however, to remind us that much of the charm of fishes lies in the grace of their movements, and in the peculiar lustre which plays upon their sides as they glide through the water, but which is soon lost after death.

Fishes are well adapted to swimming. Their shape is such as to move with the least possible friction, and they are further aided by the smooth, slimy coating, which generally consists of scales overlapping each other like tiles on a roof.

Dr. Hartwig says of fishes: "We wisely endeavor to imitate this peculiar form in the construction of our ships, yet the rapidity with which the fastest clipper cleaves the waters is nothing to the velocity of an animal formed to reside in that element. The flight of an arrow is not more rapid than the darting of a tunny, a salmon, or a gilt-head through the water. Every part of the body seems exerted in this despatch; the fins, the tail, and the motion of the whole backbone assist progression; and it is to this admirable flexibility of body, which mocks the efforts of art, that fishes owe the astonishing rapidity of their movements."

On examining the backbone of a fish you will find it to consist of circular vertebrae, which are concave at each end. The space between the vertebrae is filled with a jelly-like substance, giving great freedom of motion. The ribs are not much curved, and are attached to the spinal column at one end.

The fins are chiefly used to balance the fish in an upright position, while the principal swimming organ is the tail, which is set vertically at the end of the spine, so as to work from side to side.

As the weight of the body is greater than that of the surrounding water, most fishes are supplied with a "swim-bladder," which connects with the oesophagus, and which, being filled with air, assists the fish to rise or sink in the water.

Fishes' gills are leaf-like bodies lying in cavities on each side of the neck, and covered by plates called gill-covers; they may often be seen gently moving when a fish is in its native element. You may also notice the gills in fishes that have been arranged on a string for convenience in carrying; in such cases it is customary to put the string through the "gill-slit."

The breathing of fishes we shall find to be a very simple process. All the air they require is contained in the water, which enters freely at the mouth, passes over the gills, and escapes at the gill-slit. The blood, continually circulating through the gills, absorbs oxygen from the water, and becomes purified. This breathing from water resembles the act of swallowing, with the important difference that the water passes to the gills, and not to the stomach.

We sometimes say, when a fish is taken out of the river, that it dies for want of water. Strictly speaking, it would be more correct to say that it dies for want of air. Surrounded as it is by air, the fish can make no use of it because it is not mixed with water, and the poor creature flounders and throws itself uneasily about as it slowly suffocates.

Fishes are generally well supplied with teeth, since they grow not only on the upper and lower jaw, but are sometimes found on the tongue and the throat. They have also large eyes without any lids. They have no external ears, yet they evidently notice sounds. Fishermen are aware of this fact, so they carry on their sport in profound silence, and the boys and girls who accompany them must leave off their fun and laughter until the fishing is over.

Fishes feed upon small mollusks, or upon other fishes, often devouring their own young. The stomach of a fish which we once dissected contained, to the great surprise of the children who were watching, three small fishes and several crabs, which we thought an abundant supply for one meal.

These inoffensive-looking creatures live in continual warfare, first pursuing their prey, and then, in turn, flying from their own enemies. They have probably more to suffer in this way than other animals, for a great many enemies are waiting to pounce upon them, their eggs, and their young ones.

Flying-fishes (Fig. 2) often leap into the air in large companies to escape pursuit, and their blue bodies and silvery wings glisten prettily in the sunlight. Even here they sometimes meet with new dangers from the greedy gulls and other sea-birds, so they find safety neither in the water nor in the air. The large fins of these fishes act like wings, and enable them to take long, low leaps into the air, but they have no power of raising themselves after having once left the water.

The eggs of fishes are tiny affairs, covered with a thin skin, so transparent that the young fish may be seen tumbling about inside for a day or two before it is hatched.

When the baby fishes first leave the egg they swim about for some time with the yolk bag hanging underneath the body; they take no food during this time, but are nourished by the oily contents of the yolk bag.

Fishes produce large quantities of eggs, a single cod-fish, for instance, having been found to contain nine million eggs. Generally fishes take no care of their eggs or their young ones. There are exceptions, however, to this rule, and some kinds of fishes prepare nests in the bottom of streams, like the sunfish in the picture (Fig. 3), while the stickleback builds a true nest of grass and weeds fastened together with the sticky slime of his own body (Fig. 4). There is a hole entirely through the nest, from one side to the other, that water may constantly flow over the eggs. The male defends the nest bravely, for, strangely enough, among fishes, it falls to the lot of the fathers to build the nest and care for the young ones.

The eggs of the sea-horse (Fig. 1) are well taken care of by the males, which have a pouch in the lower part of their bodies especially for carrying them. The females have no such pouch.

One would scarcely suspect this odd-looking sea-horse, with its long snout, of being a fish. It has a singular habit of twisting its tail round some branch of sea-weed and standing upright in the water, as if watching all that takes place around it. Being a poor swimmer, it often floats with the sea-weed for long distances in this erect position.

Tropical birds and flowers, we know, are brilliant in color; so also are the inhabitants of tropical oceans. We noticed this peculiarity in jelly fishes and in shells, and the same is true with regard to fishes. Some of the gayest fishes live among the coral reefs. The warm waters in which the coral polyps thrive and spread their flower-like tentacles to the sun are further enlivened by glittering fishes, which glide in and out among the brilliant coral branches, and remind us of the similar fact that dazzling birds hover over the brightest flowers.

We might suppose that these lowly creatures would not pay much regard to beauty in selecting their mates, but, with fishes as with every other species of animal, there are points of difference, which we would probably not notice, but which lead to the selection of certain individuals in preference to others. And it has been observed that many fishes grow brilliant as the season approaches for mating. All members of the trout family, for instance, are arrayed in their brightest colors during spawning time.

"A SLIGHT, STOOPING FIGURE ROSE AND ADVANCED TO MEET HER."

A FORTUNATE MISTAKE.

BY FLORENCE HALLOWELL.

"I'M afraid she'll think it very odd if she isn't invited, Pauline. She lives very near Flora, for I heard her say so, and she must know there's something of the kind on foot."

"She'd be stupid if she didn't, when we've done nothing but whisper for the past week," said Pauline Jennings, with a dark frown on her face; "but as to giving her an invitation, I won't. And if any one else asks her, I'll stay at home—that's all."

"I don't see why you dislike her so much," said Eva Walton, gently.

"Oh, she's so shy and awkward, and then she dresses so abominably! Did you notice that dress she wore yesterday? It was so faded I couldn't tell the original color.

Her father must be as poor as Job's turkey. Now there's no use in your trying to persuade me to ask her to go, Eva, for my mind's made up."

"Then I sha'n't try to change it, of course," said Eva; "but I'm afraid she'll be dreadfully hurt."

"If she is, you won't know it," said Pauline, "for there's only one more day of school, I'm glad to say."

The bell rang, and recess was over. Eva had no time to reply, but all the rest of the afternoon she had a feeling of shame whenever her eyes happened to rest on the stooping, awkward figure of Patty Madden, the only girl in the advanced class who had not been asked to join the surprise party to Flora Graves. Eva did not know Patty very well, and was not especially attracted toward her; but being a warm-hearted, good-tempered girl, she did not like the idea of having Patty slighted and wounded unnecessarily. But of course it would not do to give her an invitation in the face of Pauline's opposition, for Pauline had been the one to suggest the party, and had worked hard over the arrangements for it. She had thought and talked of little else for a week past, and had baked more cake for the lunch baskets than all the other girls put together. Flora Graves was her "most particular" friend, and she was therefore anxious that the party should be a pronounced success.

She had not seen Flora for several weeks, for Mr. Graves had recently moved his family to a fine farm about four miles from town, and Flora had concluded not to attend school the rest of the term. It was not convenient for her to have the carriage every morning, and she considered the distance too great for her to walk.

Patty, however, thought nothing of the three-mile tramp morning and night, for she had been born and brought up in the country, and was accustomed to out-door exercise. She was sometimes so fortunate as to get a ride on a neighbor's wagon, and occasionally she made her appearance at school in her father's ox-cart; but as a usual thing she came on foot.

In spite of the shyness and reserve which kept her school-mates at a distance, Patty was very fond of the company of young people of her own age, and, as Eva had supposed, was well aware that Pauline was arranging a grand surprise party to some one, and was both wounded and mortified at being the only girl in the grammar class not invited. But she was too proud to show what she felt, and when school was dismissed at four o'clock, and Pauline left the building without even a look in her direction, she gave no sign of the terrible heart-sickness which made her feel just then as if she had not a friend in the world.

"Good-by," she said to Eva, in a pleasant, even tone, as she walked away, her school-bag on her arm; and Eva, watching her out of sight down the quiet country road, wondered why it was that Pauline disliked her so much.

Knox's big express wagon went around at six o'clock, gathering up all those who were to attend the surprise party, and by half past six they were well on their way.

It was a beautiful June evening, the road was good, and the young people all in high spirits. The time passed so rapidly that the wagon was turning in at a big white gate before any one realized that they were anywhere near their destination.

"I've never been here before," said Pauline.

"Nor I!" "Nor I!" "Nor I!" cried half a dozen other voices.

"Are you sure this is the place, driver?" asked Eva, appealing to the man on the box.

"Well, I ain't just certain, miss," was the reply, "but I reckon it is."

"Oh, of course this is the place," said Pauline, confidently. "I can tell by the poplar-trees. Flora wrote me that the yard was full of them."

As the wagon rolled up to the house the front door was opened by a tall, shy-looking boy of about seventeen years of age, who retreated in manifest dismay as he saw the merry crowd.

"Surprise!" "Surprise!" cried the boys and girls in chorus, and laughing and talking at the top of their voices, they jumped out of the wagon, and went storming into the hall in a body.

Pauline was the first to reach the parlor door, and as she entered it a slight, stooping figure rose hurriedly from a sofa, dropped a book, and advanced to meet her. It was Patty Madden.

Before Pauline could utter the cry of amazement and chagrin that rose to her lips, the parlor was full of her comrades, and Patty, half laughing and half crying, was saying how pleased she was at the honor done her.

"I feel real mean," she said, frankly, "for I heard there was to be a surprise party, and was dreadfully vexed because I hadn't been invited. I never dreamed for a moment that you were all coming here. I am real glad, though, and I intend to make you have a first-rate time. Ned can play the violin and Tom can play the banjo, and we'll have a dance in the new barn."

The members of the surprise party exchanged stealthy glances, but no one said anything to undeceive Patty, who rushed off with a radiant face to find some candles, and tell her brothers what she expected of them.

"Why didn't you say something?" asked Eva, turning to Pauline, as the door closed behind Patty. "We were all waiting for you to speak, of course. It is your party."

"I couldn't say anything," said Pauline, whose face had an unwonted amount of color in it. "Let's make the best of it now we're here. It's too late now to set the matter right."

"Making the best of it" proved very good fun indeed. They danced in the new barn, to the music of the violin and banjo, until they could dance no more. And then Mrs. Madden, who had opened the baskets, invited them all into a great cool room where a most appetizing supper was spread. She had contributed, as Patty's share of the feast, a great bowl of strawberries, which had been picked for market, and two pitchers of delicious thick cream.

"If you always treat us so royally, Patty, we'll be surprising you pretty often," said Tom Parton, who had a weakness for strawberries and cream.

"Come as often as you like," said Patty. "I have enjoyed myself as much as any one. I only wish Flora Graves could have been here; but she went away to-day to spend a week with her grandmother in Utica, as I suppose you all know."

Again the members of the surprise party exchanged stealthy glances, and Tom Parton nudged Pauline, who sat next to him.

Patty drew Pauline to one side for a moment after the good-nights had been said, and the big express wagon was taking on its load again.

"I want to tell you something, Pauline," she said, with shining eyes and a little falter in her voice. "I had very hard thoughts of you to-day. I believed you were leaving me out of this surprise party just to be unkind. Will you forgive me?"

Pauline looked, as she felt, very much ashamed of herself, and she began to realize for the first time what she had lost in neglecting such a bright, sincere girl as Patty Madden.

"It is you who ought to forgive me, Patty," she said. "I haven't treated you very well, I'm afraid. But I mean to be your friend in future if you'll let me."

"If I'll let you?" said Patty; and then the two girls kissed each other, and turned aside to furtively wipe away the tears that had risen to their eyes.

"It was a case of mutual surprise," said Tom Parton, as the big express wagon rolled away a few minutes later. "And it was mighty lucky we did make a mistake in the house. Just suppose we'd gone to Flora's! We would have had to turn right around and go home again. As it is, we've had a glorious time, and I think it would be a good idea to surprise Patty every day or two as long as strawberries are in market."

Every one laughed except Pauline, who was strangely silent. She was thinking how cordially Patty had treated her, and how bravely she had confessed the hard thoughts she had cherished.

"I'll make it up to her—if I ever can," thought Pauline, whose repentance was really sincere.

And Patty, happy in the warm friendship which owed its rise to a most fortunate mistake, never knew that the surprise party she had enjoyed so thoroughly had been intended for another.

BY THE AUTHOR OF

"TOBY TYLER," "MR. STUBBS'S BROTHER," "RAISING THE 'PEARL,'" ETC.

CHAPTER IV.

AN UNFORTUNATE ENCOUNTER.

IN two days after their first appearance on deck the stowaways had become accustomed to their new mode of life. They had tried so hard to please by performing any task allotted to them, or by seeking to find some work at which they might make themselves useful, that, if Captain Sproul considered the matter at all, he must have thought he was fortunate in having two such industrious boys, even if they had come on board without his knowledge or consent.

There was but one person on board the Clio who was not kindly disposed toward the industrious little stowaways, and that was Mr. Samuel Harding, the first mate. He had not forgotten that both the boys had knocked him down when they made their first appearance on deck, and even though such familiarity toward the first officer was unintentional, he had not forgiven them. He was probably so foolish as to also harbor unkindly feelings toward the boys because they had been the unwitting cause of his having received a reprimand from the Captain, at the time when he would have given way to his anger, and while every one else had a kindly word for the stowaways, he never spoke.

"You don't want to pay no kind of attention to him," Abe said to Jerry, after the latter had expressed his regret at having unintentionally displeased the first officer. "Of course Captain Sproul would make everybody treat respectfully and obey the first mate, no matter who he was; but he don't like this one any better'n the rest of us do. Who's Sam Harding, I'd like to know, that he can put on airs just because he's first mate? Why, pretty nigh all of us here were brought up in the same town with him, and we know just what he's worth to a cent. He acts as if he thought he was a better navigator than the Captain; but between me and you he ain't any more fit to sail a vessel than I am."

"But all the same he hates to have Pete and me around," said Jerry, who could find no particular consolation in the arguments the cook was advancing.

"You keep on about your work, and don't pay any attention to him," said Abe, as he stirred the hash vigorously lest it should receive more of a browning than would please Captain Sproul. "Of course, if he tells you to jump, you've got to do it, and pretty lively too; but don't try to fix anything special for him, 'cause it wouldn't do any more good than to coax a cat not to catch mice. You want to look alive now, and get the supper into the cabin, for it's about ready. I guess I'd better help you this time, or you may lose some of it, for the old brig's dancing like a pea in a hot pan."

"I can carry it in all right," insisted Jerry, eager to do as much work as possible. "Pete is waiting to open the cabin door when he sees me coming, so I won't have any trouble."

As he spoke, Jerry took the teapot from the stove and left the galley, darting from one point of vantage to another, until he succeeded, thanks to Pete's aid, in reaching the cabin in safety.

His second trip was disastrous in more ways than one.

Abe had dashed up the hash in a large platter which it was impossible for Jerry to carry in one hand; therefore he was obliged to make his way across the deck as best he could, without supporting himself by anything. He left the galley as the vessel rolled, running directly down to leeward that he might have the shelter of the rail, and this experiment was a successful one until the time when he was obliged to go up the incline of the deck to reach the cabin door. Twice he attempted to do this; but the rolling of the vessel forced him to await a more favorable opportunity.

It was just when the time had come that Jerry thought he should make one bold dash for the door which Pete was holding open, that Mr. Harding started to come around the windward side of the deck-house.

Jerry saw nothing but his burden and the open door, and thought of nothing save getting the food into the cabin intact. As the brig stood on an even keel for an instant, he started at full speed; but Mr. Harding had gained the door a few seconds in advance of him. To continue on was to run directly into the first officer, who made no attempt to get out of the boy's way, although he must have seen him. Jerry tried to stop, but his momentum was great, and, besides, the brig lurched just at that instant, throwing him, hash, platter, and all, directly on to Mr. Harding's back, he being then exactly on the threshold of the door.

Even then Jerry could not stop, but rolled across the deck into the scuppers, and back again to leeward as the vessel pitched, and then Pete rushed to his assistance.

The first officer was in a towering rage. He was covered from head to foot with the rather moist hash, and had only saved himself from being thrown down through his hold on the cabin door. The noise of the wind had prevented Abe from hearing the slight sound that followed the breaking of the platter, and he was in blissful ignorance of the ruin that had befallen his carefully prepared supper. His surprise, therefore, may be imagined when, a few seconds later, on looking out from the galley, he saw Mr. Harding run quickly across the deck to leeward and seize Jerry by the collar, just as Pete was helping him to his feet.

"What do you mean, you young scoundrel?" he cried, as he swung Jerry around that he might seize the bight of a coil of rope that hung from the main rigging. "Don't think I didn't see you waiting until I was where you would have some reason for saying that it was an accident."

"But it was an accident, sir; indeed it was," pleaded Jerry, now thoroughly frightened. "I never saw you at all, sir, until I got close to the door, and then I did my best to stop."

"You lie, you young rascal!" cried the angry man, as he raised the rope's end and brought it down across the boy's back with all the force he could bestow.

Abe stood in the galley door, gazing at this scene of brutality with flashing eyes, but powerless to prevent it. When the Captain is not on deck, the first officer has full authority, and the law calls it by the ugly name of mutiny if any of the crew attempt to resist an officer, or even to restrain him, when he is brutally cruel.

Pete stood by the rail while his only friend was being ill treated, looking as if he had been paralyzed by the sight. He neither spoke nor moved until the mate had whipped Jerry for several moments, and then a sudden change came over him.

"Don't you strike Jerry again!" he cried, in a perfect fury of rage that distorted his features until one would have looked in vain for any resemblance to those of the little musician. "Don't you dare to strike him!"

As he spoke he seized an iron belaying-pin and rushed toward the mate, as if he believed he could aid his friend. It would have been impossible for Pete, small and weak as he was, to have inflicted any injury on the mate, for even the weapon he held was quite as much as he could lift—more than he could raise above his head.

Mr. Harding, however, chose to treat Pete as if he was a dangerous mutineer. Dropping the rope, but still retaining his hold on Jerry's collar, he struck viciously at Pete with his clenched fist, knocking him prostrate, and sending him fully twenty feet along the deck.

* Begun in No. 336, HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE.

"WHAT DO YOU MEAN, YOU' YOUNG SCOUNDREL?" HE CRIED."

Up to this moment Jerry had not made even the slightest show of resistance. He had stood perfectly still, as if he had deserved the treatment he was receiving; but the instant Pete fell, the mate learned what the boy might have done at first had he been so disposed. Twisting himself around, at the expense of the collar of his jacket, which gave way at the first wrench, Jerry fought desperately to hold the man's hands, for he feared that more punishment would be inflicted upon poor little Pete, who was lying on the deck, with Abe bending over him.

"Take that cub into the forksle," Mr. Harding shouted to Abe. "I guess he'll mind his own business in the future."

Jerry hardly knew what was happening around him at that time, so bewildered was he. Half unconsciously he noticed that there were tears on Abe's cheeks as the cook raised the little musician in his arms as tenderly as if he had been an infant, and then it seemed to him as if a cloud had descended upon the brig, for he could see nothing. He heard a voice that sounded as if from afar off say:

"This is only a taste of what you will get in the future if you try any more of your tricks on me."

After that he was conscious of nothing until he felt the shock of water in his face, and opening his eyes, he saw two or three of the sailors near him, one of whom was bathing his head and hands. It was only for a few moments that he had been senseless, and the appearance of the deck was the same as before the cloud had shut it out from his view. He attempted unsuccessfully to gain his feet, and the man who had been bathing his head said:

"Want to get below, eh? I'll take you there, lad, for it ain't likely you can get around very lively yet awhile. But I've got this to say, mates," he added, as he raised his voice and looked defiantly at Mr. Harding, who was nervously pacing the quarter-deck as if he had not yet recovered from his anger, "and I don't care who hears me: If there's any law ashore, it ought to be served out to them as will beat babies till they can't stand."

"Right you are, Bill," said one of the others, who also spoke in a loud tone, as if desirous that Mr. Harding should hear him: "but I want to say here that I've sailed with Captain Sproul three years and more, and I never saw a man struck on his vessel before, to say nothing of a child."

The mate must have heard these remarks, as the men intended he should, but he made no sign of having done so, and the first speaker carried Jerry below, even though the boy insisted that he could walk unaided.

"Very likely you can, after a fashion, lad, for you don't feel as sore and lame now as you will to-morrow, but I'll carry you down just the same, for there's no telling where your head might lead you if you should try to navigate alone."

Pete was in by no means as bad a condition as Jerry had feared. When the latter was brought into the forecastle, where the watch below were indulging in very uncomplimentary remarks about their first officer, he saw the little musician sitting on a sea-chest, while Abe was putting a bandage on his head.

The cook was in a towering passion. He gave no heed to the fact that all hands were waiting for supper, and that the food intended for the cabin table had been spoiled, but continued to express his opinion of "Sam Harding," as he persisted in speaking of the chief mate.

"When the Captain wants to know why the cabin supper hasn't been served, I'll have the chance to tell him that I had to leave the galley to prevent a baby his beautiful mate had been knocking down from bleeding to death. If that don't stir up Captain Sproul I'm mistaken, and Sam Harding will find things pretty hot for him, or my name ain't Abe Green."

Pete had not spoken from the time the cook had restored him to consciousness, nor did he do so when Jerry was brought into the fore-castle; but as soon as the bandage had been adjusted, he got into the berth by Jerry's side, where he lay silent, but convulsed from time to time by dry, choking sobs.

"Now, just look at that!" cried Abe, passionately. "See what Sam Harding can do when he tries, and yet every one of us stood by like bumps on a log while he was a doing of it."

"That's true, cookee," said the man who had answered to the name of Bill, "and that's all we could do unless we'd called the Captain. It ain't no ways a nice thing raising your hand agin one of the officers when you're on the high seas. I don't know how we could 'a acted any different from what we did; but it strikes me that we can do something when once we're ashore. Then I'll go in with any of the rest to give him the same as he served out to the boys, or to see what the law will do for him."

"Give him a dose of law first," suggested one of the men, "and then, if the judge don't do any more than fine him, we can all turn to and give him our ideas of the law, each on his own account."

"The Captain wants the cook!" shouted a voice from the deck.

"There!" said Abe, in a tone of satisfaction; "I knowed it wouldn't be long before I got some sich word as that, and now we'll see what Captain Sproul has got to say about having Sam Harding a-spending his time flogging babies."

There was no question in the minds of any of the men but that Captain Sproul would receive a highly colored account of the whole affair; and as all hands had sailed in the Clio before, they were reasonably certain that Mr. Harding would, in some way, be obliged to answer for that which he had done.

"We'll go on deck, mates, so the first officer can't say we're down here plotting mischief;" and the sailor patted Jerry on the head as he turned to leave the fore-castle.

"It may be that we sha'n't hear any more about this thing until after we get into port; but then the mate will get pulled up with a short turn, or I'm a marine."

The men went on deck, and the poor little stowaways, sore in heart as well as in body, were left alone to cheer each other as best they might.

"I'd like to kill him!" Jerry whispered, as he put his arm affectionately around Pete. "I could 'a stood it to have him beat me, and I wouldn't 'a said a word; but he ought to be chopped up into little pieces for hitting you."

"That didn't hurt me half as much as it did to see him flogging you, Jerry. It seemed as if I didn't know what to do at first; but afterward, if I could have hit him with that belaying-pin, I'm 'most sure I'd 'a done it. Are you very sore, Jerry?"

"I'm madder than anything else, though I do kinder smart. But don't think about it, Pete. It won't be long before we get to New York, and after we've found your folks we'll pay him off some way."

Neither of the boys felt much inclination to talk. Pete had a very severe headache, and Jerry was growing more sore and more lame each moment. For a long time they remained silent. Pete still kept his hands on his friend's face, while Jerry had thrown his arm over the little musician's neck, and they were occupying these positions when Captain Sproul entered the fore-castle. He stood looking at the boys a moment, as if trying to learn whether they were asleep or awake, and Jerry, who thought the Captain was waiting for him to speak, said:

"Indeed I didn't mean to hit Mr. Harding, sir. I was trying to carry the hash into the cabin, and didn't see him till he got right in the doorway. Then I tried to stop, but couldn't."

"Did you say anything to him?"

"I tried to tell him that I couldn't help it; but he wouldn't believe me."

"What did Pete do?"

"Well, you see, sir, Pete he didn't hardly know what he was about when he saw me getting a flogging, and he tried to strike Mr. Harding with a belaying-pin; but I don't believe he could have hit him very hard."

The Captain made no reply. He unfastened the bandage to look at the cut on Pete's cheek, ordered Jerry to pull off his jacket, when he saw the long marks of the blows, that were swollen and rapidly discoloring, and having finished the examination, he asked, "Is there anything you would like?"

"Nothing but water, sir, and I can get that," replied Jerry, making a motion as if he was about to rise, but was forced to lie down again immediately, because of the increase of pain caused by the movement.

"Lie still, both of you. The cook will soon be here with something for your back, and I will put some sticking-plaster on Pete's cheek. I hope you will feel better in the morning."

"I reckon we shall, sir," replied Jerry, with a feeble attempt at cheerfulness. "I'm almost sure I'll be all right, so I can do my work."

"Don't worry about that," said the Captain, with a kindly smile. "We can get the Clio into port even if we don't call on you to do anything more."

Then he left the fore-castle, and while the boys were speculating as to what he meant when he spoke of being able to sail the brig without their assistance, Abe came below. He went to work at once to bathe Jerry's back, shoulders, and arms, and although it was not his custom to remain silent very long at a time, he hardly spoke. Jerry thought at first that he was offended with them, and was about to ask the cause of offence, when the Captain came into the fore-castle again. Then Abe's silence was explained; he knew the Captain would follow him, and he had not entered into conversation through fear of being overheard. Captain Sproul fastened the wound on Pete's cheek with sticking-plaster, put on fresh bandages, and after telling Abe what to do for Jerry, went on deck.

"Did he ask you any questions?" whispered the cook, when he and the boys were alone again.

Jerry told him all that had been said during the Captain's first visit, and was about to ask for an explanation of the remark about getting the brig into port without their aid, when Abe said:

"He wanted to know why supper hadn't been sent into the cabin, and I told him the whole thing. He looked hopping mad; but he didn't say anything. After a while I saw him talking with Sam Harding, and I reckon Mister Sam won't bring his dunnage aboard this brig agin—leastways not while Captain Sproul is in command of her. The next time he goes to sea he ought to start in a dory all by himself, for he ain't fit to sail with decent people."

BY HOWARD PYLE,
AUTHOR OF "PEPPER AND SALT," ETC.

THIS is the way that this story begins: Once upon a time there was a rich brother and a poor brother, and the one lived across the street from the other. The rich brother had all of the world's gear that was good for him, and more besides; the poor brother had hardly enough to keep soul and body together, yet he was contented with his lot. One day who should come travelling to the town where the rich brother and the poor brother lived but St. Nicholas himself.

Just beside the town gate stood the great house of the rich brother; thither went the saint and knocked at the door, and it was the rich brother himself who came and opened it to him.

Now St. Nicholas had had a long walk of it that day, so that he was quite covered with dust, and looked no better than he should. So when the rich brother heard St. Nicholas ask for a night's lodging at his fine great house, he gaped like a toad in a rain-storm. There was no place for the likes of him in the house, and that was the truth. But yonder was a poor man's house across the street; if he went over there, perhaps he could get a night's lodging and a crust of bread. That was what the rich brother said.

So there was nothing for good St. Nicholas to do but to go across the street to the poor brother's house. Rap! tap! tap! he knocked at the door, and it was the poor brother who came and opened it for him. Was it lodging for the night that St. Nicholas was wanting? Then he should have it and welcome, and the very best that the poor man had in his house besides.

So in came St. Nicholas, and sat himself down behind the stove, where it was good and warm, while the good wife spread before him all that they had in the house—a loaf of brown bread and a crock of cold water from the town fountain.

"And is that all that you have to eat?" said St. Nicholas. Yes; that was all, and the best that they had.

Then maybe the good saint could help them to a better feast than that if they would bring him a bowl and a crock.

You may guess that the poor man's wife was not long in fetching what he wanted. When they were brought, the saint blessed the one and passed his hand over the other. Then he said, "Bowl, be filled!" And what do you think happened? Why, the bowl began to boil up with a good rich meat pottage until it was full to the brim. Then the saint said, "Bowl, be stilled!" and it stopped making the broth, and there stood as good a feast as man could wish for. Then St. Nicholas said, "Crock, be filled!" and the crock began to bubble up with the purest of crystal water; then he said, "Crock, be stilled!" and there stood as good drink as man ever poured down his throat.

Down they all sat—the saint and the poor man and the poor man's wife—and ate and drank till they could eat and drink no more, and whenever the bowl and the crock grew empty, the one and the other filled itself at the bidding.

The next morning the saint trudged off the way he was going, but he left behind him the bowl and the crock, so that there was no danger of hunger and thirst coming to that house.

One day the rich brother said to his wife, "See, now, fortune seems to be stroking our brother over yonder the right way; I'll just go and see what it all means." So over the street he went, and the upshot of the matter was that, bit by bit, he dragged out the whole story from the poor man. Then nothing would do but he must see the bowl and the crock at work. So the bowl and the crock were brought and set to work, and—hui! how the rich brother opened his eyes when he saw how they made good food and drink of themselves!

Then nothing would do for him but to have that bowl and crock. At first the poor brother said "No," but at last he consented to let him have the two for a hundred dollars, and off he marched.

When the next day had come, the rich brother said to his wife: "Never you mind about the dinner to-day. Go you into the harvest field, and I will see to the dinner." So off went the wife with the harvesters, and the husband staid at home and smoked his pipe all the morning. When noontide had come, he took out the bowl and the crock as fine as you please, and placing them on the table, said, "Bowl, be filled! crock, be filled!" and straightway they began making broth and drink as fast as they could.

In a little while the bowl and the crock were filled, and then they could hold no more, so that the food ran down all over the table and the floor. Then the rich brother was in a pretty pickle, for he did not know how to bid the bowl and the crock to stop from making what they were making. Out he ran to the poor man's house; and meanwhile the stuff filled the whole room until it could hold no more, and then ran out into the gutters.

"Oh, dear brother," cried the rich man to the poor man, "do tell me what to do, or the whole town will soon be smothered in broth and water."

But no; the poor brother was not to be stirred in such haste; they would have to strike a bit of a bargain first. So the upshot of the matter was that the rich brother had to pay the poor brother another hundred dollars to take the crock and the bowl back again.

As for the poor man, he was well off in the world now, for he had all that he could eat and drink, and a stockingful of money back of the stove besides.

And now St. Christopher was thinking about taking a little journey below. "See, brother," says St. Nicholas to him, "if you chance to be jogging by yonder town, stop at the poor man's house, for there you will have a warm welcome and plenty to eat."

But when St. Christopher came to the town, the rich man's house seemed so much larger and finer than the poor man's house, that he thought he would ask for lodging there.

But it fared the same with him as it had with St. Nicholas. Bang! the door was slammed in his face, and the saint packed off with a flea in his ear.

Over he went to the poor man's house, and there was a warm welcome for him, and good broth and water from the bowl and the crock that St. Nicholas had blessed. After he had supped, he went to bed, where he slept as snug as a mouse in the nest.

Then the good wife said to the husband: "See, now, the poor fellow's shirt is none too good for him to be wearing. I'll just make him another whilst he is sleeping, so that he'll have a decent bit of linen to wear in the morning."

So she brought her best roll of linen out of the closet, and set to work stitching and sewing, and never stopped till she had made the new shirt to the last button. The next morning when the saint awoke, there lay the nice new clean shirt, and he put it on and gave thanks for it.

Before he left the house the poor man took him aside, and emptied the stockingful of silver money on the table, and bade the saint take what he wanted.

After that it was time for the holy man to be jogging, but before he went he said: "See, now, because you have been so kind and so good to a poor traveller, I will give you a blessing, and it shall be that whatever you begin doing this morning you shall continue doing till sunset." So saying, he took up his staff and went his way.

After St. Christopher had gone, the poor man and his wife began talking together as to what would be best for them to be doing all of the day.

"Come," said the good woman, "while we are talking the matter over, I will be folding the linen that is left from making the shirt."

"And I," said the good man, "will be putting the silver away that the holy man has left."

So the wife began folding the linen into a bundle again, and the man began putting away the money that he had offered in charity. That was the first thing they did, and they kept on doing it, so that by the time the evening had come the whole house was full of fine linen, and every tub and bucket about the place was brimming with silver money.

That night who should come over from across the street but the rich brother. Dear heart's sake alive! where did all these fine things come from? That was what he should like to know.

Oh! there was nothing to hide in the matter, and so the poor man told all about what had happened.

So the rich brother made the poor brother promise that if either of the saints came that way again, he should be sent over to his house for a night's lodging, for it was only fair and just that he should have a share of the same cake.

Well, a year and a day passed, and then who should come along that way but both the saints together.

They were willing enough to go to the rich brother's house, though they would rather have staid with the other, and that was the truth.

But you should have seen the feast that was set for the two saints at the rich man's house. I can only say that I never saw the like, and I only wish that I had been there with my legs under the table. After supper they were shown to bed, and before they were fairly asleep the rich man's wife came and took away their old shirts and laid a shirt of fine cambrie linen in the place of each. When the next morning had come and the saints were about to take their leave, the rich brother brought out a great bag of golden money, and bade them to stuff what they would of it into their pockets.

Well, all this was as it should be, and before the two saints went on their way they said that they would send the same blessing to him and his wife that they had sent to the other couple—that whatsoever they should begin doing that morning, that they should continue doing until sunset.

After that they put on their hats and took up their staffs, and off they plodded.

Now the rich brother was a very envious man, and was not contented to do only as well as his brother had done; so down he sat back of the stove and began turning the matter over in his mind.

In the mean time the wife said to herself: "See, now, I shall be folding fine cambrie linen all day, and the pigs will have to go with nothing to eat. I have no time to waste in feeding them, but I'll just run out and fill their troughs with water."

So out she went with a bucketful of water, and began pouring it into the troughs for the pigs. That was the first thing she did, and after that there was no leaving off, but pour water she must until sunset.

All this while the man sat back of the stove, saying to himself, "Shall I do this? shall I do that?" and answering "no" to himself every time. At last he wondered what his wife was doing, so out he went to find her. Find her he did, for there she was pouring out water for the pigs. Then if anybody was angry, it was the rich man.

He looked around, and there lay a bit of a switch on the ground near by. He picked up the switch and struck the woman across the shoulders with it, and that was the first thing that he began doing. After that he had to keep on doing the same thing until sunset.

They made such a hubbub that the neighbors came to see what was going forward. They looked, and laughed, and went away again, and others came, and there stood the two—the woman pouring water, and the man beating her with the bit of a switch.

When the evening came, and they left off their work, they were so weary that they could hardly stand; and nothing was to show for it but a sore back and a wet sty, for even the blessed saints cannot give wisdom to those who shut their eyes to it, and that is the truth.

MARGUERITE II.

WEEKEND, NORTH WALES.

We have a very nice big dog; he is a St. Bernard, and his name is Druid. I have had him bad cough, and have been in my bed a long time. I have sometimes had the dog in the room to keep me company. He is very gentle, and we are all very fond of him. I have seen in Harper's Young People from whom the commencement, and at the close of last year my brother George got the papers bound for me in real leather. We have had a very fine snow on the ground for some time, and I have had much snow in New York? I have an uncle, an aunt, and two little cousins living in Savannah, they live in England about seven years ago. I had a very nice letter from my little cousin Nellie, although she is only eight years old. My uncle says that beautiful flowers grow out of doors in Savannah all the year round. I am afraid my cough will keep me from school the whole of this term. I am very sorry, as I like to go very much. I have had a very nice piano and music. I wanted my father to bring up the piano into my bedroom, that I might practice, but father thought that I ought to play for some time, and I am afraid it will be some weeks more before I go down-stairs. I enclose a puzzle, which I have made myself. I hope you will put this letter in the magazine.

GRIZZIE B. (aged 11 years).

Thank you for the puzzle.

LONDON, ENGLAND.

I thought I would write a letter about our visit to the London Hospital, and in a plain dress made of dark blue serge, and a white mull cap edged with lace, took us to the children's ward, called Barton Ward. There were fifteen cots, but only eight patients, and three cots with babies in them from three to six months old, also two bed tables. Each of the cots has wooden trays for the medicine. We took two dolls, two scrap-books, and a musical box, and as soon as we entered the ward the children screamed for a doll, a book, etc. I like to quilt, and I like to read. I like to read "Canton Bannet Mother Hubbard dresses, which look very cheerful. One little girl was cross because we did not give her a doll, and she wanted to tell me. Another girl told me she had three years, and has spinal trouble, I believe. I have a baby doll, a doll in short clothes, a butcher store, and some soldiers to take down when I make my second visit. I could write a much longer letter about this hospital, but don't like to take up so much room in your valuable paper, so I have cut three scrap-books to St. Mary's Hospital, New York, and a week ago last Thursday had a letter from Katie Archibald, which is in this hospital. I intend to make a book of the names of the children, and send you some shanrock I got on St. Patrick's Day. MARY P.

Thank you for the shanrock. The children in St. Mary's will be glad to see you, and I have no doubt the little invalids in the hospital which you describe so pleasantly were the better for your visit.

SHARPLESBURY, WESHAMPTON, HAMPSHIRE, ENGLAND.

DEAR POSTMASTER, I have never written to you before, so I hope you will be able to find room for this letter. We have a little dog named Pinner. He has been run about three times, and is now the worst for it. He is very fond of a badger earth for three days. He is very once in hunting rabbits, and he has been shot once. My sister likes me to read Harper's Young People every month, and I like reading the letters very much. I was born at Malta. My favorite story in Harper's Young People are "The Lost City" and "The Arroyos." Will you tell me what your favorite flower is? I have a book in which I press wild flowers, as I am so fond of them; my sister has etched the cover of it most beautifully. I do have some flowers growing near here that only grow in two other places in England. They are called fritillaries. There are two kinds, one is blue and white. They grow very early in the spring and are shaped like a bell. I hope this won't be too long. Good-by. ALICE F. G.

Mignonette is my darling among flowers, and violet is next in my love, but I like all fragrant flowers very much.

CHERRIS, LONDON, ENGLAND.

I am a girl thirteen years old, like HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE very much. "Roif House" is my favorite story. I think "Nan Lovely." I have only one pet, a cat named Romeo, a beautiful orange, is now old. Our house faces "Over the Thames" and we have a lovely view. There is a bridge nearly opposite our house, and Battersea Park is only the other side of the river. We live in Chyeve Walk, and a little along from our house is Chyeve Road and No. 21 is where Thomas Carlyle lived. There is a grand bronze statue raised to his memory in the gardens opposite our house. A good way farther along is Chyeve Walk, Joseph M. W. Turner, the painter, lived. There used to live here a number of historical people, but most of them are dead. As this is the first letter I ever wrote you, I remain your constant reader.

JEAN.

JEAN was a little girl who lived with her parents and brothers and sisters in a small cottage far out in the country. She also had her old grandmother living with her. Jean was eight years old. She had short curly hair and dark and blue eyes; she was very lively in disposition, and she also had a defect which a great many children have—a quick temper. She had two brothers, a little boy of four. Jean was always known as J. She was rewarded when she did anything good, because she so seldom did, and she was always in mischief.

One day all the family except Mr. Bill (d's father) and Jim were out near the pond in front of the house. Some of them were looking at the pond except little Freddie. Suddenly a splash was heard, and turning round, they saw Freddie splashing about in the water. He began to cry, and his mother was very cold, as it was in the month of March. J., as soon as she saw the danger, took off her boots and dashed into the water, and being out of her boots she said, "Help! help!" Then she called, "Throw us a rope."

Every one who was in a hurry; but in a minute or two Jim, who was near by, heard the screams, and rushing to them, pulled both the children out of the pond.

"Naughtier!" said his mother; "how dare you go into the pond?" By this time Freddie was crying as hard as he could.

Mr. Bill, who had arrived upon the scene of disaster, asked the story, and asked, "Where is Jean? I wish to thank her for saving Fred."

But Jean had disappeared, no one knew where she had gone to her room. She had had done it all herself. "Oh, if I had only done it," said she, "they all would think that I was brave, and papa and mamma would have thanked me. But I'm so use; every time that I try to do something I always fail." Jean had not taken off her shoes, and she was so cold. Just then she heard her father call:

"Jeanie, come here, my dear. Where are you?"

"Here, papa, in my room."

By this time her father was in her room.

"Jeanie, my dear," said he, "I want to thank you for saving Freddie."

"But, papa, I did not save him; it was Jim who did it. I only kept him up till Jim came."

"Well, if you had not been kept up by my brave Jean, he would have sunk, and Jim might not have arrived in time, and then our poor little Freddie would have been drowned."

"How did I really save him? Oh, I am so glad."

"Yes, Jean, and I want you to know that Freddie owes his life to you, and you are these things, you should not have had him so long."

"This time Jeanie was not rewarded by anything that was given her, but by her father's love."

A STORY ON ANIMALS.

Animals are things that have life about them, or breathe; nothing is an animal that does not breathe. They are respectfully called bipeds, quadrupeds, and cutts; all these are people, and all quadrupeds are dumb animals. Some have two feet and some have four. There are a great many classes of animals, such as sheep, horses, and cats; all these and many more have four feet; but people, chickens, canaries, pigeons, and birds generally have two feet.

OUR VISIT TO THE BEAVER DAM.

It was a pleasant October afternoon when a party of six—Mr. A., Mrs. A., my father and mother, my sister, and I—started for a beaver dam about two miles away from where we live. We went across on rocks in the water. The creek where the dam was about twenty feet wide, and the dam was about four feet high, made of sticks and mud. We saw stumps of trees and branches where the beavers had cut them; some were as much as three inches thick. It seems so queer that those little animals could cut such big branches with their teeth. We saw well-worn paths where they had been back and forth with their wood. I have read that the beaver will never go in a path after any human being has walked on it. When we reached the dam, we crossed the creek in a different place than when going, and the water was quite deep. Mr. A. and my father helped us across. Mr. A. being strong, carried his wife and me across, and would have carried the rest if they had let him. We were very tired when we reached home, but we were well paid for our long walk, and we will never forget the beaver dam.

TAKE HEED.

BY GATH BRITTLE.

FOOT-SORE, hungry, and out of heart,
A fox and wolf were wearily trotting,
Devising plans to gain a meal
At little cost of time in plotting.

As one they spied a mule, who stood
Out in the meadow calmly thinking,
His long ears flapping to and fro,
His sleepy eyes serenely blinking.

"Ha!" whispered Fox, a tricky elf,
"Dear brother Wolf, as I'm a sinner,
Here's just what we most sorely need;
Here's meat for many a hearty dinner."

"What beast it is," said brother Wolf,
"I fain would learn ere we assail him."
Said brother Fox, "Your hint is good:
Suppose you march right up and hail him."

"Friend with the waving ears," said Wolf,
"We strangers both are glad to greet you.
I'm Wolf; he's Fox. What is your name?
It is an honor, sir, to meet you."

"My name," said Mule, "is graven deep
Upon my hinder hoof—the near one;
You'll laugh when you have spelled it out,
For it is such a very queer one."

Wolf trotted gayly to the rear.
Mule raised his foot—to save him trouble—
Then let it drive. Fall ten feet off
Poor Wolf lay lifeless on the stubble.

And when you interview a mule,
For safety's sake don't stand behind him.

LITTLE COQUETTE.

BY MARGARET E. SANGSTER.

HER father's little comforter,
When trials round him press,
The magic of her lacy ways (Cleans life of bitterness,
All day he toils with hand and brain,
Of trouble has his share,
But evening brings him home again,
And sweet Coquette is there.

"Papa! papa!" the silver tones
In flute-like sound will fall,
As comes a rush of flying feet
Along the stair and hall;
O, little eager blushing face,
O, dancing eyes of blue,
The kisses give the dimples chase,
Papa's in love with you.

In love with tender clinging arms,
With winsome look and smile,
With merry mouth and fearless brow,
So innocent of guile,
O, little sweetheart, hold him fast,
'Tis lover fond and true;
Your father is your paladin,
And strong to care for you.

If e'er for him the tempter's art
Shall spread a gilded lure,
He'll spurn the evil thing away,
And keep his spirit pure,
While though the day bring toil and pain,
No hour shall weave a snare,
Till evening bid him home again,
And sweet Coquette is there.

O, little lovely woman-child,
Through all the future years
Be yours the gentle ministry
To soothe the hurt of tears,
In changing moods of sun and shower,
Your father's amulet,
And his dear love your richest dower,
Our April maid Coquette.

DON.

BY CAROLINE SINCLAIR.

"HOOP-LA!" came in ringing tones up the cañon, followed by the rush and trampling of many feet upon the sun-dried earth, as a band of thirty or forty horses swept out from under the trees by the arroyo, urged on by Juan, the vaquero, who with voice and swinging lariat kept them in swift mad flight to the corral, and by an open gate leading into the alameda, or almond orchard.

Quickly coiling the lariat, hanging it upon the pommel of the saddle, and dropping the reins upon the horse's neck, Juan dismounted at the gate, and proceeded to close and fasten it, while Don, waiting a second only in quivering restlessness, suddenly plunged away, the tapaderos knocking loudly against his sides, and joined his comrades just as Jollie was about to close the gate.

Instantly there seemed to be an intelligence among the horses that something unusual had occurred, for the whole band huddled in one corner, with Don in their midst, and faced the corral house, into which Juan, white with anger, had disappeared.

Not a word had been spoken. Jollie, the Chinaman, leaned against the bars, ready to act, yet watching the next move.

The horses, with necks craned forward, gave a start backward as Juan appeared with a big "black-snake" whip, an ugly-looking rawhide, and taking his stand in the centre of the corral, called, "Don, come here!" Don, who had watched every movement of his master, looked round upon the other horses in mute appeal, put his nose gravely, gently, to the nose of a big bay near, raised his head, and at the second command from his irate owner, walked proudly out, his head on one side, his large eyes fixed upon his master's face. He took the cutting, stinging lash, which curled around his flanks relentlessly, until, unable to bear it, he would rush back into the band of crowding, trembling horses. The third time he walked out to punishment his eyes were suffused as if with tears, yet no fear was expressed in his manner, only a grand obedience to the word of command. And when Juan, his anger over, told him to follow him to the corral house, the horse stepped by his side, thrusting his beautiful head into the saddle-room to view his master hang up the whip.

Flinging himself into the saddle, Juan signed to Jollie to open the gate, and riding to the alameda, leisurely opened and shut the big gate, Don standing very quietly where he was halted. His lesson was learned, never to be forgotten.

A pained yet interested witness of this scene, I admired the noble conduct of the horse; he had had no especial training, but was naturally intelligent and affectionate, and would, I am convinced, have fully understood how wrongly he had acted in running away if Juan had been less cruel.

Some years after this, seeing a wonderful exhibition of horses trained to obedience through love and quiet words, I remembered with regret poor Don, subject to the fierce anger of an ignorant man, and I wished that a happier lot had been his.

THE DESERT FAIRY'S GIFT.

BY LUCY C. LILLIE.

AUTHOR OF "NAN," "BOLY HORSE," "JO'S OPPORTUNITY," ETC.

THERE was once upon a time a Queen who had a daughter so beautiful that she was named All-fair, and when the fairies were invited to her christening, they were informed that their very best gifts were expected. Accordingly one after another arrived at the palace so laden that the large gates had to be taken down to make room for the chariots to roll in, and the great court-yard was fairly ablaze with the splendor of the gifts they brought. But the Queen looked forward to the coming of the Desert Fairy most impatiently, for this reason: it was well known that this fairy could bestow a very important gift, and the Queen and her ladies, as they sat in one of the upper rooms, whence they could watch every one coming and going, wondered what it could be, or if the other fairies had left anything to be desired. For one had brought a gold mantle studded with precious stones which would preserve All-fair's health, and always keep wind and rain from her; another, a cap which needed only to be worn to summon any one from any part of the palace into her presence; a third, a ring which required just the least touch to cause the most interesting book to read itself aloud without the bother of having to say "Louder," or "Not so loud," or "Don't go so fast," or any of the things that make listening a bore; while a fourth endowed her with a badge which she just had to pin on over her heart, and she couldn't feel sorry for herself or any one or anything.

Nobody knew where the Desert Fairy lived, so the Queen and her ladies could not tell from which window to watch for her coming. They stationed themselves north, south, east, and west, and every time a little cloud of dust appeared, one of them would call out, "There she is," or, "Here she comes"; but they were wrong, for suddenly a voice exclaimed, right in their midst, "Well, ladies, waiting for me?" And there stood the Desert Fairy, smiling and courtesying, with a great deal of sarcasm in her manner.

The Queen said yes, they were, and promptly summoned all the fairies and the ladies and gentlemen and people of the court, and the trumpeter announced the entrance of the Princess All-fair.

Twelve pages headed the procession with long scrolls on which were written lists of all her inheritances, the names of her various attendants, and then what she was expected to become in future, while a herald, standing on the lower steps of the throne, proclaimed the fairies' gifts.

Now the baby, lying on a golden pillow, and carried by four ladies of the court, next appeared, and she was so beautiful that the "ohs!" and "ahs!" and "ohmys!" uttered on every side caused such a draught that the Lord Chamberlain sneezed his wig directly into the middle of the floor, whereupon there was dead silence until some one chuckled.

The Desert Fairy was guilty of something very like a laugh at this, and she was smiling still. But she was not laughing all the time. While the gifts were pouring in, she looked very grave, and at last, when it came her turn, she stepped forward, and even the most sedate of the fairies said they had never seen her look so sad.

"You will be surprised," she said, gravely, "when I tell you that on my way hither the gift I had for the Princess rolled out of my hand and was lost. I cannot, therefore, give it to her; but as from various evidences I am more convinced than ever she will need it sorely, I promise that if after her seventeenth birthday, with her whole heart she looks long and carefully, she will find it."

Time went on, and the Princess grew year by year more beautiful than anything you can imagine, and of course she had the entire court trying to please her; but at last, as nothing would satisfy her unless she had the reins of government in her own hands, her father abdicated his throne and went away to a country place he owned, where, to tell the truth, he was far happier than he had been at court. For, you see, All-fair, with her innumerable caprices, her way of whisking people hither and thither, her desiring to have her wants attended to first, and regardless of other people's feelings, was a very uncomfortable young person to live with, and the whole castle was perpetually in an uproar.

The worst part of it all was that you could not induce her to see the mischief she created, because all she had to do was to pin her little badge over her heart, and, behold! she didn't care a particle what anybody said, thought, or felt. If she was scolded, she listened, smilingly careless. You couldn't make her feel. If her caprices and her humors and her ninety-nine hundred changes in court customs made her poor mother fairly ill, all she had to do was to whisk on the badge, and she didn't care; she would actually dance and sing while her mother groaned in pain. Surely, said some of the courtiers, never was gift more fatal than this!

Day by day she advanced in loveliness of person until every court in the world heard of her beauty, and princes came from far and near to seek her hand. But when they applied first to the King, her father, he would say, solemnly, "I cannot live with my daughter; go, see for yourself." So they would journey on to the palace, where All-fair, sitting on her father's throne, fairly dazzled every one with her beauty; but very soon evidences of her heartlessness would appear. On one occasion she was by the palace gate when Great-heart, the best Prince on earth, rode in, followed by a poor woman in rags, who was almost dying of fatigue and hunger. Great-heart had bidden her follow him to the palace and seek help from the famous All-fair; but at sight of so much wretchedness All-fair hurried to fasten her badge more securely, and instead of offering the poor woman any assistance, she ordered the attendants to drive her forth.

Now Prince Great-heart had travelled many leagues to see the Princess; but this act completely altered his humor. Away he rode, after a very brief farewell, and the Princess was left to wonder angrily at so singular an occurrence; for if she could not feel sorry, she could be angry and mortified.

Things went on from bad to worse. No one pleased the Princess. She was continually turning people out of their places to try what change would do—for you must know she was far from happy—yet she could not tell where the fault or the trouble lay.

At last All-fair became so discontented that she shut herself up in her own rooms and forbade any of the courtiers to bring her news of the court, good, bad, or indifferent—an edict which, as you may imagine, drove everything into complete chaos; for people did as they liked, and paid no attention whatever to the affairs of the kingdom or the people, and the poverty on all sides was terrible to see.

One morning All-fair was seated before her mirror combing out her golden hair, and wondering what the noise was in the court-yard below. Suddenly a voice right at her elbow said, in a sharp tone,

"Didn't you know—this is your seventeenth birthday."

And looking around, she beheld the tiniest little creature imaginable—a little fellow with quick bright eyes, and the fleetest sort of movements, and the smallest, sharpest little voice.

"Do you hear me?" he inquired again, so daintily that All-fair had to sweep back the waves of golden hair from her brow, and bend her ear over to listen.

"Yes, I hear," she answered, feeling her heart beat quickly. "Who are you?"

"I am the Fairy Still-small-voice," he answered, skipping nearer to view. "And I am reminding you of your birthday."

"Well," said All-fair, rather drearily, "I'm tired of birthdays. People have given me everything on earth. There can't be any birthday presents left." And she put up her arms and yawned at the mere thought of more birthday gifts.

"But don't you know," said the fairy, and again All-fair had to try hard to hear him, "the Desert Fairy had a gift for your christening which was lost?"

All-fair sprang up with delight. Quite true! How came she to have forgotten the tale so often told in her childhood? And the Desert Fairy had distinctly said that she could find it by diligent search after her seventeenth birthday.

"How can I find it?" All-fair asked, haughtily. But no answer came. She repeated the question even more haughtily, but there was dead silence. Suddenly she said, timidly and anxiously: "Please tell me, Fairy Still-small-voice, I am so unhappy." And at once the fairy's words reached her ear.

"I was trying to make myself heard, but while you spoke so angrily it wasn't possible. You must go forth from your palace gates alone to seek it, and you must leave your badge behind."

For a long time All-fair debated as to whether any gift could be worth this effort, but at last she decided to make it, and accordingly ordering her ladies to wind up her hair, and put her blue satin cloak with pearl embroideries about her, she started from her own apartment, leaving the badge on her dressing-table pinned to a cushion.

What sights and sounds met her eyes as she walked through the palace! Wrangling and discord on every side; disorder, confusion, misery. All-fair had to put her hand before her eyes several times as she hastened along, for, not having her badge, these evidences of her own neglect pained her keenly. Indeed, the poor Princess could scarcely control herself as she flew along the corridors and through the rooms of the palace, for, singular to say, ever since she had listened to Fairy Still-small-voice, things looked very different, and what had seemed before only pardonable negligence on the part of officials now appeared to her as blind disregard of duty.

Glad was All-fair to reach the court-yard, but I am inclined to think that any one who had then seen the poor Princess flying along would scarcely have recognized her as the haughty, capricious ruler of the court only a day or two before, since in spite of her satin mantle, her gold-tipped shoes, and her famous shining hair, she had so bewildered and dismayed an expression that the very porters at the gateway shrank back, and allowed her to pass without a word.

So All-fair started on her famous journey. I don't know how she would have borne its many perils and privations but for the fact that little Fairy Still-small-voice never deserted her. He was always ready with counsel and suggestion and encouragement, if she tried to hear him, and led her through a strange journey—a country of forests and dark rivers and long boundless plains, where they were perpetually meeting obstacles of one kind and another, from which in former times All-fair might readily have protected herself with the use of her badge, and the indifference to other people's feelings which it brought her. Now, having nothing of the kind, All-fair began to see how much hardship and pain and trouble there was for many people in the world, and also how much happiness was to be derived from doing good and showing kindness and compassion. On this strange journey of hers, as soon as she overcame an obstacle in her path by gentle and kindly means, the whole face of the earth looked brighter and sweeter, and she felt able to walk on gayly and with a light heart; and, moreover, she observed that the path was made more clear to her, as with each fresh effort little flowers would spring up on either side of her, marking the way, and nodding their heads in the most encouraging fashion.

Sometimes All-fair had to pause and try to recall her old self, and wonder what had prompted her to make this long and wearisome pilgrimage after some unknown gift. Then she would in a flash see herself seated combing out her hair for want of other occupation, and seem again to hear the little tender voice of the tiny fairy. Yes, he it was who had roused her and sent her forth, and who kept her going even now.

But at last, one evening, as she emerged from the shadows of a deep wood in which she had been wandering all day, she beheld the gray turrets, the heavy gateway, and the grim entrance of the Desert Fairy's castle.

Timidly enough she approached and pulled the bell which was at the gateway. Back flew the portal; a voice from somewhere said, "Come in," and All-fair, with a quick look up and down and round about her, passed through the arch, and heard the gate clang behind her.

UNCLE HARRY'S FOILS,

BY B. F. O'CONNOR.

UNCLE HARRY was a great favorite with the boys, and when he visited their home it was holiday-time for Jack and Wallace his younger brother. Uncle Harry was the best rider they had ever seen. He taught them how to manage a horse, how to shoot, to box, to sail a boat, and was always ready to join in their sports. So you can imagine how fond his nephews were of him, and how glad they were to find he had come to stay with them for three or four weeks.

Jack and Wallace ran upstairs to their uncle's room. He was not there, but the boys ventured in, and saw lying on the bed two swords about three feet long, two large chamois skin gloves, and a pair of strong wire masks. Some days before, Jack had been reading a book about various manly exercises, and remembered that he had seen in it pictures of things just like these Uncle Harry had brought. He soon found the book again, and turned to the place where he had seen the pictures. Squatting down on the bed with the book on his knees, he began to read aloud to Wallace.

"These swords," he read, "blunted at the point, are called foils. They are used in fencing—an exercise which has been termed the high art of athletics. The wire masks are needed to protect the face from blows and thrusts. The hands are guaranteed by thick gloves from scratches and bruises."

The boys were so intent on their reading that they did not hear a step approaching, and Uncle Harry, with an amused smile on his face, stood in the doorway. When Jack glanced up and saw his uncle, he threw down his book, and sprang forward to give him a boy's hearty welcome. It would be impossible to tell half the questions Uncle Harry had to answer about the foils—what they were used for? how people handled them? In a few minutes Uncle Harry had explained the use of the foils, and fired the boys with enthusiasm to master the art of fencing.

"Does it take very long to learn?" said Jack.

"Not very," replied his uncle. "The principles are soon acquired, and then practice is all you need to make you quick and accurate with hand and eye."

Jack's eyes fairly glowed with excitement. Uncle Harry was easily persuaded to give the boys a few lessons, and Jack was so eager to learn that he wanted to start right away. He had to postpone his first trial at arms, however, until the next morning, when at nine o'clock the boys followed their uncle up into the garret.

"Now I must take you one at a time to begin," said Uncle Harry. "Jack, put on this mask and a glove. Now, Wallace, you watch what I tell Jack, and when it comes your turn you will understand much more easily. Now, Jack, catch this foil in your right hand in this way: open your hand perfectly flat; now lay the hilt diagonally across the palm (Fig. 1); now close your hand naturally, grasping the hilt firmly with all the fingers, the thumb lying straight along the other side (Fig. 2). In this position, with the nails up and your thumb on the right side (Fig. 3), your hand is said to be in quart (pronounced 'cart')."

"Now turn your hand right around by a movement of the wrist without stirring your arm. The nails are now below, your thumb to the left, and in this position your hand is said to be in tierce (Fig. 4). Notice that when your hand is in quart, and your arm fully extended on a level with your shoulder, the point of your foil is a little higher than your hand (Fig. 3). Turn your hand as before, from the wrist only, until you get it in tierce (Fig. 5). You see your hand is as high as ever, but your point is lower.

"From this fact we draw the first principle of attack, which is this: When you attack your adversary in the upper part of his body, always get your hand in quart.

"THERE WAS A LIVELY STRUGGLE, INDEED; BLADE FLASHED AGAINST BLADE."

When you attack him below his guard, get your hand in tierce. Now, on guard! Stand firmly on your feet, your feet at right angles to one another, your side only presented to your adversary; bend slightly on your knees, leaving all the weight on the left leg, and carry the right foot forward an easy distance (Fig. 6). When you fence with the left hand, of course you do just the opposite."

"But do people fence with the left hand?" asked Jack.

"Why, of course," replied his uncle. "You must learn with both hands, so as to develop both sets of muscles. Now practice moving your hand from quart to terce without stirring your arm, and I think that will do for you. Now, Wallace, you go through the movements I showed to Jack. That is good. Now take a step for-if he did not speak it, so Uncle Harry explained that this exercise was to train the hand and arm and leg to move together quickly.

Jack thought it was easy work to stick his point every time on the leather, but when he tried he found he missed it a good deal oftener than he hit it. He determined he would practice that some time by himself. To-day he wanted to learn some new thrusts and parries. Uncle Harry made him get on guard in quart, then in tierce; made him advance and retreat, lunge and recover his guard, until he was well satisfied Jack was a rare scholar.

ward. Ah, you must move the front foot first always. Now retreat a step. Move the hind foot first in this. Now take a long step forward, bend your right knee, and straighten out your left leg as quickly as you can (Fig. 7). That is what is called lunging. Just before you lunge you must extend your arm to the utmost, with your foil well in line with your shoulder, and then lunge as quickly as possible. Now you both have some idea of what to do, put on your masks and your gloves, and see who can touch the other."

This was great fun. They began slowly enough, and measured their strokes, lunging and parrying with some regularity. Soon, however, the boys got warmed up to their work, and then there was a lively struggle indeed; blade flashed against blade, and back and forth they sprang simply lower the point of your foil by bending your wrist (Fig. 8), keeping your hand in its position. Your blade meets mine and throws it off in front, giving you an opportunity to plant a thrust in my breast by simply extending your arm straight before you. If I attack by a thrust on the other side, simply turn your hand in tierce, and my blade is thrown off behind you, leaving you another opportunity to riposte by straightening your blade out, and thrusting over my guard. Now, on guard in tierce, the same thing happens exactly. If I attack below, parry by lowering your point (Fig. 9). If I attack on the other side, turn your hand in quart, and you are quite covered. These are very simple principles, very easy to learn and retain. Now let us have another all over the garret. One minute Jack was pressing closely on Wallace, then Wallace got Jack's foil over his blade, and in his turn made him retreat almost into a corner.

Finally Jack, by a quick turn of his wrist, disengaged his foil from Wallace's, and lunging right at the same time, planted his point fair and square on Wallace's breast. The tournament was ended, and conqueror and conquered, covered with perspiration, laid down their arms, and went to take a good bath and a brisk rub-down after it.

Next morning, at nine promptly, Jack and Wallace flew up to the garret, where they found Uncle Harry in his shirt sleeves, with a foil in his hand, springing back and forth and lunging against the wall. He was aiming at a round piece of leather about the size of a silver dollar, which he had nailed up about four feet from the floor. Jack's look asked a question, even tournament between you and Wallace." But just then a phaeton, drawn by a pair of pretty ponies, drove up to the front door. The boys dropped their foils, and skipped down-stairs to welcome two young ladies who had driven over to go sailing in Jack's new cat-boat.

SILENT PETE; OR, THE STOWAWAYS.*

BY THE AUTHOR OF

"TOBY TYLER," "MR. STEBB'S BROTHER," "RAISING THE 'PEARL,'" ETC.

CHAPTER V.

OFF HATTERAS.

IT was two days before Jerry was able to leave his berth in the fore-castle, and during that time he had no cause to complain of lack of attention. The Captain did not visit him again, it is true, but every one else on board, with the single exception of the first officer, came to see him frequently. Abe Green was particularly attentive, spending every spare moment of his time with the boys, and scolding about "Sam Harding" at every opportunity.

Pete's wound, while it was painful, of course, had given him but little trouble from the next morning after it had been received, and although he could have gone on deck twenty-four hours before it was possible for Jerry to have done so, he positively refused to leave his friend even for a moment. He waited upon Jerry as tenderly as a girl, and his touch was so gentle and soothing that it quieted the sick boy whenever he became nervous through the fever that threatened him. When not engaged in bestowing some personal attention on Jerry, or in trying to tidy up the fore-castle so that it might seem more cheerful, Pete soothed the sick boy by playing on Sweetness. Every time he played to Jerry, those of the crew who were idle on deck would gather around the fore-castle companionway, listening intently, while even the Captain and the second mate often found occasion to walk that way during these private concerts. If Pete had not been a favorite with the sailors before, he would have been after these later exhibitions of his musical powers, and nearly every one, certainly all the crew, were impatient for Jerry to be well enough to come on deck, so that they might hear more of what Pete called "Sweetness talking."

The Captain, so Abe reported, had said nothing to any one, unless to Mr. Harding, regarding the latter's treatment of the boys, but it was generally believed that as soon as the Clío arrived in port the first officer would be brought to a strict account before a legal tribunal for his brutality. This made Jerry decidedly uncomfortable; he thought the mate was already his enemy, and he did not wish that the man should have further cause to be angry with him, as undoubtedly would be the case if he should be arrested.

"What's the use of it?" he asked, as Abe said, decidedly, that if the Captain did not cause the offender to be arrested, the crew would take the case in their own hands. "I've had the flogging, and no matter how many courts you carried Mr. Harding to, it wouldn't take that back. He don't like Pete and me now, and if anything should be done to him when we land, he'd be just about ready to eat us."

"Well, what of that?" asked Abe, with a laugh. "He's the mate now, and we've all got to step around when he speaks; but the minute we land he won't be more'n any other man, and it won't make any difference whether he likes sugar or vinegar."

"But it will make a difference to Pete and me," pleaded Jerry. "You see, we've got to hunt for Pete's folks when we get there, and if he was real mad with us, he might do something to keep us from finding 'em."

"Don't you worry about that," replied the cook. "There's a good deal of difference between the size of New York alongside of New Orleans, and you might be there four years, on the street all the time, without seeing anybody you ever saw before."

"Is it so awful big?"

"Big? I reckon you'll think so when you get there."

Why, Orleans ain't a marker by the side of it. If you should set that city down in the middle of New York, you couldn't find it again; and if you should accidentally happen to see it kicking round in some corner, you'd think it was one of them Noah's-ark towns."

"But if it is so large, how are we going to find Pete's folks?" and a troubled look came over Jerry's face.

"That's just what's been bothering me ever since you said you didn't even know the names of them you wanted to find," replied Abe, as he too looked perplexed and disturbed.

"But Pete thinks he would know 'em if he could only find where they was."

"That's just it," said Abe, sadly. "He don't know where they are, and he don't know how to ask for 'em. You see, Jerry, it ain't likely that anybody in New York would pay very much attention if you should go around asking for Pete's Aunt Nannette, when you couldn't even tell what her other name was."

"But if we stay on the streets playing and singing, like we did at home, we might see her," said Pete, hopefully.

"Yes, you might run afoul of her the very first thing, and then, again, you might walk your legs off, and never even sight her."

"Well," said Jerry, with a sigh, "we've started, and we've got to go there, I suppose. It ain't any use to get discouraged now when we can't help ourselves, and we will do our best to find his folks. If we can't, why, we can't, and that's all there is to it."

"It looks to me like as if you'd better stay here another voyage," said Abe, in a fatherly tone. "I guess I could talk Captain Sprout into letting you hold on a spell longer, for I know that he's about tickled to death with the looks of the cabin since you youngsters have been on board."

"But how would that help us any?" asked Jerry. "We've got to go ashore some time, and if we staid here we shouldn't be doing anything toward finding Pete's folks."

"That's a fact, of course; but, you see, you'd be just that much better off, 'cause you'd get three square meals a day, and I'm afraid you won't fare so well when you're ashore."

"Perhaps we sha'n't," replied Jerry; "but, you see, the longer we stay here, the more we sha'n't feel like leaving, so we'd best go on shore just as soon as the brig gets to New York."

Already Jerry had begun to fear that their search would be fruitless, but he was careful not to let Pete know how he felt. He seemed to consider it his duty to prevent his friend from having any anxiety regarding the future, and as soon as Abe had left the fore-castle he said:

"Don't you fuss, Pete; the cook thinks that we'll have a hard time to find your folks, but he don't know us, old man. Of course we'll have to hunt round some, perhaps a good deal; but there ain't any such thing as not finding her at last, no matter if she was trying to hide from us, which of course she ain't."

Pete had the most implicit confidence in Jerry, and when he learned that his friend was still hopeful, even positive, as to the successful result of their mission, he ceased to give any serious attention to Abe's forebodings regarding the future. During the remainder of the time that he was confined to the fore-castle Jerry took good care that Abe should not have another opportunity of intimating that he and Pete might not succeed in their purpose, and the first time he went on deck again, where he could speak to the cook without being overheard by his friend, he said:

"If Pete talks to you about finding his folks, you act as if you thought he could do it easy enough—will you? The poor little fellow has been regularly dreaming about that ever since his mother died, and it would break him all up if he should come to think he ain't going to find 'em."

"But see here, Jerry," said Abe, in a fatherly tone; "it's no use for you to keep on thinking that you can find

* Begun in No. 336, HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE.

IT WAS IMPOSSIBLE TO SEE ANYTHING BUT THE WHITE GLEAM OF THE FOAM-CRESTED WAVES."

Aunt Nanette like you was hunting for a piece of boiled beef in a two quart pail, for I tell you that you've got just about no chance at all."

"I'm afraid you're right; but I want to keep Pete feeling good, so I'm going to make him believe that all we've got to do is to hunt for her."

"He'll have to know some time or another," said Abe.

"Yes, I suppose he has; but before he does know it I'll try to get things fixed kind o' comfortable for him; and then he won't take on so bad about it. If I should tell him now, he'd just about cry his eyes out; and," he added, almost angrily, "I ain't going to have him feeling bad before there's any need."

"All right, Jerry— all right," replied Abe, quickly; "you shall have your way about it, of course. I was only telling of you that it wouldn't be as easy as you thought, for it ain't likely that his aunt Nanette is sitting out on a fence waiting for him to claim her."

The Captain spoke to the boys now and then, although he paid no particular attention to them even when they first appeared on deck after their recovery, but the chief mate passed them by entirely, much as if he had forgotten that they were on board. In fact, his avoidance of them was so plain that even Pete understood that the officer still cherished an ill feeling toward them.

"I should think he might be satisfied after sweeping up the deck with us," Jerry said to Abe one day, when he and Pete had finished their work in the cabin; "but instead of that, he acts as if he was just as mad with us as ever."

"That's a way the Hardings allers had," replied Abe, savagely spearing with a fork at a piece of beef in the coppers, as if he was showing Jerry how he would treat the first officer if he had the opportunity. "But don't you pay any attention to him. I reckon he won't dare to lay his hands on either of you again, unless you should really do something that was dead agin the rules of the ship, 'cause he's got good reason to believe that he hasn't heard the last of what he's already done."

Thus far the Clio had had as much in her favor in the way of fair winds and pleasant days as if her Captain had made a regular contract with the clerk of the weather to insure a quick passage. Already had the brig left behind her the short, spitefully rolling waves of the Gulf of Mexico, and was bounding over the long billows of the Atlantic toward her destination. Every one, with the exception of Mr. Harding, was in the best of spirits. The crew were happy and contented, because they had but little work to do in the way of making or shortening sail; the Captain was feeling well in mind because he was making a quick passage, which meant a good profit to him on certain private ventures he had made, while Jerry and Pete—more particularly the latter—were happy because they were being carried so rapidly toward New York.

Already was the voyage drawing to a close. The Clio

would be off Cape Hatteras by noon of the day following the one on which Abe and Jerry had held the conversation regarding the first mate, providing the wind remained in the same direction, and it was not too much to hope that in four days at the latest the brig would be at her dock in New York. But before the sun had sunk behind the horizon that evening, there was such a change in the weather that even Jerry and Pete could understand that a storm was close upon them.

"I reckon it's going to rain," Jerry said, as he entered the galley after the officers' supper had been served.

"Rain?" repeated Abe; "I reckon it is, and there'll be more wind with it than we shall know what to do with. Before this frisky spell of weather is over, you'll know what a storm at sea means. I didn't calculate we was going to make Hatteras without having a little dusty weather; but this time I guess we'll get more'n we want."

"Do you believe we're going to have a very bad storm?" asked Pete, in a nervous way, as he tried to stand upright on the windward side of the galley, and, failing, rolled down to leeward, where he bumped against Jerry with such force that the two were wedged between the floor barrel and the partition.

"That's only a taste of what we're going to get before morning," the cook said, as he tucked Pete away in a corner where he could prevent himself from "f-etching away," as the sailors say. "The brig's a master-hand at rolling when she once gets at it, and many's the time that I've watched her spars, expecting that at the next lurch she made they'd go out of her. You boys want to get stowed away below, for it won't be a great while before you'll find it more'n you can do to get to the forks."

"Come, Pete," Jerry said, as he started toward the galley door; "I reckon we'd better go now, for I ain't feeling very good."

When the boys were below, both in one berth, they realized more fully even than when they had been on deck, how violently the brig was tossing and plunging in the heavy waves that appeared to increase in size each moment. The timbers creaked and groaned as if protesting against the heavy blows from the billows, and many times, as the Clio's bow went down into the hollows of the waves, Jerry would clasp Pete more closely, believing that the brig would never rise again. Now and then, as some wave heavier than the others would strike the vessel, or as she rolled more violently, Pete would ask Jerry to tell him truly if he believed the brig would outlive the gale, and Jerry's answers were always the same:

"It seems like we was going to sink, sure; but if there really was any danger Abe would come to tell us, I know, for he wouldn't leave us here to be drowned."

How long, after they went below, the brig continued to stagger on through the angry waves, tossed and buffeted until it seemed as if she would be dashed into fragments, neither of the boys knew. The night had come, and it seemed as if morning must be near, when suddenly a violent shock threw both the boys on to the floor, while immediately after could be heard the grinding, crashing, and tearing asunder of timbers, spars, and cordage.

Everything movable had been thrown over on the port side, which now seemed to be where the floor of the fore-castle should have been, and among this confused mass the boys were wedged like pieces of merchandise. Jerry had been flung into one corner and held there by a heavy sea chest that, broken from its lashings, was sliding fore and aft with every sluggish plunge of the wreck, threatening each instant to crush the boy, who, even in the time of danger, had no thought of himself.

"Pete! Pete!" he cried. "Where are you, Pete?"

"Here I am, under the berth," was the muffled reply. "There's a lot of stuff on top of me, and I can't get out."

Under ordinary circumstances it is doubtful if Jerry could, unaided, have extricated himself from his dangerous position; but the thought of Pete's possible peril seemed to give him the strength of a man. Using as a lever a piece of board that had been torn from one of the berths by the sea-chest which threatened to crush him, he succeeded in making an opening sufficiently large to enable him to get out of the narrow space in which he had been imprisoned, and hardly had he done so when the chest was thrown into the very place from which he had escaped.

"Keep up your pluck, Pete, and I'll soon have you out of that," Jerry said, cheerily, as he flung aside the different articles that had been thrown on top of the boy, completely shutting him in between the floor and the bottom of one of the berths.

Although Jerry worked with a will, he could hardly have succeeded in releasing Pete without some assistance, since the boards of the berth had been broken and forced down in such a manner that the poor little fellow was completely pinned down. It was when the lighter articles had been removed that Jerry understood this; and then came a great pain into his heart, greater than had been caused by the knowledge that the vessel had been wrecked, and was perhaps sinking; for he knew that Pete's moments were caused by some injury received.

"Get out here quick, for your lives!" shouted a voice from the deck.

"I can't, for Pete is fastened under the berth, and I'm afraid he's dying," cried Jerry, in an agonized tone.

In an instant Abe—for he it was who had thought of the boys in the moment of danger—had leaped into the fore-castle, and in a few seconds the shattered boards were torn up so that the little prisoner could be removed. It was impossible to see anything in the darkness, and Abe asked, as he lifted Pete as tenderly as possible under the circumstances, "Are you hurt much, lad?"

"I don't know; but the boards were across me so I couldn't hardly breathe."

"Get out of here as quick as you can, Jerry," said Abe. "I'll carry Pete; but I'm afraid I can't get him up unless you're on deck to help."

The vessel was on her beam ends, therefore the only way of gaining the deck was by climbing up the side of the stairway. How he succeeded in getting out, Jerry never knew; he was only conscious of the fact that while clinging to the companionway he helped Abe and Pete up, and that then he waited, half submerged in the waves that swept over the brig from stem to stern, until he should be told what to do next.

It was impossible to see anything more than the white gleam of the foam-crested waves. The sky was as black as the water, and in the dense gloom it would have been impossible to have seen the masts, even if they were then standing.

"What has happened?" Jerry asked, when, on stretching out his hand, he found that Abe was still by his side.

"I don't rightly know. We must have been run into on the port quarter—everything has gone by the board there, and they are clearing away the boats now."

"Are we to go in the little boats?" Jerry asked in a tremulous voice.

"That's all we can do, lad."

"But these waves will stave them to pieces."

"They'll live longer than the brig will, for she's settling fast."

Jerry crept closer to Abe, half loosened his hold on the companionway that he might clasp Pete by the hand, as if he believed he could give him courage in the awful time when death was hovering very close above them, and, without speaking, the stowaways waited for the moment when they should be taken on board the tiny boats, or engulfed in the angry waves that beat incessantly upon the doomed vessel.

THE KING'S PET ELEPHANTS.

BY DAVID KER.

AUTHOR OF "INTO UNKNOWN SEAS," "THE LOST CITY," ETC.

"WELL, if those are white elephants, I don't think much of them," said I to my friend Mr. T—, of the American Legation, as we came back across the courtyard of the royal palace at Bangkok (the capital of Siam), after our visit to the famous white elephants which are to Siam what the eagle is to America or the lion to England. "It seems to me that if you were to upset a pot of white paint over an ordinary black elephant, it would come to much the same thing, except the blue eyes."

"Ah! it's just those white spots that make all the difference," answered he. "As to a perfectly white elephant like that you see on the Siamese flag, I don't suppose there ever was such a beast, and there's none such here now, anyway. But the best part of this show is still to come."

"What's the next thing, then—a sky-blue rhinoceros, or a pea-green buffalo?"

"Not quite; but you haven't seen the big elephants yet. They're all in the King's stable, outside the palace gates, and when we get there, you'll see some fellows with whom Jumbo might have walked down Broadway any day he liked, without being ashamed of his company."

Following our Siamese conductor—a brisk little fellow in the blue frock and white helmet of the King's Lifeguard—we crossed the courtyard, passed out through a high archway sentinelled by two red-jacketed Siamese soldiers with helmets of shining brass, and turning to the right along the wide esplanade which made a kind of desert all around the palace wall, soon found ourselves in front of the elephant stable, the doors of which were at once thrown open by half a dozen gaunt, brown, half-clad native "helps."

There they were, sure enough, the five great black bodies, each in a separate stall of its own. The stalls were so narrow, and the elephants so large, that the whole stable looked very much like a monster toy-house, with toy animals fitted into its compartments and fastened there with pins or glue.

All five were fine beasts, huge, and strong, and massive as Hindoo idols. But the show figure was the one that stood fourth on the list, which the Siamese Lifeguardman admiringly pointed out as "Rajah Cheng" (the king elephant). Kingly indeed he looked, with his broad solid front proudly raised, and his mighty bulk planted on limbs that seemed like columns of black marble. But the most striking thing about him was neither his size nor his strength, magnificent though they both were; it was his tusks.

Wonderful tusks indeed they were, such as would have made the fortune of any circus or menagerie; for instead of growing straight out on either side of the trunk, after the fashion of ordinary tusks, they came right across each other just like an enormous X. And, stranger still, they were so immensely long that (as I could see by looking closely at them) their tips had actually been sawed off to keep them from digging into the ground.

"You see," explained our native guide, in very good English, "all the elephants here are supposed to be the especial property of the King. There's a large keddah [corral] about eighty miles from here—you'll see it when you go up the river to Ayuthia⁸—in a water meadow close to the bank. The hunters get together a great many elephants every year, and drive them into the enclosure, which is so strong and high that there's no chance of their getting out again. Then the 'choosers' pick out all the good ones for the King, and let the others go again."

"But what has this gentleman in No. 5 been doing to be put in irons like that?" asked Mr. T—, laughing. "Has he been breaking open some other elephant's trunk, or keeping the King awake at night by trumpeting under the palace windows?"

In truth, the fifth elephant certainly did seem a most desperate criminal, for he was covered with a perfect network of strong chains and cables, crossing and recrossing each other till he looked just like a huge black parcel corded up with very unusual care.

"Ah! we have to keep that one chained," answered the Siamese, with a grin, "for if he were to get loose, he would break the whole place to pieces. The last time he was let out he killed two or three people; and ever since then he's been tied up, as you see. He's one of the vicious sort—what we call an 'old rogue!'"

"Take care! take care!" shouted Mr. T—.

The warning cry came barely in time. I had just stepped forward to take a nearer view of this dangerous fellow, when suddenly the huge ears gave an angry twitch, the small, deep-set eyes glowed like live coals, and swinging up his mighty trunk, the monster dealt a blow at me that seemed able to shatter a solid rock, and the very wind of which all but knocked me down. I jumped back as nimbly as a circus acrobat, and the brown-faced bystanders laughed as if it were a good joke.

This was a pretty good lesson, but a few days later I had another sample of the temper of a Siamese elephant, to which this was nothing.

Mr. T— and I were coming back from a drive into the country one fine afternoon, when the narrow, muddy street through which we were passing was suddenly filled with native soldiers—white-coated grenadiers, red-coated dragoons, and blue-coated guardsmen—all returning from a grand review. While we were trying to steer our way through the mass, a great uproar was heard just ahead of us, and a crowd of Siamese and Chinamen came rushing confusedly around the corner as if flying from some danger, while high above all their outcries rose the harsh note, half scream and half roar, peculiar to the elephant.

"I hope this isn't our friend the 'old rogue' broken loose again," muttered Mr. T—, reining in with all his might the snorting and rearing horses.

In another moment the whole scene lay before us. One of the King's elephants (which had also been figuring in the review) had taken offence at a passing gig, and charged it headlong, the owner having barely time to leap out and run for his life. Luckily, the elephant's first blow smashed the shafts, and the horse tore away down the road, with them clattering at his heels, while Mr. Elephant, after beating the gig to pieces, trotted away, with one of the wheels hanging to his trunk like an ear-ring.

"Well," said Mr. T—, looking after the retreating monster, "I should think you'll give Siamese elephants a wide berth after this."

And so I did.

PARLOR PARTERRES.

BY GEORGE B. BARTLETT.

AUTHOR OF "NEW GAMES FOR PARLOR AND LAWN."

THE YOUNG ARTIST (IN TWO SCENES).

IN the first scene a boy is seated in a studio. He wears a velvet jacket and cap, or any picturesque dress, and the room is furnished with an easel and pretty ornaments. A mother enters, leading a little girl, and expresses in pantomime her wish to have a portrait of her child. With many gestures, the artist then places the child in position, and, after her mother has taken off her cloak and bonnet, proceeds to paint.

herself, who stands behind the easel, and shows her face and figure to the waist through a picture-frame, which stands in the same position as the one on which the artist was at work. The mother holds by her left hand a little girl, who stands with her back to the spectators, and wears the same cloak and bonnet which was worn by the little girl in the first scene, whom she must also resemble in size. The artist stands at the right of the picture, which he exhibits with pride.

FAMILY STAIRS

For this scene arrange as many children as can be conveniently found according to their heights, the shortest at the left, and the next a little higher, no two being alike. They are supposed to be a family from the rural districts making their first visit to the city. The tallest one is dressed as a comfortable farmer, with short pantaloons, frock, and broad straw hat, with his good dame, the next in height, hanging on his arm. The boys wear short jackets and pantaloons and straw hats; the lady and the girls wear calico dresses, with poke-bonnets. All have their hands full of bundles, baskets, or bandboxes, and yet manage to hold the hands or grasp the dresses of the children by their side. All stare with eyes and mouths wide open at the objects of interest, and when they go out they march in single file, led by the old man, with his wife clinging to his arm, and all the rest following in eager pursuit. After marching about and staring alternately at each side and at the back of the room, they face round in front again, and with a final stare at the spectators, take their departure in the order described above.

DICKENS SCENE.

The Dolls' Dress-maker's dream of "Shining rows of children."

In the foreground a little girl sits by a small table covered with dolls, some richly dressed, some in various stages of completion. A crutch leans against the chair in which the maiden sits, who wears a black dress and white apron, and has a great quantity of golden hair falling over her shoulders. She bends forward with an eager face, as if listening, and rows of children fill the room, one child on each side of her chair, and the others in long rows, each head a little above the one in front of it. This can easily be done by the use of boards, one end of each resting on the floor, and the other supported upon tables at the back of the room. If these tables are not high enough to enable the heads of the highest children to reach the ceiling, boxes or crickets can be also placed on these tables, all of this platform being covered with cotton sheets. These children must wear white or light dresses, and their hair should be crêpéd. If more elaboration is needed or a large audience is expected, a curtain of blue tartan muslin tightly drawn in front of the children adds to the effect by lending the appearance of distance to the vision.

THE HOUSEHOLD BRIGADE.

A party of knights or Amazons may stand in line of battle, fully equipped for action in armor gathered from the kitchen and pantry. The helmets are wire cake covers lined with silver paper, the breastplates are tin dish covers, and the shields are waiters, which are held by a piece of string tied across the handles on the back. The swords may be brass-handled shovels or pokers, and when elaboration is desired, all may wear skirts of red calico, ornamented with tin pail covers sewed on the front in a uniform style.

They must learn to march in straight lines, to countermarch and parade in single and double files, and to go through a simple sword exercise, as two cuts up, two down, and thrust, after which they may divide into two equal sides, and go through a spirited combat. For this purpose they face each other from the two sides of the room, advance, and meet in the centre, and clash their swords and shields against each other with great courage and clamor until some are wounded and one side gives up the contest, the scene closing with a grand tableau of Victory and Triumph.

THE MODERN NARCISSUS.

This pretty scene can be performed in any room by means of a large mirror, which is placed upon the floor, with the back slightly elevated, so that the reflection can be seen by the spectators. The frame is carefully covered with brown cambric to resemble a pool of water, upon which leaves and rushes cut from green cambric may be reflected. Narcissus soon enters at the left side, dressed as a modern dandy, with extreme elegance. He walks around with many airs and graces, and at last sees his image reflected in the pool with great delight. He gazes long and lovingly upon the beautiful vision, and comes forward for a moment to the front, and then goes back hastily, as if he could not tear himself away from the lovely picture. Going to the right side, he perceives a hideous view of a black monkey's face, with red cheeks and eyes, in caricature of himself, which is thrown upon the mirror by a person who stands on the left, concealed from the spectators by a curtain or door. Narcissus then throws up his hands in an attitude of disgust, and runs hastily off at the right, when two youths appear at the left, laughing heartily at his discomfiture. Thus the audience depart with smiles of pleasure on their faces.

I have taken HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE since September, and like it very much. This is the first letter I ever wrote to you. My sister has a little white dog, like to go to school, but an ever sorry when vacation comes. I have been trying some of the receipts for candy and the Post-office Book, and succeeded very well. I would like to send some of my receipts, but I fear this letter would be too long for the first time.

HOW WE WENT A-MAYING.

One day in the early part of May we girls went a-maying. After a pleasant drive along the country roads for a mile we came to the woods. The party was composed of Edith and Kate D., Marion P., Mildred H. and myself. May R. Marlon was the leader of all the girls in our set; she is clever, thoughtful, and amiable. I was a little bit too fond of ruling over us. Edith was quiet and thoughtful, Kate strong-minded and vigorous, while Mildred and myself were very firm friends, and were neither very hard nor very good. We all scrambled out of the carriage, and ran into the woods, taking with us our baskets, which we hoped to fill with wild flowers. The trees were not close together, so the woods were not dark, but Mildred clung to my arm in terror.

"Oh, May," she whispered, "I wish I hadn't come any-and in these woods."

Marion overheard her whisper, and laughed at her for being so silly. "Of course there are no bears, and it isn't going to be dark. All these woods are light."

An exclamation from Kate was now heard: "Oh, see the hepatics!"

We looked where she pointed, and truly the ground was studded with the pretty blossoms. In a moment we were picking fast, each anxious to have the biggest bunch. Kate, after picking all she wanted, wandered off in search of violets. Edward, her brother, and I started to our feet. I saw her running toward us with a white face.

"Girls," she gasped, "I saw a bear!" Mildred and Edith screamed, and all except Marion ran to where we had left the carriage and driver. Mildred caught him by the arm.

"Oh, John," she said, "there is a bear in the woods."

John stared, and said, "Waah, I guess you're mistaken, but I'll go and look."

Just then a ringing laugh from Marion was heard, and hastening to the spot, we found that the bear was only a dead stump. How we laughed, and she in defence, said, "Well, my fancy I wasn't much more alarmed than some of you."

And John, going back to the carriage, said: "That Marion is a brave one, and the rest of them are nothing but babies. Waah, anyway, they are only girls."

MIRIAM O.

THE STORY OF A DOLL.

BY M. E. K.

I am a jointed, rubber, negro doll, about six inches high, and my name is Braddy. My mistress's name is Edith. Her father lives with me at one of the stands on Broadway, New York city. When he brought me home he gave me to Louise, and she called me Braddy. My mistress's father took her with him when he went to the barber's shop to get shaved. The man who owned the barber's shop was colored, and his name too was Braddy. After Louise had been shaved, my mistress, Braddy, took me in her arms. He asked her what my name was, and she told him, and he was much amused. Louise, when she was older, took her doll to her room, in white velvet bonnet and all, always took me. When I came, I had on a white cotton gown, but I haven't worn anything like that since.

It was one of those common wax dolls with a sawdust body, painted face, and a lot of yellow hair piled on top of her head. My mistress's name was Edith. I was almost forgotten. When Louise did condescend to take notice of me, it was only to make me Miss Victoria's servant. This was long ago, and I can't say for sure.

How happy I was when one day I slipped from under Louise's arm down to the sidewalk. There I lay, with a serene smile on my black face. By and by a ragged news-boy came along, crying his papers, "Evening X— Whoop! here here is a doll!" Then, to my great disgust, he picked me up and put me in his pocket, but he forgot to take out my coat pocket. He ran, and ran so fast that I was almost bumped to pieces. Oh, how sorry my head was! Very soon he stopped so suddenly that I almost fell out of his pocket. "Here, here, here," said Victoria, "he cried, 'see what I've got.'"

A little lame girl came running out, saying: "Oh, Jimmy, how nice of ye: Where did ye get it?"

She kissed me so much that I thought that there wouldn't be a bit of black left on me; but there was, and I don't mind it. I was very happy days. When Jimmy came home at night, he and Sarah Jane would play that I was their doll, and they would play with me. I was a little lame girl. Times will come, though, when you can't have your own way; for my mistress Louise found out where I was, and came after me. Then I had to go back to misery, and see Victoria petted. But I couldn't say anything, I was obliged to go.

Again I was lost. This time I was left behind in the store. The man who owned the store found me, and took me home to his little girl. She called me Topsy, and dressed me up in girl's clothes. I never had many very nice things, but I was dressed up in girl's clothes and was called by a girl's name. Just think of a boy dressed in girl's clothes, pinned on, with pins sticking into him! Why, I was just perforated with pin-holes.

Louise soon found me, however, and rescued me from that wretched life. When she took me home I found that one of my arms had broken, and one arm had come off. She was in a sad plight indeed. She is now in the rag-bag. I am growing gray now (that is, the paint is faded), but many very nice things, but I have lasted five years, and I hope that I have done my little mistress Louise good service.

BRADDY.

DEAR POSTMISTRESS,—I enjoy "Jo's Opportunity" so much, I can scarcely wait until my paper comes. I have learned a great deal since I have become a reader of HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE. I cannot express how delighted I am with the "Beholdings." I have made some, entirely without any aid from any one else. I was a little boy only six years old. I hope you will publish them, and this letter too, in the Post-office Box. I also send you a piece of poetry which my grandma wrote me.

We have a cow, two horses, and a good many cats (but they are not all tame; one stays in the house, the others out doors). We live in the country, three miles from Albany. It was my sister's birthday day before yesterday. On St. Patrick's Day we all wore green ribbons to school. I have taken HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE for over a year, and enjoy it very much, especially "Jo's Opportunity" and "Roll Home" and the stories by Howard Pyle. I take music lessons every Wednesday and Saturday. When Ugo puts his paws on papa's shoulder, he is as big as Papa. Good-by.

I know not many little Nevada girls write to the Post-office Box. My mamma reads all the letters to me. I have never been at school, but a teacher is coming next week, and we are to have school in our house. My brother Bobbie is twelve years old, and I am seven years old. We have taken HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE four years, and love it awfully. I feel sorry when it does not come every week. We live thirty miles from Eureka. My papa is a cattle-man.

EDNA T. B.

I think I will tell you of our broom-brigade entertainment. It was given for the benefit of the Presbyterian church, and finished, which is nearly completed. The evening was not very pleasant, and the roads were muddy, so there were not many there, and we did not make so much money as we had anticipated. Still, we did very well. The brigade was composed of thirteen girls, from fourteen to sixteen years of age. We should like to have had more, but the time was short. The costumes consisted of white chemise-clothes, with turkey-red calico waists and caps. We had dust-pans on our backs for knapsacks, and, of course, brooms for muskets. Our drill consisted in the main of marching and broom tactics. We used our brooms as the soldiers do their muskets. Everything passed off nicely, and we had a merry evening. The broom drill is a splendid exercise for girls, both mentally and physically, as it requires the strictest attention, and also the movements are very healthy. I am very fond of my studies, especially algebra.

THEY went to gather wind-flowers
One merry morn in May,
And taking home their treasures,
Were almost blown away.

The madcap breezes tossed their hair,
And danced about their feet;
The wind mistook them for the flowers,
The darlings were so sweet.

A MUCH-TRAVELLED DOG.

A CORRESPONDENT of the London Field relates the travels of a dog belonging to him when he lived in South Africa, which were even more adventurous than those of the famous English travelling dog Railway Jack.

This sagacious animal, which also was named Jack, had struck up an acquaintance with station-masters and conductors, and frequently went on short trips on his own account. On one occasion, when traveling with his owner, he jumped from the window in chase of something that he had seen in the bush. His owner gave him up for lost; but hardly had the former finished his dinner when Master Jack arrived, he having been picked up on the road by a later train. This was the dog's last trip by rail; thereafter he devoted himself to travel by sea.

His first voyage was in company with his master; and having thus been introduced to the pleasures of the deep, this roving quadruped made frequent trips by himself. One time he made a voyage lasting five weeks on board a bark. Another time he sailed on board a steamer bound from Natal to London; but when the ship touched at Cape Town, Jack thought he had had enough of that vessel, and so went ashore. It happened, however, that he met an old friend in Cape Town, the butcher belonging to a ship in which he had made a voyage previously, and so he shipped with the butcher and returned home.

Finding short journeys of a thousand miles or so rather tame, he resolved to do something to keep his memory green in the hearts of his numerous friends. This time it was the Norham Castle, a splendid steamer of four thousand tons, that he patronized. She was bound for London; and Jack, having "stowed away," did not show himself on deck until the vessel was well out at sea. The voyage was safely made, and the travelled dog was taken to the Captain's home in the suburbs of London. When the vessel was ready to start on the return trip, Jack thanked his English friends for their hospitality, and went on board of the Norham Castle, arriving in Natal in due course.

It happened, however, that Jack's owner could not go down to the dock to meet the steamer when it touched, so the dog was taken on to another port, his owner intending to reclaim him on his return trip. But the unfortunate traveller never set foot again on his native shore, for, being insulted by a negro (one of a race for whom he had always shown great dislike), he tried to leap across an open hatchway to avenge the insult. The distance was, however, too great, and the poor dog fell down thirty-two feet on to the iron ballast. Both his fore-legs were broken, and though surgical skill was taxed on his behalf, it was of no avail. Fever set in, and his friends, seeing that his case was now hopeless, gave him chloroform, attached a weight to his feet, and dropped him overboard in the harbor.

And so, like many a gallant human sailor before him, he found a grave at the bottom of the "sounding sea" which he had loved so well. The story of this African Jack deserves to be remembered by those who love dogs, and delight in the record of their almost human intelligence.

MOTHER'S LITTLE WILHELMINE.

BY MARGARET E. SANGSTER.

I SHUT my eyes up very tight
Whenever I go to my bed at night;
But in the morning, as you see,
I open them wide as wide can be.

I like to frisk and run and play,
To frolic with kitty every day;
But I can, like a little mouse,
Go tiptoe, tiptoe over the house.

If mother says, "My dear, be still,"
I answer, "Why, to be sure I will."
When baby wants to take a nap,
And mother is hushing him in her lap.

I have a pretty cap and skirt,
All stiffly starched, and a speck of dirt
Would fall away in fright, I know,
If it caught on ruffle or furrow.

I like to gather pretty flowers,
To work in my garden hours and hours,
For I've a garden of my own
With roses and lilies overgrown.

My hands in mischief now and then,
Like most little hands, I fear, have been;
But crossed like this upon my breast,
Of all little hands they are the best.

Oh, up and down the land may be Many a maiden just like me,
But ne'er a happier one is seen
Than mother's maid, little Wilhelmine.

CHAPTER VI.

IN THE BOATS.

DURING the dreadful time that the boys waited for the boats to be made ready, Pete did not speak; he remained in Abe's arms without signs of life, save when at times he returned the pressure of Jerry's hand.

It was as impossible for the boys to see each other as it was for them to see the crew, who were working just abaft the foremast. By the hand-clasp only did they know that they were yet together, and from the sound of voices they understood that they had not been deserted. Abe did not attempt to cheer them. Perhaps, knowing the full peril to which they were exposed, he thought it best not to raise hopes that might prove false. He held Pete tightly in his arms, forced at times to exert all his strength to prevent the boy from being washed overboard; but he remained silent.

Jerry, as he tried to understand, from the noise the men made while they worked, what was being done, concluded that both the boats had been made ready, but that the Captain delayed launching them in the hope that the wreck might float until morning. One of the masts had fallen at the time the brig had been run into, or at least Jerry believed it had, for he heard the men cutting away the foremast only, which proved to him that the mainmast had already gone. He also heard them try the pumps from time to time, and not knowing that they were "choked," thus being useless, wondered why an attempt was not made to keep the vessel afloat by relieving her of some of the weight of water in the hold that was gradually drawing her beneath the waves. Jerry was more than willing to remain where he was, even though he knew the brig was sinking, for he believed that their destruction would be certain if they took to the boats.

But it was destined that neither the Captain's nor Jerry's hopes were to be realized. After the foremast had been cut away, the brig continued to settle as rapidly as before, and even as Jerry was thinking that the Clio would surely float until daybreak, the order was given to lower the boats.

It surely seemed little less than madness to look for safety in those frail craft, or even to attempt to launch them in the darkness, and while the gale raged so furiously; but there was nothing else that could be done with the least shadow of a chance of success, and both officers and men were thoroughly well aware how desperate was the situation.

"Follow me, and every time I give the word, hold on as tight as you can to whatever comes handiest, or you'll be washed overboard," Abe shouted in Jerry's ear; and then he started aft, clinging to the rail as he literally crawled along the deck, which was already at such an angle as to render walking an impossibility.

In the darkness and confusion Jerry never rightly understood how the boats were launched without being overturned. He heard Captain Sproul tell Abe to "put the boys in the long-boat, and make them lie under the thwart," and he knew that this precaution was taken to guard against their being washed overboard. When they were in that position, and he had clasped Pete in his arms, he was puzzled to make out what the little musician was carrying under his jacket, holding it tightly even though it was apparent from his labored breathing that he was in great pain.

"What is it you've got, Pete?—why, I do believe it's Sweetness!"

"Of course it is," replied Pete. "You didn't think I could leave her there to drown, did you?"

"I know you'd want to bring it with you if you could; but fiddles can't drown, for they'll float."

"Sweetness wouldn't live, that's sure," said Pete, as tenderly as if he had been speaking of some living thing. "I couldn't have got in the boat and left her on the vessel alone."

"But how did you get her? It was so dark in the fore-castle that I couldn't have found her if I had hunted till this time."

"I had left her at the back of the berth before the storm began, and when the vessel rolled so bad, I buttoned her under my jacket. I'm afraid she got broke when we fell out; but I've kept her as well as I could. Jerry, it was all my fault that we came on the Clio, for you never would have done such a thing if I hadn't wanted to get to New York."

"Now you don't know anything about that. I might have started in the brig if I had never seen you."

"I don't believe so, Jerry, for you always liked New Orleans. But you won't be mad with me, Jerry, 'cause you've had such a hard time trying to do what I wanted, will you?"

"Mlad with you, Pete?" replied Jerry, as if surprised at such a question. "I couldn't be that, whatever happened; and when it's because I've come with you, why, I couldn't do it nohow. P'raps we won't ever get to the land, old man, and if we shouldn't, and should both go up in the sky— You've never done anything bad, Pete, and p'raps you could help me through—'cause you've got a father and a mother there—even if I have been pretty bad."

Pete reached up, regardless of Sweetness's safety, took Jerry's face in his hands, and kissed him softly, tenderly, much as kisses are given to the dying. Then he said, "You've always been better than me, Jerry, for somehow I never could do any good to folks, and when we tell God all you've done for me since mother died, He'll be glad to see you."

"Such a little thing as that won't count, Pete," said Jerry, gravely. And then, after a short pause, he said, in a more cheerful tone: "Well, if we don't ever get back to the shore, we'll stay together like this till we are— Just to think that you brought Sweetness, and I never thought of her!"

"I couldn't forget, for, except you, Sweetness is all I've got in this world to love. Put your arm around my neck, Jerry, and if the boat does tip over, put your face close up to mine, so's I can feel you when we're in the water."

Jerry drew the little fellow even closer to him, and, with the violin between them under Pete's jacket, the two boys lay silently in the bottom of the boat that was as an egg-shell on the tumult of waters.

The morning came, and while it was difficult for either of the boys to realize that the sea was any less violent than it had been, Jerry heard the men congratulating each other because the gale was abating so rapidly. In an hour after the sun rose, the little boat was riding gallantly over the heavy seas, with a small lug-sail set, and the Captain told the boys that they might sit on the thwart, which was an agreeable change for them, cramped as they had been in the bottom of the boat.

The cook told them that they were within sight of Cape Hatteras, and that if the wind did not die away entirely, the party would be safe on shore before night. The long-boat had been skilfully handled by Captain Sproul, who had remained constantly at the helm; but whether the other boat, which was in charge of the first officer, had fared as well, no one could say, since she was nowhere to be seen.

It was not until after Abe had been talking with the boys for some moments, explaining the situation to them, that either he or Jerry noticed the marked change that had come over Pete, and then both saw it at the same time. The little fellow had made no complaint since he had been taken from under the crushed berth, but it was only too evident that he had been severely injured. The extreme pallor of his face and the flecks of blood that appeared on his colorless lips told of his suffering, and Jerry asked quickly, his own face growing pale from apprehension as he grasped the little fellow's hand, "What is the matter, Pete? What makes you look so bad?"

"I ain't sick," replied the boy, with a feeble attempt at a smile, "but I've got such an ache here;" and he laid his hand on his chest, wincing with pain under the pressure even of his own touch.

"What is it, lad?" asked Captain Sproul, who had heard the words and seen the gesture.

"I think he was hurt last night, sir," replied Abe, quickly. "He got thrown under one of the berths, and the dunnage piled a-top of him until he was reg'larly pinned down by splintered boards."

"Take off his jacket, and find out if there are any bones broken."

Abe, assisted by Jerry, proceeded to obey the command by first taking from under Pete's jacket the violin, crushed and broken now like its master, but still as dear as ever in his eyes. Jerry awaited in agonized suspense the brief examination. The little musician's chest was so sore that, without causing the poor boy a great deal of unnecessary pain, it was impossible to do very much toward learning the extent of his injuries; but the cook was quite positive that no bones had been broken.

If no bones were broken, Jerry consoled himself with the thought that Pete could not be in a very critical condition, and firmly believed that the little fellow would be well again as soon as they were on shore once more, while the boy himself gave color to this idea by showing far more concern about the damage done to Sweetness than about his own injuries. The violin had not been broken beyond all hope of mending, although it appeared to be a total wreck, and Pete sat gazing at it with such an air of sadness as, together with the evidences of bodily pain on his face, made a very pitiful-looking boy of him.

"Don't you feel bad about Sweetness," Jerry said, in a low tone. "I've got all the money I had when we started, and we'll have her mended the first thing we do when we land."

"Oh, the fiddle is all right," Abe said, in a very decided and positive tone, as he looked critically at the battered instrument. "I reckon I can set it up just as good as new when we are where we can find some glue. If we've come safe out of as bad a wreck as the Clio made, we hadn't ought to fret very much over a broken fiddle."

Pete took the instrument from Abe much as if he resented the expression "broken fiddle" as applied to such a faithful friend as Sweetness had been to him, and Jerry whispered:

"Don't you take on about her, old man, for we'll have her all right again by to-morrow, and when she talks to you once more, you won't even know that she's been wrecked."

As may be supposed, Captain Sproul and those of the crew who had taken refuge in the long-boat, had other matters to occupy their attention besides Pete and Sweetness. Although so far they had been preserved when it had seemed almost impossible that any could be saved, the little boat was so far from land as to make it doubtful if they could reach it before night if the wind should die away. There were many dangers, perhaps, yet to be encountered, and at noon the wind, which had been growing fainter each hour since the sun had risen, hauled around to the westward, blowing directly off shore. The sea was yet far too angry to admit of tacking in order to gain the land, for to have steered the boat directly across the foam-capped waves would have been certain destruction.

Twice during the day was bread, meat, and water served out to the shipwrecked ones. Jerry ate his portion as quickly as did the sailors; but Pete had lost all appetite, and when urged by Abe to "stow away as much as he could," he was forced to admit that the pain in his chest was so great as to prevent him from swallowing the food. Under the circumstances there was nothing that could be done for the little sufferer, save to clear a place in the bottom of the boat that he might lie down, and Jerry sat by his side trying to soothe him with whispered accounts of what they would do when they were on shore again.

With but sufficient sail to enable the little boat to escape the cross-seas that had risen since the change of wind, and which threatened each moment to break over her stern, the land had faded slowly away, until, about an hour before sunset, it was hardly more than a cloud on the western horizon. Even the most hopeful now despaired of reaching a place of safety that night, and a dull silence settled upon the crew, save Abe and the Captain, who did all in their power to cheer their companions.

The fact that they had not sighted the boat of which the first officer had command caused the most lively fears for the safety of those who had taken refuge in her. At the time of abandoning the brig it was agreed that both boats should be steered on the same course, and unless this one had been swamped, she should have been seen at some time during the day. The Captain thought it possible that Mr. Harding, fearing to run before the wind, had hove to until the gale abated; but even in such case the boat should have been sighted by noon unless, as was possible, her course had been changed in order to gain the land south of the cape, instead of north.

As the sun sank below the horizon, and the mantle of night descended upon the waters, the waves grew higher under the influence of the rapidly increasing wind, and the spray dashed over the little boat until it was no longer possible for Pete to lie down without being completely drenched. Two men were detailed to bale the water out, otherwise the boat would have been swamped, and Pete was given a seat on one of the thwarts between Abe and Jerry, whose bodies sheltered him somewhat from the flying spray. Both the boys tried to keep their eyes shut that they might not see the towering walls of water that rose above the frail craft, threatening her with destruction, or the hollows of the waves into which the boat darted as if bent on plunging to the bottom of the sea.

"It's no use to think of what might happen," Abe said, as a wave more threatening than the others rose above the boat, and he felt a shudder pass over Pete, while Jerry involuntarily clutched his arm. "Men, and even boys, have been in worse places than this through a shipwreck, and lived to tell the story. Just think that we might be somewhere out of the track of vessels, where there wouldn't be one chance in a thousand of our being picked up. But instead of that we are right in the course of every ship that approaches the coast, and you might say that we're certain of seeing a dozen by sunrise to-morrow."

"Were you ever shipwrecked before, Abe?" asked Jerry, more for the purpose of starting a conversation that would take their thoughts from the terrible realities of their situation than from any desire to gain knowledge.

"Yes, once, on the Pacific Ocean," replied the cook, and this time it was he who shuddered. "Don't let's talk about it, for it wouldn't be exactly the sort of a yarn to spin just now."

"Was Captain Sproul with you?" persisted Jerry.

"Yes, he was first mate; and to compare our situation now with what it was then makes it seem that we are as safe as if we were already ashore. How do you feel, Pete?"

"I guess I don't ache so bad as I did," replied the little fellow, in a tremulous voice; but Jerry knew that he tried to speak cheerfully only to reassure those who were anxious concerning him, and that he was suffering quite as much as ever.

"Lean against me all you can, lad, for it may ease you a bit. Jerry, sit close to him to keep the spray off, and if either of you can go to sleep, do so, for it looks now as if we'd got an all-night job of it, and no mistake."

When the morning dawned, each one in the long-boat scanned the horizon carefully in the hope of seeing some friendly sail, even before it was light enough to have distinguished a vessel three miles away, and as the sun dispelled the gloom of the early day all could see, hardly more than five miles away, a large three-masted schooner bearing directly down upon them.

What a shout went up from the shipwrecked ones then! Even little sick Pete joined in it, and how eagerly every one watched the approach of the stranger! Nearer and nearer she came, until when she was within half a mile of the long-boat, she came up into the wind with all her sails fluttering an invitation for those in distress to come on board.

The men bent to the oars; the little boat that had been tossed and buffeted by the waves on the night previous now seemed to dance over them joyously, and in a few moments those who had been so bowed down by despair were safe on board the Sea-Gull, bound from Key West to New York.

THE DESERT FAIRY'S GIFT.

BY LUCY C. LILLIE,

AUTHOR OF "NAN," "ROLF HOUSE," "JO'S OPPORTUNITY," ETC.

Part II.

WHILE All-fair stood there enjoying this calm flood of light which had so much peacefulness in it, the voice of the Desert Fairy sounded, and looking around, the traveller saw her unknown friend standing at a little distance and smiling very complacently upon her visitor.

"Now, my dear," she said, kindly, "let me congratulate you on your safe arrival here. Very many people set out on that journey, but few accomplish it."

"Why?" said All-fair, quickly. The light of the hallway had made her feel at once so rested and happy that she could not remember all the perils and fatigue of her journey.

"I think," said the Desert Fairy, "it is because they take all their gifts with them—gifts like your badge, for example. You never could have reached here had you worn that fatal badge, nor if you had resisted Still-small-voice's suggestions."

"Well, I am here now, at all events," said All-fair. Perhaps she dreaded being preached at too long.

The Desert Fairy laughed. "And you wish your gift, I suppose," she said, in a pleasant manner.

All-fair followed her hostess up a long staircase where the lights lingered, and thence down to a dark corridor, where the Desert Fairy opened a closet door, taking out a vial, which she showed the Princess. It contained a colorless liquid.

"This is your gift," she said, solemnly. "It is just what you and your court need, but I cannot tell you its value until you yourself have tested it. Return, by the same route you took in coming, to your castle. When you have reached there, cause a room to be prepared with a large mirror swinging from the wall. Stand before the mirror, and rub a few drops of the liquid on its surface. The result will determine whether the gift is of any value. Any one in your court may use it, and if possible urge all to do so. The vial will never be empty."

"How can I find my way home?" All-fair inquired, a little timidly; for it was nearly nightfall, and she now recalled the miseries of her first journey.

"As you pass through the Hall of Light down-stairs," said the Desert Fairy, "some of its rays will cling to you, and in any dark spot you have only to appeal to them, and they will shine forth. You are entitled to them for having made the journey and passed into that hall, which, as I said, few people ever reach. Then, again, the roadway is full of flowers, which bloomed after each of your kindly or gentle deeds, so, although your journey may be long, it cannot be so perilous."

All-fair set forth, and found the Desert Fairy's predictions true at every step. There were the flowers marking her way, and when the road darkened she had only to call upon the beams that followed her, and the whole earth seemed illuminated, her own particular pathway being indicated in a manner which it was impossible to mistake. Therefore, in spite of much fatigue and many privations, All-fair pursued her journey joyfully, and was delighted to find, on reaching the gateway of her own palace, that Prince Great-heart was just riding in, having come once more to see the famous Princess whose cruelty to the poor beggar-woman had so alarmed him on the previous occasion, yet toward whom he again felt attracted.

All-fair was surprised to find that no one knew her, and at first it chilled and dismayed her, but on going to her own apartments she proved that she was her very self by calling each official by name and examining into the affairs of the kingdom in such a business-like manner that she set the whole palace in commotion. But there was no time to conceal bad management or put on deceptive appearances, and in a short time all who had filled their places of trust badly were groaning in the dungeons of the castle.

Meanwhile the room with the mirror was prepared, and bidding all her attendants to remain behind, All-fair took the Desert Fairy's vial in her hand and entered the room alone.

It was impossible for the Princess not to know how great was her beauty, since for seventeen years it had been on every lip—the theme of poets and of painters, and reflected by every glass that she gazed into, yet as she stood before the long mirror on this occasion a sense of her own wondrous loveliness flooded her whole being with new delight. She put her hands out with a cry of delight, and holding each side of the silver frame of the mirror, brought her own smiling lips close to those reflected in the glass, kissing the vision of herself with a happy feeling of affection for so enchanting a spectacle. She had put on her daintiest robe of gossamer and bees' wings broidery, her golden hair filleted with a band of precious stones flowed over her shoulders and down her back, and the arms stretched forth toward the Princess in the glass were strung with pearls.

"Ah! I am beautiful!" cried the Princess, stepping back from the mirror. "No wonder I am called All-fair."

The vial had fallen from her hand, and now the silver toe of her slipper touched it. She picked it up eagerly, remembering that the Desert Fairy had said its value could only be decided after she had tried it.

The stopper was taken out. The Princess taking two or three drops upon her finger, and glancing around to make very sure she was alone, stepped forward and began slowly to rub the liquid on the clear surface of the glass. Scarcely had it touched it before it spread around and around in an ever-widening circle, illuminating the mirror as it went, until at last such a shining glass as All-fair never dreamed of was before her.

But what was this? With a low cry of horror, yet a growing fascination for what she saw presented, All-fair gazed and gazed into the mirror, calling upon Fairy Still-small-voice to aid her in understanding the mystery of the magic mirror.

An hour later the entire court was panic-stricken by an announcement that the Princess All-fair had desired her mother to accompany her to the throne, and there review the court. Prince Great-heart, as an honored guest, was given a place as near the throne as possible, while the officials not in chains formed imposing senecircles at either side, and the ladies and gentlemen of the court in gorgeous array made up a picture the like of which had not been seen since All-fair took the government of the court into her own hands.

Every one was eager to know what the Princess meant to do, especially as since she had returned from the magic mirror her face was pale and sad, and her manner peculiarly anxious.

As soon as all were assembled, she rose and summoned the Lord Chamberlain to the foot of the throne. Handing him the key of the room and the magic vial, she gave him directions how to use the latter, desiring him to return as speedily as possible. The Lord Chamberlain bowed low, and as he did so his wig fell to the ground. "Did any one laugh?" he asked, severely, as he picked up his movable head of hair. But no one had laughed; somehow the court officials did not feel inclined to be merry just now. So his lordship repaired to the magic mirror in obedience to his royal mistress's commands, and when half an hour had gone by, and no sign of the Lord Chamberlain appeared, the Princess asked Great-heart to go in search of him. The Prince remained away about ten minutes, returning with the vial, and declaring that the Lord Chamberlain had fled from the palace, at the same time explaining that he had waited to rub on a few drops of the liquid for himself.

Upon this the Princess's cheek paled again, and she bent forward to ask him in a whisper what he saw.

"Only myself," was his smiling answer, whereupon the Princess gave a great sigh of relief, and summoning the officer next in rank to the Chamberlain, sent him on a like errand.

And so she went through the entire court. Some came back pale and dismayed; some fled from the palace; others returned to fall upon their knees and entreat forgiveness for their many faults; a few appeared calm as Prince Great-heart, and wondered what the Princess had meant by sending them to look at themselves in a long glass.

However, the Princess knew very well what she was about, and before a week had gone by she had set up such a variety of reforms that the court and the kingdom were turned inside out and upside down, finally settling into a state of such perfect behavior that All-fair's reputation as a wise and just sovereign spread all over the world. And then she sent a humble petition begging her father to resume his crown and sceptre; but the old King was enjoying his country life too much to leave it for any court on earth, and, moreover, he was delighted by the Princess's marvellous government. There was neither cheating nor deception, no defrauding of laborers nor oppression of the poor; and why? what was it that had created the change? The courtiers never told if they knew, and even after Prince Great-heart married the Princess, and people came from far and near to ask his advice, he could not exactly explain how the Princess contrived to have a court and a country under such perfect management, so honestly governed, so kindly ruled.

Well he knew that directly any one did wrong, the Princess at once conducted the culprit to the room of the magic mirror, but as no one ever told his or her experience therein, the meaning of this curious kind of punishment was never known. Sometimes, on leaving the room, she promptly forgave a criminal whose offence had seemed unpardonable, and her only excuse was that "it was right to do so," but who told her, or how her decision was effected, not even Prince Great-heart could divine.

The secret might have died with the Princess but for the fact that the Prince grew so annoyed over the mystery attending it that he flew into a rage one day, and abused his wife roundly.

To his complete surprise she only laughed with glee. "Now I can tell you!" she exclaimed. "You need the mirror yourself. Come—come quickly."

And taking him by the hand, she fairly flew along the corridors to the door of the room, which she opened with trembling fingers, the Prince, still in a rage, following her, until they stood before the mirror.

"Quickly! quickly!" she cried, afraid that his wrath would cool. "Rub the liquid on for yourself."

The Prince very nearly dashed the whole contents of the bottle on the glass, but curiosity as well as anger governed him, and he obeyed the Princess's instructions.

Looking with blazing eyes into the long glass, he saw himself, not as he appeared ordinarily, handsome, courteous, manly, and good, but as in that moment of anger he really was. He could see his heart, and see the anger working therein sending out little shoots of flame that burned up all the good and noble feelings within him, and which would have stilled his better nature forever had they lasted. He saw now why the mirror had shown him nothing unexpected before, since then his exterior self was a true reflection of both heart and soul.

How sad a spectacle had the Princess seen on that first occasion of using the Desert Fairy's gift! She had seen suddenly laid bare her very heart with all its own miserable little follies, carelessness, and self-indulgence, but Still-small-voice had whispered that by means of this mirror, of seeing herself as she really was, all could be conquered, and good prevail in its stead. So when any one flattered her, instead of accepting it all as in old times, All-fair flew to the mirror, and beheld herself as she really was; if she did an evil deed, she sought the same counsellor, which made it impossible for her to rest until the fault was repaired or the weakness cast out. But the power of the mirror could not be explained, and as Great-heart had always been good and upright and sincere, All-fair had no means of telling him its secret.

From this hour the fame of the magic mirror spread far and wide. People came from great distances, asking to be allowed to visit the room so famous for improving the minds and natures of the Princess's courtiers; but the only explanation they or any one could offer of the good result was that the mirror taught them how to govern themselves—an art which, once learned, made governing other people very easy and successful. Great was the dismay of the court when, on the death of All-fair and the Prince, the mirror and vial vanished.

Some say that the Desert Fairy carried them away to her castle, and that no one has been found willing to undertake the humiliation of a journey in search of them; but in the country of All-fair, for generations after her reign, people were wont to say of any good person, "He must have looked in the Princess's mirror," while of a bad one the reverse was declared, all wishing that even for a short space of time the mirror might be returned to them. But, so far as I have heard, nothing of it has ever been seen again, and it is feared that, in despair of ever finding a suitable owner, the Desert Fairy threw out the contents of the vial, and broke the mirror into fragments, once and for all.

THE END.

AN APRIL FAIR.

BY MARGARET E. SANGSTER.

NOT an April-fool, but an April fair, held in the pleasant rooms of the Industrial School Association, 141 South Third Street, Brooklyn, E. D. Having known something about this association and its work ever since it was begun, I am glad to ask you to listen while, this bright May morning, I tell you about its fair.

A fair, as my little friends know, is never held just for fun. Its object is to make money that may be given away for some useful purpose. The managers of this School and Home have not room enough to take in all the children who need care and shelter, and so they are building a new and large house. Some time ago they did build a wing, and now they wish to erect a "centre building." When that shall be completed and paid for, they will no doubt set about having fairs and raising money to build the other wing. Before any wing was built they tucked the children as cosily as they could into an old-fashioned mansion, which had once been the home of a rich man.

When I entered the building on the second evening of the fair, a pretty sight met my eyes. The walls were covered with our dear American flag, and the tables were loaded with beautiful pieces of needle-work, paintings, queer packages, china, fans, all sorts of dainty devices, and gay bits of bric-à-brac. Motherly ladies and lovely girls were as busy as bees in waiting on the throngs of buyers. But I looked past all these to the centre of the room, where around the piano a number of the Home boys and girls, standing in a circle, were led by their kind teacher in merry songs. One refrain was,

And it rang out in such a jolly way that it coaxed a good many five-cent pieces out of coat pockets and purses. Five cents pays for a brick.

On a table which made no particular show there were specimens of mending, patching, and darning done by the children. I did not wonder that the lady who sat here exhibited this work with pride; for it is a great accomplishment to know how to patch a boy's trousers neatly, to set a piece into the worn-out knees, to darn an immense hole in the heel of a stocking so smoothly that the wearer would never know it was darned. And I wish I could make such button-holes as one dear child of twelve had made. I am afraid I never shall. They were beautiful button-holes. The ladies of this part of Brooklyn take great interest in the sewing classes of this institution, and spend a good deal of time in teaching the children.

Yet many of the visitors would have found the most attractive spot, not in the bustling fair room, but away upstairs where the babies and the younger children were fast asleep in cribs and beds, or away down-stairs where the breakfast table, with plates and mugs, was set for the next morning. One hundred and sixty-four children are cared for here—cared for with wise and loving thoughtfulness. They have Christmas and Fourth of July as other children do. They all go to Sunday-school; and when the Fresh-air Fund is large enough, the managers take them for a summer outing, sometimes to Coney Island, sometimes to Prospect Park. I hope they receive HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE, for I am sure they would enjoy reading this story of themselves and their fair.

CHIPPY'S DRAGON.

BY JOHN HABBERTON.

AUTHOR OF "HELEN'S BARRIS," "WHO WAS PAUL GRAYSON?" ETC.

CHIPPY was not the name which the only child in the Ransom family received when he was baptized; his father and mother gave it to him because, like the "chippy" birds in the bushes, he chattered and chirped a great deal about everything that occurred within sight of him. He was a country boy, having been born on a farm about five hundred miles from New York, and at least ten miles from a town of any kind; so he had never seen an electric light, or a steam-boat, or a horse-car; as for railroads, he had never seen even a toy locomotive.

And yet he knew a great deal. Although only seven years old, he could teach any city boy all about horses and cows, and a great deal about dogs. He knew all the birds by sight and name, and although he never robbed their nests of eggs, he knew just where they lived. Show him a hill a mile away, and he could tell on which side of it you would find the spring flowers earliest; he could also, on looking over a large tract of ground, tell just where one should walk if one didn't care to see snakes. As for wild strawberries, he could find them before his father would know they were ripe.

Chippy could not read; as, however, HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE was not published when he was a boy, this was not as great a misfortune as it would be now. But he was not entirely ignorant of books; his mother told him about hundreds of things printed in the Bible and the History of the United States. Among his mother's few books, however, Chippy's favorite was an old volume of fairy stories, for in this there were pictures, and these he was sure he understood. One of them was of a dragon—a long monster composed of many joints, with a head unlike any animal on the farm or in the woods. This head had a single great bright eye, which terrified every one upon whom it gazed, and a mouth which breathed out fire and poisonous air. The dragon lived in a mountain, out of a hole in which the picture showed him coming, and he swallowed every human being he met, no matter how many he had already eaten. The story explained that he was finally killed by a brave youth with golden hair and blue eyes, who threw a red scarf in the dragon's face, and exclaimed, "Be thou destroyed!" And Chippy used to dream about that dragon, and wish he could meet him, for his own hair was yellow and his eyes were blue, and he did not think it would be hard to find a red scarf, for in the picture this looked very much like a common handkerchief.

Soon after Chippy's seventh birthday his father sold his little farm, and putting all his household goods in a single wagon, moved to another farm twenty-five miles distant. The journey was a great event for Chippy, who had never before been five miles from home, and the boy was terribly disappointed at reaching the new home after dark, for it did not seem to him that everything could be right until he had looked at it and found it satisfactory.

This feeling oppressed Chippy's mind all night, and woke him very early in the morning. He dressed himself quickly, went out, and looked around. He could not find any fault with the new farm, for there were plenty of cherry-trees near the house, a brook behind the barn, and a pond not far away, in which he found pollywogs that looked just like those he had known for years. Then he saw a tree with which he had never before been acquainted; so he tramped to it and examined it, after which he made his way toward a hill not half a mile away, for, young though he was, he knew by experience that a hill-top was the best of all places for a long outlook.

Scarcely had he reached the foot of the hill when he saw a sharp cliff on one side of it, and in the cliff was a great dark hole.

"I declare, it looks just like the dragon's hole," said Chippy to himself. Then he made up his mind that he could spare a few minutes to watch for the dragon, so he lay down, prudently selecting a thick bush to hide him, lest the dragon, if he really lived there, should see and swallow him.

Lying on the ground is not a very spirited way of passing time, and Chippy was just beginning to wonder if it would not be better to look about and see if that country had not some new flowers to put on his mother's breakfast plate, when from the hole came a dull noise, and then an awful shriek which made Chippy clap his fingers to his ears.

"I do believe I've found the dragon's den!" exclaimed Chippy to himself. Then he wished himself at home and in bed—no, under the bed. He had enough curiosity, though, to raise his head slightly, and peep through an open space in the bush at the hole in the cliff. Suddenly, however, he dropped his head, for he saw a great fiery eye—the very eye he had heard of in the story and seen in his dreams; he also saw the breath of fire or sparks—and he was sure he breathed the poisonous air which the dragon blew out, for something that entered his own lungs made him cough dreadfully.

Surer than all other evidence, however, were the people he saw inside the monster, for they were real people, and although none of them were crying, none looked at all happy. The noise made by the monster was simply terrific, and Chippy did not dare to move until it stopped; then he peered carefully around, and finally arose, but no dragon could be seen or heard. What did it mean? What should he have done? If he had not been so scared he might have slain the dragon, if he had been able to throw a red scarf in its face, and if he had owned a scarf.

"I wonder if my cap wouldn't have done as well as a scarf?" said Chippy. "It's made of red flannel, and I don't believe the dragon would have known it from a scarf. I wish I'd thought of that."

Then Chippy lay down again, and spent some time in wishing, as a great many millions of grown people had done before him, that he might be able to think a little quicker. A few minutes thus spent taught him that the ground was more cold than comfortable, so he arose and started for home to tell his father and mother all he had seen. Just then, however, he again heard a noise in the direction of the hole in the cliff; after that he heard a shriek, and turning his head, he saw again the great bright, blazing eye.

"I'll bet an ear of pop-corn that I'll catch that dragon this time!" exclaimed Chippy. "He runs pretty fast, but I guess I can head him off."

So saying, Chippy ran as fast as he could in the direction the dragon had taken. His steps were suddenly stopped by a cut in the side of the hill, but by that time the dragon's head was so far out of the hole that it could see anything near by, so Chippy snatched his red cap from his head and shook it at the monster, ready to throw it as soon as he could be sure of his aim. And all the while he roared, as only a seven-year-old boy can, "Be thou destroyed!"

In an instant the dragon gave two short screams, but they were long enough to reach from Chippy's ears all the way to his toes. It did not seem at first as if the monster would be killed by a make-believe scarf that was only a red cap, but it seemed to slow its motion, and just as Chippy was about to throw the cap the dragon wheezed and groaned and rattled, and then became as still as death.

Instantly a number of people appeared from the inside of the dragon. In the fairy story these people all knelt at the feet of the brave youth who had rescued them from a horrible fate, and they gave him gold and jewels, and begged him to marry the king's daughter. Chippy had no desire to marry a princess or any one else, but he was just thinking how nice it would be to carry his mother some gold with which to buy all the things he had heard her say she would need at the new house, when he noticed that none of the people who were approaching him seemed to think of kneeling down. Then a sharp-eyed man in a striped shirt and dirty hands said, "Well, youngster, what's the matter?"

"Nothing," said Chippie, modestly, "except that I've slain the dragon."

"Oh, drop your ancient history!" said the sharp-eyed man. "Is anything the matter with the track around the curve?"

"Track?" said Chippie. He did not know what else to say for a moment, and suddenly the sharp-eyed man took him by the throat. Then Chippie shouted:

"Oh, please don't! 'Twas I that killed the dragon and saved your lives."

"Dragon!—saved lives?" exclaimed the sharp-eyed man. "I didn't know there was a lunatic asylum in this neighborhood. Why, you little idiot, do you know what you've done? You've stopped the Lightning Express, and she was thirty-five minutes behind time already."

Chippie wasn't any wiser then than before, but some one shouted, "All aboard!" upon which the people, including the sharp-eyed man, hurried back, and the monster started again, and in a single minute Chippie found himself entirely alone. As he could not understand it at all, he hurried home and told the story to his father and mother, and they listened very kindly, and when Chippie had finished, his father said,

"My dear little boy, that wasn't a dragon; it was a railroad train coming out of a tunnel."

"Oh!" said Chippie.

All this happened so long ago that Chippie now has some gray hairs. But to this day he cannot look a locomotive in the face without blushing.

HOW THE CZAR AROUSED A SLEEPER.

"THE hardest bit of work I ever did in my life," said Colonel B—, as we sat together over our samovar (tea-urn) in a little post-house on the shoulder of Mount Kazbak, half-way across the Central Caucasus, "was bringing despatches from the Crimea to the Czar Nikolai Pavlovitch (Nicholas, son of Paul) in January, 1855. It was no joke being in the army then, I can tell you; for the Emperor and those who were under him made no allowance for bad weather or bad roads, want of food and transport, sickness, or anything of that sort. When an order was given, you had to obey it somehow, and if you couldn't, so much the worse for you.

"Of course there were no railways in southern Russia then, or we wouldn't have lost so many men in our march to Sebastopol, and for more than a week I was flying over the snow day and night in a sledge as if a pack of wolves were after me—as they were, by-the-bye, once or twice during the voyage. You've been across Central Asia yourself, and you'll know what work I had of it, snatching a little food and sleep when I could, and going without when I couldn't. Once I awoke just as I was falling out of the sledge, and found the driver asleep too, and the horses going at full speed, so that I should never have been missed, and should just have been frozen to death where I lay.

"At last I reached Moscow, and drove through the Kremlin to the new palace, where the Czar then was. They brought me to him at once, and I gave him my despatches. I had just time to notice how worn and haggard he looked (this was only a few weeks before his death, you know), when I lurched back against the wall, and fell asleep standing.

"Presently—so I learned afterward—the Czar looked up to ask me some question, and there was I fast asleep on my feet! He spoke to me, touched me, shook me—no use! At last he bent down and shouted in my ear,

"'Vashé blagorodié, lozhadi gotovi' (your honor, the horses are ready).

"At the sound of the words that had been ringing in my ears for eight days and nights I started upright as if I'd been shot, which I fully expected to be when I found that I'd been sleeping in the Czar's own presence. But he only laughed, and told me to go home and rest, and I assure you I was mighty glad to get off so cheaply."

THE REIGN OF FIRE.

BY SOPHIE B. HERRICK.

YOU remember, I hope, that besides the water and the air that helped to fashion our beautiful earth out of the globe of rock covered by a heated ocean which existed in the past, another force has been mentioned—fire. Fire is still working day and night in changing the world, but it is mostly underground.

Air and water are as much levellers as they are builders. If only these two forces had been at work, the mountains would gradually have been brought low, and the valleys exalted, till finally every rock and island would have been worn down and buried in the depths of the sea. The world would have returned to the condition it had been in thousands of years before, only it would be cooler.

But the internal fires were there to upset all this gradual change. They were never at rest. Again and again the sea bottom was lifted up, and became dry land, and the waters gathered together in new hollows.

Miners who go down into the earth for coal and iron find, after a certain distance, that it grows steadily warmer and warmer as they descend. If the heat of the earth goes on increasing at this rate, at thirty miles below the surface of the earth the heat would be so intense as to melt even iron or stone. As a matter of fact, things melt a great deal more easily when they are open to the air than when they are under pressure. Down deep in the earth the pressure of the rocks above is tremendous, and this gets heavier the deeper it is. So there is a battle between the heat and the pressure down deep in the earth, and whether the rocks there are melted or solid depends on which is the stronger. Some people think that all but a thin shell over the outside of the world is red-hot liquid; others think it is hot enough to be liquid, but that the pressure keeps it solid. However this may be, whenever, from any cause, the pressure is sufficiently lightened, the melted stone and cinders and steam come rushing out. Volcanoes are the chimneys by which they escape.

The cool crust of the earth is a great deal thinner in proportion to the rest of the globe than an egg-shell is to the egg. In old geologic times the shell was thinner even than it is now. The fires then worked wonderful changes, the same in kind as they are working now, but much greater. The earth's crust—made of many layers of different kinds deposited by the water—was crumpled and torn and twisted in a most remarkable way.

The struggles of the internal fires often produce a sound and shaking—an earthquake. Suppose you were to lower a can of gunpowder (sealed up tight, and so arranged that it would go off in half an hour) into a pond. When the powder took fire it would explode, and as soon as the commotion reached the top of the water, a wave would spread out from the point above the explosion. An earthquake is such an explosion, only it is underground; the earth is thrown into waves, but instead of rocking and moving off as the water does, the ground, being solid, is torn and broken, and if the shock is severe, houses are thrown down and people destroyed. Sometimes things are thrown straight up into the air by an earthquake shock; at other times they are shaken backward and forward till they fall in ruins. The movement of the earth during a shock is at times a curious twisting motion, which has been known to turn pieces of furniture around so that their faces were to the wall. Rows of trees have been found all twisted out of line, though still growing, after such a shock. We are apt to think of earthquakes as being very rare, and so they are with us; but in hot countries they are so common that it is probable that some part of the earth is quaking all the time.

Sometimes, when the shock is not very severe, the earth cracks underneath, but the cracks do not quite come through. The melted stone then pours up and fills the cracks (Fig. 1), and hardens there. The intense heat of the melted stone often changes the rock through which it flows. Limestone, which is a rather soft stone made up largely of shells, is turned into marble in this way. Marble, then, is merely "cooked" limestone.

In Fig. 2 you see a cut through a part of the earth's surface. At first, underneath all, was the melted stone; over this formed the layered rocks. Then the melted stone rose up, lifting the layers S S as it rose. As time went on, the air and water washed the layers from the top of the mountain, leaving it bare (A). After a while an earthquake cracked the earth, and more melted rock poured up. At B the cracks only reached part of the way up, and the lava, after rising to the top of the crack, spread out between two layers. At C it reached the top and flowed over the ground, making a solid slab of volcanic rock on top of the layered rock. At E the lava came out with such a rush that it built up a little volcano there.

Very often, when one stone is melted in this way, the crystals of another kind of mineral are enclosed in it. (Fig. 3.) Here is another curious stone made by the fire. The lava cooled full of bubbles, and with these holes another mineral collected and hardened, as plaster of Paris fills a mould into which it is poured. The moulds were made by fire, though it was dissolved and not a melted mineral which filled them. (Fig. 4.)

A volcano, you know, is a mountain that sends out burning gases and lava and cinders. It is usually a high peak with a cup-like depression in the top, called a crater. The volcanoes of the world are found almost always near the sea, and nearly three-quarters of them are situated upon islands.

If you have a globe—or if you have not, a map of the world—put your finger on Terra del Fuego (the land of fire), at the very southern part of South America, then run it along the western coast of the two continents—the Andes and the Rocky Mountains being your guide—till you get to Alaska, where Asia and America almost touch; pass over to the Aleutian Islands and down by way of islands across the Indian and Pacific oceans back to Terra del Fuego again. Your finger will have passed over most of the large volcanoes in the world.

It is as if the earth's crust were cracked all around in this irregular line, that the mountain chains were the raised edges of this crack, and that the crack gave way every now and then, and through the broken places melted stone and gas and flames rushed out.

Some of the grandest volcanoes in the world are in the Pacific islands. One of the Sandwich Islands is nothing but an immense volcano with three craters. The island has been built up by the outpouring of lava, which gradually lifted it, craters and all, out of the sea. One of these craters, Mount Kilauea, is an immense wide pit, large enough to hold a city. The rocky plain at the bottom of the pit, when there is an eruption, breaks up and fills with lava. It is a wonderful sight to see these great lakes of red-hot melted stone boiling and bubbling like a great pot of boiling water, and the red-hot waves beating against the rocky shore, and spurting fountains of fire rising up here and there. In one eruption the weight of the lava was so great that it broke through the side of the crater, and ran down a river of living fire to the sea. When it met the water, great clouds of hissing steam spouted up, carrying the cooled and shattered lava with it.

The lava in Kilauea is often like clear glass, and when the bubbles burst in the boiling lake, it is drawn out into fine spun glass, which the wind collects in sheltered spots. The Sandwich-Islanders used to call it Pele's hair, because they believed their goddess Pele lived under the crater, and caused its eruptions. Since I wrote these words a curious thing has happened to Kilauea: the bottom has tumbled out of the crater. The boiling, fiery lakes and fountains suddenly sunk in, and left it a great dark abyss.

In the sea near the coast of Greece, more than 2000 years ago, the crater of a great volcano was lifted out of the water. It made a sort of horseshoe island, part of the rim having been broken away. This island is called Santorin. In the curve of the bay enclosed by the horseshoe several volcanoes have burst up since, and are still sending out steam and vapor. The water around them is hot, and is colored orange by the iron and other things thrown out by the volcanoes.

The volcanoes in Europe, such as Etna and Vesuvius, are different from Kilauea. Before an eruption loud noises are heard, an earthquake shakes the ground, and then comes a sudden outpouring of lava and cinders and smoke. In one of these eruptions soon after the time of Christ two cities were buried by an overflow, one of mud and the other of cinders. A little more than a hundred years ago, in digging a well in a town that had grown up over the old one, the city was discovered. Imagine what a wonderful thing it must have been to walk those deserted streets, sealed up for nearly two thousand years, and find the houses, the baths, the libraries, almost unimpaired! These buried cities, Herculaneum and Pompeii, were destroyed (as was thought until their rediscovery, about the middle of the eighteenth century) in the year 79. Some day you will read about them in Bulwer-Lytton's fascinating romance The Last Days of Pompeii.

In Mexico, in a peaceful district where there were fine cotton plantations, a hundred and thirty years ago lived a rich planter quietly cultivating his crops. Suddenly one day loud and terrible noises were heard underground; earthquake shocks were felt. This went on for two months, and then all quieted down. After a few weeks of quiet, the noises began again, the ground for about four miles swelled up in a great bladder 500 feet high, which rose and fell, till finally a yawning gulf opened. Two rivers which before had flowed peacefully through the country plunged into this opening and were lost. Thousands of little mud volcanoes burst up all over the plain, an immense crater opened, and poured out such quantities of red-hot stones and ashes that it built up a range of six mountains. One of these is a volcano, called Jorulla, which has been active ever since.

OUR POST-OFFICE BOX

IN No. 537, Mrs. Chater made, as she supposed, a final acknowledgment of contributions received for the Monroe Chapel Fund, but the interest in dear little Fairfax Payne and her beautiful gift continues unabated, and to the former sum of $23.30 our friend is now able to add a goodly amount, as the following letters will show. Mrs. E. M. Barnes has suggested that a portion of the money raised by her little friends should be devoted to founding a Sunday-school library for the church in Monroe, and this seems so fit a use for it that the thought will be carried into action. Fairfax will write her own thanks to the eight little girls who, through Mrs. Barnes, sent the proceeds of their fair, and with Mrs. Chater, we must all be very glad that a little seed has fallen into good ground, and the harvest being gathered by willing hands and warm hearts."

BROOKLYN, N. Y.

DEAR POSTMISTRESS,—Wouldn't you like to know of some good you have done? I am sure you would. I must begin in the middle of my story, as you have already published the first of it. Do you remember the letter from Englewood, New Jersey, telling of the sacrifice made by a little girl in North Carolina of her beautiful blond hair, that she might "sell it for the church"? Well, that letter was read in the Clinton Avenue Sunday-school, and listened to by some warm-hearted little girls. These six little girls intended to help, in some way, their little Southern sister to raise money to build a church in a Southern town.

On Saturday, April 17, they held a fair in the Sunday-school room of the Clinton Avenue Church, and in three hours cleared ninety dollars! I cannot tell you how much surprised the mammas and friends of these children were, for no one knew they had so many lovely articles for sale. The design and management of the fair were entirely their own. They sent for the hair of their Southern friend, and it was looked at and admired by many bright eyes.

It has occurred to me that perhaps if you, dear Postmistress, should publish the proceeds of the effort of these six little girls, and others might be inclined to a similar endeavor, and the story of the self-sacrifice of the little North Carolinian, retold, would bring from the little friends at the North means to build that longed-for church. Will you retell it?

Please accept this letter and the suggestion it contains for what you may think them worth to your little readers. Your admiring friend, the proud mamma of one of the six.

MRS. THERO, B. McLEOD.

Little readers who have forgotten or overlooked this story will find the original letter to which Mrs. McLeod refers, in the Post-office Box of No. 323.

SALT LAKE CITY, UTAH.

DEAR POSTMISTRESS,—I wrote to you once before, and you asked me if I had ever read "We Are Seven." Yes, but not until after you spoke of it. I have no pets except a baby brother three weeks old, the only boy in a family of five girls, which I am the eldest. I go to Hammond Hall, or Salt Lake Academy; it is a two-story building, built of light red brick, with darker red brick around the windows and doors. My teacher is very pleasant. We have a sewing society; we call it "The Four O'Clocks," because that flower opens just about the time we sit down to school. Mrs. G. is President, Winny W. is Treasurer, and Ruth S. is Secretary. We meet every Monday at half past three, and stay an hour. We are sewing and studying, and doing up all the things we make in a fair at Hammond Hall. We will have our fair in May. I will write again and tell you about our success.

MARIA C.

RICHMOND, VIRGINIA.

I am a little boy seven years old. I go to school every day. I study reading, spelling, and geography. I have one sister ten months old, and another little sister is just three months old. She is lame, and will never walk well as long as she lives. I have no pets, but I like to play myself have many playthings. We have a large express wagon. My largest sister has a nice bisque baby. I expect to get a sleigh next Christmas, and I can't wait for it. I was at the HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE every Saturday. Papa began reading "Silent Pete" last Sunday night. We have had one volume home. We think it is very nice.

AVGUSTUS ANSELL B.

MASKATO, MINNESOTA.

DEAR POSTMISTRESS,—I suppose you would hardly admit this letter to your delightful page of "Our Little Friends," but I have a story to tell public, but you know the democracy of childhood, so please let me post this to you all, and especially to my tiny sister Jo, who will always insist on being allowed the blessed privilege of cutting the leaves "her own self" of her loved HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE, even when I happen to be interested too. The story of child life as it runs through each season in your bright little paper is a poem in itself, and just what the children should contemplate a little mirror, in which they can "see themselves as others see them," in a quaint, odd, pretty frame that belongs to no particular period of art, but to all countries, for childhood, I feel, is everywhere, and ways the same, with perhaps a little change of costume and scene. Why are they like "the flowers that bloom in the spring," if not "for the hope that they bring—'tis a lie!"

Very truly,
EMMA W. A.

DEAR POSTMISTRESS,—I am a little girl ten years old, and I have two sisters and three brothers. My oldest sister and brother have been taking HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE for a good while. I always wanted to send a letter to you, but I have no money to do so, but as my two cousins are writers, I thought I would.

AMY B.

DEAR POSTMISTRESS,—I am a little girl of eight years old. My biggest sister has a cut and kitten, and some are pure black. My brother has two cats, and I have one dog, and the dog is so lonely that he gave it away.

BEATRICE B.

A FABLE.

There was once a man who began to be greatly troubled by numerous rabbits, which devoured his corn. He had a dog, and he had often heard of a dog for sale, a remarkably fine hunter, and thinking it would be to his profit, he bought it and brought it home. The dog served him faithfully, and soon reduced the rabbits considerably, continually bringing him numbers of them. On such occasions his master always loaded him with praises and caresses, but never gave him any share of the game, having it all cooked for himself and his family. In consequence, the dog, which was too fond of its food, was hurried to death, and the rabbits, returning in greater numbers than ever, soon utterly destroyed all his crops.

Moral.—Something more is needed in recompense for faithful service than empty honor.

E. B.

THE THREE GOBLINS.

Once upon a time, in the land of Somewhere, there lived a Gnome King, who was generally supposed to be a magician. He reached a ripe old age, and died, but he did so suddenly, that the people thought it very mysterious. However, as their suspicions were not very strong, they did not say anything. Soon after the King's death his will was fully read, and it was stated in it that his skull and his favorite walking-stick should be riveted together to make a sceptre.

About two hundred years after this, when King Canetto, a descendant of the magician King, was reigning, his Grand Vizier happened to offend him, so the King struck him dead with his sceptre. To the surprise of Canetto and his courtiers, the head of the sceptre split open, and out jumped three ugly goblins, who with their heads and feet riveted together, entered into a ship loaded with combustibles, and transferred it to the middle of the ocean. The goblins then went down to the hold, and set the ship on fire in three different places. The ship was soon one mass of flame. The goblins were seen to escape among the smoke and flame in the form of vampires only, and when the King and his courtiers were never heard of again.

CANTON, KENT, ENGLAND. HAROLD D. (aged 12).

NEW JASPER, OHIO.

I am a girl thirteen years old. I have been taking this delightful paper for nearly a year, and can hardly wait till Wednesday comes. My papa is a Methodist minister. I go to school, and study arithmetic, reading, spelling, geography, grammar, and history. Our school is about a quarter of a mile from town; we take our dinners. At noon we go to the woods to look at wild flowers. Do you not like them?

LIDA M. K.

I do not live where wild flowers grow. But to gather them in the wood was the dearest pleasure I used to know. And I really wish I could go out with you on a sunny day. To gather the beautiful flowers of May.

BIRTON, RHODE ISLAND.

I am a little girl twelve years old. I go to a private school, and study arithmetic, history, spelling, grammar, and French every day. I like "Jo's Opportunity" and "Silent Pete" very much. I made some of the things for Christmas told about in "Brightie's Club"; I think they were very nice. I have a garden because then we can go into the woods and have good times. I have a garden with my sister, and some violets have just begun to grow there. Do you not think they are very pretty?

G. D. D.

Yes, indeed.

STANFORD, CONNECTICUT.

When I last visited Tappanout, I saw Washington's Head-quarters, which is a very nice place, and a monument and a statue of the house where Andr. and his men were kept prisoners. The house is a very queer-looking building. I have to go to school in the winter, and consequently we do not take much comfort this vacation. For pets I have a dog, two cats, and four kittens that are two young to play with yet. The dog's name is Sly, and the cats are named Spring-beauties. "Jo's Opportunity" was a very interesting story. I think.

CLARA S.

LAKE MILLS, WISCONSIN.

I am a little girl twelve years old, and I live in a nice story. I live in the country, about four miles from town, and have always been to a district school, but I expect to go to a public school next winter. I have to go a mile and a quarter to school, but I went quite regularly this winter, for the teacher boarded at our house, and we rode every morning. I was very glad, and consequently we do not take much comfort this vacation. For pets I have a dog, two cats, and four kittens that are two young to play with yet. The dog's name is Sly, and the cats are named Spring-beauties. "Jo's Opportunity" was a very interesting story. I think.

CLAUD A.

ALLEGHENY CITY, PENNSYLVANIA.

I am twelve years old, and I go to a public school, and study reading, spelling, writing, arithmetic, grammar, geography, history, drawing, physiology, music, and business forms. There are eighteen rooms in the school, and I am in No. 17. I have no pets. I had three little kittens, but they died long ago. I had a white cat, and the two that died were Maltese, and the other was pure white (that is, when we got it from the country it was); by the time we had it two days after it had become a girl, and I received HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE on Christmas, 1882, and again on Christmas, 1884, and again this year. My first year I wrote two papers to go away. After I read them, and now they sit all the time. Not long ago I took a large bundle of papers up to an orphan asylum, for I don't think the orphan gets a paper. Some of the girls who are in the same room in school with myself write stories, but I have never tried. I prefer reading them to writing them. I am ten years old and the other four. I am the oldest child and only girl. Eight girls near by have formed a club to make fancy work, and bring a certain amount to every meeting; when we get enough money, we are going to buy gingham, and make aprons to give away. I love to read the letters from American girls travelling in Europe.

MEADOW LEE, MANITOBA.

We live on a farm about two miles from Manitowish, which is quite a pretty little village, especially in the summer. We have taken this paper nearly three years. The continued story, such as opportunity is, I think, very interesting, also Howard Pyle's fairy stories. I have two sisters younger than myself—Clara, aged nine, and Julia, aged seven. Our mother died three years ago, and my father is an editor. Our pets are three cats—Josy, Dinah, and Tildie. We also pet the cows and calves, and Lizzie, the horse. We have about fifty hens, and I take care of them. I had a little pet hen which would let any one take her up and handle her; she would even walk into our laps if we were sitting on the ground. She has never been sick, and she looks as healthy like a little dog, but, alas! she came to a sad end. One morning when I went out to feed the hens, all that remained of her was a bunch of feathers; some animal had caught her. KATIE B.

MEADOW LEE, MANITOBA.

DEAD POSTMISTRESS.—As I have not seen any letters from Manitoba, I thought I would write one. We live on a farm. I have no pets, but we have many very nice flowers. I have a white female. A friend gave us HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE for two years, and I think that we will take it ourselves next year. I have a very nice garden, and I have some flowers every fortnight; the last one was very good. I will send you some of our prairie flowers. I would like to see this letter, and tell about the nice little tree you wrote. I will speak to the editor about your request, which I have not published.

CHATEAUX, PENNSYLVANIA.

My aunt has a nice big white setter dog, and she lets me play with her. Her name is Daisy, and I have trained her all myself to pull a wagon. I have nice red shoes, and a nice white dress, and an express wagon with shafts, and when there is snow I fasten the shafts to myself. My little cousin gets into the wagon sometimes, and Daisy will trot with him. I am almost too heavy for her to pull, but I have her haul different things around the farm. Grandpa has a greenhouse, and I have some seeds. I have a brother who is nearly ten years old, and I have a brother who is seven. Papa gave him HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE for a Christmas present; he gave me a pair of skates.

A WEEK IN THE COUNTRY.

Letty was a spoiled child. Florence said; but Florence was jealous of her little cousin's many friends, and we cannot quite rely on her word. Florence lived at grandma's, and she was fourteen. Her father lived with her papa and mamma, and she loved.

Well, one day the postman said, with a grin, as he handed Mary the mail, "There's a letter for Miss Alice; it's here is." "Oh, how nice!" she was, for it was from Cousin Florence, inviting Letty to come out and pay a visit at grandma's. "I will change my dress," said Alice. "Oh, can I go, Aunt Anna?" she cried.

"I can't quite decide, my dear, as mamma and papa are away, but I will see about it," said Aunt Anna with a reassuring smile, and then she went away.

"I'm sure mamma wouldn't mind. I would love to go, but Aunt Anna keeps saying I should behave like a lady, and not pout and snirk, for I promised to be good while mamma was away," said Letty, aloud, as she folded up the letter and put it in her pocket, little thinking that that little speech of self-ideal was to send her to grandma's.

At tea-time Aunt Anna told Letty that she had made up her mind that she (Letty) could go to grandma's, as she felt that she could trust her. "Oh, auntie!" cried Letty, upsetting her teacup, and taking great pains to knock over everything within her reach.

"Yes," said Aunt Anna, "I think you are a very sensible girl, Letty, and, to-morrow afternoon you may start."

The next day great excitement prevailed until five o'clock, when the girls were called. Bridget said to Mary, "Och, it's not a bad job at all at all that that we've bit of a thing is gone out of the house for a while, and I will have a bit of nose at it for looking inside!" "And when," said Bridget, "I liked Letty, and so did Mary, and so did everybody in the household."

As the little girl, Gretchen, Florence was at the station, and welcomed her in her usual flippancy manner. But Letty was used to this, and she went happily home to grandma's with her mother and sister.

That night Florence invited some young folks from the neighborhood in to see Letty, and they had a very pleasant time. They played snapp-apple, and blindman's-buff, and various other consequences, and rickrack-auroa. The last-mentioned game Letty was not familiar with, and was taught many things.

The next day Florence took her cousin to school with her, and "city Letty" was much amused at the system of teaching in a country school.

The day before Letty was to leave for home she was invited to a picnic at Finis Vine Groves, and she enjoyed it very much. She and Florence gathered a lot of water-lilies to take home, but on the way they fell out of the wagon.

The next day Letty returned home, looking "ruddy and rosy," and she told Aunt Anna that her week in the country had been the happiest one she had ever experienced.

HOTEL MADISON, NEW YORK CITY.

RIVER EDGE, NEW JERSEY.

I live in a little country town sixteen miles from New York; it is on the banks of the Hackensack River, and is very pretty. We live at the foot of the hill, and very nice school here, but the foot of it, which makes the view very pretty. We have great sport here in winter coasting; some of the folks go skating on the river, but I do not, as mamma does not think it safe. In summer we have nice times gathering the wild flowers, and going rowing and sailing on the river. I like to go to very nice school here, but I have not attended since the holidays, as I have been sick. Will somebody please give me Mrs. Richardson's address?

INNIE C. K.

Woodslee, near Lincolnton, North Carolina, is the address of Mrs. Alice Richardson.

CHICAGO, ILLINOIS.

I have taken HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE for four years, and have never written to you before. I have one sister and one brother. For pets I have a black cat, and Alice, a heavy setter, four years old, and Alice is not quite one year old. Alice has three teeth, and both dark eyes and light hair.

LILA H.

PHILADELPHIA, PENNSYLVANIA.

I wish somebody would write to me for pet dogs and cats. I have a black kitten, and his name is Purr-purr, because he purrs so loud; and I have a gray kitten; I called him Wew-wew, because when he came to me he was so small. This is the first letter I ever wrote, and I would like to see it printed.

ALICE G.

CHARLEVILLE, IRELAND.

MY DEAR POSTMISTRESS,—I AM a young girl in my fourth year. I am a heavy setter, two miles from the city of Dublin. I have been at home for the past five months, but will be going home very soon. I will be very sorry to leave my parents. I have three brothers and one sister. One of my brothers is at college. My sister and I have taken HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE for twelve months, and we shall continue to do so.

MARY Y. M.

CLERIFORD GRANGE, BORNEMOUTH, ENGLAND.

I have two brothers and two sisters. We have four pet birds, a parrot, a cat, and a rabbit. Last summer we had forty-seven rabbits, but some of them died of cold, some were eaten by rats, and those that remained we sold, because they were very fat. I was very sorry to leave my parents. I was born in India, and am eleven years old. I hope my letter is not too long for a place in the Post-office Box. Good-bye, dear Postmistress.

EVELYN D.

THE FOUR FRIENDS.

Once there was a boy who had a dog, and a girl who had a cat. They were brother and sister. The boy's name was Frank, and the girl's Alice. Frank was a great hunter, and he was saying to Alice he would send his dog after her cat. One day when Frank was out walking he saw that his dog had the cat in his mouth, and Alice was standing by them crying. They went into the house; their mother asked what was the matter, and Alice told her. Alice went out after a while, and was overjoyed to find her cat still alive. The next day the cat went up to the dog and scratched his face, and said, "When Frank saw the blood on his dog's face, he cried just as Alice did. He said he would drown her cat. So the next day he stayed out with the cat. Frank saw the dog following him. He threw the cat into the water, when, to his surprise, the dog plunged in and brought her back. From that day, Frank, Alice, the cat, and the dog have been good friends."

HASTING, MASSACHUSETTS.

I am a boy of twelve. I go to school, and study arithmetic, spelling, mental arithmetic, geography, language and writing, and I read in HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE. For pets, I have a pony, a cat, and two rabbits. When I am five years old, after I go out in the country nearly every day, I am riding on horseback.

CHARLES E. W., JUN.

INDIAN STATION, KENTUCKY.

I am eleven years old. I have taken eleven numbers of HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE, and like it very much. I think "Joe's Opportunity" is the best story I have read. I have a dog named Jess, the other Leslie. I had a nice pet dog, but he got killed by the train. I have six sisters. I am the youngest of the family. I hope you will publish this, for it is the first I have written. I went to a five-month school this winter. I am going to begin another school the first of March. My studies are reading, writing, spelling, arithmetic, and geography. JOHN W. W.

BROOKLYN, NEW YORK.

DEAR POSTMISTRESS,—I LIVE in BROOKLYN, only a little way from Prospect Park, and in the summer we have nice little picnics there. I am just seven years old, and go to school, but as I cannot write very well yet, mamma is writing this for me. I have one brother and one sister, both older than I am. We have taken this paper from the first number, and like it more and more. We cannot mamma to make some bread-cakes for us by that receipt in the paper; so she did last Sunday morning, and we all thought they were delicious. I have a great many pretty dolls, but I like to play out doors best, and will be so glad when the weather gets pleasant. I have the chicken-pox, and cannot go to school this week, so mamma said it would be nice to write to HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE, and surprise sister and brother. I have two little cousins in New Brighton, Pennsylvania, who take it, and it will surprise them very much. I have a very nice tree we live on Chautauque Lake, and her letter was printed; and she has sent two or three puzzles. I will write again next summer when we have vacation, and tell about the nice little tree we have taken.

SHOW CURIOSITIES.

YARMOUTH fair happened to take place when I was there. Of course I went into the shows. The best thing by far was the Hairless Horse. Yes, he was perfectly hairless, as bald as a billiard ball. His hair had not been shaved; he had never had any. Some part of the skin was white, the rest black. The white was very white, like the skin of a sucking pig; the black was the black of the edible Chinese dog, also called the "India-rubber Dog." There was also on view a living skeleton—certainly a skeleton something awful to look at. He was said to be thirty-four; he might have been any age. He was awfully thin. His wrist would pass through a gauge of one inch and one-eighth. I asked the skeleton what he lived on. He said, "Rump-steaks and porter." Anyhow, he certainly did not grow fat on it. I went also to see a "Petritied Mummy," about which the showman, of course, had a long yarn to tell. This was an old friend that I am continually coming across at penny shows—viz, the "Abogine." The history of the "Abogine" is as follows: "He is a dried Australian native, thrown in as a bargain with some shells, spears, etc., in a lot, and bought by a dealer. The shells, etc., were sold, but not the dried Australian, and the dealer got quite tired of his bargain. At last he called him an "Abogine," and exchanged him with a penny showman for some monkeys. The poor "Abogine" does not get on; showmen can't make money out of him. The "Abogine," of course, means "aboriginal native," only the word has been a little twisted.

There were a tremendous number of roundabouts in the fair. Why the women, children, and men do not get giddy and fall out of these model boats and rocking-horses, I can't tell. The sailors were great at the swings, and, I must say, were sent up fearful heights—higher than any landmen could or would go. —From Frank Buckland's "Notes and Jottings from Animal Life."

"JACKET."

BY LUCY C. LILLIE.

AUTHOR OF "NAN," "ROLY HOUSE," "JO'S OPPORTUNITY," ETC.

PART I.

I THINK I ought to tell you at once that he wasn't an Indian, for I find that when we speak to strangers of dear old Jacket they are apt to associate him with war-whoops and tomahawks and feathers and tribes, whereas Jacket— Well, perhaps if I tell you his story you will see he was quite a different sort of creature.

We made his acquaintance one very windy March day. Edwin was at school at the time—he is our oldest brother—in Dalesford, seven miles from here, and twice a week William Mugford, the stage-driver, brought letters, or messages, or packages to and fro. We knew William's days, of course, and about what hour to expect him, and were always on the lookout for the old-fashioned stage as it turned our corner with William's kind old face and grizzled beard in full view, and usually some interested passenger on the seat beside him.

Now on this particular morning as he came in sight, we—that is, Carolyn and one of the twins, who were established in the upper hall window—exclaimed, "Why, William Mugford has a dog with him!" and our old friend drawing in his horses at the same moment, we saw seated beside him, with a rope around his neck, a curious, old-fashioned sort of brown and white dog—not a handsome dog; not a young dog; indeed, I have always maintained that with his first solemn survey of our dear little home he silently expressed the desire for peace and rest, which is often the result of an anxious, active life, and a pathetic indication of old age. He sat perfectly still while William set down the two packages Edwin had sent of clothes to be mended and clothes to be washed, and only wagged his tail—it was a hard sort of tail—when William said,

"The dog, Mugford!" ejaculated our mother in surprise. "Why, we weren't expecting any dog."

Jacket—that is his name, you see—regarded her all the time very solemnly with an old-fashioned pucker to his mouth that gave him a very serious air.

"Well, ma'am," said Mugford, smiling, "Master Edwin sent him. I guess you'll find a letter in one of those packages." And so, not very cordially welcomed, Jacket was slowly admitted into the house.

"Carolyn," said our mother, smiling, yet despairingly, "what can we do with a dog?"

And no wonder the dear little mother said this, for our house is small and our numbers many, and at the same time the twins had two rabbits and a very disagreeable little alligator, Edith had a cat, and Carolyn a parrot; and then, perhaps, like Dick Deadeye in Pinafore, it seemed more hopeless because certainly Jacket's "looks wuz agin' him."

He was a medium-sized dog, brown and white, hard to classify, yet having something of the terrier in his looks, and something of the Irish setter in the way he shielded himself when preparing for sleep; but we all say no dog ever was quite like Jacket, therefore why try to give his pedigree? He was a trifle lame, and when he cocked his head on one side, you observed that one eye was shrewder than the other, and one long flapping ear longer and flappier than the other. These were the old boy's most striking characteristics on a first glance, but speedily came to notice his expression, which I have never seen in any other animal—never, certainly, in any other dog, and which, ugly and aged as he was, dignified Jacket at once. It was a look of complete resignation. I don't know how else or more simply to define it. There it was, looking out of his great mournful eyes, settling about the curves of his dear old mouth. Jacket had had a past, had seen life, had had experiences, and in the midst of all our merry-making over his plain looks and his personal defects, he called us back to a feeling of respect with his strange appearance of being one privileged by a history to our respectful attention.

"I suppose we must receive him," said mother, slowly, regarding the stranger, while Caro found Edwin's letter, and began to read it aloud. "Dear mamma," he wrote, "Mugford's going to take along a dog I just bought. I hope you'll all take good care of him until I come home Saturday." This was all. Where, or when, or how the dog had been purchased Edwin did not say, until mother wrote over the next day, mildly remonstrating, and saying, "My dear boy, what did you want with a dog?" To which came Edwin's answer, written with the fervor of his feelings expressed in every stroke of the pen. "Why, mother," he wrote, "I wanted a dog for the same reason every boy wants a dog. He came to the school the other night nobody knows from where or how, and Mr. Ball tried to find his owner, but couldn't, and so auctioned him, and I bought him for fifty-two cents. Please be careful of him."

And so there was an end to any question as to Jacket's reception as a member of the family. Coming from nowhere, purchased for fifty-two cents, he was received into our home as Edwin's friend—into our hearts by a slower, yet at last as sure a means.

Saturday night brought Edwin home, full of impatience to see the dog, not named as yet because the boy had petitioned us not to do so, and to avoid calling him anything until his return.

"Of course he must have a name," Edwin said, fondling the old fellow, who thrust his nose up lovingly between the lad's knees. "I wish we knew it."

"And he knows lots of tricks," said the second twin, eagerly. The twins always hung about Edwin from Saturday night until Monday morning; they were eleven, and Edwin was fifteen, tall of his age, though, and already cultivating a military manner, which they secretly adored and openly imitated.

"See here," and the younger boys began. The dog jumped over a stick, "begged" in the most pathetic manner, but seemed to be racking his old brains about some other accomplishment, the beginning or end of which had somehow slipped his memory. He would roll over and over a minute or two, and then jump upward, give two or three barks, then down to one side would go his head, flap his longest ear, and the shrewd eye would consider something anxiously, but what came next in the performance Jacket had evidently forgotten, and it was as plain as daylight that it worried him; for no sooner had he jumped and "begged" than he would return to this forgotten sort of an entertainment, which tickled the boys hugely, yet seemed to thoroughly upset the poor old dog for a long time afterward.

But about his name—that was quite curious. Our cousin Jack Miles was at home from Harvard, and he came in that first Sunday evening, and of course the boys had to show off their new pet. Willingly enough, with the same patience that characterized everything he did, the dog went through his tricks, again trying to remember the complicated performance, and stopping short just as usual. Jack was highly amused, and the boys crying out from time to time, "Jack! Jack! look at him now," suddenly observed that the dog's "game eye" was alert when our cousin's name was called, and at last it occurred to Edwin to try if he would answer to it. He stationed himself at the end of the library, which adjoins the parlor, and called out, "Here, Jack—here, old boy—here, Jack." And with a great wagging of his hard old tail, the dog ran over, leaping and jumping about Edwin in grateful joy.

"Jack, old boy! Jack!" repeated Edwin, in great glee; and the twins caught it up, making it into "Jacket, old Jacket, come along, sir," until the dog hardly knew to which of the three lads to turn first or last in the abundance of his joy. He had found not only a home and loving little masters, but his own name, only altered out of tenderness into something he was thenceforth familiarly called.

All that week different boys called to see Jacket, with the instinctive sort of feeling between boy and dog which so speedily makes them friends. Every boy saw him do his tricks—even the piece of one—and heard the story of Edwin's "hitting" on what was evidently his right name, and each boy had his own ideas about his probable history, and the way he ought to be taken care of. His hair and his teeth and his shrewd eye and his flappiest ear and his lamest foot were all fascinations for our neighborhood for weeks afterward, and old as he seemed, and sober of gait and purpose, Jacket was the boys' companion in every ramble that spring and summer.

At home he soon showed some regular habits, which he never neglected. Every afternoon about five o'clock he would stretch himself out for a good sleep, and to this no one would have objected but for the nature of his dreams. Precisely what they were, which one of us could say? We speculated, mused, guessed, nay, we tested the effect of old Jane's cooking upon them to see if digestion influenced them; but all in vain, for Jacket's afternoon naps were always mysterious. He groaned, he muttered, and I solemnly aver he laughed; and gradually we talked of these disturbed slumbers as his times of remorseful or melancholy remembrance. He would puzzle strangers ludicrously by this, as more than one instance proved. We would have an unsuspecting caller; Jacket would be curled up behind the hall stove; suddenly would arise those curious plaints. Our visitor would say, "Why, is that a twin?" for everybody knew the twins were perpetually falling down or knocking something over, and we would have to explain it was only Jacket dreaming—"remembering." Carolyn called it so often that at last we accepted the term as a sort of family slang; and whenever any luckless mortal slept and murmured or approached a snore, he or she would receive a fraternal poke, or perhaps something small and harmless in the way of a missile, and be requested not to "remember" quite so loud.

Soon after he came among us, while we were studying him closely, the second twin sprained his ankle, and was a sorry sight for days afterward, using a pair of crutches at last because he could not keep still. Jacket's surprise and joy knew no bounds when the twin limped into the sitting-room one morning on the crutches. He jumped up, barked, sprang about the boy, evincing all his usual tokens of pleasure, and wagged his tail nearly off.

Nor, when a time of sure-footedness came again, would he allow the twin any sort of comfort; so that at last, and because they loved old Jacket so tenderly, the boys humored him. Many a time have I seen them go stumping about the room just for the sake of beholding his evidences of delight in the performance. Evidently it was a familiar one, but where or when? I used to wonder about it often those winter days when I rarely left my sofa, and Jacket and I established a sort of mutual understanding, hard to define, but expressing better than anything I could say the old fellow's curious magnetism and power. He was so quickly in sympathy with whatever seemed helpless or ill that I think he felt drawn toward me, and I in turn learned every variation of his queer old-fashioned face, as well as to love all his peculiarities.

One spring day, I on my sofa, and Jacket curled up near the wood fire, were alone. One of the hall windows was open, the front door also ajar. There was a delicious feeling of spring-time in the air. Our lilac bushes were just beginning to bud; their sweetness seemed part of the happy content all about us. And Jacket was not asleep; he was in no danger of "remembering." Suddenly down the street came sounds of a band that the townspeople had made up the week before to welcome an old general that evening. There was the tramp of feet, and the tune that always and forever must send a pain sharply to my heart, and yet bring up a smile of tender memories:

"Hurrah! hurrah! we bring the jubilee.
Hurrah! hurrah! the flag that makes you free,
So we sang the chorus from Atlanta to the sea,
While we went marching through Georgia."

That was what they were playing, and where is there a war tune like it?—when will it not summon up a crowd of pictures of that wonderful, thrilling, sad, and glorious four years in our nation's history. Wait a minute; you say why "glorious"? Because North and South, here and there, it set free more than the one kind of slavery. It tested our "boys" in blue or gray; it made men of them, showed what the reserve force of our people was, and how and why we loved our flag, and what it was worth to us. Not glorious because of bloodshed and strife, but because it showed us what our men were made of, what their endurance, their heroism, their bravery, courage and power, patience and humility. All these worked together under one spell of loyalty and truth. And our women?—they learned their lesson; learned what patriotism in its noblest sense could mean. And those who went forth to heal and care for the sick and the dying returned stronger and nobler; those who staid—were kept—at home learned too what perhaps God saw they needed, and so faced life braver Christians when the last battle was fought and the last grave covered.

But this tune—there it was, as I had so often in the old days heard it, breaking in upon the spring-time stillness. I sat up and listened, and Jacket listened too. He listened like an electrified creature, almost handsome for the moment, so erect he stood, so intensely alert, his eye and ear at so correct an angle of consideration. Slowly, calmly, like a person careful to test himself, he walked across the room, and with much dignity of demeanor posed himself upon the door-step. The band turned our corner, still playing the old song, and came down our street. Jacket listened, and stood still. Suddenly a drum beat, loudly, tunefully, gayly, a sort of call to arms. It was enough. Jacket heard it, and responded. A moment later and he was at the heels of the band, following like an old soldier wherever the summons led.

Edwin came home that night, and had to hear all about it. I told him first—first at least after mamma. She knew why I cared for Jacket so much more after this; so did Edwin. But you see the twins were only babies when our brother went away, and mamma has not been able to keep in view signs of his soldier life. Jacket never had seen anything that suggested what I now believe he had had, military associations. Because of mamma's feeling, the boys forbore to make merry over these discoveries, yet she never minded their giving a roll of a drum to call Jacket here or there, and the old dog seemed to enjoy it in a positively childish manner. It was his most dignified hour, and evidently he liked the sense of importance it gave him and the effect he made in solemnly answering the drum-call, no matter in what part of the house it sounded. Sometimes after this he began again the trick which so often failed him, but with no new success. He would roll over, then jump up and bark, and inclining his head on one side in a curious manner, would seem to be trying to recall the forgotten performance. There was evidently a link wanting which none of us could supply.

A GREEN MOUNTAIN BOYS' CLUB.

SOME two years ago, in a thriving town in Vermont, a party of boys, whose ages ranged from ten to fifteen, decided to form themselves into an athletic club, which, after some deliberation, they styled the "Star Athletic Club." Their meetings were held in a private bowling-alley kindly placed at their service, and when a president, two vice-presidents, a treasurer, and a secretary had been elected, the club felt that it was fairly on its feet.

So far their course had been easy enough, and were that all, the venture of these Green Mountain boys would have had no mention here; but that was not all. Before they could begin to practise the sports for which they had banded together it was necessary to have a "ground," and when a sufficient quantity of land had been lent them, it was still necessary to do considerable work before the land was converted into a "ground." One part of the field was kept well mowed for use as a running path; another part, a square of twelve feet, was dug up and thoroughly loosened, the clods broken up, and the stones removed, for a jumping place, a path fifty feet long and two feet wide being made to lead up to it.

Every afternoon the boys assembled regularly for practice, and after a few weeks the friends of the members were invited to witness the opening "games" of the Star Athletic Club. The "events" were numerous—flat and hurdle races, high jump, standing high jump, broad jump, pole-vaulting, and putting the shot—and the prizes were silver medals, the value of which may be computed when it is stated that they were made from silver quarters, one side of which had been polished and engraved with the initials of the club, "S. A. C." This was real and praiseworthy economy, and not "stinginess," for the funds were low, and the boys did not propose to wreck their excellent institution by running into debt at the start.

The following summer, having in the mean time been "coached" by a member of the New York Athletic Club, the "Star" boys held their second annual games, the medals being of greater actual value this time, though they could not have been worn with greater pride than the polished quarters.

When the winter came on, and they could no longer practise field athletics, the boys set to work to construct a skating pond. A generous friend lent them a field through which ran a small stream, and with the permission of the owner the boys soon constructed a dam which turned part of the field into a pond, so that when a cold snap came there was a capital sheet of clear ice. In addition to the pond, the boys built a house, which was heated by a stove for the benefit of the patrons of the skating pond. Season tickets were issued to boys at seventy-five cents and to girls at fifty cents, and everything was going on well, until one day the dam gave way, and in a few hours the pond had vanished. This was discouraging, but Green Mountain boys of to-day, like those of history, are not easily beaten, and the dam was soon reconstructed.

The Star Athletic Club is now entering upon its third season, with a large and united membership, a considerable money balance on the credit side of the treasurer's account, and unabated enthusiasm. The success of this club should encourage other boys to follow their example. And depend upon it that when a club is entirely self-reliant, as these Green Mountain boys were, preparing the ground for its sports, making its own tennis nets and poles, building its canoes, or what not, it is establishing itself on a much firmer foundation than if it depended altogether upon the contributions of parents and friends to defray its necessary expenses.

CHAMPIONS OF THE STAR ATHLETIC CLUB

THE REARING OF PUPPIES.

BY FRANKLIN SATTERTHWAIT.

SINCE the introduction of dog shows in this country, some years back, and the consequent large increase of dogs of various breeds, from the courtly St. Bernard to the shivering little black-and-tan terrier, it has fallen to the lot of many young people to become dog owners.

There is something especially delightful to a boy to be the possessor of some live animal, and to know that its well-doing depends upon his care. The novelty of a responsibility of this kind seemingly causes the average boy to grow two inches taller in a night, and to make his jacket a tight fit around his chest when he puts it on in the morning. It then behooves the young owner to learn how to care for his pet, so that it may enjoy the best of health, and be a safe companion and always ready for a romp. Even if he cannot assume the entire charge of his them she can well care for. If she is strong and vigorous, she may be able to raise nine or ten of them; but five or six strong, well-nourished puppies are more apt to turn out well than a larger lot only half cared for and half fed. In such cases, when the mother is only of moderate size and strength, yet the possessor of a large family, the sickly and scrawny puppies should be turned over to a foster-mother or destroyed; for it will be far more satisfactory in the long-run to see a small family full of strength and fun being brought up under a healthy mother's care than twice the number devoid of life and spirit.

Having provided a comfortable bed for the mother and puppies in a place with plenty of ventilation, yet free from draughts, see that the mother has lukewarm milk and small feeds of thin oatmeal gruel or broth six or seven times a day. She should not be given solid food for several days after the puppies are born, but pure water at all times should be within her reach. On the second dog, every boy should inform himself as to how it should be looked after in his absence, and be able to give his directions accordingly. Too often ignorance on the subject of proper canine care consigns the pet to the charge of some servant equally ignorant, and far more indifferent, if not actually cruel.

If the pleasure of being the owner of one dog is great, how much more so when she presents her young master with a family of fuzzy puppies! The first visit to the little strangers is one full of curiosity. He almost wonders if the little balls of yarn are about to unwind, and can hardly resist handling them. This he must not do on any account, for it is very injurious to the youngsters. Yet when it is absolutely necessary, they may be lifted by the back of the neck. If your dog, which we will suppose to be a setter, has become the mother of a large family, say ten or a dozen puppies, the young owner must decide from her condition and supply of milk how many of day take her out for a short walk, and every day increase the distance and time of separation from her puppies, until she is herself again. During this period give her a liberal supply of the most nutritious food, such as milk and scraps from the table. She may be given portions of beef soup occasionally if she shows signs of becoming thin. In fact, the health of the puppies hinges on the welfare of the mother, and her general health should receive the greatest attention. If her strength fails, then tonics will be required to build her up. If, on the other hand, she is over fat and lazy, then an occasional tablespoonful of castor-oil or a small dose of sulphate of magnesia will be of benefit to her.

The puppies when about nine days old begin to blink and open their eyes. They then soon begin crawling about. It is not a bad plan then to have an old piece of carpet stretched near the nest, which will enable them to creep about easily. At this time puppies are sometimes subjected to various ailments. At their young age it is best to leave to nature the remedy of the evil, or correct their disorder through their mother. Still, bad cases of diarrhoea in puppies can be checked by letting them suck the finger, which has been dipped in milk thickened with prepared chalk. Puppies, too, at a very early age are preyed upon by parasites. These are lice, fleas, and ticks. When signs of these are found, the youngsters should be washed with Spratt's patent dog soap, and a new bed provided. But it is best to prevent an occurrence of this kind by securing a clean kennel in the first place, and by seeing that the mother is free from these irritating pests before the puppies are born.

When the puppies are between two and three weeks old, they may be taught to eat bread and milk and lap a little gravy. In all instances, milk given to the puppies should have first been boiled. As the puppies grow older, their diet may be changed to oatmeal porridge, etc. Still, on no account should they be weaned until they are six weeks old, if the mother continues to have a good supply of milk. The weaning process should be gradual, removing the mother from her young in the warmest portion of the day, and then increasing her time of separation until she is only allowed to remain with them at night, and then keeping her away altogether.

The puppies after their separation from their mother usually look the worse for wear, and present a woe-begone appearance, according to their several dispositions. "Smarty" tries to escape from his kennel by clambering out of a window five feet from the ground, "Stupid" sticks out his tiny strip of red flannel, dignified by being called a tongue, and boo-hoos, "Stuffy" tries to suck the end of his tail, and poor little "Runt" gives way to despair, and hides his head in a corner, amid heart-rending squalls.

Frequent visions of broth, stale bread, mush thinned with milk, and later on big bones to bite on, with scraps of lean meat and vegetables, however, dry their tears and warm the cockles of their hearts. They should be fed every few hours; they will then rapidly increase in size and strength. Soon they learn to play with each other, and when any one approaches, to erect their intelligent faces above their wooden barrier, and take a lively interest in what is going on in the outer world.

Fresh air and plenty of sunshine, wild romps with their young owner, impart health, and are the A, B, C's of their future education.

All kennel yards should be dry, and the puppies should have low benches to clamber upon. They should be permitted to run about their enclosure unrestrained, for nothing tends so much to get a growing dog out of shape as a chain and collar, and to make a dog bow-legged as creeping up in a barrel.

Almost every boy has heard of "distemper"—a word, by-the-way, which simply means disease. This so-called distemper in dogs is a form of fever arising from blood-poisoning; it is contagious, and has no specific cure. The treatment of the afflicted animal should vary according to the symptoms of the case. Its first appearance in the puppy causes him to appear as if he had taken a severe cold. His little nose gets hot; he shivers and shakes in a chill; he is thirsty, restless, and dull in turn; his tail has lost its wag; he wears a woe-begone look. Later on, if he used a handkerchief he would apply it incessantly to his eyes and nose. Master Puppy is no longer hungry; he has a bad cough; he goes from bad to worse—very rapidly at times, if not cared for. But the wise boy consults his family doctor, or at least he does not dose his pet with quack remedies with which this country is flooded. It much depends then upon the natural constitution of Master Puppy and the treatment bestowed on him whether he lives to point birds in this world or departs at once for the "happy hunting ground."

SILENT PETE; OR, THE STOWAWAYS.*

CHAPTER VII. IN PORT.

AFTER the story of the shipwreck had been told, the Captain of the Sea-Gull did not require any urging to look for the missing boat, in which was Mr. Harding and the remainder of the Clio's crew. The schooner was headed as nearly as possible for the location of the wreck, and the crews of both vessels stationed themselves as look-outs.

As a matter of course the addition of so many men would cause the sleeping accommodations on the Sea-Gull to be rather crowded, and as the fore-cabin was full to overflowing, Pete, Jerry, and Abe were given a spare state-room in the cabin. This was fortunate for Pete, for, sick as he was, it might have been fatal to the little fellow had he been obliged to sleep with the crew, where his chances of getting a full night's rest would have been very small, and where the foul air would have been very injurious to him. He was undressed and put to bed almost as soon as he was taken on board the schooner; and while Captain Sprout was overhauling the medicine chest to find something which might remove the pain from which he was suffering, Abe was in the galley making him some broth, for he had eaten nothing since leaving the wreck. To be able to lie down seemed to afford him more relief than anything, and in less than an hour after he had taken some medicine and the broth he sank into a sweet, refreshing slumber, which gave Jerry, who had not left his side for a moment, an opportunity of going on deck.

Abe was in the rigging looking out for the missing boat, and fearing that he might be in the way if he joined him, Jerry walked about the deck with the hymn of thanksgiving that was in his heart escaping from his lips in snatches of song. He and Pete had been saved from a great peril, and surely, he thought, the good God who watched over them in the boat would restore little Pete to health once more.

It was while he was thus thinking that he remembered Sweetness. The broken violin had been brought on board by its master, and was in the state-room, bruised and broken like him who had so often given it voice.

"If I could get it mended and put in Pete's berth, so's the first thing he sees when he wakes up is Sweetness whole again, I believe it would do him more good than all the medicine on board the vessel," he said to himself, and just at that moment Abe came down on deck.

"Have they seen anything of the boat?" Jerry asked, knowing, even as he spoke, that nothing had been discovered, or the cook's face would not have had on it such a mournful look.

"Not a thing. If she's afloat she ought to be around here somewhere, unless they've been picked up; but I'm afraid they're at the bottom by this time. If we hadn't had a thorough seaman like Captain Sprout at the helm we would have been swamped in five minutes after we left the wreck, and I don't believe Harding could keep her up half an hour."

"They haven't given up looking, have they?"

"No; I heard the Captain say he would cruise around here all day, but that at sunset he'd have to stand in for New York. By staying here twelve hours he's doing a good deal more'n most ship-masters would do; but I'm afraid we're looking for them as we'll never see."

"Perhaps they met a vessel night before last."

* Begun in No. 336, HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE.

"I hope so, lad, I hope so, and that's all any of us can do now. What are you up to? Looking the schooner over, eh?"

"I came on deck when Pete went to sleep, and I was just thinking of something I might do to please him, if you'd help me."

"All you've got to do is to say what it is. I offered to work in the galley; but as there's two men there, they didn't need me, so my time's my own."

"I want to mend Pete's fiddle. He'd be awful tickled if we should show it to him whole."

"All right, lad. You sneak it out while he's asleep, and I'll see what the cook has got in the way of glue."

Jerry had no difficulty in getting Sweetness from the state-room without Pete's knowing it, for the little fellow was sleeping so soundly that it would have been quite a loud noise that could have awakened him, and the violin menders were soon at work with all the materials they needed.

An instrument manufacturer might, and probably would, have laughed in derision at the appearance of Sweetness after Jerry and Abe had completed their work; but they had the satisfaction of knowing that the tone of the violin was nearly as good as before, and that rude as their work was, it would delight the little fellow who was sleeping in the cabin below.

Jerry carried the violin into the state-room, hoping to get in and out again unobserved; but Pete opened his eyes as his friend bent over him, and his glance rested immediately on the instrument.

"What have you been doing with Sweetness? Didn't I bring her in here with me?" he asked, in surprise.

"Of course you did; but Abe and me thought if you'd been doctored, the fiddle ought to be, so we've been tinkering it a little."

In an instant, and despite the pain, Pete was sitting up in the berth tuning the violin, and in a few moments Sweetness was "speaking" to its master in low, sweet tones of gladness, while Jerry found it quite difficult to restrain his joy as he saw the look of happiness in his friend's eyes.

"It's all right now," he cried, as he ran on deck, where Abe was waiting for him. "He'll get well sure, for he's sitting up fiddling, and Sweetness sounds just as good as ever. Come and hear them."

While Abe and Jerry stood outside the cabin listening to the melody, Pete was feasting both his eyes and his ears. To him the violin was even more beautiful than before, for the cracks and bruises were but reminders of that terrible time when he had carried it over his aching chest.

At sunset the Sea-Gull was put on her course once more, nothing having been seen of the boat, and the survivors of the Clio spoke in low tones of their missing shipmates, as if speaking of the dead.

On the next morning Pete was feeling so much improved in health that he insisted on dressing himself and going on deck. He was no longer troubled by the pain in his chest, and looked so much better in the face that Jerry made no protest against his leaving the cabin, save to say, "It seems to me it would be better for you, old man, if you stay here another day."

"I shall feel nicer on deck, Jerry—indeed I shall; and now that Abe hasn't anything to do, we can talk with him about what we must do first to find Aunt Nannette."

But this last was exactly what Jerry did not intend Pete should do. He knew that Abe felt doubtful as to the success of their search, and he feared that the late cook of the Clio might say something to dishearten the little fellow. Therefore it was that Jerry went on deck alone to speak with Abe.

"If you can't say anything to make him feel good, don't talk about it at all," he said; and the cook promised him that he would at least say nothing to discourage the boy, although he stoutly declared that he could not conscientiously say anything to cheer him.

During the days that followed, Jerry tried in vain to find something useful to do; but there were so many idle men that there was absolutely no work for him, and both he and Abe had nothing to occupy their time but the care of Pete. Never had the little musician been shown so much attention; the crew of the Clio claimed him as shipmate, and were continually trying to please him in some way, while the sailors of the Sea-Gull did what they could to show their appreciation of the music with which he cheered them. It would have been strange indeed if Pete had not improved rapidly in health, and during the four days that elapsed before the schooner arrived in port Jerry declared that he could see him growing brighter each hour.

"We'll likely be inside of Sandy Hook by breakfast-time to-morrow morning," Abe said, on the evening of the third day, "and I tell you, lads, it kind o' makes me feel bad to part with you."

The three were sitting just under the windward rail, where Pete had been drawing the bow back and forth across the strings of the violin, apparently with no idea of playing any tune, but yet producing a series of chords which in the fast-gathering darkness sounded unspeakably sweet. He had ceased for a moment, to lay his hand on Jerry's, and then it was that Abe spoke.

"But we shall see you again," said Jerry, hopefully, for he too felt sad that they were to separate from the cook, who had not only helped them to stow away, but had been a firm, true friend to them both. "Unless you go right off on another vessel we'll hunt you up, and we can all three be together on a good many evenings."

"Yes, but it won't be like this. If I had my way now, we'd be just starting off on a long voyage, Jerry as cabin-boy, Pete as fiddler-general, and me as cook."

"But what would become of Aunt Nannette if you had your way?" asked Jerry, with a laugh.

"Well, you see, I don't believe—"

Abe was on the point of saying that he did not believe Pete would find his aunt; but he checked himself before the words were uttered.

"Then you think we'll be in New York to-morrow, do you?" Jerry asked, hoping to turn the conversation so that his friend might forget what the cook had said; but although they talked of many things before they retired, the moment he and Jerry were alone in the state-room, Pete said,

"Abe don't think that I'll find Aunt Nannette."

"What makes you think that?"

"He was going to say so when I stopped playing. I knew it was that when he looked at me and didn't say anything more."

"Now see here, Pete," said Jerry, emphatically, "whether Abe thinks we will or we won't find her can't make any difference, can it? I say if she's in New York we'll get her, and if she ain't, why, we can settle down there or go back to New Orleans, just as we want to. But she's there, of course, and we'll hunt her out."

"You won't get tired and give it up if it takes a good while, will you, Jerry?"

"Get tired! Of course I won't. I'll keep right after her all the time, and no matter what comes up, I won't give in. But you musn't let what you think Abe was going to say fret you, 'cause he don't know half so much about it as you and I. He thinks it's a big job, 'cause he don't know what it is to live in a city, like we do. Now don't fuss any more, but go right to sleep, and to-morrow we'll be promenading round New York, running up against your aunt the first thing, perhaps."

Pete appeared to be satisfied with Jerry's assurance that their mission would be successful, and the Sea-Gull flew gallantly on toward the harbor of the great metropolis.

ABE AND JERRY MENDING "SWEETNESS."

The sun was just rising when Abe called the boys on deck with the announcement that the schooner was already in New York Harbor, and would be at her dock in a few hours. There was no baggage to pack, and but a limited toilet to make; therefore Pete and Jerry were not long in answering the summons.

Standing near the port rail forward, the boys were gazing in mute admiration at the beautiful panorama spread out before them, as the schooner followed in the wake of a noisy, fussy little tug, when Abe said to Jerry:

"We'll be snug at the dock in an hour, and now I want to know what you're going to do? If we was sailing up here in the old Clio, I should get the Captain to let you stay on board while we were in port, at any rate; but seeing as how we're visitors aboard a strange craft, I reckon we'll all have to scuttle ashore as quick as we can, to be out of the way. Where are you and Pete going?"

"Well, you see," and Jerry spoke in a slow, hesitating way, as if he had already begun to doubt the wisdom of his own plans, "Pete and me kinder settled it that we would do the same as we used to at home—he playing and I trying to sing."

"Yes, that's all right, I suppose," said Abe, rubbing his nose vigorously; "but what I'm trying to get at is where are you going to tie up. You've got to have some kind of a place to sleep in, even if you do get your meals 'round permiscuous like."

"Oh, that 'll be all right," replied Jerry, confidently. "We can sleep anywhere, for I don't suppose the policemen are worse on a feller than they are down home."

"Do you mean to tell me that you're going to sleep 'round on the streets?"

"Not much," was the quick reply; "we'll likely find a wagon sometimes, or a box, and if the houses are built like they are in New Orleans, I know a reg'lar swell dodge to work under the front steps."

"But see here, Jerry," said Abe, almost imploringly, "you musn't do anything like that. You want to get a room and live like white folks. It won't do nohow to go camping out wherever you see a chance."

"I don't know how it can be fixed any different," was the decided reply. "You know we've been used to living that way ever since Pete's mother died, and it won't come very rough on us to keep it up a little while longer."

Abe was far from being satisfied with such an arrangement, for he had come to look upon the boys as in some way under his especial protection; but he recognized the uselessness of trying to convince Jerry that it was necessary he should live at least so much of a civilized life as to sleep in a house, and he said, much as if he was asking a very great favor:

"I'll try to let me know how you're getting along, won't you, lad? Now that the old Clio has gone, I can't say where I'll be for sure; but you can find out by asking at the owner's office—here's their card—for most likely they'll give Captain Sprout another vessel, and I shall go with him, of course. Now you'll keep me posted, won't you?"

"I will for sure, Abe," replied Jerry, as he placed the card carefully in one of the many holes in his coat that served him as pockets. "Just as soon as we know anything ourselves I'll come to see you."

"But I want you to come even if you're having bad luck, for perhaps I could help you some; leastways I might show you a place to sleep and something to eat."

The conversation was interrupted at this point by Abe's being called away by one of his shipmates, and the boys stood arm in arm watching the strange sights around them, until the Sea Gull was nearly at her dock, when Captain Sprout's voice caused them both to turn.

"Well, lads," he said, kindly, "it won't be long now before you can go ashore, and I heartily hope you will be successful in your undertaking. If it was possible I would like to do something to help you, but we are all shipwrecked mariners together, and the most any of us can do is to say 'God-speed.'"

"You've been awful good to us, Captain," said Jerry, earnestly, "and if we ever can do anything to make you glad that you let us stay on your vessel, we'll do it."

"I am glad already, lad, and I only wish you could have sailed up here in the Clio. I feel that I owe you something to make up for the treatment you received on the brig, and if you'll hunt me up—Abe will tell you where to come—I will try to make the matter square."

"It is more than square now, and all we'll do is to come and see you after you get a new vessel. I've got a card Abe gave me, and I suppose we'll find you there."

"At the owner's? Yes. Who knows but that you'll want to go back to New Orleans after a time? and if you do, come right to me. Now, good-by, boys, for a while, and may God bless and guard you!"

"Good-by, sir," they both cried, and as Captain Sprout turned away to make his preparations for landing, that sense of loneliness came over them which comes upon all of us when we part with a true and tried friend.

Each one of the sailors from the Clio had a kind word to say to the boys as he went on shore, and it was not until Abe came up that Jerry had roused himself sufficiently to understand that he and Pete should land.

"Now, then, lads, come with me, and I'll show you the way to the City Hall. I reckon there's where you'll want to commence business."

Without making any reply, Pete and Jerry followed the kind-hearted cook, and after they had landed and walked several blocks, thoroughly confused by what they believed was an unusual excitement in the streets, Abe said, as he halted at a corner: "I'm going this way to find a sailor's lodging-house, and you want to keep straight on up this street till you come to a big white building, with a park in front of it. There'll be the place for you to start from, and there's where you'll find boys enough to give you all the points you need on business. Don't let any of 'em impose on you, and if you strike hard luck, come right to me. I reckon I'll be able to do you some good, even if the Clio did pay me such a scurvy trick. Remember to hunt me up according to that card."

As Abe ceased speaking, he hurried away, much as if he could not trust himself to say good-by. He was gone before the boys had time to make any reply, and they stood motionless on the sidewalk, disheartened by the thought of that task which in New Orleans had seemed so simple.

They were alone in the great city, where every one but themselves appeared to be at home, and it is not strange that even Jerry's courage began to fail him, or that Pete almost despaired of ever finding Aunt Nannette.

THE NEW NOAH'S ARK.

BY MRS. W. J. HAYS.

"WHAT are you going to make for our fair, Chester?" The speaker was a very small young woman, with so much fluffy blond hair hanging over her eyes that she looked very like the terrier curled up beside the work-basket, where were bunched bright bits of ribbon and lace to be turned into wonderful "trinkets" for the fair.

"I don't know," was the response from a corner where Chester was supposed to be studying.

"A boy with a camera and a scroll-saw and a printing-press ought to do lots of things, Bessie Clarke says."

"Did Bessie really say that?"

"Yes, and she is to have a table, and all the money goes to the Children's Hospital."

"I don't care where the money goes."

"But you ought; it's so philan—something."

"Filling something?"

"Yes; poor little empty stomachs—I suppose that's what it means."

"Why should children in a hospital be hungry, when they have oranges and things? Aunt Constance takes dozens of them there."

Blanche was unable to reply, for she had come to a tangle in her silk, and was struggling with a knot; besides, she always felt like a witness in court when Chester began to ask questions.

"You will make something, won't you?" she said, after a while.

"I might make a book," said Chester, looking around as if for an idea.

"The very thing!—a picture-book, I suppose," said Blanche, eagerly. "Bessie makes lovely scrap-books with Christmas cards."

"Do you think I'd do that?" was the scornful answer.

"Why not?"

"I'm not a girl. I mean a real book, with a title and a preface and a 'to be continued'—or, no, 'the end,' would be better—and stories in it."

"Oh!" said Blanche, drawing a long breath.

"I can print it well enough; I have plenty of paper, and my press is all in good order. The type is a little mixed, but I can soon straighten it out; the only bother will be the stories. I hate to write."

"So do I; my fingers get so inky."

"That isn't the worst—it's the thinking more than the inking."

"Laura Jones likes it; she writes verses."

"So does Jack Vane; he makes up yarns by the yard."

"And Kitty Rogers's compositions are splendid."

"I won't have any girls' fingers in this pie; they can make pin cushions and paint plaques."

"Oh, Chester!"

"I'll only have one story with illustrations, and a red binding and gilt letters. I'm going to see Tom Barker and the boys; perhaps they will help. When is the fair?"

"Six weeks from to-day."

"That's time enough," said Chester, as he put on his cap and went out.

He found Tom Barker and two or three of his other companions playing base-ball, but they were tired, and glad to have a chat as they strolled home. They all entered heartily into his project, and promised assistance.

"I tell you what," said Jim Nixon; "let's have an editor. My big brother will do it, and we'll get the fellows at school to send in things, and the best story shall have the author's name on the title-page, and we'll print ever so many copies."

"All right," was the response all around. And then hours for meeting were appointed, and they resolved to call themselves "The Steeple-chase Printing Club."

The way in which pens and pencils danced about at the Webster School for a few days was something remarkable. Such knitting of brows and biting of nails and twisting of shoulders might have frightened parents had they seen it; but they did not, and so there was no suggestion of nervous maladies. Some lessons suffered, and much paper went into the waste-basket; but the editor soon announced the chosen manuscript, and the boys ceased their literary efforts for the more agreeable task of printing. But, strange to say, the editor had promised not to reveal the author's name. The story was called The New Noah's Ark, and the only name accompanying it was to be Chester Drayton's, the boys having voted that as he was the donor, this honor should be awarded him. The rest were contented to see "Printed by the Steeple-chase Club" in very small type down at the bottom of the last page. There were a good many difficulties to be overcome, and the boys worked like beavers under the direction of a competent bookbinder, whom Chester's father employed for the purpose. Perhaps the volume was a little rough, a trifle less beautiful than the finished work of experienced hands, but how proudly did the makers survey it! Copy after copy was turned off, until a goodly little pile was ready in brightest scarlet and gold; and never was boy better satisfied than Chester.

The Steeple-chase Printing Club went in a body to the fair—a handsome, valiant set of lads, full of fun and non-sense, but of courteous manners and gentle address.

The book was prominently placarded, and at the table where Blanche Drayton was serving, everybody was saying what a bright idea it had been, and how clever and funny the story was.

"Have you read it? How do you like it? Isn't it good!" said one to another.

"It is the best thing in the fair. There ought to have been a thousand copies; they would go off like hot cakes."

Chester could not help being a little proud as Blanche smilingly repeated all the kind things that were said; and Blanche looked so pretty as she gave a little sigh, saying, dismally, "None of my things sell so well."

"You could not expect them to," said Chester.

"Why not?" asked Bessie Clarke—a bright little wren of a girl, with a soft voice and sweet manner that Chester thought very winning.

"Well," he answered, in a patronizing way, "the things girls do are very nice, of course, but they can't come quite up to this;" and he looked at The New Noah's Ark he held in his hand with an immense amount of satisfaction.

Bessie's laugh rang out as softly musical as a wren's jubilant twitter when it has made its nest.

"Who is the author of this?" asked somebody.

"Oh, I must tell," cried Blanche; "I must tell. Bessie Clarke wrote the story."

Chester stared incredulously.

"She did—she did," nodded Blanche, and every one crowded around the young author to congratulate her.

Chester had a little struggle with himself. So the best of the book was not his, after all!

This was indeed an unwelcome surprise; but his better nature prevailed, and as soon as he had the chance he took Bessie's hand, and said: "You're a perfect brick—I beg pardon; but there isn't a boy I know who could have done it. Besides, the not telling was splendid, and I just wish my name was off that cover."

"Oh, no, no," said Bessie, laughing; "it is twice the fun to be anonymous; but when Blanche told me that no girl's finger was to be in this pie, I could not resist the temptation, and my brother George was only too glad to let me try. You must scold him."

But no scoldings were necessary. The fair was a success every way.

THE DRAWING CLUB.—III.*

BY ALICE DONLEVY.

ONE thing that helped to keep up the interest of the members of the Drawing Club was Aunt Ida's thoughtfulness in providing something new every time as an incentive to the young workers. When the club next came together at Dr. Lee's house they found over the door of the room an embroidered inscription, which might be taken as the guiding motto of the club: "First. Find what the object is like. Second. Look for the difference. Third. Observe the relation of one part to the other."

This much Aunt Ida had done by way of precept; but she had not forgotten that example is better than precept, and she had provided (each on a square of white paper) an onion, a carrot, a parsnip, a turnip, and a sweet-potato.

Edith took up one of the vegetables, and asked, "What is it I hold in my hand?" It sounded as if she were "crying forfoits."

All agreed that it was a sweet-potato.

"That isn't the right way to begin," exclaimed Rosa.

And Edith, suddenly remembering the precept over the door, cried, quickly, "What is it like?"

* Articles I. and II. were published in Nos. 322 and 323.

SWEET-POTATO.

"It is like an egg lying on its side, with two pointed ends," said Rosa. Every one laughed. "Well, it is almost round, like an egg," she declared.

"Oval, you mean," corrected Marian.

"I think it is like a lemon," said Clarita—a proposition that seemed to strike the club as being very true.

Leonard happened to have plaster casts of a lemon, an apple, an egg, an orange, and a turnip, and when all had been examined and the differences compared, it was decided that the potato was more like a lemon with the ends drawn out into points than anything else.

The onion was next taken up, and Marian took a pin out of her hat, and speared the onion so that it could be stood up on the table in such a manner that all could see its shape. The homely vegetable was likened to a great many things in turn, and it was finally decided that in form it resembled an egg, and that its skin was irregular, like the boundary lines on a map, while the light lines on the skin were like the lines of longitude, which come together at the poles.

THE ONION.

As was shown when Clarita drew the beet on the blackboard, the easiest way to draw a form that is curved or irregular is to "block it out." Leonard proceeded to do this on the blackboard. He drew a queer-shaped figure, which some one likened to a pyramid upside down (they were always looking for likenesses now). This was, as Leonard explained, a sort of packing-box for the carrot.

"What is the use of blocking out?" asked one of the girls.

"The use is," replied Leonard, "that the blocking-out lines are a guide for the eye, and it is easier to draw a straight line than a curved one. All artists begin that way. One must travel by steam nowadays, and this method is quicker than any other."

"Why not draw as we like?" asked Marian.

"This is a drawing from nature club, my dear," answered Clarita, "and time, tide, and nature do not wait for anybody. It is all very well taking our time about these vegetables speared on pins so that they can not get away, but how about flowers, that may wilt in an hour, unless we learn to draw quickly?"

While Leonard was drawing the carrot, Norman began to block out the parsnip, whose difference from a carrot was at once remarked, one member of the club finding that it tapered to a finer point than the carrot, another that it wore more of a cap upon its head, while several were quick to notice the marks on the skin closely resembling eyes. And Norman proceeded to draw the parsnip with a black background.

"The turnip is now ready to have its likeness taken."

"What is it like?" asked Leonard, and this oft-repeated question excited a smile, for it seemed as if some one was always asking, "What is it like?"

"It looks to me like an egg with cap and beard and a pointed goat-ee," said Marian. "The part where the stem and green leaves have been cut off is the cap, and the little rootlets on the sides are exactly like hair."

"The dark shade it shows on the white background looks like the back of somebody's head," said Edith.

"Shade!" exclaimed Leonard, indignantly. "It is shadow. Shade is on everything you draw—the part where the light does not strike—but this is shadow. The turnip's shadow is cast upon the white paper because the window happens to be on the other side. The shadow is on the paper; the shade is on the object itself."

"There is shade on Leonard's boot," said Norman. "Look at that white spot on the black leather."

All eyes were bent down upon Leonard's well-polished shoes.

"Yes," said the owner of the shoes; "the white spot, as Norman calls it, is where the light strikes it; the rest of the shoe is in shade."

"May your shadow never grow less!" said Edith, with a twinkle in her eye.

"My shadow tells me that it is near dinner-time," said Rosa, "and time to go home."

"It seems to me," said one of the members of the club, "that we have done a great deal more talking than anything else to-day."

"I don't know about that," said Leonard. "Look at Norman's parsnip."

"Oh, that's nothing," protested Norman, modestly. "Leonard showed me how it was done when he blocked out and drew the carrot. I just followed his lead."

"It all depends on whether you like carrots or parsnips best," put in Edith. "I like carrots best, boiled."

"And I like them better on the blackboard than on the dinner-table," added Rosa.

"Girls," said Clarita, "this is frivolous. What we have been trying to find out is not which we like best, or whether we like them at all, but what they are like."

"Secondly," added Norman, glancing up at Aunt Ida's text, "what the difference is, and—"

"Thirdly," interrupted Leonard, "you will please to observe the relation of one part to the other."

"Your aunt is awfully clever at embroidery," said one of the sisters.

BOYS AND BUMBLEBEES

A PERSON who has never been a boy in the country finds great difficulty in understanding just where the fun comes in when a party of boys undertake to fight out a bumblebees' nest. With the limited knowledge of boys and bumblebees that city people possess, they are apt to think that the fun is all on the side of the bees, and that the boys are moved to attack the nest by a generous intention to amuse its occupants. That this view is a reasonable one, although not exactly correct, will be seen when the method and consequences of an attack upon a bumblebees' nest are described.

The boys who are fortunate enough to have discovered a bees' nest assemble in the neighborhood, armed with "paddles" whittled out of shingles, or branches of brushwood. The attack is made with some caution, and it is always a doubtful point whether the position nearest to the nest is the post of honor, or whether that desirable station is not somewhere in the rear of the attacking party.

It does not take much to arouse the sturdy inhabitants of the nest to active hostilities, nor do they confine themselves closely to defensive tactics. By no means. Each individual bee seems animated by a determination to give those boys all the fun that can possibly be obtained from their enterprise, and the air is soon alive with the battle-cries of the two contending parties, which to an outside spectator sound like "Buzz! buzz! buzz!" on one side, and "Oh! oh! oh!" on the other. Soon the boy party takes to flight, and the bee party gives chase; and notwithstanding the rapid motions of paddles and branches, most of the insects succeed in "locating a claim" on the faces or necks of the enemy.

There is one way to escape being stung, but it requires so much nerve that most boys prefer to take their chances in the hand-to-hand fight rather than try this hazardous strategy. The plan is to lie still, as if dead. The bumblebee is a generous foe, and does not care to insult a dead enemy; so if a boy will lie perfectly still he may escape. But as the bee is generous, so also is he suspicious. There are legends in the hives and nests of human bipeds who have suddenly died upon the field of battle, and as suddenly arisen and walked off when the enemy had retired. Accordingly the bumblebee wanders cautiously over the face, ears, head, and neck of the apparently lifeless foe, seeking evidence that life is not yet extinct, probes the corners of the eyes with a feeler, or tickles the tender skin of the nose with a hind-leg. Possibly he discovers new fields of sensation beneath a wilted collar, and explores that region. The boy who can stand this sort of examination would be a hero in a dentist's chair, perhaps; but as there are few who can brave that ordeal without flinching, so there are few who succeed in passing the bumblebee's examination when "playing dead."

After all, perhaps the city person is right, and the bees have all the fun and the boys all the suffering; so, as the latter are not required by the dictates of fine feeling or the laws of good society to amuse bumblebees at their own expense, we think they would be wise if they let bees' nests alone during the present summer.

FIGHTING OUT A BUMBLEBEES' NEST—DRAWN BY P. NEWELL.

Seven O'clock

Around about,
Around about,
The Kobold played and in and out
He peeped in every Pot and Pail,
And grinned, and pulled the Pussy's tail.

Big clumsy Gretchen, washing up
The Breakfast-dishes, dropped a Cup;
It fell upon the Kobold's Toe,
And made him hop it hurt him so.

OUR POST-OFFICE BOX.

NEWMARKET, CAMB., ENGLAND.

DEAR POSTMASTER.—I am a little English girl of thirteen, and have taken this charming letter for six months. I do not think any one has written from Newmarket, so I thought I would write to you. I go to school in Bedford, and am in the third class. When I came home for my Christmas holidays I was taken ill with scarlatina on Christmas Eve, so on Christmas Day I was shut up away from all my brothers and sisters. My brother was very ill at the same time. We thought he would not live, but he is better now. I am sending you an engraving which I hope I shall see in print soon, about a tale by myself. I am very fond of painting and drawing. I think HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE is splendid. I have such a dear little niece! Her name is Marguerite. She was two on the 1st of April. I have no pets at present, but father is going to buy me two canaries and a goldfinch. I will write and tell you all about them when I get them.

I remain yours devotedly,
MARRIE R. J.
Thank you for both your contributions. They will appear in another number.

To the Readers of "Harper's Young People":

The immense destruction of birds is growing every day, and why? Three principal reasons may be given:

First.—The wanton killing of birds by guns, bean-shooters, traps, etc. without any scientific motive, and which not needed for food.

Second.—The taking of eggs and destroying of nests.

Third.—The using feathers as ornaments, either in hats or other articles.

In the first, when a boy gets a gun he generally shoots whatever he can, quite often trying to secure as large a bag of birds as possible; so in that way a great number are killed. A great many are also killed by bean-shooters; I heard of a case in which two boys shot fifty birds in one summer with bean-shooters. Then, again, a great many are killed by traps, nets, bird-line, etc.

In the second, at least one-fifth of the boys in America take collections of bird eggs, most of them doing it unscientifically and only with a view of enlarging their collections; and when they get older, the collections are generally given up. A great many boys destroy the nests and eggs of the cut-bird (Troglodytes curvirostris), because they think it destroys the eggs of other birds; but it is very seldom guilty of this crime. In the third, they are mostly killed for hats and as ornaments. The number of birds annually sacrificed for decorative purposes is between 5,000,000 and 10,000,000.

Now there is a society to be added in New York—the Audubon Society. Its purpose is to prevent the destruction of birds, and it has adopted three pledges, viz.:

(1) "I pledge myself not to kill, wound, or capture any wild bird as long as it remains a member of the Audubon Society, and I promise to discourage and prevent, so far as I can, the killing, wounding, or capturing of birds by others."

(2) "I pledge myself not to rob, destroy, or in any way injure the nest or eggs of any wild bird, or to take any member of the Audubon Society, and I promise to discourage and prevent, so far as I can, such injury by others."

(3) "I pledge myself not to make use of the feathers of any wild bird as ornaments of dress or household furniture, and by every means in my power to discourage the use of feathers for decorative purposes."

Any one may sign these pledges, and every one should. They do not care to sign all of them, at least sign one or two, and influence others to do the same. I have numbers of certificates on which are printed these pledges. If any one who wants to sign them will just write to me, saying so, I will send him or her several to sign, and to influence others to sign the duplicates. They will send the certificates back to me, and I will forward them to the Audubon Society. By doing so they will favor the society and help the birds.

Box 3063, West Chester, Pennsylvania.

The Postmaster agrees with this, and hopes the children will join the Audubon Society in its work of rescuing the birds. This letter is from a young contributor who is in earnest.

WENONA, ILLINOIS.

I am a little girl ten years old. I go to school, and am in the fourth room. I have a dear little brother named Louis; he is fourteen months old. His presence adds greatly to the comfort of his parents and sister. I like HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE, and like it very much. I enjoy reading the many little letters in it from the young correspondents, and especially the stories written by Lucy C. Lillie and Howard Pyle. I have never seen a letter in HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE from Wenona, so I thought I would send you one to represent our little city.

ELIZABETH W.

KONIGSBERT, BOHEMIA, AUSTRIA.

DEAR POSTMASTER.—I think I am one of all your subscribers I am the only Bohemian girl, but am very proud to be one, and like my country, the "pearl of the Austrian Empire." The town in which I live is not just a small town, but is surrounded by ramparts, as it is an old garrison town; outside of these are large meadows and an immense pine forest. In the distance rises a chain of mountains called the Riesengebirge (or Giant Mountains); they are now covered with snow, and look very beautiful. We had a very severe winter when I was born, and it was splendid. I can skate very well, having commenced at five or six years, and can cut figures on the ice. I am a new subscriber, this is my first letter. I like the journal very much, and think the Post-office Box quite a charming and original idea, and hope I shall see my letter amongst the number. I will do my best to tell you about their studies, I will do the same. I study at home, and have three visiting masters—for German, music, and drawing. I like music immensely, and play now and then. I am a German. I have also an English governess, and I call her sometimes Miss-Sipp; is it not funny? With my sister, papa, and mamma, we speak French; with the masters and other people, naturally, German; and with the servants, sometimes Bohemian; with Miss D., of course, English. We had a French governess for nine years, and it was a long time; but I fear my letter will be much too long. If you would like to hear of a trip we made in the Austrian Alps, and of a garden party at the Queen of Bavaria's residence in Gmündau, I shall have much pleasure in writing again. My name is Caroline, but I am called always Kotte. I have no pets, but papa has a beautiful black pointer of English breed, whose name is Darling. He can perform several clever tricks, such as opening the doors when he wishes to come in or go out, and playing at hide-and-seek. He has a great dislike to being alone or in the dark, and drags his ears and tail when he is frightened. Oh, I love him dearly, he is such a good old fellow. LILLOTTE M. (aged 14).

P.S.—I should like to know the meaning of a candy-pull.

Which of you will tell our little friend all about a candy-pull. She must write again.

CAROL ROSE, HOBBART ROAD, DARTMOUTH PARK, LONDON, ENGLAND.

DEAR POSTMASTER.—I AM VERY YOUNG TO trouble you with another letter, but when I wrote and described the mat I did not expect I should have about twelve letters asking for pattern and design. My attention was attracted, so I am to ask my correspondents to be patient, as it will take some time for me to answer all their letters, but I will try to do so in a short time.

ANNIE H. SCOTT.

STUDLEY CASTLE, WARWICKSHIRE, ENGLAND.

MY DEAR POSTMASTER.—I began taking HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE in monthly last Christmas, and I like it very much. Father gave me last year's volume on Christmas Day. I think I like "Roif House" the best. I have two sisters and two brothers. I am the eldest, and nine years old. I have four ponds; they are kept quite well, and come to the hall door to be fed with bread and sugar. Mine is called Ebel, and she such a good girl. My intention was to give her also three little dogs called Pop, Ding, and Flo. I have been to Scotland twice. We used to go fishing there on a loch, and help row the boat. In the summer we go to Egoor, Sussex, and have great fun on the sands. Last year mother and father took us to Brighton from there. We went to the Aquarium. I liked seeing the sea-lion best, but my sister Ellen liked the octopus. Mother and father gave us a silver watch and chain on our last birthdays, and my brother has a Waterbury one. We have a garden, and do lessons at home, and we are now looking forward to our Easter holiday. We always spend Christmas with grandpa; he lives near Coventry. The woods are so pretty with their red pines. I remain, dear Postmaster, yours affectionately, ELIZABETH W.

HONESDALE, PENNSYLVANIA.

I live in Honesdale, a pretty town in the northern part of Pennsylvania, with about eight thousand inhabitants. It is one of the largest coal depots in the world. It is a valley, situated between two large hills. Honesdale has wide, straight streets, and is called "Maple City," because of its numerous maple-trees, which are the state tree. We have a very handsome park, with a large fountain and a soldiers' monument. I am in the Sixth Grade, and am twelve years of age.

FLORENCE B.

BIRMINGHAM, TORQUAY, ENGLAND.

I SAW in the magazine for February 29, that some of the Little House-keepers had lost their receipt for chocolate caramels, and having one, which I think is very good, and which I had prepared some one had been kind enough to satisfy the wants of the Little House-keepers already.

CHOCOLATE CARAMELS.—One half pound of grated chocolate, two teaspoonsful of sugar, one half cupful of hot decanted water, and one cupful of butter, and one teaspoonful of alum.

Here is also a nice receipt for LEMON SYRUP.—One pound of loaf-sugar, one ounce of citric-acid, and the rind and juice of one lemon. Put the sugar into a jug, also the acid, then pour a half pint of boiling water on it. Peel the lemon very thin, and squeeze the juice into the jug. It must stand for about twenty-four hours, and then be strained through a decanter. It can then be diluted with water.

E. E. MARY.

STUTTGART, GERMANY.

I WANT to write and tell you how much I enjoy my HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE. It is the nicest paper I have ever seen. My mamma is writing this to you, and she is very glad to hear from you. I am not plain enough. My little brother Spencer is writing. He is such a nice little boy, and we all love him. Stuttgart is a nice city, and we are learning German and go to school. I can do lessons, and can play a little. I hope you will print this, because it will be such fun to see it in dear HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE. I am not so plain as I am silly letter; I am very sorry, but please excuse it. There are a great many American people in Stuttgart, but I like the Germans better—they are so kind. My mother is going to be much nicer than mine, but do please print this, even if it is not good. The weather over here is dreadful, or has been, because now it is nice and pleasant. I like to rest, but sometimes very good. We had a lovely Christmas tree. German Christmas is not like ours, but beautiful. My little brother has such a nice tree. He is only eight years old, but as soon as he is old enough. Now, good-bye, dear Postmistress, with love. BESSIE G.

THE RESCUED KITTENS.

(A TRUE STORY.)

"Ah, the dear little cuddling things! How sweet they do look! Just see, mummy—I don't think we will take them up even for supper."

The little cuddling things referred to were two kittens, one a little over a fortnight old, the other on paws; on the other, white tails and paws were so intertwined you could scarcely tell which belonged to either kitten. Two little girls, the keeper of the light-house a little way down from Sierpe's Wharf, on the Rappahannock River, a queer-looking little girl, they were dressed in faded calicoes that came down, without hooks or tuck or overskirt, to the tops of their heavy country-made shoes, their hair curled in ringlets, and their eyes brushed smoothly down to their heads. A queer-looking little house they lived in, too—a rambunctiously little tenement, raised on a creek, and built on a little island of water mark. Above hung the light-house beam, and below swung two or three water-hatmen old boats. These boats must have formed most of the play ground these two little girls enjoyed, for they did not often go ashore, and though they used to run up and down the ladders, and have all kinds of fun on the grass on the bank, I am afraid they must have led rather a lonely life, especially as they could not have any chickens to take care of, or animals of any kind. So it is quite a good thing for them when one of their father, who had been ashore, called out to them in his bluff voice:

"Come here, little girls; I have some things for you."

They went to him and ran their hands into his deep great-coat pockets, but then drew back in alarm.

"Why, daddy," said Sarah Ann, "what is it? It's all squashy."

"Hi ha!" laughed their father; and he ran his own hands into his pockets and brought out two little kittens, and put one in Sarah Ann's apron and one in Lucy Ellen's. They were delighted, and carried them to their mother to ask her what they were, and she said they were cats, and then they were fed, and while they ate the little girls got down on their knees to watch them, and their father put on another pair of mitts, and then he went to the light-house keeper, who was too poor to burn candles, but the pine knots on his hearth threw a bright blaze to the very large windows.

The two kittens were great pets. As the days grew shorter, and the wind louder and colder, the little girls gave up playing in the boat, and they spent most of their time by the fire, and you may imagine what comforts the soft little pussies were.

One day the light-house keeper was fastening the door for the night, some fishermen, rowing past, called out to ask if he were not afraid "his old last year's crew nest" would come down over his head when the wind blew so hard.

"No," he answered, cheerily; "it has been here as long as I want it, and I reckon it will be here as long as I want it." But when he went to bed he tried to get his last year's crew nest out of bed, and looked out upon the dark rushing water, and felt the house swaying with the wind, he remembered a little while ago that the fishermen were determined to make a move at the next court toward having a new light-house built.

"Is the lamp all right?" asked his wife as he came in.

"Yes," he answered, a little absently, and went up to the window to look once more out on the stormy night.

"Why don't daddy come to bed?" asked Lucy Ellen.

"I'm going out first," he answered; and he put on his great-coat and went down to the boat once more, rowed out a little way into the river, and then took out the nest by the fire light, usually a heavy, owing to a heavy fall of rain and an east wind that was blowing the waters of the bay up into the river. The nestle-work was certainly still rising. He rowed around it a little more, and wondered if the old hulk would stand this, as it had so many storms before. The water was still rising, and the clouds were driving about the storm-taken moon. Then came a sudden gust;

the house shook till it seemed almost to turn round, and looking out toward a dark object in the water, he saw a large white hulk, as if floating toward him. He looked at it intently. Yes, it was the wreck of the upper wharf that was coming down upon him.

The light-house might, indeed, stand the storm, but it would be down in a moment if the mass of wharf timbers should strike it, and there was no doubt that it would be lost, and towed back once more as swiftly as possible.

"Wife," he said, hurriedly, as soon as he was once in the house, "you must wake the children and get them dressed right away. We must get out of this old shell; it's about to hit us."

What he meant was his wife, starting up in great amazement.

"We've got to clear out. Don't waste your breath asking questions. Just put some clothes on the children."

"Land sakes!" cried the poor woman. "Lucy Ellen! Lucy Ellen! Sary Ann! Wake up, and put your clothes on! Our house is a coming stretch over our heads!" And while the benighted children were waking up and rubbing their eyes open, she began bustling on their garments, so that no time might be lost.

Meanwhile her husband, who had carried a few of their most necessary articles, and was storing them in the boat, called to her to come immediately, and the laborers were all coming on them. In a very few moments they were coming down the ladder, and silently and quickly the children were being hurried on to the light-house voice that showed how anxious he was, he said, "Are we ready now?" and took the oars up, eager to be off.

As they felt they were leaving their old home forever, involuntarily the eyes of each were raised to look at it once more, and there, standing in the doorway, were the kittens, their little stretch over their heads, and over their lives.

"Oh, the kitties!" cried Lucy Ellen and Sary Ann, both in a breath, and they began to cry.

"Never mind the kitties," said their mother; "it is well we can save your own lives."

But the poor little things, both children and kittens, were crying dismally. They had striven so hard for their lives, and now their kittens seemed to be begging so hard for theirs too.

The light-house keeper laid down his oars, and then he turned to the mother and said:

"Land sakes!" cried his wife, "you wouldn't dround us all for the kitties?"

But without speaking, her husband ran up the ladder, seized both kittens, and was about to cling to his coat came back again in a moment; then silently and in breathless haste he unlashed the boat once more, and they were speeding over the troubled waves, there came a deep sullen sound, a splash, and the water all round them rose and fell like a sea, and the boat was nearly on the tide. The light-house was down! But they were riding safely in their little cockle-shell, and now they saw lights moving around on the shore, and boats were coming out to meet them. The people from around the upper wharf, fearing the danger to the light-house, had come down to see about the boats.

A few moments more, and the frightened crew of the little boat were standing safely on shore, kittens and all. I saw a gentleman who was among those who went to their help, and he said they were very thankful for their escape, and did not seem to feel much the loss of all their worldly goods; for one good thing about having very little is that you haven't much to lose. It is no wonder the mother did moan a little over the loss of her handsome quilt, made after the pattern of the first year's crew nest, which was nearly gone, and I hope, when they went to live in the new light-house, which was built soon after, that the two kittens were very diligent in catching rats and mice for the new light-house keeper who had risked his own life for theirs.

WILKIE, J.

WARRENTON, VIRGINIA.

DEAR POSTMISTRESS,—I am an eight-year-old boy, and I have a very nice nest of kittens. We could not go Easter-egg rolling, because it was rainy in the morning. I have one pet-kitten, and I think HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE splendid. I wish you would send it to me; it is no sweet of her to do so? She is a little girl who used to live in Brooklyn, but now she lives in the country. I am a quiet milkmaid, and I hope you will print this. The country is lovely just now, all the trees and flowers in bloom. I wish you could see it, and could you not come to see us this summer?

You must fancy that you receive a visit from me every week when you turn to the Post-office Box. I like to think of all the boys and girls who are my little friends, the wide world around.

WILKIE, J.

LA FARGUEVILLE, N. Y.

I am a little boy eight years old, and I have a sister thirteen years old, named Edith, and a little brother four years old, named Fred. But we call him Ted. I go to school, and study reading, spelling, arithmetic, geography, history of United States, and writing. I have one pet, an old cat that had four kittens: three of them died of fits, and the prettiest of them was hung in a tree in front of our house. I had a ham behind the house under some cherry-trees.

HAROLD F.

SLETTWATER, GERMANY.

DEAR POSTMISTRESS,—I am a little boy ten years old, and I am so interested in HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE! I have not seen many letters from Stuttgart, but I hope you will write to me soon. This is a splendid city. I hear German spoken, and I hope soon to speak it. The German boys wear red caps, and carry fur knapsacks. I have two sisters, Christine and Bessie, and a little brother Clarence, fifteen months old, and he is so cunning! My birthday was the same day as the King's, and I felt as if the court was really my mother's too. All the soldiers had on their best uniforms. Will you please tell me where Stonewall Jackson died, and when? SPENCER G.

General Thomas J. Jackson died May 10, 1863, at Chancellorsville, Virginia, U. S. A. "Stonewall" was merely an affectionate nickname bestowed upon him by his men.

OWENIA, ALABAMA.

I am a little boy twelve years old. I go to school, and study algebra, arithmetic, geography, Latin, and composition. My mother would not let me handle a gun until a few weeks ago, when my father allowed me to go hunting. A great many of the birds around here migrate to the North in February, such as robins, field-sparrows, and many other birds, and I hope they will correspond with a boy in one of the Western States. THOMAS L. KENNEDY, JUN.

ARANSIE CITY, NEW JERSEY.

We live very near the beach. It is a grand sight to see the waves roll in at high tide. In the summertime I like the sand and the water. I am not allowed to go in the water much, but every day when it does not rain, I go on the beach with my bucket and shovel. I attend a little private school; I study geography, spelling, reading, and grammar. My mother went to school before; my auntie has taught me at home. MABEL D.

Everything that pleases,
Ever blithe and gay.

CHAPTER VIII.

STRANGERS AND HOMELESS.

AFTER Abe left the boys they walked for some distance, not heeding whether they were going in the direction pointed out by the cook or not, and thinking only that they were strangers in a great city, where every one else looked happy in contrast to their utter loneliness.

"Come, Pete, this won't ever do!" exclaimed Jerry, after the two had walked on for some time in mournful silence. "We mustn't be travelling round here like sick chickens just because we can't go on board the Clio when we get tired. Here we are in New York, old boy, just where we've been wanting to be so long, and we ought to be as lively and happy as crabs."

"But, Jerry, it's so big, and there are so many people! Everybody looks as if they thought we had no business to come, and how ever shall we find Aunt Nannette?"

"We'll find her sure enough," said Jerry, with an assumption of cheerfulness he was far from feeling. "I don't just know how we'll do it; but we will. If the folks here don't like it because we've come, why, I'm sorry for 'em, 'cause you see they can't help themselves now that we're here."

"But where are we going?"

"Up where Abe told us to, and then we'll kind o' look round and see what to do. Perhaps we'll strike some fellow what can give us points. But ain't this a pretty big city?"

"It's too big, Jerry. It don't seem as if we'd have a chance of finding anybody, does it?"

"Well, I'll allow that the thing don't look so awful easy; but then, you see, we've got to take time about it. Say! I reckon that's the City Hall Abe was talking about," he added, as he pointed to a dirty white building, in front of which was a park, and around which could be seen boys enough, as Jerry said, "to start a orphan 'sylum."

"Hi! Johnny, where'd you get the crippled fiddle?"

"'Jist look at de swells!"

These and many other expressions, hardly more elegant or significant of good feeling, greeted the boys, and Jerry at once thought of the warning Felix had given him, while Pete, accustomed to look to his friend for protection, nestled close by his side, with Sweetness held between them to screen it from the blows he felt certain would follow the salutations. It was while Jerry stood looking around him in bewilderment, at a loss to understand whether it was a declaration of war or good-natured chaff, that a boy larger than the others stepped in front of the strangers, and asked, in a friendly tone:

"Were you going into the park?"

"I reckon so; but didn't 'zactly know," replied Jerry, disposed to place confidence in the boy who had spoken the first friendly word to him.

"Of course that's where you want to go," said the boy, decidedly. "You're strange here, ain't you?"

"Yes; we've just come up from New Orleans."

"Got any money?"

"A little," replied Jerry, modestly.

"Then I can fix everything for you in style. You see, I don't have nothing to do but just take care of fellows who come from New Orleans, and I'll put you through all right. Now you want to go into the Park, and I'll see that you can do it for five cents. The price is put 'way down to fellows from New Orleans; but if you had come from Yonkers or Cohoes, it would cost you a quarter."

It is possible that Jerry, owing to the hardships of the voyage and shipwreck, may have appeared at that moment like a boy who was unaccustomed to city life; but even if such was the case, he soon showed that he could not be victimized by a New-Yorker.

"I'll kind o' take the run of the place for a while," he said, gravely, "and you can send the bill up the first of the month. I shall be at the swellest hotel, whichever one that is."

"Perhaps you think duffers from New Orleans can get into this here park without a ticket?" said the boy, angrily, and doubling up his fists as if he proposed to contest the right of way.

"Well, I hadn't thought much about it, and now that I've seen it, I'll allow that it ain't worth fighting over."

"Oh, you're scared, eh?"

"Scared of who?" asked Jerry, looking around with pretended anxiety, as if to see some one of whom he would have reason to be afraid. "If it's the park you mean, I don't see anything very alarming in that little thing. Down our way we keep such as them by the dozen to give away to fellows from the North, and if they find fault at the size, we throw in four or five fighting men like you, so as to make it a decent present."

"Oh, you've come up here to put on airs, have you? Well, I'll show you whether you can or not," and the bully stepped nearer to Jerry as if determined to provoke a fight.

Pete clutched Jerry's arm more firmly, as he whispered in a trembling voice: "Come away; you'll get into a fight if you don't, and there are so many of them that you'll get all tore up."

"Don't you worry," replied Jerry, loud enough for the crowd to hear him. "This fellow looks to me a good deal like the Mayor of the city; but all the same, he don't want to fight when he knows the police would nab him, unless he can run faster than I think for. We sha'n't have any trouble here, old boy; but 'most any other time when he can show us a place where we can have it out, I'll give his honor what he wants, just for fun."

Jerry spoke so unconcernedly, and as if a fight was an every-day occurrence with him, that the young gentleman who had been especially detailed to amuse boys from New Orleans thought it wise not to push the stranger too far, and he said, as he swaggered up the street:

"I'll meet you before long, young fellow, and I'll show you something you never saw before."

This little encounter seemed to have cheered Jerry wonderfully. He had had many of them in his own city, although he had not always succeeded quite as well, and the feeling of homesickness had entirely disappeared.

"We'll take in this five-cent park, and then we'll get to work. New York ain't so very bad after all, is it?"

"If only we can find Aunt Nannette," said Pete.

"Of course we can; there's no trouble about that. I was afraid the boys here would be stuck up because they lived in a big city; but you can see they ain't, and we'll come out all right."

There was not very much to be seen in the little park, and after the boys had walked once around it, Jerry all the time comparing it unfavorably with what might be found in New Orleans, they sat on the City Hall steps to decide where they would begin work.

"There's that same fellow what's been following us all around," Jerry said, as he gazed curiously at a good-natured-looking boy about his own age and size, who was approaching them with his face wreathed in what can be called nothing less than a broad grin.

"Say, you fellow," called the stranger, while he was yet quite a distance away. "Let me ask you something, will you?"

* Begun in No. 336, HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE.

"Of course I will; why don't you come up and ask it like a man?"

"I didn't know as you'd want anything to do with us fellows after what you said to Jigger Sam," replied the new-comer, as he advanced and seated himself.

"Oh, that was Jigger Sam that wanted to sell me tickets to come into the park, was it?"

"Yes, and he can dance the greatest jig you ever saw."

"Well, I don't think very much of him anyway. What was it you wanted to ask me?"

"Say, don't you want somebody to show you round the city, and tell you who all the fellows are? You said you'd just come from New Orleans, and if you have, you can't know much about New York."

"Look here," said Jerry, sternly, rising to his feet and standing directly in front of the boy, "are you one of them fellows that's been sorted out to take care of folks from down our way, like that Jigger Sam?"

"No, no; I ain't a-trying to play any such games on you as he did," replied the boy, alarmed by Jerry's threatening attitude. "I'm only Bill Chick. I thought you might like to know some fellow that could tell you all about things, and if you do, I'll post you up in first-class style."

"What do you want for posting us?" asked Jerry, suspicious as to the intentions of this would-be friend.

"I don't want nothing—honest Injun I don't. I'll tell you why I'd like to go round with you: Jigger and all his gang are down on me, and they rough it in whenever they get a chance. Now you backed Jigger right straight out, and if I was with you, he wouldn't dare to pick on me."

"Oh, that's it, is it?" and Jerry seemed relieved to learn that his friendship was not sought for any more dangerous purpose. "Well, I suppose you can stay with Pete and me if you want to; but you'll have to snoop round by yourself for something to eat."

"I'll do that fast enough," was Master Bill's reply.

"How long have you lived here?" Jerry asked, a happy thought having occurred to him as to how Billy could be made useful.

"Never lived anywhere else."

"Then perhaps you know where Pete's Aunt Nannette lives."

"Who's she?"

"Why, just Aunt Nannette," said Jerry, impatiently.

"Aunt Nannette," said Master Chick, musingly, and as if very anxious to give his new acquaintances this, the first information for which they had asked. "If it was any other name, I could 'most told you right out. I don't suppose Mother Harker would do, would she? I know her, and could take you right where she lives."

"Of course she wouldn't," replied Jerry, indignantly; and then assuming a more confidential tone, he added, "We've come up here just to find Pete's aunt, and we've got to do it somehow."

"Has she got a big nose with a wart on it, and does she take snuff pretty much all the time?" asked Billy, eagerly, as if he was on the brink of an important discovery.

"I don't know. Why?"

"Cause I know a woman like that down in Vesey Street Market, and I wouldn't wonder if she was just the one you're looking for."

"What makes you think so?"

"Nothing, only it might be her as well as any one else; now mightn't it?"

Jerry did not know how to answer the question, and Pete hadn't the slightest idea as to what his aunt looked like; but he thought it would be well to ask the woman herself.

"That's just what we will do," said Jerry. "You show us where she is, Bill, and we'll go to see her now."

"It'll be a big thing if we get hold of her as easy as this," Jerry said, as they walked rapidly along, obliged to exert themselves to the utmost in order to keep pace with Master Chick. "I'd be willing to stay round here a month just to prevent Jigger from picking on Bill if he does find your folks, and won't you 'stonish her when you tell her who you are?"

Pete was too much excited to speak; he pressed forward as rapidly as possible, fully believing that their search would soon be at an end. Both he and Jerry looked wofully disappointed, however, a short time afterward, when Master Chick came to a halt and pointed to a most disagreeable old woman a short distance away, who was then busily engaged in taking snuff.

"There she is!" Billy exclaimed, triumphantly. "There she is, and now you can tell whether she looks anything like your aunt or not."

Jerry said nothing; he was decidedly disappointed in the appearance of this possible relative of his friend, and he looked at him inquiringly.

"I don't believe that is her," replied Pete, in answer to the mute question. "She don't look anything like my mother, and I reckon we'd better not ask her."

"Oh yes, let's find out now that we've come so far. She may be a good deal better'n she seems," said Billy, quickly. "You wait here, and I'll ask her."

"I hope that woman ain't my aunt," said Pete, in a tone of distress, as Master Chick ran rapidly across the street. "She don't look nice at all, does she?"

"Well, she ain't no great beauty," replied Jerry, reflectively, "and I never thought much of folks that was always taking snuff; but then she may be all right."

By this time Master Chick had engaged the old lady in conversation, and from her animated expression and threatening gestures it was quite evident that she believed the boy was trying to make sport of her. In fact, before Billy had been talking with her three minutes she attempted to box his ears, and it was only through his activity that he escaped the punishment.

"She says she hain't your aunt," he cried, as he came up to where Pete and Jerry were anxiously awaiting the result of the interview; "but I don't believe her. How does she know, when she didn't hardly look at you?"

"I reckon she knows what her own name is," said Jerry, decidedly, "and I'm glad she's no relation, 'cause if she had been I'd a thought we'd made a big mistake in coming all the way from New Orleans."

"Now what are you going to do?" Master Chick asked.

"I suppose we ought to get to work," said Jerry, thoughtfully. "We haven't got much money, and it never 'd do to let every cent go while we're up here in a strange place, so we must earn some more."

"How are you going to do it?"

"Pete will play on the fiddle, and I'll try to sing. Where's the best place for us to begin?"

"I'll take you where you can earn no end of money. 'Most all the hand-organo men go there. Where'll you sleep to-night?"

"I don't know—'most any place. Do you know a good chance?"

"Well, you'd think I did if you should see it once. Me and Jim Barrow gets a whole room to ourselves for fifty cents a week, and it's got a bed and a chair, and pretty nigh a whole looking-glass."

"Fifty cents a week for all that?" exclaimed Jerry, absolutely dazzled by the idea of so much magnificence at such a low price.

"Yes, sir, and it's in a reg'lar house, with a key to the door. I'll take you up there if you want to look at it."

"Well, we'd like such a place," said Jerry, hesitatingly; "but, you see, I allowed that we'd sleep round 'most anywhere. Do the policemen make a fuss if they find you in wagons or in the park?"

"You'd know mighty quick if you was to try it. The police is getting awful down on the fellows, and if they find us stowed away anywhere they think we hadn't ought to be, they rough it in pretty bad. Suppose you come up and look at my room?"

Jerry decided that he would accept the invitation, although it seemed to him very much like throwing money away to spend it for a room, when there were so many places on the streets in which a boy could sleep. Had he been alone, he would not have entertained the idea of hiring a room for a single moment; but to have Pete ill-treated by a policeman was more than he could endure, and he concluded to follow Master Chick's example.

The house in which Billy lived was not far from the City Hall, and if its exterior was not all in appearance that one could ask for, it was better than Pete's parents had occupied in New Orleans, therefore Jerry thought it safest to ask a few questions before entering.

"This looks kinder swell, and I don't want to get into a place where I've got to go round like a nob. Do they make you agree to keep dressed up all the time?"

"Of course they don't," replied Bill, quickly. "Look at me; I'm fixed about as well as the other fellows that live here." Billy's "fixing" consisted of a pair of trousers with suspenders, a shirt, and a portion of a vest, all in a more or less soiled condition; but he believed that the suspenders lent an air of general magnificence to the whole costume, since they were gorgeously colored with red and green. "I hain't combed my hair for a week, and they never said anything to me," he added.

"Then we'll go in," said Jerry, and Master Chick led the way into the house and up to the third story, where he displayed his room with a great flourish, feeling quite certain that his New Orleans friends would be filled with wonder and surprise.

Billy was anxious that the boy upon whom he relied to protect him from Jigger Sam should live in the same house with him, and without waiting to hear Jerry's views on the matter, he called the landlady to show his two friends a room. It so chanced that the apartment adjoining the one occupied by Master Chick was vacant, and this was offered to Jerry, who, after a whispered consultation with Pete, decided to hire it at once.

"Now all we've got to do is to earn money enough to pay for this place, and to buy us something to eat," said Jerry, after the landlady had left her new tenants. "We've got things pretty fine so far, but we musn't try to put on too much style, or we shall fail up, sure, like Tony Dauphin did when he thought he wasn't swell enough, and bought half of Felix's shed to sleep in."

Billy thought, in view of the fact that they had settled down, it would be the proper thing to have a dinner, or an excursion; but Jerry objected, saying:

"See here, Billy Chick, when we've got money in the bank, or when we've found Aunt Nannette, we can afford to loaf; but just now we've got too much to do, and it ain't no kind of use for you to talk. Will you come and show us where we ought to go, or must you sit down here fussing about what you haven't any money to pay for."

"Oh, I'll go with you, of course," replied Billy, quickly. "I was only thinking what a good time we might have, and you could see all the boys."

THE COURTSHIP OF THE WRENS.

BY MARGARET E. SANGSTER.

LISTEN, listen to the singing from yonder apple-tree,
Where the honey of the blossoms tempts the coming of the bee;
And look, afloat among the leaves, the jaunty little bird!
A lover he, with wooing song the sweetest ever heard.

"Oh, hear me, Jenny, Jenny Wren," in silver notes he cries.
Perverse she turns away her head, and not a note replies,
Till louder, sweeter, rings the song: "I love you, love you best,
And you must be my little bride, and help me build the nest."

"'Tis you must help me, sir, you mean?" at last she deigns to say;
And off they fly to choose a place, all in the merry May—
A dainty little cradle that shall swing upon the bough
When the blossom wreaths have fallen that are shining on it now.

Listen, listen, children, to the wooing of the bird,
The sweetest, merriest little song that ever children heard,
And watch with bright eyes open the building of the nest,
Where the mother bird will cherish the eggs beneath her breast.

MORE WORDS IN THE SADDLE,

BY COLONEL THEODORE A. DODGE, U.S.A.

AND now, before we say good-by,* we will take a ride together. You, Dick, must let Polly ride Don. The lady should always have the best and safest mount. I will lend you my new cob Punchinello, who is headstrong enough to suit the most ambitious boy, and will be as much of a handful as you want. I will ride Patroclus, the perfect, my daily companion for seven years, who knows all that a horse should know, never has done a wrong thing, seen a sick day, or taken a lame step. Few horses have so good a record.

Of course, Dick, you know how to mount a lady. I will stand at Don's head, though indeed he does not need watching. He is fond of a girl rider, for he is sure of gentle treatment, which all boys do not give him, and perhaps a lump of sugar. Come, Polly, stand here, close by your saddle, and facing Don's head. Put your right hand on the upper horn and your left on Dick's shoulder, who will stand facing you; place your left foot in Dick's hand, and when he counts one, two, three, spring upward; he will help lift you, and—there you are safely in your seat. Now put your right leg over the upper and your left knee under the leaping horn, and Dick will adjust your foot in the stirrup; pull the folds of your skirt straight, so as to be comfortable, take your reins and whip, and you are your own mistress, and Don's too. Dick and I soon mount, and we are at your service.

In the South they have mounting blocks, for ladies ride alone a great deal, and a clever girl can mount from a fence or stump if her pony is quiet. But ladies are not as independent now as years ago, when they rode astride like men. I used to know an old lady, Gräfin zu Dohna, in Silesia, who in her youth always rode thus. Their costumes—wide Turkish trousers, with a long skirt on both sides—were quite picturesque. One can still find pictures of them in old books, prancing along very gayly. I think it is a good plan for little girls to learn bare-back, like boys, for they get accustomed to a sort of balance on the horse; but when they come within hail of young ladyhood they must sober down to a side-saddle.

We will, if you please, walk our horses for a mile or so. Many young beasts are rather gay on first going out, but it is well to teach them to walk until we find that everything is in proper trim. Dick, you ride on Polly's right. The safer side is certainly the left, for your right hand is then nearest her, and in case of need I have known a man to bodily lift a lady clear of her saddle; but fashion dictates the right side. Remember, too, that it is the lady's option to give the pace, and her every wish should be your law. You must not leave her side, and only danger should allow you to exert your own will. Nothing is more ungallant than to cross your Amazon's choice or to leave her side for a moment. It is only "Sunday riders" who go stringing along the road at a breakneck pace. Expert horsemen ride close together, and slowly, as a rule, so as to indulge in pleasant talk.

Now let us start into a modest trot. Gather up your reins, snaffle most, and a steady "Come, Don!" will suffice. Southern horses are taught to trot when you pull their mane. I prefer a word or a sign of the reins. Patroclus will go half a dozen gaits, and change from any one to any other by a very slight sign of the reins or a word. I shall drop behind you, Polly, to see how you rise to your trot. Some girls need to go fast to rise well, but this shows lack of skill. You can, I see, rise to a slow trot, and well too. Your backbone is straight over Don's. Now don't lean forward quite so much, nor sit back too stiff, and you'll do admirably.

Ah, Dick, I thought Punch would keep you busy. He's a very rogue for shying till he finds out that you're not timid. But don't be angry. A blow will only make him worse next time. Reason with him, and tell him not to be foolish. It is the tone of your voice does it. Shying may generally be overcome by firm kindness, unless, indeed, it comes from bad eyes; it never can be by rough usage. I have worked weeks sometimes to make a horse forget a single unnecessary cut of the whip.

Here we come to a soft stretch of dirt-road. Shall we take a canter? Polly, draw up your curb a bit, not too tight, but enough to bring in Don's head, and at the same minute lift your reins so as to gather him, and touch him with your heel. There, that sends him into a canter, with the right shoulder leading, which is easier for a girl.

* See Colonel Dodge's articles, "In the Saddle," published in HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE, Nos. 335 and 336.

Now, steady! We don't want to rush into a gallop. Any plug can gallop. Only the well-trained hack is able or willing to put a twelve-mile gallop into a five-mile canter, and when he does there is nothing so agreeable. Handle your reins lightly, so that Don will mouth his bit as he canters, and you can hold him with a silken skein. But Punch, you see, is obstinate, and needs muscle: he has not been well-bitted. There is no pace capable of finer gradations than the canter. Well performed, it is the most exquisite of motions. A loose-jointed, ten-mile rush is not worthy the name of canter. There should be a perfect and slow rhythm to the feet, as well as a vigorous, springy action.

What do you say to crossing the fields here and making a bee-line for the highway? Hold hard, and let us take our bearings. This field won't do, for on the other side, you see, is a wall laid in cement, with sharp-edged cap-stones. I never like to let a girl take any but easy jumps, and don't like dangerous ones myself as well as when I was a boy. The next field, I notice, has a low wall on this side and an easy fence on the other, and we can skirt the marshy lowland and find a narrow place to jump yonder brook. It is not more than five feet wide in places. Now, Dick, you and Punch lead, so as to make Don jump free. Never fear Punch; all he wants is a little rein. Select that place where the wall is low, and take it moderately after you land. Polly, do you forget everything except to lean back, grip your horns for all you are worth, and let Don have his head. Loosen your curb before you start. Now, Dick! See Punch go at it shaking his head for very delight! Over he is! Now for you, Polly! Leave Don to himself, and—brava, pretty! You sat that well, though your hat did get knocked over your eyes. Hold hard, Dick. If Punch goes on that way, we shall bid good-by to him and you for the rest of the afternoon. Pull him down. We are not steeple-chasing. Keep to the right of the dam's ground, well up the slope, and make for that panel in the fence where the top rail is gone.

You hold on, Polly, till you see Dick well across before you follow. If he should come down, you might land atop of him else. I will take the panel next to you, and we will go it neck and neck. Steady him down. Never go wildly at a jump. Always keep to a gait such that your horse feels you are cool-headed, and he will be so too. Let him do his own work. This "lifting" a horse is only for the very expert. If he knows from your reins that your heart is in the right spot, he will jump boldly; and if it isn't, he will guess it sure, and probably refuse. Here we come. Now for it! Good again! Polly, you are a trump! That was strong three feet. We will brisk up into a hand-gallop across this pretty meadow and over the brook—ditch doesn't sound well—which is just beyond us. Dick, let Polly have the place to the left of the bushes. The take-off is firm there, and a trifle higher than the landing bank. We can all go together as well as not. Watch the horses' ears as they see the water ahead. Never fear; they will all take it handily in company, though Don might not do so alone. Give him a word of cheer, Polly, to make him feel that all's well. Now, then—over we are. Didn't you feel like a swallow on the wing? Is there anything like it? Let us pull down and take it easy.

And now, as we walk along over the soft turf, or pause, indeed, a few minutes while our nags get a nibble of the fresh young grass, I want to spin you a yarn about a real Don and his plucky boy rider whom I have learned to know since I named our pony Don. This little beast, whose full name is Don Bucephalus, grew up on the pampas of the Argentine Republic, on a ranch where some fifty thousand sheep were herded, with lambs for playmates, and the horizon alone to fence him in. He was given to the Captain of an American schooner which made a yearly trip to Rosario for fruits and other products of the Rio de la Plata country. The only way in which Don could be got on board was to rig a tackle to the yard-arm, put him in a sling—which is a broad band around the body, held in place by straps front and rear—and hoist him up. But Don was so frightened when he found himself in mid-air that he struggled loose from the sling, and took a header into the river. They fished him out, and on the second trial he was wise enough to keep quiet; for Don is something of a philosopher. Once on deck, he was put in a huge box, just wide enough to squeeze him into, so that the sides should hold him steady when the ship pitched. Here Don stood two long months, asleep or awake, with his head and tail alternately bobbing out of the ends of his novel "box stall," as the schooner rolled to and fro over the waves.

Sailors are always fond of pets, and Don was a prime favorite. The crew fed him on hay as long as the supply they had taken on board lasted, and then on potato peelings and ship's biscuit. Finally Boston Harbor was made, and Don found release from his prison. Every one supposed that this wild pampas pony would be frightened out of his wits at the novel sights of a city. But Don had too much wit to be frightened, and was too much of a citizen of the world to show surprise, if he felt any; he simply ignored the whole proceedings, and behaved as if he had long ago divined it all. He walked through Boston streets probably feeling akin to its intellectual atmosphere, stared the locomotive out of countenance when he was put on the cars to be taken to his new home, and accepted everything as a matter of course.

The Captain's people did not know what to do with the little fellow, and sold him for a song to a young bank clerk, whom, though Don is only twelve and one-half hands high, he managed to carry without effort. Once, indeed, he ran away with him, and on another occasion was put into a race, in which, though beaten, he ran his three furlongs in forty-eight seconds with his owner in the saddle. On this gentleman's death, soon after, poor Don fell into cruel hands, whose unreasonable treatment he repaid with many spirited and resentful pranks, thus earning the reputation of treachery—a vice quite foreign to his nature. Finally good fortune cast his lot with his present owner, Master Alfred B—, of Fall River, then only seven years old.

Alfred had never ridden, but he had the stuff in him of which riders are made, and the first day he tried racing Don against his older brother's big pony. Not knowing Don's temper—indeed, knowing nothing of riding—he struck him with a stick. The spirit of the pampas rose at once in revolt. Off went Don like the wind, leaving the other pony far in the rear, threading the mazes of a funeral procession, and bringing every one to the scene where, like John Gilpin of old, this curly-pated youngster ran his race.

"The dogs did bark, the children screamed,
Up flew the windows all;
And every soul cried out, 'Well done!'
As loud as he could bawl!"

But Alfred was in no whit dismayed. He stuck to Don like a trump as he flashed along the road for nearly three miles, kept his head and seat, and finally pulled him up. When he got home he mildly observed, "I think I won't ride any more to-day, mamma." And when his mother, surprised, asked what had happened, he told her Don had run away, and added, "But I staid on, mamma, and I think he was getting tuckered."

Every one now protested that it was too dangerous a thing to keep Don, but the boys had no such fears, and Don staid. In a short while he found that he was among friends, where he need not fight for existence, and all that was sweet in him came out to repay the children's petting. He is by nature as docile as he is strong and plucky, and his young owner fairly matches him.

Don is a famous jumper, and has cleared obstacles all but as high as himself, while Alfred has taken a five-foot hurdle on his mother's thorough-bred. No one who has seen the pair ride to hounds would recognize the pony while he patiently waits on a summer day, unhitched, on the sandy beach for six or eight children to finish their bath, to and from which he daily drags the whole crowd in a village cart; or, indeed, when the boys stand him on the stable floor, hang a hat on his ear, and play leap-frog with him. One day on the beach Don stood quietly while the children buried him nearly up to the body in sand, and the young ones all aver that he winked at them in pure enjoyment of their fun.

Master Alfred seems to have all the qualities which go to make the typical horseman. He is cool and courageous; he has a firm, steady seat, and is kind and judicious. With these to start with, everything else will come. I hope I shall know him a dozen years hence, for I am sure he will have justified his promise.

Here we are at the highway, with an open gate, which you and I, Polly, will soberly go through. But Dick has no idea of using a gate when there is a stone wall to jump, and Punch to carry him over it. I hope you are not tired of walking. There is no gait in the saddle to be compared to a good walk. It is a pity to have to hurry for exercise. Road riding should be a lazy luxury, and on a walk one can converse so much better than on any other gait. There are hundreds of things I want to tell you, but I shall have to wait for another day. Both Dick and you have good firm seats, and I fancy your hands will become gradually lighter. There is one test both of good hands and a mouth well bitten which you should keep in mind, for these, you see, mutually depend on each other.

If your horse will stop, back, and turn handily and quickly and without boring—that is, without giving a dull, heavy pull on the bit—both his mouth and your hands are properly light. But whenever your horse bores, something is wrong. A light-mouthed horse may, in galloping, or when very fresh, want to work up to the bit with taut reins, but the least indication will arch his neck and make the bits play loosely in his mouth. What I mean by boring is the stupid, unintelligent, stiff-necked hold of the bit which nine out of ten horses always show. In this condition you can convey no meaning to them except by sheer muscle. All skill is thrown away. The horse's bits should be handled as delicately as the instrument which sends the telegram along the wires. In fact, the reins and bits are only for just such messages. How to "make" a horse's mouth I will tell you some other time. It is a long story.

And here we are back home. You may now learn to dismount in good form. You, Polly, hand your whip to the groom who holds your horse's head; Dick will release your foot from the stirrup; you can then take your knee from off the pommel, so that you sit square across the horse; seize your skirts in your hands so that you will not catch in them; Dick will place his hands on your waist or under your elbows, and you can glide to the ground as lightly as may be. There, that is well done. Some ladies prefer to place their right hand on the pommel, and give their left to the gentleman who dismounts them, and with the short skirt of the day this is not a bad plan. The main thing is to land lightly and clear of your saddle, and not to trip on your skirt.

And now let me thank you for a very pleasant ride, Miss Polly, and you, Dick, too, and say, not good-by, but au revoir!

THE second spring old Jacket was with us, the return of two of my brother's comrades for a very special occasion decided mamma to go on Decoration Day to our dear old church-yard—by which name, from a habit in Dalesford, the resting-place of those we loved is always called.

The services were over, but the church-yard was still full of people, the sunlight not gone, and we were moving about by ourselves—mamma talking in low tones to Colonel Sharply about our brother—when suddenly a carriage drawn by fine dark horses and driven by liveried servants stopped in the main roadway of the church-yard, and a grizzled man with "soldier" in every line of his face and bearing alighted. He looked about him—was evidently searching for a grave, and we moved back a little with an instinctive feeling of delicacy. The man found what he was seeking—the grave of a Dalesford boy we had all been proud of—a little drummer-boy whose fate was to die young but very gloriously, and who had been beloved by the whole regiment and mourned by them.

When it was found, the man read the inscription and went back to the carriage, and now we saw more plainly who was seated within it—an old lady, very beautiful, very gentle, very quiet, with white curls on either side of her delicate oval face, with tender blue eyes, that looked as though weeping and sorrowing had only left them patient and sympathetic for the sorrows of all other people in the world. One of her hands rested on the edge of the carriage door as the man spoke; then he opened the door, offered her his arm, and gently led her forward.

We had drawn back, as I said, and would have gone away now down the hill but for Jacket's unexpected behavior.

With a bound he had rushed at the man's legs; the man had cried out, "Why, Jack! Jack Horner!" Then the old lady had turned, trembling visibly, and put out her hand as she exclaimed,

"Jack Horner! naughty old Jack!"

And there was our old comrade leaping about wildly and joyfully, like a dog "come to his own again."

The twins were looking on like a pair of young thunder-clouds. Mamma began to speak—then looked at Edwin, who certainly did very well in his way of explaining how the dear old dog had come into our keeping.

"Why, you see," said the soldierly man, smiling, "Mrs. Hervey, my aunt, lost the dog about two years ago."

"It was my son's dog," said the old lady in a very gentle voice. "I have not been home here for many, many years. My son's dog," she added, looking down again at Jacket, whose demonstrations of delight were by no means subdued as yet, and then the man, who had the air of an old family servant, explained:

"You see, Mrs. Hervey, the house-keeper, came up here from Boston two years ago to leave the dog at her mother's while we were in Scotland, and she lost him, miss"—looking at me—"and never could say how, but guessed he was stolen. And if he was, he probably got away from the thief, and so to the school where this young gentleman bought him, you see."

This was evidently the case; the all-important question now, asked with eager glances already by the twins' two pairs of bright blue eyes, was what should we all do about it?

"You must have been so good to my poor old Jack!" said the old lady. "May I take him home with me now—and to-morrow, madam, to mamma, may all of your people come to see him?"

"HE IS A LAME SOLDIER COMING HOME, MRS.' EXPLAINS TRUEMAN."

So it was settled; the address in a village five miles away given, and Jacket, our dear old Jacket, was driven away in the grand carriage, flapping his ear, cocking his eye, and looking painfully like our most familiar association with him. The boys took their way homeward in silent grief, not all unminged with resentment. We older ones walked quietly and sadly, too, for Jacket somehow seemed strangely part and parcel of our simple home life. To return in the sweet May twilight and not find old Jacket drowsily curled up in the doorway, to spend an evening undisturbed by his "remembering"—his sudden starts and little affectionate demonstrations—how strange it seemed! No wonder the twins and Edwin and Edith were a mournful quartette around the library table.

All that evening there were the sounds—sometimes far away, sometimes near—of the soldiers tramping, of the war tunes played over and over again for the sake of auld lang syne, while the beauty of the summer night gathered, and the sky shone full of stars—shining down upon our Dalesford church-yard, upon the grave of little Tom Barton, our drummer-boy, and George Marshall, our young general, lighting up all alike now with God's radiance—the same glory, only differing as star from star, for one and all, and it was hard not to have a sense of peace and rest, and to think of our own lad up in the church-yard as bright and happy and at peace in God's fair land.

The next day I went with Carolyn, Edith, and the boys to see Jacket in his old home. The lady's name was Mrs. Margaret Joy. The place had an old-fashioned entrance—a gate that swung back, and let us in upon a long drive which circled about a mansion painted white, with fluted pillars on the porch, and a great deal of fine dark paneling in the hall.

Jacket made a dash for us from his place at the front door, kewed each twin, we felt sure, and this was hard work, they were so alike, recognized Edwin, the girls, and myself with his peculiar demonstrations of delight. Then Mrs. Joy led us into a long, beautiful drawing-room, where a girl of Carolyn's age sat working, who rose with a pretty, shy grace to make us welcome, and where at once we saw who had been Jacket's master.

At the lower end of the room hung the picture of a splendid-looking youth, a lad of nineteen, in the uniform of an officer, and with a brown and white dog sitting beside him. Above this picture hung sword and spurs and an old flag, pathetic with its tattered edges, mute testimonials to the past. The face of the young soldier was beautiful, I thought boyish, but with manliness in every line written in by the new fires of loyalty; and the dog—ah, Jacket! Jacket! that was your very self in youth. Poor old doggie! once you looked young and brisk, almost handsome, did you? "Was that Jacket?" the twins were saying, almost in a breath, their curly heads close together, their faces lifted at precisely the same angle, their blue eyes fixed upon the dog in the picture. And Jacket, poor old man, near by, cocked his eye and flapped his ear and banded his hard old tail on the floor. Doubtless he was accustomed to seeing strangers gaze from the smart young dog in the picture to the spectacle of his halt old age, and considered it a compliment.

"That was Jack, or Jacket, as you seem to call him,"

"HEY, MIDDLE, DIDDLE! THE CAT AND THE FIDDLE."

the dear old lady said, smiling. "He was in the war with my boy."

And the pretty girl, Mrs. Joy's granddaughter, called out, "Here, Jack! where's Trueman?" And I believe Trueman—the soldierly man we had seen before—must have been just outside the door, he answered this summons so quickly.

"Here, Miss Jenny," he said, coming in, and standing very straight, and smiling, and waiting for orders.

"May we have the drum, grandmamma?" said Miss Jenny, prettily.

"Of course. I don't doubt Jack has learned many new tricks, but perhaps you'd like to see some of the old ones."

Wouldn't we! and particularly wouldn't the twins! I must tell you that in moments of special interest or excitement the twins always cling to each other very closely, and positively seem to draw their breaths simultaneously—tall, slim lads they are even now, with just the same clear-cut oval faces, and no special difference that less keen observers than old Jacket, who never failed to distinguish between them, would detect. They stand now gaping at old Sergeant Trueman, who puts up his hands to imitate a fife, while Miss Jenny fetches a drum from a little glass-covered porch just outside.

Then you should see Jacket! Up he starts, listens to the rat-tat-tat of the drum, to the filing noise from Trueman, and forthwith, for the first time in our knowledge of him, goes through the trick he had struggled with so many times in vain: rolls over on the ground, springs up, barks as usual; then, while the military music goes on, marches solemnly about, up and down in good time to the tune Trueman and Jenny are playing; and what should it be but "Georgia," of course! Why had we never thought to play it? Jacket's missing link is found; he is himself again. And now the tune changes. Back comes the old boy from the upper end of the room, limping slowly, haltingly. "He is a lame soldier coming home, miss," explains Trueman, in a polite aside, too low for Jacket to hear. "The first time, he was going out to battle, you see; the rolling over and over is supposed to be getting out of his tent or making ready. It was our Colonel"—with a look at the picture—"taught him that, miss."

"He was born in camp, you see, miss, and the Colonel had him from the very first. Colonel was in the hospital then; lost his leg, miss"—with a look of intense pride—"and while he was laid up, old Jack scarcely left him. Colonel could have taught an idiot good sense, I think; anything could have learned from him, and Jack was always quick. Jack Horner he was called, because he would stick to the corner by the Colonel's bed. Then the Colonel was coming home, and says he, 'Trueman, do you think we can take Jack?' 'Why, we'll see, sir,' says I, and we arranged it; and so he learned our home ways, too, but never forgot army life a minute; and we always did this with fife and drum every day. Then we took him back again. That was the time Jack saved his life. Come here, you rascal!" and the old Sergeant, who had been Colonel Joy's body-servant years before, catches our Jacket up, and shows us the old boy's lame leg.

"It was a bad night. Colonel he was with a scouting party, and they thought Jack was in the camp—but he was close at the old mare's heels—trust him for following where he could. When Colonel tied the horse up, Jack followed on at his master's heels, and then—Colonel had dropped low to reconnoitre, you see—there was a movement back of a tree—a rifle aimed—Jack sprang forward right in front of our Colonel, miss, and got the shot in his leg that would have lodged in his master's heart. True grit was Jack, I tell you," and there is something a trifle luskily in the way the Sergeant ends the story.

So that was Jacket's story—a hero and a veteran! Did we not always say he had a past—something worth "remembering"?

"And then—did they take him to the hospital?" says a twin, with rather misty blue eyes. The other twin is doing what he calls "rummaging" in Jacket's neck.

Trueman and all the rest laughed.

"Well, I should think so, my boy. At all events, no wounded soldier ever had better care than Colonel's Jack, I tell you, sir. Why, miss, I wish you could have seen it. They all missed him so; it would be, 'How's Jack Horner to-day?' or, 'When's Jack going to be around again?' And as for that tune—old 'Georgia'—if Jack hadn't learned it, and the first day he limped out and around to that, I tell you he was well received."

We are silent now, twins and all, and we look at the picture of Jacket's Colonel. He too had his story—or perhaps the country has it for him and his—a sacred record. Mr. Trueman's old eyes follow ours.

"The Colonel was killed in the Wilderness," he says, quietly. There is no regret in his tone—a solemn sort of pain, perhaps—a reverence very decidedly, and Mrs. Joy seems to feel in the same way. We never asked any questions, but during that morning in the dear old house learned how ever-present "Colonel's" life and memory seemed to be. Upstairs Miss Jenny showed us her young uncle's rooms, kept as he used to have them, only here and there and everywhere were added signs of his soldier life—his cap, his pistols, his belt, and all his decorations; and he was a mere lad at that battle of the Wilderness. Barely three and twenty, and little Tom Barton, our Dalesford boy, had fallen at his side.

"We went to decorate Tom's grave," the Sergeant explained. "We've always tried to do it ever since—Colonel went away."

That was how they spoke of him: "Went away"—and the look of patience and resignation in the mother's eyes was one of waiting too. To her the boy was not lost—only waiting—having fought his fight, laid down his earthly laurels, and gone to meet his Master.

Well, you see how it was that giving Jacket back to his original home seemed an easier task even for the second twin after we heard his story, and spent that June day with the Joys. And what a satisfaction to know our old friend was a hero, had had a history sure enough, a real story of his own! We felt somehow a great sense of that day's importance, and bade good-by to our new friends in the twilight, conscious that an event had happened.

It was perhaps a week later that Mr. Trueman appeared quite late one afternoon with Jacket, and he explained that the old dog was so lonely Mrs. Joy had not had the heart to keep him. His first actions were characteristic and funny. He searched out all his old haunts, went up and down stairs as though to assure himself that no changes had been made, and at last curled himself up for a nap, "remembering" in his most vigorous fashion.

So we never really lost him: moreover, he brought us friends—dear ones—for all that summer back and forth went the Joys' carriage, sometimes with dear Jenny in it, sometimes sent to fetch a twin, or Carolyn, or Edwin, or Edith and myself for a visit, and old Jacket travelled too between the houses, evidently conscious of his own importance, growing older and older as the summer deepened and the winter came, at last giving up all but what we called his "Drum trick," which was always a source of pride to him, I verily believe, and after which one day he laid down for a sleep, and "remembered" in his usual way. What? I chanced to be alone with him; he started up—awake, eager, and evidently fully himself—went forward a few steps; laughingly I began, half under my breath,

"Hurrah! hurrah! we bring the jubilee!"

Jacket looked at me, tried to march a little way, but turned back and lay down, never to raise his dear wise old face to ours again.

BY HOWARD PYLE,
AUTHOR OF "PEPPER AND SALT," ETC.

ONCE upon a time there lived a King who had an only daughter. The Queen had been dead for so long that the King began to think about marrying a second time; so the upshot of the matter was that by-and-by there came a step-mother into the house, and a step-sister besides.

One day the step-mother, the step-sister, and the pretty Princess sat together in the castle garden beside a deep cistern of water. By the cistern hung a silver cup for the use of those who would drink. And as they sat there the Princess grew thirsty, and would have taken the cup to drink from the cistern, but the step-mother stopped her.

"See, now," said she, "if you must drink, you will have to stoop to the water, for the silver cup is too good for the likes of you."

"Alas!" said the poor Princess, "the time was when a cup of gold was not too good for me!" But there was no help for it. If she would drink, she must stoop for it; so down she knelt, and began to drink from the deep water without any thought or fear of harm.

But as the Princess thus stooped and drank, the wicked step-mother came behind her and gave her a push, so that she fell headlong into the well.

When the Princess sank down to the bottom of the well, she found herself in a great wide meadow, all covered over with bright flowers, as many as there are stars in the sky at night. Across this meadow she went, and on and on and on, but never a single soul did she see, until at last she came to a great fine house that stood all alone by itself, without another to be seen near or far. In the doorway of the house stood an old woman, to whom the Princess courtesied, as a modest maiden should, for she saw very plainly that the old woman was not like common folk. And there the Princess was right, for the old woman was none other than Mother Hildegard, who is so wise that she knows almost as much as Father Time himself.

The Princess told all that had befallen her, and when she had ended, Mother Hildegard said, "See, now, I will give you food and lodging, and will pay you well, if you will serve me faithfully for the space of a year and a day."

Oh, the Princess was willing enough. So into the house she went to serve Mother Hildegard for a year and a day.

One day comes Mother Hildegard to her and says: "See, now, I am going off on a bit of a journey, and it may be a while before I am back again. Here are the keys of all the house, and you are free to go wherever you choose. Only here is a black key that unlocks a little room into which you must not go, for if you do I will be sure to know it, and ill luck will be sure to happen to you."

The first day the Princess went here, and the second day she went there, and the third day she had gone everywhere, except into the little room where Mother Hildegard had told her not to go, and she never wanted anything in all of her life as much as she wanted just to peep into that little room. And she did peep into it.

Believe me or not, all the same I tell you the truth when I say that there was not one thing in the room but a single jar with a cover on it that stood in the very middle of the floor. She went to the jar and took off the lid, and peeped into it. And what do you think was in it? Nothing but water!

But as the Princess looked into the water, she saw Mother Hildegard as though she was a great way off, and the Mother Hildegard whom she saw in the water was looking at nobody in all of the world but her. As soon as the Princess saw what she saw, she clapped down the lid of the jar again; but she clapped it down just a moment too late, for a strand of hair fell down over her face, and one single hair touched the water.

And when the Princess looked, she saw that every lock upon her head was turned to pure gold. Then if anybody in all of the world was frightened, it was the poor Princess. She twisted up the hair upon the top of her head, and bound her kerchief about it so that it was all hidden, but all the same the hair was there, and could never be changed from the gold again.

Just then who should come walking into the house but Mother Hildegard herself. "Have you obeyed all that I have told you?" said she.

"Yes," said the Princess; but all the same she was so frightened that her knees knocked together.

"Did you go into the little room?"

"No," said the Princess; but her heart beat so that she could hardly speak.

Then Mother Hildegard snatched the kerchief off of the Princess's head, and her golden hair came tumbling down all about her shoulders, so that it was the finest sight that you could see between here and No-man's Land.

"Then how came your hair to be like that?"

"I do not know," said the Princess.

"See, now," said Mother Hildegard, "you have served me well for all of the time that you have been with me, therefore I will have pity upon you, only you must tell me the truth. Did you go into the room while I was away?"

But for all that Mother Hildegard spoke ever so kindly, the Princess could not bring herself to speak the truth.

"No," said she.

MOTHER HILDEGARDE AND THE PRINCESS.

Then the young King, seeing that she would not come down from the branches to him, climbed up himself and brought her.

He wrapped his cloak about her, and set her on his horse in front of him, and then he and all that were with him rode away out of the dark forest and under the blue sky until they had come to the King's castle. But all the time the Princess did nothing but weep and weep, for she could not speak a single word. The young King gave her to his mother to care for. As for her, she was none too glad to have a dumb maiden brought into the house. But the young King cared nothing whatever of that. So the end of the matter was that the King married her, even though she had not a word to say for herself.

Well, time went on and on, until one day the storks that lived on the castle roof brought a baby boy to the poor dumb Princess, whereat everybody was glad. But their gladness was soon changed to sadness, for that night, when every one in the King's house was fast and sound asleep, Mother Hildegarde came softly into the Princess's room. She gave her back her speech for the time being, and then she said: "I will still have pity upon you. If you will only tell me the truth you shall have your speech again, and all will go well with you. But if you tell me a falsehood once more, still greater troubles will come upon you. Now tell me, did you go into the little room?"

"No," said the Princess, for still she could not bring herself to confess to Mother Hildegarde.

"Then how came your hair to be like that?"

"Then how came your hair to be like that?"

"I do not know," said the Princess.

At this Mother Hildegarde frowned till her eyes burned like sparks of fire. She caught the Princess by the arm, and struck her staff upon the ground, and away they flew through the air until the wind whistled behind them. So by-and-by they came to a great forest. "See, now," said Mother Hildegarde, "if you do not answer me truthfully this time I will leave you alone here in the forest, and will take away your speech so that you will be as dumb as the beasts of the field. Did you go into the little room?"

But still the Princess hardened her heart, and answered, "No."

"Then how came your hair to be like that?" said Mother Hildegarde.

"I do not know," said the Princess.

Then Mother Hildegarde went away, and left the Princess alone in the forest, as she had promised to do; and not only that, but she took away the Princess's speech, so that she was quite dumb. So in the forest the Princess dwelt for a long time, and there she would have died of hunger, only that Mother Hildegarde still cared for her, and sent the wood-pigeons to feed her, which they did from day to day.

Well, one time it happened that a young King came riding into the forest to hunt the wild boars, and many of his people came along with him. There he saw the maiden, and he called to her to come down from the tree where she was hiding. But she only shook her head, for she was ashamed of being found where she was.

THE PRINCESS PEEPS INTO THE JAR.

THE PRINCESS AND THE PIGEONS.

"I do not know," said the Princess.

So Mother Hildegarde took away her speech once more. After that she smeared the mouth of the Princess with blood, and then wrapping the baby in her mantle, she carried it away with her.

You can guess what a hubbub there was the next morning in the castle when they came and found that the baby was gone, and that the Princess's mouth was smeared with blood.

"See," said the King's mother. "What did I tell you from the very first? Do you not see that you have brought a wicked witch into the house, and that she has killed her own child?"

But the King would listen to no such words as these, for it seemed to him that the Princess was too beautiful and too good to do such a wicked thing. Nevertheless, he was perplexed within himself.

After a time there came another baby to the Princess, and once more Mother Hildegarde came to her and said, "Did you go into the little room?"

"No," said the Princess.

"Then how came your hair to be like that?"

"I don't know," said the Princess.

So Mother Hildegarde took this baby away also, and left the Princess with her lips smeared with blood.

In time there came a third baby, but still the Princess could not soften her heart, and Mother Hildegarde took it away as she had done the others. This time the King could do nothing to save the Princess, for every one cried out upon her that she was a wicked witch who killed her children, and that she should be burned at the stake, as was fitting for such a one. So a great pile of fagots was built out in the castle court-yard, and the Princess was brought out and tied to a stake that stood in the midst. Then they lit the pile of fagots, and it began to crackle and burn about the Princess where she stood.

Then suddenly Mother Hildegarde stood beside the Princess in the midst of the fire. In her arms she held the Princess's youngest baby, and the others stood, one upon one side and the other upon the other.

And then she said, "Now tell me, did you go into the little room?"

Even yet the Princess would have answered "No," but when she saw her children standing in the midst of the fire with her, her heart melted away within her.

"Yes," she cried, "I went in and I saw."

"And how came your hair to be like that?" said Mother Hildegarde.

"Alas!" said the Princess, "I gazed upon that which I should not have gazed upon, and looked into that which I should not have looked into, and one hair touched the water and all was turned to gold."

Then Mother Hildegarde smiled till her face shone as white as the moon. "The truth is better late than not at all," said she, "and if you had but spoken in the first place, I would have freely forgiven you." As she spoke, there came a shower of rain, which quenched the fire.

Thus it is that everything turns out right in the long run—that is, in fairy tales.

writing, and arithmetic, and sometimes we have drawing lessons. I am very fond of drawing. I have elementary mathematics at home in Liverpool. My sister and I have taken in HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE this year for the first time, and we like it very much. We look forward to the next week. We had a wild-beast show in this town a few days ago, and one of the camels went into a newspaper shop. I went to the Zoo last summer, and there we saw all sorts of things. We saw a seal; it was on the ledge of the pond. While we were at London we went into the Crystal Palace; we saw the Roseary, and a sight of the Palace was a fine lot called "We saw a lady cutting drinking-glasses, and we saw a lady walking on a tight-rope."

I am a little girl seven years old. I always have HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE given to me every year by mamma, and I like it very much. For a pet I have a cat, and a very little one called Tiny. I have a number of brothers and sisters. This is the first letter I have written to the Post-office, and I hope it will be put in. Your loving little reader,

I have been so interested in reading the letters in the Post-office Box that I thought I would like to write you my name, and a very little called Tiny. I have a number of brothers and sisters. St. LOUIS, MISSOURI.

I am a little boy six years old, and as I am just learning to write, and can not do it very well yet, my aunt is writing for me. Auntie taught me how to write my name, and a very little called Tiny. I have a number of brothers and sisters. This is the first letter I have written to the Post-office, and I hope it will be put in. Your loving little reader,

Richmond, VIRGINIA.

DEAR POST-MISTRESS.—A few weeks ago we had a flood here. The water came up to the second pair street, and much damage was done, although not so much as at some other places. It looked very fine, with the boats floating in the streets. There are a great many historical places around Richmond, and it is very interesting to visit them. There are two Presidents buried in Hollywood Cemetery, Monroe and Tyler. If any little girl or boy will enclose a two-cent stamp in a letter, with the address, I will send in return a pressed buttercup from the residence of our President Monroe. I have no pets except a snake, whose name is Nebuchadnezzar, and a duck which has no name. S. N. McNEELY, GEOGRAPHY, 821 BYRD STREET.

CHERRY, PENNSYLVANIA.

I am a little girl eight years old, and I had eight little chickens, and one got very fat. I take HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE, but a little boy friend of mine does, and he lets me read it, and I think it is such a nice paper. I go to school, and I study French, reading, arithmetic, geography, Book of Nature, and spelling. Some time I hope I may be a teacher. MARY R. H.

EDINBURGH, SCOTLAND.

Last year I received a present of a bound volume of HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE. It was simply splendid! This year my brothers began to get it, but they are not living in the same house, so never till lately saw it. One day, when I was visiting them, I proposed that when they had read it they might send it to me. We have grand views here, and I had a boat, but to make it more interesting, I had half past five. It is simply magnificent to watch the tips of the fir-trees get all golden, and generally the whole trees in the same way, as if they were in a glow. Sometimes a friend of mine comes out from Edinburgh, and we go up the glen, as it is called in Scotland, hunting for moss. I have only one pet, which is a dog. He is a dear wee fellow; he is a Skye terrier. I am eleven years old, and am in the highest class in the school. Our examination was on the 7th of April I say "was," because the 7th will be past when you get this, but in reality it is only the 30th. I would like if some of your young friends would like to correspond with me. I wonder what America is like. Some parts of it must be grand. I do not think I could ever be a Yankee. I must stop. ANICE H. C.

ONKOTA, N. Y.

I have just returned from a long walk in search of wild flowers, and I saw a very pretty one. I took up HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE and read the letter from Alice F. G., of Stratfieldsgay, England, and thought, as she is interested in wild flowers, I would like to send you something of those which are common in this part of the United States, as I should like to hear of those in England. If Alice will send me a card, I will correspond on the subject with a friend of the Post-office Box? MADON YAGER.

If Alice chooses to do so, she may write to Markon. Such an exchange of letters might be for the improvement of each little correspondent.

NEW HAVEN, CONNECTICUT.

I have taken HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE since January, and like it very much. I would like to read the letters. I thought I would like to write one and see it published. I have a brother and a sister, who are very dear. My brother is seven years of age. We have been spending part of our vacation with grandpa and grandma, who have a lovely home in the country. I have three very lady aunts, and an Uncle John who is only three years older than myself; he attends a military school, and wears a uniform. I take music lessons, and study French. I am eleven years old. I have an auntie and uncle, who are boarding at a hotel only two blocks from where I live; I frequently take dinner with them, which I enjoy very much. DAISY A. L.

LAVERGNE CROSSING,

As I have been a subscriber to the paper for the last two years, and have enjoyed it very much, I thought I would address you a few lines to give you a few details of our place; it is situated on Bayou Lafourche, and has about two hundred inhabitants. In the summer we have lots of fun, fishing, boating, and have other summer amusements. I enjoy reading your paper very much; my favorite story is "The Opportunity." I send you a receipt of tea-cakes, which are delicious. Fearing that my letter is getting too long, I wish you all a kind good-by.

TEA-CAKES.—Five eggs, one cup of butter, two of sugar, four to thicken, two teaspoonfuls of yeast powder, flavor with vanilla, roll out, and cut; bake in a hot oven.

WASHINGTON, D. C.

I have two sisters, but no brothers. For pets we have a turtle and two foxes. One is a large St. Bernard, whose name is Rex; the other, a little Yorkshire Skye that we have not yet named. We had two alligators, but one was eaten up by rats, and the other died of grief. I send you a picture of a friend of mine with a snake who you will publish. JEANNETTE G. P.

It is very funny to think of an alligator's dying of grief, and I should fancy you a tough morsel for the rats. Thank you for sending your friend's pretty story.

ONE GOOD TURN DESERVES ANOTHER.

It was only a little cottage standing behind a clump of bushes and shrubbery, and surrounded by a low stone wall, that stood in the sun, and sunshine on a beautiful summer's day in the heat of August. The way leading to "Peach Blossom Cottage," as it was called, was through a grove of trees, which hung the delicate grapes as if ready to be plucked. On this day of which I speak a stranger entered the little village, and after brushing away the sweat from his forehead proceeded to seek a place to rest himself from the long and tiresome journey. Glancing at him one would certainly term him a tramp, so shabby and soiled was he, and he had not even one honest article upon him, and found nothing in the way of wooden stools and rustic benches, he almost despaired. With nearly dropping his hat, and with the cane in sight, he "Peach Blossom Cottage"; he could not refrain from stepping over the wall, and seating himself upon an ivy-covered bench, that stood under the shade, he had seated himself when a little child, of perhaps ten years, approached him with tears of sympathy in her soft blue eyes. As soon as she saw that he was in distress, she immediately disappeared with a soft white pillow, which she laid under his head. As the child passed, she turned back, and with a look of grateful spoke volumes of thanks. Presently he fell into a long and refreshing slumber that lasted until midnight, when he was awakened by the loud knock, which came, which clanged, which rang, still night air. He rubbed his eyes and looked around him; then grasping the situation, he ran around to the side wing of the house, which was enveloped in flames. Already a large crowd had collected to note the progress of the flames. And after Farmer Brown, the owner of the cottage, looked around him to see that all was safe, a terrible accident occurred to him. His face grew pale as ashes, as his trembling hands reached the heart of the multitude: "My daughter! my daughter! Oh, where is my daughter?" as his eyes sought the burning building. A ladder was quickly placed against it, and when Farmer Brown offered all his possessions for the recovery of his child, the traveler of the afternoon stepped forward amid the crowd. As he placed his foot firmly upon the ladder, a shout rent the air; the multitude watched with eager eyes as he ascended the ladder and gained the top. All was still as the unknown man disappeared through the window. Once more a shout was raised, twice as noisy as the first, as the man appeared on the top bearing the almost suffocated child in his arms. Just as he reached the ground, and everybody was rejoicing, the ladder caught fire and burned to the ground. Then Farmer Brown offered the money that he had promised to give; but the good stranger answered, as he pursued his way: "Surely one good turn deserves another." SUTRIE PRICE (aged 13 years).

I have two sisters, Emily and Allie, and two brothers, Sam and Charles. We have a very nice cat named Chunkie, which has long and silken fur. My sister Allie received a game of Parchees last week. PARLOR MAGIC.

TO MAKE A CIGAR DANCE ON A HAT.

A HAT is borrowed; likewise a cigar. The performer breathes on the latter to mesmerize it, and declares that when so mesmerized he can compel it to stand upright on the crown of the hat. He endeavors to make it stand up accordingly, at first without success, but presently the cigar does actually stand upright, self-supported, on the crown. At command it will bow to the company, salute the ladies on the right, the ladies on the left, and so on. The performer then asks for a little music, and begins to move the hat about, still crown upward, first in one hand, then in the other. The cigar retains its vertical position, but sways about, sometimes to one side, sometimes the other, as if endeavoring to keep time to the music. At any moment the performer can request a spectator to take the cigar from the hat and to satisfy himself that it is not attached in any way.

The seeming mystery rests on the use of a very simple piece of apparatus—a little rod about the size of a lead-pencil, but rather thicker, of ebony or some other heavy wood, and with a needle-point an inch long projecting from one end of it. The performer gets this inside the hat, and in his pretended efforts to balance the cigar on the hat, pushes the needle-point up through the crown and into the end of the cigar, which thenceforward sticks upright on the point. Any inclination given to the ebony rod within the hat will naturally make the cigar bend in the opposite direction, and so to salute the company, etc.

The hand may now grasp the brim of the hat only, leaving the ebony rod swinging free within the hat; and as it swings it will communicate a swaying motion to the cigar above, as if affected by the music.

When the trick is completed you invite some spectator to take the cigar from the hat. At the same moment that his fingers touch the cigar you withdraw the needle-point from below, when the cigar naturally falls, and nothing whatever remains to indicate the means that supported it. The performer immediately begins to brush the hat with his handkerchief, and under cover of so doing is enabled without difficulty to smuggle away into his sleeve or pocket the little ebony rod.

"FIRSTLING of spring" the ancients called
Our modest primrose dear,
For first among the woodland flowers
It braves th' awakening year.

Firstlings of spring these maidens twain
May we not call, in sooth,
Whose cheeks are rosy, prim their mien?
Their spring-time?—'tis in youth.

A LITTLE MAID OF ROME.

BY MARGARET E. SANGSTER.

SITTING alone on a cheerless day,
 In a winter without a flower,
 The vagrant wings of my fancy stray
 To the dream of a tropic hour
 Broader with bloom and honey-sweet—
 An hour for bee and bird—
 With billows of flowers to bathe my feet,
 By passionate zephyrs stirred,
 Pansies and clover and cyclamen,
 And the spiciest pinks that blow,
 And acres on acres of daisies then—
 Shall be weaving their gold and snow—
 The long lush grass and the poppies red,
 And the roses staining the light,
 And the shy proud girl with the drooping head
 Wooing my pensive sight:
 The beautiful child with the Titian hair
 And the darkly splendid eyes,
 The fairest flower where a host was fair
 Under the Roman walls,
 I dream, to the dash of the frozen rain,
 Of her thrilling voice and clear;
 I dream, and the sleet on the icy pane
 Is the only sound that I hear.
 Acres on acres of purple and white,
 Waves and fringes of bloom,
 Italy's sky in its lucid night
 Flocked by no cloud of doom,
 Away with the breath of the stormy north!
 I am home afar from home,
 And the nut-brown face that has led me forth
 Is the face of a maid of Rome.

THREE RUNAWAY GIRLS.

BY KELVYN GROVE.

"GIRLS, let's seek our fortunes!" This was the startling proposition I made to my two younger sisters one bright spring morning.

"Let's!" eagerly responded the older of the two, a brown-eyed beauty of ten years. "You'll go, won't you, Mynie?" she added, turning toward the youngest of us, the girl baby of the family, who had just reached her eighth birthday.

I was the eldest daughter of a large family, principally boys, and was rapidly approaching the advanced age of twelve. I was known among our neighbors in the dear old town where we then lived as a "tomboy." I was devoted to out-of-door games, and cared little for dolls. I could swing a bat or kick a foot-ball with the biggest of my brothers, and I often rode the horses that grazed along the road-side bare-backed through the town. The good villagers shook their heads at my mad pranks, and said, "That Kel Grove will come to no good." A bad end had been predicted for me when I was scarcely eight years of age, for I was never out of mischief; and I remember once, when I fell down-stairs and cut my lip open, my sister Mildred, who was terrified by my fall and the sight of the blood that flowed from my lip, flew into my mother's room with the exclamation, "Come, mamma, quick; Kel has fallen down-stairs, and says she's killed."

My mother sprang up, pale and frightened, to run to my aid. "It would be a blessing if she was killed," said Aunt Maria, who was sitting by; and my mother did not speak to her for six months.

As far back as I can remember I was possessed with the idea of running away. When I was three years old I escaped from the confines of my father's grounds, and toddled off to the church where my nurse was telling her beads and reading her prayer-book.

"I want my Annie!" I called out from the middle aisle.

The holy father stopped short in the act of crossing himself, and the small boys forgot to swing their censers. "My Annie" recognized the voice crying out in the temple, and blushing to the roots of her hair, she reached out over her pew door, dragged me in, and tucked me under the seat, where I was forced to remain till the long service was ended.

With all my love for out-of-door adventure I was a great reader, and devoured everything that came in my way—The Swiss Family Robinson, Don Juan, Wild Western Scenes, Macanlay's Lays, The Bandit's Bride, Dr. Kane's Arctic Voyages, The Essays of Elia, Hugh Miller's Schools and School-Masters, and fairy tales without end. In most of these books there was a great deal about "seeking fortunes," and I got the idea into my head that fortunes were to be found by those who sought for them. I didn't want to "seek" alone, so I made the proposition to my sisters Mildred and Mynie in the adventure. Mildred, as I have said, had large brown eyes. Their expression was simply angelic, and no one would ever have accused her of having any but the most gentle and domestic of natures. When we played "wolf and lamb" in the room with our elders, Mildred always said, in her mildest voice, "Let me play the lamb." And our elders would look at each other and shake their heads significantly, as if to say, "Such a nature as that will never be able to resist the buffets and blows of this hard world." When we were down in the meadow, or playing together in the woods, Mildred always chose the part of the wolf, my favorite part, and I was the lamb sacrificed on the altar of her strong will. My proposition to seek our fortunes delighted her.

"Let's go right away," she said. "We won't be missed for an hour or two, and we can be miles from home by that time."

"Miles from home!" My heart sank. "Perhaps we'll strike our luck nearer home than that," I ventured.

"Oh, you're a baby!" said Mildred.

"I don't want to go without mamma," Mynie blurted out, half crying.

The idea of telling mamma when we were going to run away struck Mildred and me as very funny, and the woods rang with our laughter. Mynie's feelings were hurt, and she said no more about mamma for the present.

"We must get long sticks and hold them together over our heads while we vow that we will not come back to Birdington until our fortunes are made."

Mildred and I cut the necessary sticks, took the vow most impressively, and started cross-lots for the turnpike. We each took one of Mynie's hands, and encouraged her faltering footsteps along the dusty road.

"How little these people know we are going to seek our fortunes!" I thought, as we passed the neighboring farmers on their way to town; and my heart beat high with the importance of our expedition.

"Ain't you rather fur from hum, little gals?" asked the toll-gate keeper, as he swung the gate open for us.

"We're taking a long walk to-day," I answered, for the party.

He said no more; but when I looked back, as we turned the next bend in the road, I saw him shading his eyes with his big brown hand, and regarding us rather suspiciously.

"If I'd only known what them young rascals was up to," said he, a day or two later, "I'd had them back to their mother'n less than no time."

On and on we walked, too intent upon reaching our imaginary goal to pick the flowers along the highway, or throw stones at the frogs in the pools. We had walked three miles, and were just in sight of the next town, when we heard the rumbling of wheels behind us, and looking around, saw a man driving alone in a four-seated wagon! Here was an opportunity! I was just wondering what was the best way to ask for a drive when Mildred said, in her most irresistible voice, "Man, please give us a ride."

To our no small delight he answered at once, "All right; hop in"; and in we hopped, Mildred and Mynie on the back seat, and I on the front seat with the driver. Here was luck indeed.

"Where are you going?" I asked our new-found friend, "To Freehold," he replied.

"To Freehold?" Inspiring thought! I knew a girl at school who lived in Freehold; we would go and spend the night with her. "How far's Freehold?" I inquired.

"Thirty miles from Birdlington," was the answer.

"Thirty miles!" I repeated, in astonishment.

"Only thirty miles," said Mildred; "that ain't much."

"I want to go home," almost cried Mynie, homesick at the prospect.

"Nonsense!" said Mildred, patting her hand; "don't begin to back down so soon;" and Mynie was quieted for the time, but the expression in her big gray-blue eyes was anything but a happy one. On and on we drove, through towns and villages. Noon-time came, and we were as hungry as hunters. But we had nothing to eat, and no money to buy anything with. We passed an orchard of bright red apples, and the driver stopped his horses while I filled my arms with the fruit. This allayed the cravings of our appetite. I noticed that our driver was very dull; he seemed sleepy, and several times I took the reins and drove, for his head was rolling about, with his chin resting on his shirt front. Finally I made bold to ask him why he was so sleepy, and he told me that he had been up all night, having driven a lady from Long Branch to Birdlington to the bedside of a dying brother. Then he fell asleep again, and again I took the reins.

At last, just as the pine-trees were beginning to cast long shadows across the road, our driver roused himself from his slumbers and said: "This is gittin'-off place, gals; I turn up here; there's Freehold half a mile yonder." I confess that my sensations were not very heroic as I climbed out of that wagon on the outskirts of a strange town, thirty miles from home, and night fast coming on. The responsibility of my sisters weighed upon me too. Mildred seemed plucky enough, but poor little Mynie's face was bathed in tears. We thanked the driver for his kindness, and taking hands, started on our half-mile tramp to the town. The first thing to do was to find out where my school friend lived, and throw ourselves upon her hospitality for the night. A railway station arose before us, and leaving my sisters in the waiting-room, I knocked on the door of the ticket office.

"Come in," said a pleasant voice.

I opened the door and entered.

"Well, little girl, what can I do for you?" asked a black-bearded man in a conductor's cap—the sort that Prussian officers wear, narrow at the band and bulging over at the crown.

"Can you tell me where Mr. James Ennever lives? I know his daughter Sallie, and want to go there," I said.

"Jim Ennever—I reckon I do; but you can't get there to-night; he lives five miles from here, on the Long Branch pike."

"Five miles!" I gasped. "Is there no way of getting there?"

"No; not until to-morrow morning."

All my heroism deserted me when I heard this awful truth. I thought of my mother at home, and of the two children in the waiting-room, and I put my hands over my eyes and cried hot tears of regret and apprehension.

"What is the matter, child?" said the kind-hearted ticket-seller. "Tell me; perhaps I can help you," and he patted me on the head.

It was some time before I could get control of myself. When I had succeeded in doing so I told him, in broken voice, of the adventures of the day—how we had started out in such high spirits to seek our fortunes, and how they had proved a mere will-o'-the-wisp. He asked me my name, and where I had come from, and seeing no good in concealment, I told him that my name was Kelyyn Grove, and that my sisters were in the waiting-room.

"Is your father the Rev. Henry Grove?"

"Yes," I exclaimed, delightedly; "do you know him?"

"I can't say I know him, but I've heard him preach many a time, and a good preacher he is, too. Where is your father now, sis?"

"He's in the army," I answered; and I had visions of his expressive countenance when he should learn of this, my last adventure.

"Well, just you make yourselves comfortable; I ain't going to see your father's children wandering around this town all night, nor housed in the lock-up neither. You stay out there with your sisters, and I'll run home and tell my wife to fix up a place and keep you till morning; then I'll send you home on the early train." With this he started off, and I rejoined my sisters. Mynie was still crying gently, and Mildred was trying to cheer her. I told them of my interview, and that the ticket-seller had promised to keep us all night. It was nearly night then; the sun had gone down, but it was still light enough to see out-of-door objects distinctly. I remembered having read terrible tales of child-stealing, and the misfortunes that had befallen unprotected children. Suppose this man wanted to entice us to his house to murder us? Perhaps he had gone home to adjust the closing walls of a bedroom, or the top of a bed that would screw down in the night and smother all three of us; for I was determined that we should not part company. These thoughts took such possession of me that I said: "Girls, I think the best thing we can do is to try to get home. There's the railroad track. Let's start right off and run before he gets back."

Little Mynie wiped away her tears at the thought of getting home, and even plucky Mildred's face brightened at the suggestion. So off we started down the railroad track as fast as our weary legs could carry us. Sometime in our travels Mynie had lost her hat, and as she was now bareheaded, her brown hair streamed in the wind as we ran. We had not gone more than a quarter of a mile or so when I looked behind us and saw the ticket-seller coming full tilt after us. As we hurried on we came up with a respectable old colored woman, with a turban on her head and a basket of clothes on her arm, walking along with a friend. Almost breathless, I ran to her, and gasped, "When that man catches up to us, say we are going with you, that you know us, and are going to keep us all night." I had hardly given these instructions before the man was upon us.

"Well, you are a nice lot of young colts!" said he, panting.

"What do you want with them gals anyhow?" said the quick-witted old colored woman. "They're friends of mine, and I'm going to take them home with me. Who are you, anyway, chasin' a parcel of young gals like that?"

"I am the ticket-seller and conductor of this branch road, and my name is George Compton," he replied, in a slightly hurt tone of voice.

"George Compton! Well, Lor' bless my soul—George Compton! Ha! ha! ha! 'pon my word! G'long with him, gals; he's all right. I done his washin' when he was a young man, afore he raised that beard, and he always paid his bills. G'long with him, gals; he won't do you no harm." And she walked off, chuckling to herself at the thought of doubting the goodness of a man who paid his wash-woman's bills.

"My wife's expecting you. She's got everything ready. Why, look at that child without her hat!" he exclaimed, noticing Mynie's bareheaded condition for the first time. "She'll take her death of cold." And he took the conductor's cap from his own head and put it on hers, and taking her hand, trudged back along the track, with Mildred and me close behind him. Tragic as this adventure seemed to us, neither Mildred nor I could help laughing at Mynie's appearance with the conductor's cap on her small head. She was completely lost in it. It fell over her eyes in front, and touched her shoulders in the rear; and to see at all she had to throw her head as far back as it would go without breaking her neck.

When we arrived at Mr. Compton's house we found that his kind wife had everything prepared for us. A hearty supper was waiting for our eager appetites to dispose of. After supper we sat out on the front steps with the family, and all the village came up to have a sight of the runaways. They expected to find us in tears, instead of which we had a fit of giggling—probably a reaction from the strain we had undergone. The immediate cause, however, was a telegram which Mr. Compton had sent to our mother, and which he read to us before despatching:

"Mrs. Grove, your children air safe in Freehold. Will be home by early train."

We had never heard are called air before, and we almost laughed in the good man's face.

When bed-time came we were given a hall room, for the three of us insisted upon sleeping together, though it was only a single bed. It was little sleep we got that night, we had so much to talk about. How well I remember that room! The next morning we were given a good breakfast, and sent off in the early train, of which Mr. Compton was the conductor. In the mean time he had bought a Shaker sun-bonnet for Mymie, which she wouldn't wear, because it had no cape. He brought the materials for making one, but sewing having been a neglected branch of my education, I could not put it on. There were few people in the train, but those few came into our ear and stared at us as though we were the wild men of Borneo. We did not mind their scrutiny, however, for it made us feel that we were of some account, after all, even if we had come home with our fortunes still to seek.

Never, if I live to be threescore years and ten, shall I forget the face of my aunt Maria as we stepped from the car upon the platform at Birdlington. Our mother was prostrated by the excitement she had gone through, and could not leave her bed; so Aunt Maria had come to meet us. I had my head out of the car window as we slowed up at the station, and I could see her wringing her hands and pacing the platform in nervous anxiety lest by some accident we should not be aboard; but no sooner did she see us alive and well than her whole expression changed.

"Hello, aunt!" said I, in my most unconcerned and reassuring tones.

"Your wicked children! your poor mother!" said she, giving my arm a grip, and totally ignoring my salute. "Come with me," and she dragged me along with one hand and my two sisters with the other. I saw that she was in a frame of mind not to be trifled with, and I also saw that the news of our adventure had reached the town; for we were being gazed upon with curious, twinkling eyes. "Let us go up Main Street, aunt," I said, for I saw that the town had turned out to meet us.

"Up Main Street, indeed! I'll not be disgraced by having you seen in Main Street. Up the back street you'll march this day!" And there was no appeal. The people in the back street must have expected us to come that way, for windows were thrown open and heads thrust out on every side.

I will not attempt to describe the meeting with our mother. Our conduct had caused her one of the most awful anxieties of her life. Her sense of duty overcame her first impulse to forgive everything in the satisfaction of having us safely back again. She did forgive Mildred, and of course Mymie. I, being the oldest, was made the scape-goat. I had to stay in my bedroom for a week, and was at first threatened with a bread-and-water diet; but my mother feared the effects of this regimen upon my healthy young appetite, and I was fed from the family table. No one was allowed to visit me except my young brother, who had gone out with the "three months" or "emergency" men, and who had just returned home. An exception was made in his favor; but my only other companionship was had by hanging out of the window and calling to the girls as they played in the grove below. I felt that the hand of justice had not held the scales when my punishment was dealt out; but I had plenty of time for reflection during my imprisonment, and I came to one solemn conclusion, which was that fortunes are not always to be had for the seeking.

CHAPTER IX.

THE SEARCH.

THE experience of the first day showed Jerry that New York was a better market for music than New Orleans, although they were by no means loaded down with pennies when they returned to their lodging-house.

Billy represented to his new friends that they would reap a much greater harvest in the evening, and urged that, after getting supper, they try their fortunes in a different portion of the city, where he was sure they would get "a pile of money." Jerry would have been only too well pleased to have gone out again that night, but Pete complained of being weary, and wanted to go to bed. Late in the afternoon Jerry had noticed that his friend played in a listless, mechanical sort of way, much as if it was an exertion for him to lift the bow, and he had been alarmed; for never before had he seen Pete play when it was other than a pleasure to him. On being questioned as to the reason of his singular manner, the little fellow said that the wound on his head which had been inflicted by Mr. Harding was very painful, and that he felt tired.

* Begun in No. 336, HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE.

The only grain of comfort that Jerry had that night, after Pete had complained of the pain in his head, was that the little musician ate a very hearty supper, and he reasoned that the food would make him better by morning.

"You've been walking around a good deal to-day," he said, as he helped the little fellow into bed, and sat down by his side; "that's what's making you feel bad. Tomorrow we'll take it easier, and then you'll be all right. We must go to a different part of the city every day, so's to stand more of a chance of seeing your aunt; and I tell you square, Pete, I believe we'll find her before long. While Abe was talking to me I got kind o' discouraged about it, but now the thing looks different."

"Don't let's talk any more to-night, Jerry," said Pete. "You come to bed, and in the morning you can tell me all about it, for I'll be better then."

On awakening next morning Jerry appeared to think he had grossly neglected his friend by going to sleep first, and he scolded himself so much that Pete felt it his duty to interfere.

"You couldn't help yourself, 'cause you were so tired, Jerry, and it's wrong for you to say that you don't look out for me enough. You couldn't do any more if you were twice as large. Suppose you had staid awake, what could you have done? My head ached pretty hard, but that was all."

"Now see here, old fellow, you stay right where you are, and I'll get you a good breakfast. Then I'll kind o' look round for some odd jobs, and by to-morrow you'll feel all right again."

Pete would not listen to the suggestion for a single moment; he had no idea of being treated as an invalid, and he was eager to do his share toward earning money. He was far from feeling well; but he hoped he would grow better in the open air, and it was useless for Jerry to propose anything which would prevent him from doing his full share of the work.

"All right, Pete," said Jerry, cheerily; "you shall come along; but if you don't begin to feel better pretty quick, we'll start back, whether you want to or not. We can afford a swell breakfast, and it will do you good."

"We'll get to work as soon as we can," Jerry said to Pete as they left the house. "Of course we sha'n't pick up much money so early; but if your aunt goes in the street at all, it must be in the morning, and we'll be out so's to catch her."

"What bothers me is how we're going to know her when we see her; and a look of perplexity came over Pete's face.

"I've got a sure way to find out," said Jerry, triumphantly. "While you're playing, if you see anybody you think might be your aunt, you wink at me, and I'll call out 'Aunt Nannette' as loud as I can. If she jumps, it'll be her, and if she don't, we can wait for another."

"But you might be singing when you ought to holler."

"That don't make any difference; I can stop just as well as not, and most folks had rather hear me holler than sing."

"That isn't so, Jerry," said Pete, indignantly, "for you know that it's mighty few fellows that can sing as well as you, and I'm sure as much as half the money we get comes because of you."

"Look here, old man, there's no use for you and me saying things to make each other feel good. I know how much I do and how much you do toward earning the money, so that settles it."

"But, Jerry—"

"Don't say another word, Pete, or you'll get me so I'll want to go right off and hire out to some opery, and then we'd be in a scrape. If you can make people believe I sing, it's all right; but I know better."

It was yet quite early in the morning when the boys were ready to begin the labors of the day, and in the absence of Billy they were forced to walk at random, trusting that they might by chance arrive at some neighborhood where the people were musically inclined. Both the boys had looked carefully at each woman they passed; but there was no occasion for either to call Aunt Nannette's name until, when they were in the midst of the first song, Pete winked in a most violent manner. An elderly lady had just passed, and there was no question but that, to the little musician, she resembled his idea of his aunt.

Jerry did not hesitate; but, as if his cry were a portion of the song, he shrieked, "Aunt Nannette!" to the great surprise of the listeners, as well as the one addressed.

"Mercy on us! how that boy startled me!" said the old lady as she stopped, turned around, and looked over the tops of her glasses in mingled amazement and anger.

"That's her! that's her!" cried Jerry, in delight, as he started at full speed toward the woman, and the spectators wondered what had caused such a sudden and singular pause in the song.

"We've come 'way up from New Orleans to find you," said Jerry, breathlessly, as he stood in front of the astonished lady, and beckoned vigorously for Pete to join him. "It's lucky we thought of hollering, or you'd have gone right by without knowing we were here."

"Why, what ails the boy?" asked the old lady, peering over her glasses, first at Jerry, and then at Pete. "What on earth possessed you to travel so far for the sake of seeing me?"

"It wasn't me that wanted to see you; it was Pete. He's been 'most crazy to find you ever since his mother died."

"Bless me! But what did he want to find me for?" and the old lady's astonishment was very comical.

"Are you my aunt Nannette?" asked Pete, who had just arrived on the scene, and who stood looking at the woman much as if he was expecting that she would clasp him in her arms at once.

The astonished woman looked over her glasses at Pete intently, the expression of her face changing from that of startled benevolence to injured innocence.

"Can it be possible," she exclaimed, with both hands uplifted, while she gave Jerry the benefit of a withering glance—"can it be possible that even the children in this wicked city conspire to insult the stranger? You are so young, that it is hard to believe you are so wicked."

Pete looked at Jerry and Jerry looked at Pete in the most profound amazement. If they had startled and surprised the old lady a few moments before, she had certainly done the same by them now, for they were actually bewildered, and could do no more than gaze at each other as if they had really been detected in wrong-doing.

"Josiah told me to beware of folks that would claim to be some relation of mine," she continued, regarding the boys with a look that was growing more stern and reproachful each instant, "but I never believed that the children were so wicked."

The old lady raised her hands as if calling down some dire punishment upon the whole city, and then, after casting one more sternly reproachful look at the two bewildered boys, she walked rapidly on, leaving them gazing at each other almost stupidly.

"Well," said Jerry, with a long-drawn sigh of relief, some moments after, "she couldn't a been your aunt Nannette; but if she wasn't, what made her turn around when I hollered?"

"What do you suppose she meant by our being wicked?" and Pete looked about him as if he doubted whether he had understood the woman correctly.

"I declare I don't know," replied Jerry, wiping the perspiration from his forehead. "I tell you what it is, old man, it won't do for us to go 'round hollering Aunt Nannette any more, or we'll get ourselves in a row."

The little musician was only too glad to leave the place, for he could see by the faces of those around him that all thought he and Jerry had given the old lady just cause for anger, and, with the tears of vexation filling his eyes, he hurried away with his friend, slackening his pace only when he was several blocks from where the singular encounter had taken place. Then the boys sat on the curbstone to discuss the matter, but before either could say a word Master Chick appeared in sight.

"Where have you been?" he cried, while he was yet some distance away. "I thought you were going to wait till I got back, and I hurried as fast as ever I could. What have you been doing?"

"We've been getting into a row; that's what we've been doing," said Jerry, angrily; and then, as Billy plied him with questions, he told the whole story, concluding by saying, "I can't make out what the matter was with her, 'less she was crazy, for we never said a single word of sass to her."

"If that's all you said, I don't see what made her fly up so, 'less she was crazy. Perhaps she'd just run away from the Island, and thought you were after her."

"No, I'm 'most sure that wasn't it," Jerry replied. "Anyway, it won't do for us to holler at another one."

"Then how can we find her?" asked Pete, mournfully.

"You might get a big card to wear around your neck, and have painted on it that you wanted to find your aunt," said Billy, fully convinced that his idea was a brilliant one. "Then if she should see you, she'd come right up and speak."

"I don't believe that would do at all," and Jerry looked at his friend to see what he thought of the proposition.

Pete shook his head. He objected to such a public exhibition of his troubles, and the look of distress on his face deepened into one of positive illness as he thought of his lonely position. This show of suffering seemed to quicken Jerry's ideas, for he said, in a tone of triumph:

"I know how we'll fix it: we'll go somewhere else to give a concert, and after I get through singing I'll ask for money; then I'll tell everybody who we're hunting for, and most likely we'll find out something that way."

Pete looked so much relieved by this proposition that Jerry was convinced he had hit upon the right plan at last, and was eager to put it into operation as soon as possible. Billy, however, did not regard it with favor; he had decided to abandon the newspaper business, and become a regular member of Jerry's party, acting as solicitor; but if some one else should ask for pennies he would become a mere hanger-on.

"That would take too long," he said, decidedly, "and you wouldn't earn money enough in all day to get one square dinner."

"But you and I can both go round asking the same thing, and then we'll get done quicker. If Pete is willing, we'll give you one cent out of every four we get. I don't think it would be fair to give any more, 'cause, you see, it's all along of Pete's playing that any money comes in."

Pete was perfectly satisfied to divide the receipts in any way Jerry thought best, and Master Chick willingly accepted the proposition, which gave him one-quarter of the amount received. Billy was quite as positive as he had been on the day previous that he could lead the party to a portion of the city where they would be well received, and as it was necessary to walk quite a distance in order to reach what he thought was the proper place, Pete was nearly exhausted by the time Master Chick gave the word that the concert might be opened.

"You're feeling worse, Pete, and I'm going to say right up and down that you sha'n't fiddle any more to-day;" and Jerry looked at his friend anxiously.

"I have to keep out, Jerry," pleaded the little fellow. "You know we're trying to find Aunt Nannette, and I must do all I can. When we've found her once, I'll stay in the house as long as you think best."

Jerry knew from his friend's pale face that he ought to be anywhere else rather than in the street playing on his violin; but it was impossible, or at least he thought it was, for him to say absolutely that Pete should not do as he wished, and he very reluctantly gave the word for him to commence playing.

Before the first song was concluded they were surrounded by a large crowd of children, while at nearly every window in the vicinity could be seen listeners of an older growth, all evidently well pleased with the music. Master Chick, without waiting for Jerry, had started out in quest of money and information, and, as the musicians could see, was kindly received by those to whom he told Pete's story. The women not only gave him a goodly number of pennies, but appeared to take an especial interest in the boys, each one doing her best to remember some person by the name of Nannette.

At the third attempt they saw a gleam of hope.

Billy had started out as before, and he had not spoken with more than a dozen women when he came back to his friends at full speed, his mouth wide open, and his face fairly radiant with delight.

"We've found her! we've found her!" he cried, gleefully; "and some of them folks have gone to bring her down."

"Where is she?" exclaimed Pete, as he started forward, excitedly; but Jerry, who remembered the previous disappointments, did not allow himself to show any joy over the supposed discovery.

"She lives up on the third story of that house there," said Master Chick, as he pointed to a tall building a short distance away. "Some of them folks said there was a French woman by the name of Nannette in the building, and you want to run right over before she gets away."

"Come on!" shouted Jerry. "If she ain't your aunt, she may know something about her."

Pete, his violin held almost carelessly under his left arm, followed Jerry and Billy without a word, but with a look of anxious expectancy on his face which pained Jerry, for he feared the effect of another disappointment.

By the time the boys arrived at the steps of the house, the woman who had acted as messenger returned, followed by a pleasant-faced French lady, who was so neat in attire and so motherly in her ways that Jerry hoped most fervently this might be the one of whom they were in search.

"She hasn't got a sister in this country, and never had," the woman said, as she stepped aside to let the old lady speak for herself, while the look of blank dismay that came upon the faces of the boys was painful to see.

"Tell me what your name is, my poor little man," said the old lady, with a decided French accent, as she took Pete's hands in her own, and looked kindly into his face. "I have no nephew in this part of the world, but perhaps I may be able to help you find your aunt."

Pete told his story, sobbing now and then when he spoke of the death of his parents, and when he had finished, the woman drew him closer to her, as she said:

"I fear me much, my poor little motherless one, that you will never find your aunt by asking from door to door, for the city is large and your body weak. Why do you not advertise for her in the French newspapers? If you have not the money, I can spare it from my small hoard, for surely it will be lending to the Lord."

"We've got a good deal of money," said Jerry, quickly, feeling that he would like to kiss the old lady because of her kindness to Pete, "and if we haven't enough, we'll soon earn it."

"I will write a letter that the editors of the papers may read, and perhaps they may be more interested in the case if one who is older says a word in your behalf."

Then the old lady insisted on taking all three of the boys with her upstairs, for she said she wanted to give Pete some cordial that had been sent her from "la belle France."

She ushered the boys into a room whose poverty of furniture was lost sight of in the perfect cleanliness everywhere, and making up a bed on the lounge, insisted that Pete should lie down. She gave him the cordial she had promised, spread a lunch for Billy and Jerry, and then sat down to write to the editor.

"You will bring little Pete each day to see me," she said to Jerry when she had finished and given him the letter, "and you will not allow him to stand on the streets too long at a time, for he is not strong enough to endure the fatigue."

"If I'd had my way, he shouldn't have come out to-day," said Jerry, feeling almost as if the old lady blamed him because Pete had been working when it was only too evident that he was ill. "I tried to make him stay in the house this morning; but I'm glad now that he didn't, even if he is sick, for if he had he wouldn't have seen you, and I know you've done him lots of good just by talking to him."

"He shall come every day, and I will be glad to see him, because he is a poor little French boy," said the old lady, as she kissed Pete in a tender, motherly fashion. "You may go now, but you must return to me on the morrow."

Then the boys left the house, Jerry regretting deeply that it was necessary for Pete to go, and started for the newspaper offices to try this new plan for finding Aunt Nannette.

LOST DOGS

SOME HINTS ON LAWN-TENNIS.

BY HOWARD A. TAYLOR.

"THAT game isn't worth much!" exclaimed an old gentleman while watching the Newport Tournament a couple of years ago. "I don't see the fun in batting a soft ball back and forth over that net." He touched unconsciously on the very point where lawn-tennis differs from all other sports. The game must be played well, or its pleasures are lost completely. Indeed, "batting a ball over a net" affords very slender amusement. So in laying before the readers of HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE some difficulties that beset one of their number in learning to play, a few years ago, it should be said to them at the same time that unless they have done or intend to do more than simply "bat a ball," their attention were better directed to some game either easier to master, or pleasanter to be played with a "duffer's" skill.

My first attempt at lawn-tennis was unfortunately in the implements of warfare. Some one had given me as a Christmas present a peculiar racket, warranted to "cut" every ball. Of course I felt bound to put all Christmas presents to use, and so, buying a cheap net and some variegated colored balls, I set about the game. But this memory is here set down simply as a warning. Nothing could have been more unfortunate than my first investments. The racket, net, and balls should always be perfectly plain, though made of the best materials, and absolutely in accord with the rules of the game. Cheap tennis articles are worse than useless, and each article should be selected separately, and not bought in what are known as "tennis sets."

It is well to buy the balls adopted for the year by the National Association, and a plain white net of the full length, forty-two feet. Great pains should always be taken to keep the entire net at exactly the right height, as any change materially alters the possibilities of the game. The racket should be as heavy as the wrist will easily swing—say twelve or thirteen ounces for a boy of that number of years. No racket should be too heavy to be swung with ease by the hand holding it at the tip end of the handle, the correct place of grasp, except when volleying close to the net. In the latter case it is not a bad plan to allow the hand to slip down three or four inches toward the neck of the racket.

The dry preliminaries, then, passed successfully—they might be summed up in the words "the best or not at all"—the game itself comes in question. Its rules and methods of play can be found in any book of sports, nor is there any need to comment on them further than to say that they should be strictly observed. Once engaged in the game, the first effort of a beginner should be to attain a graceful style of play. Not that grace is to be desired for the benefit of the spectators, but simply for that of the player himself. Any departure from the natural, easy swing of the racket prevents its striking the ball either fairly or with full momentum. A forced way of playing, moreover, gives rise to a "cut" or "twist," and this result is now, I believe, universally admitted to be bad, as affecting both the aim and the strength of the stroke. The chief obstacle in the way of grace is usually the elbow.

Now that member of the body should be kept as much out of the way as possible. In the forehanded strokes it should remain practically rigid, the momentum of the stroke, except when of the hardest, being gathered entirely from the wrist. In the backhanded strokes many young players, and old ones too, have the bad habit of, as it were, pushing with the elbow, giving the appearance of a desire to return the ball by means of it instead of that more natural aid, the racket. Play from the elbow, or in any manner but with a supple wrist, forbids all accuracy of "placing." Again, the natural idea of striking at the ball wherever one happens to meet it is inconsistent with graceful play. The better plan is to avoid so far as possible all strokes not made with a perpendicular swing of the racket, and this can easily be done by bringing the body close beside the point where the ball is to be struck, and then waiting until the ball almost meets the ground for the second bound. Greater accuracy is thus attained.

Grace, then, being the first general accomplishment to be acquired, the next comes somewhat in company. It is always well "to take it easy." And there are a good many ways of doing this. It is not taking it easy when a young player, often, perhaps, for the benefit of the spectators, attempts a harder stroke than is necessary. For instance, my opponent, aged fourteen, and in his first tournament, is close to the net. I have perhaps been compelled to send the ball straight to him and from the back part of my court. With an old player, there would be no mercy for me, nor doubt of the result. The ball would drop, perhaps gently, into some part of my court, but surely beyond my reach. Yet with an inexperienced player there is hope. His racket is elevated for a huge "smash," and the ball—unless the fiction of a "hole in his racket" becomes a reality—is sent back at lightning speed. "How is that, Mr. Umpire?" "Out by six inches." Such a play as that—entirely suicidal—is inexcusable. If, again, a new player is in too great a hurry to end the rally, he is not taking it easy. It is a frequent practice of our American champion, Mr. Sears, to return the ball seven and eight times with the simple intention of waiting his opportunity. Of course he does not yield an advantage to his opponent, rather returning the ball just within his reach. Finally the easy chance comes, and the ball is "killed" with no trouble at all.

But chiefly does the beginner fail to take it easy by running around the court too much. Every stroke should be played with the intention of compelling the opponent, if he returns the ball at all, to return it to a certain part of the first player's court. It behooves this first player then to go to that part of his court and await the arrival of the ball. If the ball gets there ahead of him, it resembles too closely boarding a train after it has started. Occasionally, to use a bit of tennis slang, he will get "wofully left," but that is preferable to the will-o'-the-wisp method of play that otherwise follows.

Having, then, given due attention to grace and ease, the young player is usually puzzled to find out where that position is which he is to occupy so easily and gracefully. All tennis men agree that there is some correct position for every stage of the rally, and all differ just as much as to what that position is. Recommendations on this point are therefore simply personal opinions. Going over the various methods in vogue, there comes first to mind the man, usually six feet in height, and with arms in proportion, who immediately upon serving or returning the service makes a wild dive for the net, prepared to do or die on that spot. New players especially are likely to meet him, as, after all, his style is only one of bluff. A cool head and attention to accuracy, not speed, soon overcomes him. Then there is the opposite class, men who work entirely from the base line, returning the most difficult strokes, playing a fine defensive game, and yet surprised at their want of success.

In my own play I have endeavored to strike a mean between these methods. If I can drive my opponent back in his court, I will go up to the net in mine, but if he has the same advantage over me, I do not choose to make the second bantam rooster of the party, and peg away at him from short range in an utterly brainless fashion, trusting entirely to luck. The only use of this method consists in the possibility that it will "break up" an opponent whom I know to be naturally my superior. It seems better to fall back for the time, and later try to regain the lost ground. I always keep a distance of the half court (about forty feet) between an opponent and myself, endeavoring at the same time to allow the space to be mostly on his ground.

But the first stroke of this paper game has been a long time in coming. My reader, however, has not told me that his opponent was ready. I can't wait any longer, and so must occupy that position myself till he comes. The balls are on my side of the net, and so I might as well serve. "Fault one." There is no use of comment on that stroke, as the serve always was beyond my comprehension. No sooner does it seem to come in perfection than it vanishes entirely. It is a fickle friend, and should never be relied upon for help in a difficult pass.

The ball should be struck as high above the ground as possible, nor should it drop into the opponent's court too near the net—a frequent error in the second serve. Above all, let no one make two faults. You return my service, probably by sending it, not too high, and yet reasonably above the net, down one of the side lines—the straight return is easier to make or to gauge than the one across court—and the ball strikes about a yard from the base line and a foot from the side line in one corner of my court. Such a first return should be practised again and again, as it is always effective. I trust, however, you did not send it back too swiftly, as that would be of no advantage to you, and would possibly at once send the ball out of court. If your stroke was a good one, you can get close up to the net and hold me at a disadvantage. If I "lob" the ball—always a babyish play—I am forced to do it too quickly. I shall probably try to "pass" you on either side. The ball won't come back very swiftly, nor possibly beyond your reach. The contest then turns into an endeavor on either side to take the offensive without too much risk. Finally there is an error. The ball comes full and fair at the racket. One return, not too swift, but well placed, and the point is won. But your opponent is coming, and I must go along, after one more word.

So far as practising itself is concerned, there should be just such an amount of it as sustains the interest in the game. If the real "tennis fever" is upon a person, he can play all day. But it is well to stop short the minute the game palls, or the hand becomes "stale." A rest of four days every month of the summer never does any harm.

The demands of space have obliged me to leave many points entirely untouched in the game, and to hint simply at others. But this article is only intended to be suggestive, and aims at pointing out the large field of work into which that peculiarity of tennis, head-play, can enter. Without it no one can hope to succeed. I may therefore as well close with six little rules in regard to head-work in the game that will perhaps aid some of my readers in a close struggle. They all point to the one fact that no player can succeed without an always earnest method in both practice and match.

1. Lay out your plan of play before every contest, taking into account, if possible, the known methods of play of your particular antagonist, and marshalling your resources of offence and defence in distinct order, each to be used in case of failure of the previous ones. Never be obstinate in your style of play during a match if unsuccessful, but change immediately.

2. Play every stroke with a definite purpose, keeping in mind the state of the game and your opponent, and lay out the extent of the risks you will take accordingly.

3. Consider speed as always second to accuracy, and never rely on it except to overwhelm an inferior player.

4. Remember distinctly that the game is only won or lost on the last stroke. Your opponent is liable to "lose his head" at any moment before that.

5. Unfailing courtesy of play is the best method of bothering an opponent and keeping your own wits entire.

6. Above all, never enter a game simply to do your best, but always to win. A wholesome amount of self-confidence, rightly used, is half the battle.

MIGRATIONS OF FISHES.

BY SARAH COOPER.

THE curious habit possessed by some animals of moving in companies from one place to another at certain seasons of the year is spoken of as "migration." We are probably familiar with the migrations of birds, but many kinds of fishes yield to the same instinct, and their migrations are closely connected with the production of their eggs.

A good illustration is furnished by cod, mackerel, and herring, all of which select shallow water near the coast for depositing their eggs, and approach the shore for this purpose in enormous shoals, or schools, as they are called. In these migrations the fishes are crowded so close together as almost to force each other out of the water, and they are pursued by many birds and marine animals, in their efforts to escape from which they are often washed ashore in masses.

The arrival of these schools upon the coasts causes busy, bustling times among the fishermen, whose boats may then be seen hovering over them like great flocks of seabirds, anxious to catch all they can while the harvest lasts. Mackerel fishing is thought to be fine sport, and is performed under full sail. The faster the boat moves, the better the mackerel bite. They rush after the bait as if mistaking it for escaping prey, and as the boat glides through the great shoals of fish, all hands on board are kept busy hauling in the lines and putting on fresh bait.

The migrations of salmon are especially interesting. These fishes, although hatched in fresh-water, pass the greater part of their lives in the ocean, and at certain seasons they ascend the rivers in large companies to deposit their eggs. It is believed that they return year after year to the same locality, so the baby salmon are raised in the old home of their parents, who, nevertheless, have become in the mean time great rovers.

Young salmon cannot live in salt-water, consequently the eggs must be placed where there is little danger of the young fishes drifting out to sea, and upon these journeys the impulse of the parents is so strong to reach the source of the river that they seem determined to overcome all obstacles. They even leap the water-falls, and in doing this they display great perseverance. In leaping they throw the body into a curve, resting on the head and tail; they then make a sudden spring, which is greatly aided by the pressure of the tail upon the water. The first attempt is often unsuccessful, and they fall perhaps upon the rocks or upon the bank of the river; not discouraged by the failure, they struggle back to the water and try again.

It is now customary to place fish-stairs where there is a water-fall or a dam too high for the salmon to mount. These consist of a series of steps made of wood or stone, which divide the height into a succession of small falls. The salmon soon learn to leap from one step to another, and in this way they reach the top without difficulty.

Salmon, it is said, have a leader on these journeys, and follow him in regular order. Having arrived at some suitable place, they hollow out nests in the bottom of the stream, and deposit their eggs, covering them with gravel, and then taking no further care of them.

These fishes eat little or nothing while in fresh-water, and they reach the spawning-ground bruised and exhausted by the hardships they have endured. They therefore rest for a while after the spawning process, which occupies eight or ten days, and then eagerly return to the sea.

The eggs left under the gravel finally hatch out, and the young fishes work their way slowly down the river, to make their first visit to the sea. These fishes increase but little in size while in fresh-water, whereas in the ocean the rapidity of their growth is almost incredible.

Salmon are remarkably graceful fishes, and their tapering shape is well suited to rapid motion (Fig. 1). Their bluish-gray color shades into a silvery white underneath, and the upper part of the body is marked with black spots. As the breeding season approaches, they not only grow brilliant in color, but a change much more remarkable than this takes place in the mouth of the males. The underjaw forms itself into a strong hook, which is used in the fierce combats between the males at that season, often inflicting deadly wounds.

Some of the British and Norwegian rivers contain celebrated salmon leaps, and they are visited by many persons who enjoy the sport of salmon fishing. The proper time for catching these fishes is when they ascend the rivers to spawn, for they are lean and poor on their return to the sea. At this time, however, they are ravenously hungry, and prove a serious annoyance to anglers, whose artificial flies are designed to attract only the good fishes fresh from the ocean. Salmon are also caught with nets and weirs, and with the spear.

Much attention has recently been paid to the cultivation of fishes, which is merely the revival of an old art. A "fish farm" consists of a set of troughs, standing each one a little higher than the next in the series, with fresh water constantly flowing through them. In these troughs fish eggs are hatched by artificial methods, and when the young fishes have grown to a suitable size, they are successfully planted in our rivers and streams.

Very unlike the graceful creatures we have been examining are those tyrants of the ocean, the sharks, which are by far the largest and strongest of the fishes. The stout body is well shown in the picture (Fig. 2), and you must not fail to notice how odd the tail is. The top point is much longer than the lower one, whereas the tails of most fishes nowadays are even. Sharks have several other peculiarities which cause them to be classed with an ancient race of fishes, few of which are now living. Their skeletons do not consist of bone, but of hard gristle. Instead of a scaly covering, their skin is set with hard knobs, and those slits on the side of the neck take the place of gills.

The mouth, you see, is on the under side of the head, and, in consequence of this arrangement, sharks are usually obliged to turn over before biting. A savage-looking mouth it is, too, with several rows of sharp teeth pointing backward. These teeth are never fixed in sockets, however, but are merely imbedded in the lining of the mouth.

The female shark lays but two eggs, which are enclosed in leathery purse-shaped cases. The four corners of the case are lengthened into tendrils, which, becoming entangled in sea-weed, hold the egg in place. Part of the case has been removed from the egg which is shown in Fig. 3 that we may see, within, the young fish with the yolk-bag attached to it. The empty black cases of sharks' eggs are often picked up on the sea-shore, and the sand which rattles out of the hollow case may assure you that its former occupant has already escaped.

THE REVOLT OF THE FLOWERS.

BY MARY E. VANDYNE.

SPRING awoke one morning,
And, rambling through her bowers,
Found the air was soft and warm,
And summoned up the flowers.

"No, no," cried the Snow-drop,
"My winter couch is warm;
'Neath the turf I'd rather stop
Than risk a wild March storm."
She was followed by Arbutus,
Who cried, "It's jolly here;
I'm sure 't would never suit us,
'That world so cold and drear."

"Oh no," piped little Daisy,
"I do not want to go;
It may be I am lazy,
But I love my warm bed so."
"You're right," cried little Violet;
"The wind is from the north:
We'd better wait a while yet
Before we venture forth."

And so with smiles and laughter
They hid their dainty heads,
And lugged themselves the closer
Within their mossy beds.
In June they all came smiling,
Those lazy little flowers;

But I think no earthly blossoms
Ever passed such wretched hours.

The Roses and the Lilies
Were there in stately bloom;
They filled the air with beauty,
And shed their rich perfume.
The Daisy and the Violet
Could scarcely find a place;
None cared for poor Arbutus,
Nor wished to see her face.

What value had the Snow-drop
Within that gay parterre
Where Summer brought her treasures
Of blossoms rich and rare?

They faded and they languished
And soon were glad to die,
For no one seemed to see them,
But idly passed them by.

And yet these tiny flowerets
Had each its tender grace,
Had it but fulfilled its mission
In nature's time and place.

MORAL.

Now do not skip my moral,
But learn from these poor flowers.
It is well to do our duty
In the appointed days and hours.

Eight O'clock.

 The Sun in the Sky
Is not yet high,
And the Grasses are wet by the Pool.
With hop and jump,
By Hedge and Stump,
The Children are going to School.

OUR POST-OFFICE BOX.

EVERETT, NEW YORK.

DEAR POSTMISTRESS.—This is the second year that we have taken HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE. We are two sisters—one nearly eight years old and the other six and a half. We have a little brother who will be four in August, and we had a dear little baby sister who would have been two years old to-day, but she has gone to live with Jesus. Our only pet is our dog Ned, who follows us everywhere. Every summer we go to our cottage on Lake Kenka, and we stay until after the grapes are ripe. We cannot take our doll's house with us, as it is larger than any of mamma's trunks. We started our morning-glories and sweet-peas in the house, planting them in baskets which we kept in the sunny nursery window. They came up beautifully, and we have sent the baskets to our summer house to have the young plants set out in our flower beds. We are going to try and sell flower seeds, so that we can earn pennies to give to some poor children. We always want to hear the letters read in baskets when our paper comes. We have not been to school lately, for Louise has been sick a long time, and Marjorie did not like to go alone.

LOUISE AND MARJORIE S.

We are cousins, and very, very dear friends, so we thought we would write a letter together. We are very fond of playing with paper dolls, and will tell your readers how to make a nice house for them. Take box covers (handkerchief boxes are nice), use some colored paper for carpets, and make your furniture of calling cards, or anything stiff enough to stand when four legs are cut. If you have an old fashion catalogue you can cut fancy things such as clocks, pictures, looking-glasses) to put on your fireplaces, and for pillows for our beds we use lace mats and all the fancy things we can find. Each child can have a good many dresses, as we have all the dolls of a size for one person. After the house is all finished it is great fun to play with it. I hope if any of the children try this play they will write a letter and tell us how they succeeded, and if they like it. We each have a tricycle, and ride a lot of miles. I may have a pet bird. I Carolina have two cats, one named Billwink and the other White.

MAY AND CAROLINE.

BOZEMAN, MONTANA.

This is my second letter to the Post-office Box; the first was not printed, but mamma encouraged me to write again, as I am so anxious to see one in print. I am a little girl eleven years old, and was born in Texas. I have not lived here very long. The mountains around this little valley are beautiful, I think, and on the foot-hills there are such lovely wild flowers, so I keep every vase I can find full all the time, as mamma and I are fond of them. I have only been to school one term here, but have been promoted twice, and am now in the grammar department. School was out yesterday, we had exercises, and I spoke, and sang two songs. I am going to visit my grandma next month, and I live near Chicago, and expect to have a happy time. I wrote to Mrs. Mackern, in Ireland, who asked for a correspondence in the Post-office Box, but have not received an answer. I have only two pets here, a dog named Jip and a bird named Birdie. Birdie I have a Maltese kitty named Muggins and a dog named Dolly as my grandma's. We found my dog Jip outside the door one morning; his feet were all ice, and he was covered with frost.

We took him in to warm, and then he made me go away, because he would not go, so we kept him. My bird is so cunning; we hang a little looking-glass behind his cage, and when he sees himself he thinks it is another bird, and talks to it all the time, and one day he tried to build a nest. I have taken lessons on the violin for four years, and I like to embroider, and I have made three "crazy" chair cushions, two sofa pillows, and one Afghan; and I have a doll's carriage. I have no brothers or sisters, so I have to play by myself a good deal, but I have so many toys that I don't get very bored. My teacher W. received three chocolate caramels, and they proved very good. Every time my paper comes, the first thing I do is to look for your picture in the Post-office Box. I have taken HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE, and I watch very anxiously every week for its coming.

META B.

HIVOT PARK, ILLINOIS.

My eyes are so weak that I cannot go to school, nor even read, but I get grandma to read HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE and St. Nicholas to me as soon as they come. We have four little kittens just a month old, whose mother left them a week ago, and we are trying to bring them up.

AMY F. P.

I hope you may succeed.

JAMESTOWN, NEW YORK.

As I have never seen a letter from Jamestown, I thought I would write. I have a little brother and a sister. Did any of the readers of HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE ever see a nest of little birds? Two years ago mamma raised two broods of birds. They look very queer with no feathers, and when the mother bird comes and they stretch out their long necks and get the food. We have a Young Men's Christian Association here. I like to read the letters in the Post-office Box ever so much.

BESSIE B.

SHERIDAN, NEW YORK.

I live in a picturesque little town on Lake Erie, not very far from Chautauque, the noted summer resort. I have taken HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE from the first number, and I think it is a very nice paper. I have no sisters, and only one little brother. Formerly I have two pets, one named Budgie. My favorite authors are Louisa M. Alcott, Lucy C. Lillie, and James Otis. I have an uncle who is a sailor; he is captain of the largest wooden boat on fresh water. My brother has a cream-colored mouse with red eyes.

ALICE M. R.

ROCKFORD, NEW YORK.

DEAR POSTMISTRESS.—This is the first year I have taken this nice paper; a kind friend once gave it to me. I had very much interested in the story of "Silent Pete," and I wonder if you wonder if Pete will find his aunt Nannette. I went to the country with papa the Friday before Easter, and there found nine little kittens. I am very fond of pets, and have had quite a number. The first was a pet lamb which my uncle gave me; it followed me all over, but it did not follow me to school, like Mary's lamb, for at that time I was too small to go. I am getting on very nicely in my studies. I like to write compositions very much; I also take music lessons. This is my first letter to you, and I very much hope to see it in the Post-office Box. With love from your little eleven-year-old friend.

PEARL VAN W.

BALTIMORE, MARYLAND.

I am a little girl nine years old. I have one brother and no sisters. My brother has been taking HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE for a good while, but we always wanted to see one together, but I have not had a chance. I have no pets, but I had a kitten named Pete, but she ran away one night.

M. W.

BALTIMORE, MARYLAND.

We have been disappointed, because we were going to get a kitten. We were going to the Park to spend the day, but it rained so we could not go; there were three boys of my age.

W. W.

RAVENSWOOD, MISSOURI.

I am a boy ten years old. I go to school, and study reading, spelling, arithmetic, and geography. I have taken HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE a short time, but I am very much interested in it. This is my first letter to the Post-office Box. I hope it will be published.

GLEN S.

ALBANY, NEW YORK.

I live in Albany, and think it a very pleasant city. We have a small park, but a pretty one; the school is opposite it, and we sometimes pick donations to trim our hats with. The grass is just covered with them. I have two little kittens, and I don't know what to name them. Would somebody please send me some suggestions? I belong to a club. We meet at each other's houses. I have taken HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE since the first number. My favorite authors are Miss Alcott and Mrs. Lillie. M. F. S.

SHELBYVILLE, INDIANA.

DEAR POSTMISTRESS.—As I have not seen any letters from Shelbyville, I thought I would write one. For pets I have a bird and a cat. I am ten years old. I have not had a chance to see HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE, but my papa taught me this winter. I tried the breakfast rolls, and they were splendid. I received a letter from you, and I am very glad to see me in the stamp. I should like to correspond with some little girl of my age, or a little older. I like HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE very much, but have only taken it fourteen weeks.

NORA S. M.

NEW YORK CITY.

I am a deaf and dumb boy. My school is called the Institution for the deaf and dumb in this city. I will tell you what my studies are. They are Goodrich's Child's History of the United States, Mitchell's First Lessons in Geography, Day's Grammar, Whitney's Penmanship, and model-letters. My mother buys HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE. I like it very much. My mother mailed it for me to the Institution every Friday or Saturday. When I read the letters to the Post-office Box I thought I would write one too. When I grow to be a big boy I am going to be a printer, and make books.

JAMES T.

I am very glad that HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE adds to your pleasures.

ROMA, PENNSYLVANIA.

DEAR POSTMISTRESS.—I have been here in Rome for nearly two months, and live in the "Dome." Our apartment is on the Spanish Steps, which are very long and broad, like old palace stairs. There are always a great many men of all kinds and ages, waiting on the steps to be taken to be painted by some artist. They are all dressed in the style of the old-time peasants, so that they are very picturesque and pretty. The beggars here are something dreadful! Most of the little children are sent out carrying a baby in their arms, who, as one of our Roman friends told us, is hired from poor people, and so has a certain amount of money monthly for the use of the baby. They are drugged, so as to be kept quiet. Is not it dreadful? The other day I saw a man who was named the Mamertine in prison. It is a place where St. Peter was said to have been imprisoned, and one is shown the impression made by his head when once he was thrown violently against the wall, and the nose, eyes, and ears can be plainly traced. There is a little well here that one is also shown, and our guide told us that it is said that when St. Peter was here he wished to baptize the prisoners, but that he had no water, and that then this spring came up for his head when once he was thrown into the well. I have seen the statue of Pompey, under which Caesar was said to have been killed. The face looks very cruel, and I do not like it at all. Like the Italians ever so much. Do you know they play a game besides, the language is so beautiful it is very pleasant to hear them speak, the more so because they all have such lovely voices. I have seen the hands of the prince, as well as the little prince, the Principe, as they call him. My mamma was presented to them, and then she went to the court ball. We have Italian servants, and they are so funny. Our man-servant was much amused at us when we tried to speak Italian to him, and all dinner-time he would suggest that he could hardly do so in twelve years old. M. S. B.

ORANGE, NEW JERSEY.

I was very much pleased to see that Adie had tried my receipt, and still more so to know that she liked it. Thank you very much, Adie, for wishing I could have been with you when you made it. It was, indeed, very provoking about caramels. I should much like to see you, for I am sure we would be very good friends at once. How old are you? and are you light or dark? I am so glad spring is here, for I do so love to watch the trees bud out, and to see how rapidly the grass and flowers grow. Dear Postmistress, you seem such a sweet, kind lady that I will give you a puzzle to raise the puzzle-mistress in this week's paper. I send you a puzzle, and if this fails well, I may send a "pi" some time. FANSY.

Thanks for the puzzle.

WILMINGTON, VERMONT.

DEAR POSTMISTRESS,—My home is in Vermont, although I was born in Italy, and have lived in America three years. A kind lady sends me HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE, which I enjoy very much. It is a beautiful place, and of a great resort for invalids on account of the boiling springs. We have a beautiful park here, with a pond and swans, and very nice gardens, and the magnolia-trees are in blossom, and the band plays every afternoon. On my brother's birthday we visited the Emperor's palace, which is very beautiful. We had to put on cloth slippers when we stepped upon the floor, which is in some rooms inlaid with mother-of-pearl, and the walls are covered with brocade and satin. There are perfect lawns, tennis tables, and all the most pleasant day my governess and I walked to Sonnenburg, a little German village where are the ruins of an old castle standing on a hill, part of it covered with ivy. I go to the school here to study German, and study English, French, and music at home. This is the first effort of a little girl nine years old, which if you think is good enough, it would please her greatly to have printed in the Post-office Box. ELSE H. O.

THE MEADOWS, LAWRENCE, NEW JERSEY.

DEAR POSTMISTRESS,—As the wild flowers grow in such profusion at Lakewood, and so many city children never see them, I think it would be well to send some to St. Mary's Free Hospital. How do I send them to you? I wish to thank you. Your constant reader, ELEANOR A. F.

Send them by the nearest express company, if you wish to be very welcome. I intend to ask Aunt Edna or Sister Catherine to send you all the letter, telling us about the present occupant of Harper's Young People's Cot, and I have no doubt one of the ladies will do so soon.

HOT SPRING, ARIZONA.

DEAR POSTMISTRESS,—I am very intimate with cats, and understand them as well as you do children, so when Dodee confided to me that he wished me to write a letter to you, I thought I knew exactly what he wanted to say, and it is all true I assure you. JULIA A. S.

Thank you for sending Dodee's letter.

I am a very beautiful white and yellow cat. I like kittens, for my mistress loves cats. Sometimes she calls me "an exquisite lamb"; but that is silly, for a cat is much nicer than a lamb. My name is Dodee; it comes from the Hebrew, and means "my love." I read HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE every week—that is, I look at the pictures. I notice you put in a great many pictures of dogs. I do not approve of that. No well-regulated newspaper should ever admit a dog's picture.

Last winter I had a friend named Julius Caesar. He was a yellow cat just my age, and he came to see me every day. We had fine times playing together, until he "disappeared." Where do you suppose went? My mistress said it was a way cats had. It think it a very silly way. I shall never "disappear," I am sure. I went to Julius Caesar's head and neck, and looked at it, and I could not find him. I was very lonesome for a time, until I found where Kitty Grey had hidden her kittens. Then I brought them out to play with me. I have a very nice boy named Pansy, as him Augustus. Another one she named Pansy, because she said it looked like a pansy. That is silly also; why should a cat look like a pansy? I am getting very tired of the kittens now. They are getting so fat they can hardly get up. Think of it!—my beautiful tail, which no one is allowed to touch! Was it not saucy? I boxed her ears well.

Please print my letter; and don't put in any more dog pictures. DODEE.

NOTTINGHAM, ENGLAND.

DEAR POSTMISTRESS,—I go to school, and study reading, writing, arithmetic, geography, history, grammar, spelling, dictation, and drawing. I go to Sunday-school. We have had a service of song called the "River Singers." We are having a good time some articles to the Sunday schoolers' stall. My brother and I are very fond of cricket. We pretend to play matches; we call ourselves after the manner of the boys who play at foot-ball in the winter; when I play I generally get a kick on the leg. There is a splendid castle in Nottingham, upon a high rock. There are hundreds of caves under the town, and passages leading to the castle. It was once burned down by a mob; my grandma remembers it. It is now a splendid having pictures, armor, and all sorts of musical things in to look at. My school-master is an artist, and sends pictures there. It is near to Standard Hill, the place where the first railway was raised to the top of the garden of my own. I am going to plant vegetables in it. I think it will be a pleasant way of passing away my spare moments. JOHN J. D.

WALTER GOODWIN S. (aged 9 years).

NEWBERG, NEW YORK.

I am thirteen years old, and am in the Fifth Reader. I study Latin, and am just beginning to study short-hand. I have been taking HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE for about a year, and am going to take HARPER'S for 1884 out of the Free Library; the boys who have had that volume say it is very nice, and very easy to read, and very handy to which you can go and read almost any book you like. The Library has all the volumes of YOUNG PEOPLE from 1881. I have read them all, and I like them very much. I have a garden of my own. I am going to plant vegetables in it. I think it will be a pleasant way of passing away my spare moments. JOHN J. D.

THE RIDING CAT.

I am only a little boy. I have a nice cat, and my sister has one too. One day my cat was sleeping on my father's horse, when it began rearing and jumping, and my cat did not care a bit. It was very nice, and I liked it very much to see it sleep again. ARTHUR P. (aged 8½ years).

ROYALTON, VERMONT.

I have a good aunt, who lives on a farm about a mile from our pretty little village of Roydon. She has two kinds of pets. One is a canary-bird that hangs in its cage and sings on the piazza. She has, besides, two cats. She has no children, and all these pretty creatures are very dear to her. One day the bird got out of the cage, and it was gone two weeks before it was caught and brought back to her home, and then the bird was brought back. She saw it often hopping and twittering in the trees, and hung out cages with other birds in them, but it would not come. One afternoon it was in the garden where she went, and her two cats went with her, and seemed almost as anxious to get the bird as she was. Perhaps you think that was natural in a cat, but what a nuisance! It was getting dark, and she returned to the house without her bird, and she returned in despair. She had not been in the house but a few minutes when her cats came, and one of them had her bird in its mouth. She gave it up, and not a feather of its little body was injured, and pussy seemed just as happy as her mistress. This really happened just as I have described it, last fall, when the weather was fine. The bird still lives, and every day I take from our pretty little village of Roydon. DEAR POSTMISTRESS,—We have just moved to the city, and I have a very nice boy named Pansy, as him Augustus. Another one she named Pansy, because she said it looked like a pansy. That is silly also; why should a cat look like a pansy? I Tiger. We were so fond of him we could not leave him behind, so I carried him along in a basket. At nearly every station when the cars stopped, he would call to know if we were still near. A word seemed to satisfy him, and he was quiet until the next stop, if it wasn't too far. After reaching the new house he was put down in the cellar, and refused to show himself for a long time. Now he is quite at home, and goes in all the rooms just as if he had lived here all his life. ALFRED E. P.

A TOTAL LOSS.

"Hi! whar dat cent done gone what I had in my pocket?"

CHASED BY A SHARK.

TELL you what, you musn't try swimming round the ship before breakfast in these waters. That sort of thing was all very well when we were lying in the Mediterranean or the Bitter Lake (midway along the Suez Canal); "but down here, off the coast of Arabia, there's a lot of things about, that p'raps you've heard of, called sharks, and if you go swimming where there's any of them on the lookout, you'll find yourself in twenty paces before you can sing out 'Help!'"

When my friend Captain D— spoke thus, we were lying at anchor off the Arabian port of Koomiddah (several hundred miles down the eastern side of the Red Sea), at which we had just landed a detachment of Turkish soldiers sent to assist in putting down a rebellion among the Arabs of Yemen.

It was a dismal scene. On one side of us lay a wide waste of dark waters, which was fast melting into the deepening gloom of night; on the other, the gray unending level of the great

Arabian desert stretched bare and lifeless down to the very brink of the sea, broken only by the low white wall of the Turkish fort, and the tiny Arab huts that swarmed around it like flies around a piece of meat.

"I hope we sha'n't remain here long," thought I, "for it doesn't seem to be a nice place at all."

However, we did remain there for eleven days, awaiting a convoy of wounded Turks whom we were to carry back to Constantinople; and many a time during that long and weary halt did I feel tempted to disregard the Captain's warning, and have a good swim—sharks or no sharks—in the clear cool water, which glistened and sparkled in a way that was very inviting, with the thermometer at 125° in the shade.

Our biggest quarter-boat had been left towing astern, filled with water up to the very thwarts, in order to keep the hot sun from splitting the wood; so here was a salt-water bath ready-made, in which I took a dip every morning. But, unluckily, it was not big enough for a swim, and so on the ninth day—forgetting that when a fat Turkish officer was not to be had the Arabian sharks might think even an English newspaper correspondent better than nothing—I leaped out of the boat, and swam backward and forward alongside of the steamer.

It was deliciously cool in the shadow of the vessel, and I was just enjoying myself to the utmost, when a sudden shadow ditted athwart the green sunny water, and my heart seemed to stand still as I saw gliding toward me a huge, dark, misshapen, hideous thing, with the pointed back fin and underhung jaw of a shark.

The monster was between me and the stern, and my only chance was to make for the anchor chain at the bow. But just as I struck out toward it there came a fierce rush through the calm water, and I had barely time to dart aside, when the terrible jaws gushed together close to me.

Again the shark rushed at me, and again I avoided him only just in time. But for what I had learned from the Arab divers, this story would never have been told. But the last turn had brought me up close to the steamer's bow, and almost within arm's-length of the anchor chain.

Another moment and I should have been safe; but just as I extended my hand to clutch the chain, the shark came at me once more, with the huge fangs in his open jaws glittering like two rows of spikes through the clear bright water.

I shut my eyes, expecting every instant the crunch of the cruel teeth through my flesh, and wondering how it would feel to be bitten in two. But instead of that there came a hoarse shout from above, a tremendous splash from below, and then the sea was lashed into foam, as if beaten with a paddle-wheel, while a gruff voice cried, "Quick, now, or he'll have you yet!"

Our English engineer had hit the monster on the nose (the most sensitive spot in a shark) with a heavy lump of coal, stunning him just for one moment. And that moment saved my life.

I flew up the chain quicker than I had ever mounted rope or chain in my life, and scrambled in over the bows just in time to find myself face to face with the big engineer.

"Look'ee here, young chap," said he; "when you first came aboard I thought you were a fool, and now I'm sure of it."

"Shoo! shoo!! shoo!!!"

SILENT PETE; OR, THE STOWAWAYS.*

CHAPTER X.

PETE'S ILLNESS.

BILLY was the only one of the party who was not in the best of spirits at the prospect of finding Aunt Namette very soon. It is not right to say that he hoped Pete would not find her, but he felt sad to think that he would no longer be a member of a musical firm if the little violinist should go with his aunt. He led the way to the newspaper office with the greatest alacrity, and advised Jerry as to the best way to get an interview with the editor personally.

Jerry found that it was not an easy matter to get a personal interview with the editor. The clerks in the office tried to persuade him to transact his business with them; but he was so persistent that he was finally allowed to go into the editorial rooms, although Pete and Billy were obliged to remain down-stairs, or on the sidewalk, as they chose.

There was no question as to whether the editor was busy, as Jerry could see; but after reading the letter hurriedly, he asked for the particulars of the case, and Jerry told him the whole story, concluding by saying:

"If you'll only let me bring Pete up here you'll see what a poor little lonesome fellow he is, and you can't help doing something for him. We ain't asking you to print it for nothing, 'cause we've got a right smart o' money, and will pay every cent just to find Aunt Namette."

The editor declined a personal interview with Pete, because of the many and more pressing demands upon his time; but he promised to publish a brief account of the little musician, and to try to induce other editors to do the same. He refused, however, to accept any money, and, after telling Jerry to call at the business office each day and inquire if there was a letter for Pete Marquand, the interview was at an end.

Pete and Billy were on the sidewalk when Jerry came out, looking triumphantly happy, and Master Chick asked,

"Is he going to print it for you?"

"He'll do everything he can, and he won't charge a cent. I tell you what it is, Pete, we're striking lots of friends up here, and it'll be kind o' queer if between 'em all we don't come out all right."

"Now we're going home," Jerry said, decidedly. "We've earned a good bit of money this forenoon, and Pete's got to lie down. It's no use for you to say a word, old man," he added, as the little musician began to remonstrate; "I'm going to have my way now. The old French lady said you hadn't ought to stay out very long, and I'm going to do pretty near as she thinks best. If you feel well to-night, we'll try it for an hour or two; but that's all."

Billy was particularly displeased that Jerry should be, as he believed, foolishly careful of Pete, and he did not hesitate to say very nearly what he thought.

"Of course it don't make much if any difference to me whether you stay out or go into the house, 'cause I can sell papers any time; but the first day you were here you said so much about having to earn money that I made up my mind as how you wanted to keep round just as much as you could."

"So we do want to earn money," said Jerry; "but when he don't look fit to be out, why, then I wouldn't go if I never saw another cent."

This decided Billy in forming his estimate of Jerry's

character, and he told his intimate friend that afternoon that "the New Orleans fellow wasn't any good nohow."

Although Pete had attempted to remonstrate against spending the remainder of the day in idleness, it was evident that repose was very grateful to him, for he went to bed immediately on entering the room, and showed a decided disinclination to talk, even though Jerry did his best to amuse him by telling stories.

"My head aches," was all he would say, when questioned as to how he felt; and before an hour had passed it was apparent, even to Jerry's inexperienced eyes, that he was very ill.

"Tell me what to do for you, old man," cried Jerry, anxiously. "What do you want me to get? tell me, Pete, for it makes me feel awful bad to see you looking so sick."

"Just let me stay here; that's all I want."

Jerry was in the greatest distress of mind; he knew that his friend was very ill, and he could form no idea as to what he should do to relieve him. It was while he was sitting by the bedside, with the tears very near his eyelids, trying to think what could be done, that Master Chick entered the room.

"I didn't know but what you might want to go out to-night, so I thought I'd come up to see."

As a matter of fact, Billy had made the visit in the hope that Jerry would reconsider his determination to keep Pete in the house all day, and that he could persuade him to go to work then.

"Pete's terrible sick," Jerry said, in a low whisper, as he pointed toward the bed; and Billy was actually startled as he noted the change that had come over the little musician since morning. "I don't dare to leave him alone, and I want to find the cook of the Clio. Will you stop here with Pete till I get back?"

"Of course I will," replied Billy, promptly; and then, as he remembered the purpose of his visit, he added, "If I'd 'a known he was so sick I wouldn't 'a said a word about his going to work."

"You see you haven't been round with him as much as I have, so you couldn't tell how bad he was."

"Has he been looking like that very long?" and Billy's voice was lowered to the faintest of whispers.

"Pretty near ever since we came in. Now I'll go to find Abe, and I won't be a great while."

He had the card Abe had given him, but he had not thought to ask Master Chick in which direction he should go, therefore he lost some time after he came out of the house in inquiring the way. Through the aid of a policeman and two boys he succeeded in finding the office of the owners of the Clio. Here it was some time before the clerks would pay any attention to the poorly clad boy who appeared to be in a great hurry; but after waiting what seemed to Jerry to be at least an hour, although it was really not more than ten minutes, one of the fashionably dressed young men condescended to ask him what he wanted.

"Where does Abe Green live, who was cook on the Clio?" "Do you suppose we have nothing to do but keep a record of where all the sailors in our employ live?"

"But he told me to come here when I wanted to know where he was," persisted Jerry.

"Well, you've come, and now all you have to do is to go away again," said the fellow, laughing.

"If you won't answer that question, will you tell me where Captain Sproul lives?"

"Oh, get away from here, or I'll throw you into the street," replied the clerk, angrily, not even turning his head; but before Jerry could obey, had he been so disposed, an elderly gentleman, who had just entered the office, asked him what he wanted.

Jerry replied that he had come to find the address of the cook of the Clio, and that it was very important he should see him as soon as possible.

* Begun in No. 336, HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE.

"We intend to know where each person in our employ lives," said the old gentleman, loud enough for all in the office to hear him, "and we expect that the young men here will give to any one who calls such information as may be at their command. Mr. Easton," he added, gravely, "you can ask some of your fellow-clerks where the book of seamen's addresses is kept, and after you have found it you will be able to give this boy the information he desires."

Mr. Easton was the clerk who had tried to be witty at Jerry's expense, and his face was very red as he wrote on a slip of paper Abe Green's address, handing it to the boy without a word of comment.

"Thank you, sir," Jerry said, to the old gentleman, and then he hurried away at full speed, for it seemed to him as if it had been hours since he left Pete.

Abe's boarding-house was very much like hundreds of others that may be found in New York. A short, stout, red-faced man, with the shortest and blackest of clay pipes held between his teeth, presented himself as the proprietor of the establishment. In reply to the hurried question as to Abe's whereabouts, he asked, with great deliberation and evidently quite as much curiosity:

"Were you sent here to get him to ship?"

"No; I just wanted to see him a minute."

"I didn't know but somebody sent you here to tell him of a berth; but he's just gone over to Brooklyn to look at a craft that I guess he'll fancy."

"Over to Brooklyn?" repeated Jerry, in dismay. "When will he come back?"

"I can't answer that question, mate, 'cause you see there's never no telling how long Abe will stay when once he gets out. Want to see him pretty bad, don't yer?"

"Indeed I do. Pete is real sick, and I must find him right away."

"Pete? And who may he be?"

"Abe will know when you tell him; he's a boy that came up from New Orleans on the Clio."

"Oh, is that all?" and the man appeared to be very much disappointed to learn that the matter was of no more importance. "Well, you'd better write a letter so he'll get it when he comes in, for I wouldn't want to agree to remember what you told me."

It was not an easy task for Jerry to write even a short letter; in fact, he rather doubted his ability to make himself understood. But after twenty minutes of hard work, during which time he had bitten his tongue until it was sore, he succeeded in producing this rather curious epistle:

"DEER ABE.—Pete is orful sick up at our rom, wich is in a house on Dunbar Street, wich the number is 64. Will u kum rite up & tell me what to do?"

"J. HICKS (I am Jerry, u not.)"

"Will you give this to Abe just as soon as he comes in?" he asked of the lodging-house proprietor as he returned the pencil he had borrowed, and handed the man the letter he had written after so much labor.

"Well, now, you see, I wouldn't want to promise I'd do it, 'cause I have so much on my mind with getting berths for my lodgers, and one thing and another, that I couldn't be depended on for a little thing like that."

"But this is something that must be attended to just as soon as Abe comes in, and he'd raise an awful row if he didn't get it the first thing."

"Then all the more reason why I shouldn't take it. Put Abe's name on the outside, and tack it up on the door. He'll be sure to run afoul of it. You'll find some tacks in that there little box on the desk."

Leaving the lodging-house, Jerry started at full speed for Dunbar Street, stopping on the way only long enough to buy some things which he thought might tempt Pete's appetite. The little invalid was lying on the bed, looking utterly helpless, when Jerry entered the room, but he tried to smile amid the pain as a greeting to his friend.

"Do you feel any worse?" Jerry asked, anxiously.

"I don't believe I do. If it wasn't for the awful ache in my head I'd be all right."

"Abe will be up here pretty soon, and he can tell us what to do for you," said Jerry, with a very poor attempt at cheerfulness. "I've brought some things I thought you might want, and just as likely as not some of them will stop the pain."

Then Jerry took from his pockets two sour-balls, a very green apple, three ginger cakes, and a pint of pea-nuts, laying them on the bed in tempting array, much as if he fully expected Pete would immediately begin the feast.

"Why didn't you get some oranges?" asked Master Chick, as he eyed the ginger cakes enviously.

"'Cause he had plenty of them at home. I allow he'll like the apple best, though the candy looks to me as if it would be about as good as anything for him."

Strangely enough, Pete did not care for any of the delicacies; he turned away, after thanking Jerry for bringing them, much as if even the sight was disagreeable.

"Can't you eat just a little bit?" pleaded Jerry.

"I don't feel like it," was Pete's reply. "All I want is to stay still."

"I expect that's about all he does want," said Billy. "I thought it might make him feel better to play a game of mumblety-peg, but he wouldn't."

Jerry was at a loss to know what to do. There could be no question but that Pete was very sick; but since he refused nuts, cakes, candy, or apples, his friend had not the slightest idea as to what should be done; and he said, after a long pause, "We'll wait till Abe comes. He'll be sure to go to that house pretty soon, and then he'll start for here right away."

The hours passed slowly on until sunset, and yet Abe had not come. Pete was apparently neither better nor worse than he had been when Jerry left him with Billy. In answer to the questions asked of him, he still complained of his head, and could not be persuaded to do otherwise than remain perfectly quiet.

"I tell you what," Jerry said, as the shadows of the coming night began to fall, and he had decided in his own mind that Abe would not be there till morning: "one of us could go up to that old French lady's house. If we told her how sick Pete is, she might send him some of her cordial, that did him so much good this morning."

"I'll go," said Billy, quickly. "I guess he'd rather have you stay with him than me, and perhaps you couldn't find the place."

"All right; get back as soon as you can. And say, won't the woman what runs the house let us have a lamp or something, so's we can see what we're about?"

"No, sir. Tom Bristow and I asked her when we wanted to have a kind of party in our room, and she said she didn't have no lodgers what couldn't go to bed in the dark. But it wouldn't take me more'n two shakes to get a candle for you; there's a store just round the corner where they sell two short ones for three cents."

"Well, you'd better buy a couple. Here's the money. But don't be gone long, 'cause the sooner you get the cordial for Pete, the sooner he'll feel better."

Billy brought the candles with a quickness that was very creditable in a boy who had eaten as much as he, and after he helped Jerry fasten one down with melted tallow to the wash-stand, he started at full speed for the French woman and the cordial.

During the next half-hour not a word was spoken in the room. Pete lay as if half asleep, and Jerry remained perfectly still, lest he should disturb him. The candle spluttered and smoked as if in protest at not being snuffed, while the noises that arose from the street made the loneliness of the sick chamber all the more apparent.

It was when Jerry had begun to wonder why Billy did not return that a voice was heard in the hall, shouting, in no gentle tones:

"Ahoy, you stowaways! where have you come to an anchor? Bowse out here, my hearties!"

It was Abe, who was evidently trying to appear as if he was a full fledged sailor instead of only a cook. Whether or no he succeeded in seeming what he was not, he caused Pete to awaken with a start, and Jerry ran to the door at once in order to prevent a repetition of the deafening call.

"So you hired a room, after all, did you?" Abe asked, as he accepted Jerry's invitation to "come that way."
"But what was it you tried to write about Pete? He ain't no'n under the weather a little, is he?"

"I'll be well in the morning, Abe," Pete said, in low, weak tones that caused the cook to look in surprise toward the bed; for not even when he was in the boat, after having been injured on the wreck, had the little musician's voice sounded so feeble.

"Hold the candle here, Jerry, and let's look at our little fiddler. He don't seem to pipe up very strong; but I guess he's all right, just as he says he is."

Abe had been a trifle boisterous until he could see the sick boy's face, and then his manner changed at once. Jerry saw that the cook believed Pete was very ill, and a feeling of bitter despair came into his heart. After asking how Pete had been taken sick, what had been done for him, and how long he had been in bed, Abe said: "He's got to have a doctor, of course, and he ought to be taken away from here. This room is as close and stuffy as the forepeak you stowed away in, and he needs pure air, with not too much of the sun. But where to take him beats me."

"Here's the cordial," cried Billy, as he burst into the room, and seeing a stranger, would have drawn back had he not been prevented by Jerry, who said:

"This is Abe; so you needn't be afraid. Did the woman say anything?"

"Yes; she wants you to bring Pete up to her house to-morrow morning. She says it won't ever do for him to be sick with nobody but boys to take care of him."

"She's a good, sensible woman when she says that," interrupted Abe. "Who is she?"

Jerry told him how they had met the old French lady, and what she had already done for Pete; and when he concluded the story, Abe said, decidedly:

"That's the very place for him, so we needn't bother any longer. You'd like to go, wouldn't you, Pete?"

"I think she would make me feel better if I was at her house; but I don't want to go unless I can have Jerry with me," replied the little fellow, as he clasped Abe's hand.

"Of course you can have Jerry," said the cook, quickly. "You can have anything you want, if I have to mortgage three years' wages to get it. Now what about this 'ere cordial?"

"It made him feel better before, and it's all we've got to give him," said Jerry, as he passed the bottle to the cook.

"It smells good enough to make 'most anybody well; so take hold here, lad, and down with a good swig." As he spoke, Abe raised Pete with one hand, and with the other put the bottle to his lips, nearly strangling him in his desire to help him.

After that the two boys and the cook sat by the side of Pete's bed, talking of the wreck, of New Orleans, or of the voyage of the stowaways, while every now and then the sick boy would join in the conversation; and each time he did so Jerry's heart was gladdened, for he fully believed the cordial was restoring him to health.

It was not until very late that Abe left the house; and before he did so it was arranged that he should come early next morning to superintend the removal of Pete. Billy went to his room at the same time as the cook took his departure, and Jerry was left alone to watch by the side of the boy to whom he had been such a faithful friend.

PELICAN TAKING A NEAL.
PIKE CAUGHT BY GOOSE.

SOME CURIOUS FISHERMEN.

BY CHARLES FREDERICK HOLDER.

SOME time ago a gentleman was wandering along one of the many small lakes that form a characteristic feature of certain portions of England, when he saw a large goose fluttering toward him, creating a great disturbance on the smooth water. When he first observed the bird it was well out in the lake, some distance from shore, but by the time he reached the water it came fluttering and hissing up the bank, continuing its flight over the grass, and, to the astonishment of the observer, dragging quite a large pike after it, that danced about as if objecting decidedly to such an unceremonious landing. The gentleman was about to follow the pair, when a party of boys appeared, flushed from a hard run, and claimed the goose and fish on the ground that the goose was their property, and had been fished for them. "We use her to catch pike," said the spokesman of the party, "and it's very easy when you know how. You see," he continued, "we first catch the goose, and that's the hardest part, and then you take a fish line about eight feet long, fasten a baited hook or a spoon to it, and tie it to the leg of the goose, and let her go. She takes to the water, you see, and drags the line, and in a few moments, if it's the right time, you'll see her coming in just as you did now. You see, the pike gets hooked, jerks her leg, and of course she starts for shore and drags the pike up on the green."

This curious and laughable method of catching fish is not confined to geese or to England, many different birds in various parts of the world being utilized in a similar way. Some years ago I had an acquaintance on the shores of the Gulf of Mexico, near Yucatan, who, not averse to having things made as easy as possible, be thought him that the pelican could be used to reduce the time expended in what he termed labor. It happened that he had several tame pelicans, long-necked, huge-pouched, asthmatic-voiced fellows, and one of these, named Jack, he selected to experiment with. He had nailed a piece of plank to his cabin, so that it extended out six or seven feet, and on this the tame pelicans roosted at night, and elapped their bills during the day, and every morning at about six they could be seen flying away to the adjoining reef to obtain their breakfast, which consisted of small sardines. It happened that these little fishes, also called "hard-heads," were very choice bait, and much esteemed by my acquaintance, but difficult to catch, so he devised the following plan to obtain bait and make the pelicans earn their own living.

Overnight he fastened about the narrow neck of the pelican Jack a leather strap, and arose early the next morning to watch the success of his ruse. The birds started out as usual, and soon Jack dived into the water, and a moment later rose triumphant with its pouch filled with struggling sardines. The bird tossed its head to swallow, but the strap prevented. Again and again the puzzled bird essayed to enjoy the results of its capture, but finally gave it up and flew ashore, and alighted on its roost, still carrying the load, that was there relieved by the owner.

When the first Europeans went among the natives of the islands about Cuba, they found a remarkable method of turtle catching in vogue. This consisted in using a fish known to science now as the remora; its common name is the sucker, or sucking fish, from a remarkable disk or sucking plate upon the head. Upon examination it resembles somewhat the Venetian blind, consisting of a series of seeming slats. I have often seen the fish make use of it on a shark, and its sole purpose seemed to be to enable the fish to rest. They are social in their habits, and are always found following some larger fish. Usually they follow along, their dark forms presenting a striking contrast against the dun-colored shark; but if tired, or if the shark is hooked, they immediately reverse sides, and fasten their disk upon their great companion, and are thus towed along without the slightest exertion on their part.

When a native turtle went out fishing he took, instead of the peg in use on the Florida reef, a pail of remoras, each of which had a leather ring about its tail. To this was fastened a long line about as stout as an ordinary cod line. The canoe or boat was slowly and carefully sculled along until a sleeping turtle was espied upon the bottom, upon which the remoras, two or three, depending upon the size of the turtle, were dropped overboard. At first they would perhaps swim wildly about, at loss without some protector, but very soon they would discover the turtle, dart toward him, and fasten their plates to his shell. Perhaps this would not awaken him, as it is a very quiet operation, but a tug at the strings would surely arouse him, and with a rush he is at the surface, takes a quick breath, catches a glimpse of the canoe, and is off like an arrow. The natives now would throw over the line, gradually putting a strain on it, and in a very few moments the canoe would be rushing along through the water, towed by the great turtle, with the remoras as traces. The chase depended upon the size of the turtle, and sometimes lasted an hour, the fishes never releasing their hold until their victim was hauled alongside and lifted in, when they were forcibly taken off and placed in the pail to await the appearance of another victim.

Curiously enough, in nature we find some fishermen whose methods show a remarkable similarity to human devices. An interesting example is shown in a common American fish, the American angler, or Lophius americanus.

In appearance it is a hideous object—literally a great fleshy bag two or three feet long, with an enormous mouth. Like a bag it can flatten out to an astonishing degree, and when it goes a-fishing we can imagine it lying flat on the bottom, looking like a mossy rock; for in its color it is almost a perfect mimic of these objects. Not only this, but nearly the entire family are provided with a marvelous assortment of fleshy bangles and barbels that hang from under the mouth and various parts of the body, in shape and color exactly like the local sea-weed; and as they wave to and fro in the current the deception is remarkable, and the fisherman is as completely disguised as occasion requires. But where, you will ask, is the rod and line? Surely fishes do not have such conveniences. The rod of the angler is the first spine of its dorsal fin, and the second and third can also be used in some cases. In one that I examined some time ago the first rod was about eight or ten inches in length, slender and pliable, and of the exact color of the fish. The base or butt was fastened to a slender opal-hued bone, exactly as a staple is to the hook that holds it, of course being hidden beneath the skin, flesh, and muscles.

Some fishermen, particularly young folks, do away with hooks, especially when the bait is very good, and this is the case with the angler. It has no hook, or even line. The bait, a fleshy, shining, often highly colored bit of membrane, dangles at the very tip of the rod, and when the great fisherman is nicely hidden in the weeds, it is gently lowered or bent forward, so that the bait hangs just in front of the cavernous mouth, with its rows of movable teeth. The bait dangles perhaps like a worm in the currents, and soon some unsuspecting small-fry spies it, darts ahead, and the bait moves away. The rod is gradually being lifted, and finally the victim is hovering just over the mouth. Then perhaps the green eyes of the lophius twinkle with satisfaction, the rod is jerked back, a great cavern opens below the inquisitive fish, and into the capacious cavity it is drawn, and down comes the rod, that never or rarely loses its bait, ready for another bite.

A number of other fishes have a somewhat similar arrangement by which they could secure prey, but the angler is perhaps the most remarkable.

SAILS FOR OPEN BOATS.

BY LIEUTENANT WORTH G. BOSS, U.S.R.M.

SMALL open boats are designed, in a greater or less degree, to be impelled on the water by oars, and are distinguished by different names, according to their use, size, and model. Among such are life-boats, launches, dingies, gigs, jolly-boats, pinnaces, yawls, barges, feluccas, sharpies, whale-boats, long-boats, cutters, dories, canoes, punts, bateaux, skiffs, etc. Many of these craft are provided with light, portable sails and masts that can be readily rigged up when occasion requires. Boats, therefore, that are not specially intended for sailing purposes are usually equipped with a handy suit of sails, care being taken to choose a style that is likely to insure speed and weatherly qualities, though often local prejudices and the "custom" of the waters prevail as to the kind of rig.

All sails have either three or four sides. The former of these are sometimes spread by a stay, as a jib, or by a yard, as lateen sails, or by a mast, as leg-of-mutton sails, in which cases the foremost edge is attached throughout its whole length to the stay, yard, or mast. The latter, or those of four sides, are extended by yards or by gaffs and booms, as the principal sails of a ship or schooner. They all acquire their names from the mast, yard, or stay upon which they are extended or made fast. The accompanying cut (Fig. 1), showing jib and mainsail, will aid the reader in learning the names of the different parts. The upper edge, A, is called the head; B, the leach; C, the foot; D, the luff; the corner, e, is called the peak; f, the nock; g, the clew; h, the tack; the dotted rows are the reef points; O, the boom; R, the gaff; S, the stay.

Spritsail Rig (Fig. 2).—These sails have four sides. The luffs are secured to the mast by lacing, or pieces of rope yarn, rove through holes made in the sails about three feet apart, and the heads are raised and extend ed by sprits (small tough poles) that cross the sail diagonally from the mast to the peak. The lower end of the sprit has a blunt point, which rests in a rope bucket or loop that encircles the mast like a slip-knot, and can be fixed in position without slipping.

If there is any tendency, however, for the bucket to slide, a little wetting will prevent it. One advantage of the spritsail is that it can easily be brailed up alongside of the mast, with a line leading through a block on the mast and through the clew and around the sail. Pieces of cord are sewed in the seam across the sail, near the foot, for reefing points.

FIG. 6.

FIG. 7.

Cat Rig (Fig. 3).—Purely an American idea, and for narrow and crowded waters, bays, and harbors is unsurpassed. The mast is stepped right in the bows of the boat, and carries one sail (secured to mast hoops), with a boom and gaff. These boats work with great quickness, are easily managed by one person, and have few equals in going into the "eye" of the wind.

Balance Lug (Fig. 4).—These sails are four-sided, secured to a yard which hangs obliquely to and is balanced on the mast, part of the sail being in front and part behind. The boom and the yard are of about equal lengths. The tack of a lug-sail is usually a loop on the boom, caught into a hook on the mast near its heel, and is made fast before the sail is set. When a boom is not used, as is often the case with a single sail, the tack of the lug is secured to the weather bow. While this is a popular rig and has many good sailing points, it suffers an inconvenience on account of the yard having to be shifted to leeward of the mast in tacking, termed "dipping the lug."

Sloop Rig (Fig. 5).—Undoubtedly the handsomest of all rigs, though it is not so convenient for single-handed sailing, two people being required to sail them properly. For small boats the sails consist of mainsail and jib, and sometimes a topsail, the former secured to a gaff, and with or without a boom, as preferred. The bowsprit is an adjustable one. For cutters and small yachts this style of rig is the most common, and is well adapted for racing craft, as a great spread of canvas can be carried.

Mizzen Rig.—Quite a small sail, as shown in a number of the drawings, secured to a mast stepped in the stern of the boat, near the rudder head, and may be either a lug, a spritsail, or a fore-and-aft sail (Figs. 2, 4, 9). Where the waters are likely to be lumpy and the winds gusty and strong, the main and mizzen rig will be found the most useful (the mainsail being a balance lug or other sail), and is undoubtedly the best for single-handed work in open waters. The mizzen is of great help in beating to windward, and should set as flat as possible; and whenever it is necessary for any reason to lower the mainsail, the mizzen will keep the boat head to wind and sea.

Schooner Rig (Fig. 6).—A rig very common for long open boats. It consists of two masts and temporary bowsprit for the jib. Both the mainsail and foresail are extended by galls instead of sprits. The mainsail usually has a boom, while the foresail is often without one, though this is optional. The jib can be dispensed with by stepping the bowsprit in the bows of the boat.

Sharpies (Fig. 7).—These craft are long, flat-bottomed, draw only a few inches of water, and are best suited for shallow sounds and bays. In smooth waters, sailing on the wind, they are unquestionably among the swiftest boats afloat. The best specimens are to be found along the North Carolina coast. They have long masts, with one or two sails of peculiar shape, which are made as nearly flat as possible by being extended near the foot by sprits, as shown in the illustration. On the after-part of the sail is a small yard, or club, to which the sprit is made fast. The reefing is done along the luff, the reef-bands running parallel to the mast.

Leg-of-mutton Rig (Fig. 8).—A very safe, simple, and handy rig for boys. The sail is triangular, like a jib, and the peak is hauled almost to the mast head, with one hal-yard. It is specially adapted to smooth-water sailing for small boats and in light winds, where reefing is not likely to become necessary. One or two masts can be used, and booms rigged if desired.

The Sliding gutter (Fig. 9).—The principle of this rig is that the yard to which the sail is laced slides up and down on the mast, two iron hoops or travellers forming the connection. It is not a favorite sail in going before the wind, on account of its narrow head, but has advantages when close-hauled, and is preferable to a leg-of-mutton rig for sea work and in reefing.

Lateen sails (Fig. 10).—These sails are common on the Mediterranean, and are familiar to all who have seen pictures of the East. The sail is triangular, and is bent to a long tapering yard, sometimes twice the length of the boat, which hoists to a strong short mast that rakes forward.

There is a variety of odd and original rigs for small boats which are not in common use. Those mentioned are the simplest forms, and have stood satisfactory trial by boatmen generally in various parts of the world. A rig with a single sail is always the handiest and safest when one has to "work ship" unassisted. A properly fitted centre-board will add to the sailing qualities of an open boat, and when it can be put in without taking up too much space or being in the way of the oarsmen, it should be done. The ballast should be inside, and easily removable; bags of sand are the most convenient. When about to fit out a craft, remember that a smaller amount of canvas in one piece is more effective than a larger amount divided up.

COCKLE-SHELLS AND SILVER BELLS

BY MARGARET E. SANGSTER

COCKLE-SHELLS and silver bells, lilies in a row,
And far and near the merry winds to toss them to and fro;
Cockle-shells and silver bells, and o'er the slumber sea
The prettiest little sailor-boy has steered his bark to me.

His bark a gleaming shell that floats among the lilies fair,
Which ring their bells and shake their sweets to crown his golden hair;
The clinging ringlets o'er his bow are damp with slumber-spray—
The prettiest sailor in the world, just one year old to-day.

Such wonders as the baby eyes shall watch when buds uncurl,
Or by-and-by the scarlet flags of autumn shall unfurl,
Such flying drifts of feathered snow! Yet, oh, my baby, gaze!
There's nothing lovelier than this within a year of days.

A crowd of tiny lily-cups, all packed in leaves of green,
Which thrust the mosquito-like lord's swords the fragile flowers between;
And somewhere birds are singing sweet and honey-bees are near.
It is the merriest morning in the merry, merry year.

Oh, cockle-shells and silver bells, my little sailor lad;
Within your world of beauty there is room for nothing sad.
Awake, you find a sea of bloom; asleep, you float away
To golden isles of baby-dreams, where fairy creatures stray.

And every single day for you there's something new and strange—
The kind old mother Nature loves the picture-book to change;
And whether clouds are fleecy white or cloudless skies are blue,
There's always something beautiful, my bonny boy, for you.

Cockle-shells and silver bells, lilies in a row,
And far and near the merry winds to toss them to and fro;
Cockle-shells and silver bells, and o'er the slumber sea
The prettiest little sailor-boy has steered his bark to me.

ELAINE'S GARDEN PARTY.

BY JULIA K. HILDRETH.

"ELAINE! Elaine! where are you?"

"Here I am, Olive," replied Elaine, rising from her kneeling position by a large plant in the corner of her pretty garden. The girl pulled off her leather gloves as she spoke, and extended her hand in welcome. Instead of taking the hand, however, Olive placed a small pink envelope in it, and said, "Read that, Elaine."

Elaine first turned to the address, and looked at it a moment.

"Oh, do read it!" cried Olive, impatiently.

"Is it something so very nice?" asked Elaine, as she tore open the envelope. After a first glance she lifted her eyes to her friend's face with a delighted look.

"There!" cried Olive; "I knew you'd be pleased. Read it aloud. I want to know if it is just the same as mine."

Elaine led the way to a rustic seat placed in the shade of a large chestnut-tree. Olive followed, and seating herself close to her friend's side, peeped over her shoulder.

"JUNE 1, BEETH HILL.

"DEAREST ELAINE,—Papa is going to give me a birthday party—not an every-day, common affair, but a delightful garden party. It is to begin at eight in the evening. The grounds are to be lighted with hanging lamps and colored lanterns. I am going to have a band of music hidden away among the trees. Then there are to be fireworks and all kinds of delightful things. I am going to have the arrangement of everything myself. Now I want you and Olive to come and help me, because, although I told papa that I knew I could manage all by myself, I find, when it comes to the supper, I must have some one to consult. So lose no time. Remember there are only ten days to do everything in."

"I was obliged to write, because I am too busy to leave the house. Come at once to the assistance of your ever-loving friend, CARRIE PAUL."

"That is almost exactly like my letter," said Olive, as Elaine finished reading. "Now when will you go? Remember Carrie has no mother, so we must help her."

"Yes, of course we must," replied Elaine, soberly. Then she gave a little laugh of pleasure and cried out: "Oh, how delightful! I never went to a garden party like that. Only to think! a band of music, lights hung in the trees, and fireworks."

"Lovely!" said Olive, enthusiastically. "But when will you go?"

"At once; just as soon as I have changed my dress," replied Elaine. "I was thinking we ought to make some kind of a present to Carrie for her birthday."

"That's just what mamma said; so I am going to knit a bead purse, of blue silk and gold beads—her name knit with the beads, you know."

"That will be very pretty," replied Elaine, reflectively; "but what shall I make?"

"Something with embroidery on it, because you can do that so beautifully."

"How would a handkerchief bag do?" asked Elaine.

"Just the thing. You can make it of blue silk or velvet, and line it with gold-color, and embroider flowers and her name on the outside. Then it will match my purse."

From that day to the 10th of June Elaine and Olive thought of very little else besides the wonderful garden party. Most of their spare time was spent with Carrie Paul arranging and rearranging everything. And then, besides, they worked hard at their little gifts, so as to have them in readiness for the day.

All went forward smoothly; nothing troubled the girls but the weather, since, if it proved unfavorable, all their arrangements would go for nothing. At last the important day arrived. When Elaine opened her eyes in the morning she looked anxiously toward the window, but the sun was shining brightly, and the sky was without a cloud. So she sprang out of bed joyfully. First she opened a small box lined with silk which stood upon the table near the window. It contained the daintily embroidered handkerchief bag on which she had been employed for so many days.

She gave it one last look of satisfaction, for she had succeeded beyond her expectations. "Carrie Paul," in gold-colored silk, lit up with glistening gold beads, was embroidered across the dark blue velvet, surrounded by a wreath of pale blue forget-me-nots. The yellow satin of the lining formed a little puff just above the drawing string. This handkerchief bag really was very beautiful, and no wonder Elaine felt pleased with her work.

"Is this the wonderful day at last?" asked her father, as Elaine seated herself at the breakfast table.

"Yes, papa," replied Elaine, with a smile.

"Your dress came home this morning," said her mother, pointing to a fluffy pile of pink hanging over the back of a chair in the corner.

Elaine gave it one look, and said, "It's very pretty, mamma."

"You don't seem to take much interest in it," said her father with a smile. "I thought young ladies going to their first grand party thought more of a new dress than they did of anything else."

"Oh! but, papa, no one will even look at my dress," cried Elaine, eagerly, "because they will have so much else to think of." Then Elaine described in full all the wonderful arrangements Carrie, Olive, and she had been making for the evening party.

"At what time do the festivities begin?" asked her father, when she had completed her glowing account.

"The band will start to play at half past eight."

"Then at half past seven I will have Dennis put two horses into the large wagon and send him around for all the young folks living near who are invited. You know who they are, I suppose."

"Yes, papa; I wrote almost all the invitations. The wagon will hold twelve or fourteen, and it will be ever so much better than going all alone."

So this was settled, and at eight o'clock Elaine and her mother stood at the garden gate waiting for the return of Dennis and the wagon. Presently, through the deepening twilight, they saw the horses turn the corner at a swift pace. And in a moment Elaine was greeted with a shout of welcome from the gayly dressed young people crowded together on the seats.

This wagon was very long and broad, a capacious affair without a cover, which seemed to have been made on purpose for just such parties.

As Elaine climbed into her seat, near her friend Olive, her mother pointed to the west, and said, "Dennis, is that a cloud over there?"

"Yes, ma'am," replied Dennis. "That's just what it is, and it's in a hurry, too."

"Oh!" cried Elaine, in despair, "everything will be spoiled if it rains."

"Be easy, now," replied Dennis, glancing at the sky with a knowing air; "it's nothing but wind in that cloud. I'm thinking."

"Dennis," said Elaine's mother, warningly, "remember, if it rains ever so little, take your party under shelter. They are dressed much too lightly to stand a wetting."

"I will that," replied Dennis, decisively; "not a sup of water shall touch one of them this blessed night, or my name's not Dennis Grogan." He cracked his whip over the heads of the impatient horses, and in a moment more they were spinning along the road, and the merry young party had forgotten all about the black cloud rising in the west. But they had scarcely gone half the distance when a heavy clap of thunder and a vivid flash of lightning startled every one in the wagon. Then down splashed two or three great drops of rain.

"Here it comes!" cried Dennis, stopping his horses.

"You said it would be only wind," exclaimed Elaine, "and I am sure it won't rain but a moment. Please drive on, Dennis."

"That I won't, miss," replied Dennis, obstinately. "Your mother said yez were to go in out of the rain, and so yez shall. There's a house forenust us—"

He was interrupted by a chorus of expostulations from the whole party.

It was of no use, as they soon found, for Dennis had determined to do his duty, and took no further notice of their complaints. He doggedly led his horses to a rickety fence which stood before a shabby little house, and after securing them, knocked loudly at the door. It was opened by a poorly dressed woman with a candle in her hand.

"I've got a party of lads and lasses out here," said Dennis, without any further preface, "and they're rigged out in their best coats. Would you let them step inside, ma'am, if you please, until the storm is over?"

"Certainly," replied the woman, with a smile; "send them in." She threw open the door as she spoke, and went back to her sewing, apparently in great haste.

"Come," said Elaine, resignedly; "it is the shortest way to make Dennis drive on. I am sure it will not rain more than a moment or two."

The girls followed Elaine into the room, but the boys of the party stood out on the small porch watching the progress of the storm.

"I am afraid you will have to stand," said the owner of the room, with a pleasant smile, "for I did not expect so much company."

"We don't in the least mind standing," replied Elaine, answering for all, "and we are sorry to trouble you." As she spoke she approached the table where the woman sat sewing, and was surprised to see that she was embroidering a very handsome white satin dress.

"How beautifully you do that!" said Elaine, after watching her nimble fingers for a moment or two.

"Do you think it pretty?" asked the woman, without lifting her head. "This is the first I have done for a long time, and I only came by it by chance, as you may say. I was cleaning the windows of the dress-maker's house a few days ago, when I heard her say that she could not find any one to finish this very dress. She was in a dreadful way about it, as the lady it was for was to be married on the 11th, and the girl that had begun it was too sick to work. I told the dress-maker that I used to be considered good at that kind of thing. Then nothing would do but I must dry my hands and take a few stitches. Well, it put me in mind of long ago, when I used to have nothing harder than that to do." Here the poor woman gave a little sigh and paused.

"Well?" said Elaine, for she had grown very much interested in the story.

"At first," continued the woman, "I was all of a tremble; but presently I forgot everything but the pretty flowers and leaves, and went on without a mistake. Then the dress-maker asked me to take it home and finish it, and told me I should have as much fine sewing as I could do if I only finished this by the 10th."

"And do you think you'll have it done?" asked Elaine.

"Oh yes, if I work steadily," replied the woman, cheerfully. "It is to be done by twelve o'clock to-night, for the dress-maker said she would send a man for it. I have put off everything for this dress, and my rent is overdue, but that will be all right to-morrow."

Just at that moment the door was thrown open, and a ragged boy thrust his head into the room. After staring at the prettily dressed girls, with eyes and mouth wide open, he called out:

"I say, Mrs. Clair, your sister's took awful bad again. The doctor says she'll die this time, he thinks. She wants you right off." As the boy slammed the door and disappeared, Mrs. Clair sprang to her feet with a low cry. The pretty dress dropped to the floor in a heap. Elaine picked it up quickly and placed it upon the table.

"What shall I do?" said Mrs. Clair, in a despairing whisper. "What will become of Jennie and Dick?"

"Have you no one to leave them with?" asked Elaine, feeling very much distressed for Mrs. Clair.

"That's not it," replied the woman, sorrowfully; "but the dress is not finished, and what shall we do next week? Poor little things! they're used to being alone, and they will have to get used to hunger too, I suppose. Well, anyhow it can't be helped; I must go."

Then, with a tear in each eye, she glanced at the unfinished dress and covered it carefully with a large white cloth. As she threw an old shawl over her head, she said to Elaine, "Please close the door carefully when you leave."

"I will," replied Elaine, softly.

All the girls were very sorry for Mrs. Clair, and watched her with pitying glances as she hurried past them in silence; but they had very little time to think of her troubles, for scarcely had she closed the door when it was opened again by Dennis.

"Come out of it," said he, with a grin. "The stars is shining again; ye'll take no hurt now."

The girls looked in vain for any sign of rain as they crowded laughingly into the wagon. All had forgotten poor Mrs. Clair—all but Elaine. She closed the door softly, and then stood still.

"I don't feel much like going now," thought Elaine, sorrowfully. "Poor woman, I wish I could help her, and perhaps I can."

"Now," said Dennis, turning to her as she stood in the shadow of the porch, "why don't ye jump in with the others?"

"Hush!" whispered Elaine, cautiously. "I want you to do something for me."

"Well," said Dennis, wondering, "and what's that?"

"Please take this parcel," whispered Elaine, "and give it to Carrie Paul with my love." She handed him the box containing her present. "And if Olive asks where I am, tell her I staid to finish the dress. She will understand."

"But ye'll lose all the fun!" exclaimed Dennis.

"Dennis! Dennis!" shouted one of the boys from the wagon, "what are you waiting for now? Do you see another cloud? Do come; we shall be late."

"Don't let any of them know I staid until you reach the house," whispered Elaine, beseechingly.

"You're a good lass, and I'll hold me tongue," said Dennis, as he hurried out to the impatient party in the wagon.

Elaine stood quite still until she heard him drive off. Evidently no one had missed her. She stepped back into the room, and threw off the lace handkerchief that covered her head, and unclasped her light, soft cloak. Then taking up the dress, she found the place where Mrs. Clair's needle hung by a long silken thread, and at once went on with the embroidery.

The light fell full upon Elaine's shining hair, gauzy pink dress, and the white roses fastened on her shoulder. The long shimmering satin garment was heaped upon a chair before her, covering her feet like a cloud. All the rest of the room was dark and dingy. The stained walls, faded carpet, and shabby furniture looked doubly dreary in contrast with this one bright spot.

For more than two hours Elaine worked silently and swiftly. The clock on the shelf ticking loudly was the only sound she heard, until suddenly she was startled by a little voice that came from an open door close by her.

Glancing up quickly, she saw standing there two tiny figures, hand in hand, and dressed in white. They were staring at her with wide-open, wondering eyes.

"Jennie," whispered the taller, "it's a fairy."

"Is it?" said Jennie. "Oo ask it, Dick."

"Is you a fairy?" whispered Dick, trying to look brave.

Jennie put her fingers in her mouth, while her eyes grew bigger and brighter every moment.

"Go back to bed, Jennie and Dick," said Elaine, nodding and smiling.

"There! it is a fairy," said Dick, decidedly, "'cause she knowed our names. Now be dood and come back to bed."

"Dood-by, fairy; come again," hisped Jennie, as she toddled back with her brother, hand in hand.

Elaine was left alone again. For two more hours her fingers flew over the shining satin; the bright little needle seemed gifted with life as it ran swiftly in and out, carrying the silken thread with it. The clock struck twelve as she fastened off the last stitch and anxiously examined the embroidery. She saw with pleasure that it was so well done that she could not tell where her work began and where Mrs. Clair's ended. As she laid down the dress with a happy smile, Mrs. Clair entered the room.

"It is finished," said Elaine, pointing to the dress.

For a moment Mrs. Clair stood looking from Elaine to the dress in the utmost astonishment. Then she picked up the garment and examined it anxiously. Presently she said, in a low voice: "It is beautiful! And you lost your pleasure for this? What a good girl you are! but you can never know how grateful I am. I shall have a peaceful sleep to-night, for my sister is better; and now this is done. How can I ever thank you enough?"

"Please don't say any more. I am sure I do not deserve any more thanks!" cried Elaine, as she hurried from the room, smiling.

It was only a short distance from her own home, and as the moon was now shining, she felt not the least fear as she ran down the road.

"You are home early," said Elaine's mother; "but it is plain to see that you have enjoyed yourself."

"And so I have, mamma," replied Elaine; "but not at Carrie's party." Then she related the events of the evening.

Elaine never knew how it was, but before many days every one of her friends seemed to have heard of her small deed of charity. About a week after the event she received from Mr. Paul another invitation to a garden party, and when she arrived upon the scene Mr. Paul met her and led her under an arch of colored lights that were placed so as to form the letters of her name. And everywhere that Elaine looked she saw flowers festooned about her name in glittering letters. At first she felt like running away, but presently she was surrounded by a bevy of her young friends, who thanked her warmly for this second delightful evening.

After supper Mr. Paul arose and related the little story of the embroidered wedding dress. Murmurs of admiration came from every side, but when Mr. Paul saw that Elaine felt dreadfully abashed at being the centre of observation, he directed the band to play a lively tune, and in a few moments the whole company were engaged in the figures of a Virginia reel.

Nine O'clock.

The School-bell rings;
The Children all Must answer to The Master's call.

The Master has A crooked Nose;
He whips the Boys,
And puffs, and blows;

He makes them stand
And walk by Rule,
And bow before
They leave the School.

OUR POST-OFFICE BOX.

HACKENSACK, NEW JERSEY.

I am a little boy nine and a half years of age, and live in the pretty town of Hackensack, five miles from New York city. This is the county town of Bergen County. The Court-house is here, and there are several old buildings that stood in the time of Washington. One is "the old church on the green," which has the date 1666 over its door—the year it was first built. Another is the Washington Mansion House, which in 1776 was a gentleman's residence. His name was Peter Zabriskie, and General Washington lodged with him for a time. Later it became a hotel, and has been one ever since. Children and older people like to look at the tilting around its old fireplaces; they are all Bible scenes. Almost every stranger who comes to our town feels like settling down here. I have been taking this lovely magazine for two years, and I think it is the nicest one in the world, and mamma likes it as much as I do. She always reads me the continued stories in the evening. We liked "Jo's Opportunity" so much, and are just as interested in "Silent Pete." I go to my public school. He is principal of the largest school here; it has about four hundred scholars and eight teachers. Our class has just begun declaiming. I have one little brother, Percy, six years old; he has just begun to go to school, and reads in the First Reader. I once had two little sisters, Minnie and Nellie. Who each have a pet canary and a black and white kitty. Our spring Christmas presents this year were a spinning-wheel and a velocipede. Percy is a very funny little boy. He says to tell you he is a "traps" boy. He makes us all laugh, he keeps his pockets so full of traps. The other night mamma made him clear them out, and here is a list of what she found: a silk spool, a rubber-eraser, a hanging-basket chain, three buttons, a tin whistle, a bunch of cord, a mullage brush, a piece of coal (which he said was a mineral like those in papa's cave), a ten-cent watch and broken chain, the mouth-piece of a horn, six pea-bits, a patent-medicine ball, a tiny cork-rod, and a tin box. Don't you think that pocket was full enough? Then he has a pet which I do not think any of your little folks have ever said they had; it is a pig; but he made me see a picture of a potato, with matches for legs, and he thinks it is as nice as any toy he has.

With love,

NELSON M. H.

ALBUQUERQUE, NEW MEXICO.

Perhaps you would like to hear about some of the queer customs of the Mohave Indians. I will tell you how they take care of their babies. For a cradle they take a long branch of willow, which they bend into the shape of a long horse, shoe, tying the two ends together. They fill this frame with a basket-work of woven bark, on which they bind the poor little baby with strips of plaited bright-colored cloth so tightly that it can only turn its head and move its fingers and toes. To protect the head of the baby from the burning sun of that climate they make a thing of the same material, shaped like a buggy top, and generally gaily trimmed with feathers. This is conveniently carried on the mother's back, under her arm, and more commonly, balanced on her head. They are very kind to their children, and, as I said, never punish them. Their funeral services are very peculiar. When any one is expected soon to die they gather round the patient in large numbers, and have a wild, strange dance, accompanied by monotonous chanting, continued until he is supposed to be dead, to keep the evil spirits from getting possession of the departing spirit. Sometimes before the breath is quite gone they place the body on a pile of wood prepared for the purpose, and the singing and dancing goes on while the body is burned. The nearest friends throw into the fire their most valuable articles of clothing, and the women of the family cut off their hair and burn it. If the person who died owned any horses, there follows a feast on their flesh.

Maybeth encloses a touching little true story in rhyme which her mamma wrote for the little ones at home, and which we are much obliged to her for sending to the Post-office Box.

It is curious that some of the Indian customs about which Maybeth writes should very closely resemble those of the South-sea Islanders, and other savage races on the other side of the globe. I wonder if it is kind of the Indian mothers and fathers never to punish naughty children. Of course the Post-office-Box children are very seldom naughty, but when they are, I think they will confess that it is kindness which makes their parents impose some penalty for wrong behavior. Nobody wants to grow up cross or disagreeable.

MAYBETH P.

HOW IT HAPPENED.

BY MAYBETH'S MAMMA.

Darker grows the window-pane;
Brighter glows the fire,
In its mad and merry flight,
Ever climbing higher,
Ever climbing higher,
Where the hearth-light glows,
Mother holds in loving palms
Four small heads are clustered round,
Stilled the noisy games,
Eyes of blue and eyes of brown
Mirror back the flames,
"Story-time," the children cry;
"Now the fire is bright,
Round the fire we drink of the globe,
In the coals to-night
Just a moment's silence falls
On the waiting ones,
Embers answer mamma's eyes.

Thus the story runs:

"First I saw a little horse-top,
Rudely shaped and roughly made;
Maple-tree and old black walnut
Cotterle it with their hands made,
'Home, sweet home' has words of meaning
To my children all, I know.
But without the horse I'm watching
"Much I fear it is not so,
Partial shelter, mother's eating,
Little fire, smoldering fading,
Father's fire, drunken fire-singing,
"Mother, weary-eyed and sad,
Think of it, my little children,
With your books and games and toys,

When you restless grow and fretful,
Think of me, my boys,
Little thought have they of playing;
In the winter it is cold:
In the summer they are working
Ever they're hard six years old,
The two eldest, one bright morning,
Formed a mighty secret plan;
Each small heart was full and swelling
With the courage of a man.
In the coals that glow in front there
Grows a fair potato field;
Men and boys and little children
Gather in the generous yield.
Two small mites are 'mong them toiling;
They have bargained for the pay
For the work that they are doing,
All that they can bear away.
Now at last the day is ended,
And the weary workers must go;
Little bags and hats and pockets
With their treasures overflow.
Still the secret must be guarded,
They, beneath a friendly eider,
Leave their treasures all afield.
In the morning they are digging,
Questioning, "Must it be more deep?"
"Pile the earth a little higher."
"Do you think that they will keep?"
This they say, but would not rest,
Christmas will reveal the feat;
Roast potatoes for their dinner—
Who need ask a greater treat?
"Christmas Eve! With sober faces
And important looks we rose,
They, with axe, and mother's basket,
Go to break the frozen ground.
Well, no sparrow e'er failed to Fly to ground with their will,
And he heard the voice of children,
Those two children by the hill,
All little mites, as they were,
Frozen in the ground it lay;
They return their mother's basket,
With no treat for Christmas Day."

Mother paused. The children crowd

Eager round her knee:
Eyes meet with gentle tears—
Tears of sympathy.
"Mother, make some kind man bring Things to make them glad."
"No, my dear, the tale is true—
True, although 'tis sad.
But I know these children grew
Up with their mother's trust,
Smoothed their mother's downward path
To a peaceful grave."

WASHINGTON, D.C.

I am a little girl twelve years old. I go to school, but do not like it at all. I love to read the stories in HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE and find out the puzzles. I have some little cousins in New York, and mamma says maybe she will go to see them this summer. I found a puzzle—I mean the answer to one—in No. 340; it was a Pi—No. 3. IONA K.

ST. GEORGE, GERMANY.

DEAR POSTMISTRESS,—I should be so much obliged if you will publish this letter as soon as you are able to do so. I have received forty-three letters from different parts of America, all of which I am sorry to say, I cannot possibly answer, but I will try and send the exchange of stamps as soon as possible. They are all such nice letters that I would feel quite sad not to be able to answer each of them. To-morrow I am going to school for the first time; I feel dreadfully nervous, as mamma has said, I don't speak. I have been up in the woods all this afternoon, so I am rather tired.

With much love,

ROSIE C.

WASHINGTON, D.C.

I go to school, and study arithmetic, dictation, spelling, and reading. I won a gold medal for arithmetic. I have three brothers, and I am the only girl. Mamma takes HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE for me, and she likes it very much. I like "Silent Pete," "The Desert Fairy's Gift," and the Post-office-Box. Every summer I go up to my grandpa's, in Pennsylvania, and stay until October. I have a cow, three fat geese, and grandpa have a cash, and I have a swing up there. I am nine years old. Good-by.

EDITH M.

OCELS, ILLINOIS.

This town has lately been visited by a very destructive cyclone (May 12), entirely destroying some buildings, and killing many people. Several persons were hurt, but only one fatally. It was not quite time for school to be dismissed for the day, but the principal told the teachers to dismiss the pupils, but they might reach home before the storm came on. All arrived at home in time except one little girl, who did not go directly home, but went to the store first. So when the cyclone came, she was picked up by it and injured so badly that she died the next day. Some buildings it moved or blew over without seeming to have hurt them much. Our barn was moved about three or four feet without blowing it over or otherwise damaging it. It blew the chimneys down the slope, but those chimneys escaped. The chimneys belonging to other people were blown down mostly. It took the roofs of some of the houses down, and the rain that continued to fall damaged an immense amount of groceries. Many trees were broken too, and we are thankful that so many escaped. Two country doctors came that day, but we wrote up accounts of the cyclone. Two photographers took several pictures of different places.

ROBERT A. T.

MARYE GROVE, MICHIGAN.

I have seen from many nice letters in the Post-office box how little girls, I thought I would like to write too. We live on a farm. I have four sisters and one brother. We all work together, about two miles from here. In the winter, when it is stormy, my papa drives us. I will be in the Third Book in about a month, and am to be a ten and next week. We have our uncle and aunt from Kingston, and their two little children, Maud and Mabel, visiting us just now. I am nearly four years old, and was born just six months old, and we are having a splendid time. Yesterday was Arbor Day, so, instead of having lessons, all the children spent the day in planting trees. We planted a plum, a marjoram and horse-chestnut, and a piece of cedar hedge. We have been taking Harper's Young People four or five years, and like it very much. Our Uncle Tom in Kingston sends it to us. I like the fairy tales best, and my big sisters, Mary and Bessie like Mrs. Lillie's stories. Rolf Hovey, "Nan," and "Jo's Opportunity."

FLORENCE S.

ROCK HILL, VIRGINIA.

I live on a farm near Alexandria, Virginia, and like country life very much. I see all the boys and girls give an account of their pets, and so I will tell you about mine. I have a dog, a white one, and I have a gray and white one; I have a dog and a bird. I love horses, as most country girls do, and my father says he will get me one very much interested in your advice to the children, and therefore enjoy reading the Post-office box. The flowers are coming out now, and the children are busy in getting dressed. I have devoted to flowers. I am ten years old, but will soon be eleven.

REBECCA H. D.

NEW YORK CITY.

Will the Postmistress be kind enough to tell me what is the longest word in our language? The longest that I have found is inconspicuousity; this has nineteen letters.

B. G.

The children may answer this if they can.

CHICAGO, ILLINOIS.

DEAR POSTMISTRESS.—I am a little girl seven years old. When my papa goes away he nearly always sends me a story in his letter, and I thought that I would send one, for I thought some of the other little children who take HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE would like it as well as I do. I had just told me to me what I was in Europe. I hope my letter and story will be published.

GERTRUDE G.

I am much obliged to dear little Gertrude, and to Gertrude's papa too, for the beautiful story of the kitty cat and the stork.

THE KITTY CAT AND THE STORK.

A kitty cat one day went on a potato field to look for mice. She wet her feet on the cold grass, and when the wind blew she got so shivering it made her sneeze, so that she exclaimed, "It is too hard that I must watch and wait until I can catch a mouse!" Just then a stork was flying past, and watching for an ear of wheat, or bone, or unvary chicken; and as he flew he said, "Oh dear! dear! to think that I must go five miles for something to peck my bill against! Why, if I were a dog, I would be fed at home; or if I were a kitty cat, I could just hop up to the house for some milk." In the midst of the stork's complaint he spied the kitty cat, and exclaimed, "I wonder if I could carry off a cat, and line my nest with her foot and let her peck for me." With that she swooped down, and before the kitty cat could say, "Oh my!" the stork caught her by the back and flew up in the sky with her. They had not gone together more than half a mile when the kitty cat turned half round and began to bite the stork's leg. The stork tried to turn back, but the kitty cat bit so hard that he could not do it but so fiercely that the stork began to faint from pain; he wings fluttered, his neck drooped, and she faltered in his flight. Finally, she must give up the milk with her peck, until the blood flowed, the stork reeled and fell over and over, and then both cat and stork tumbled into the tremendous tree trunk of a cypress morass. Here they lay wounded and helpless, thorn apart and badly hurt by the concussion. As they moaned and cried from hunger and pain, each began to upbraid the other. "Oh, you wicked kitty cat!" said the stork. "If you had not bit so, I would have carried you safely to my nest, and shown you my dear little baby storks, and given you a piece of dried rat for lunching; and now by your rashness you've killed me, and I'm dead!" "Ah yes!" said the kitty cat; "and if you had not carried me off, I would not have had a nice mouse for breakfast at home."

A big owl was sitting on a tree near the morass, blinking his big eyes (for he was surprised), and holding his wings tight to his body, as if because he is trying to break me of the habit of turning in my toes on the branch that supported him. He said to the rest of the owl who had been eating cat and stork, and at last said: "I think you were both in the wrong. You were both grumbling and murmuring because you had to endure a little bad luck in the way you were made to work. If the kitty cat had not been frowning so, she would have seen the stork; and if the stork had not been so greedy, he would have seen her proper food in the field, and not touched the cat."

Then a little robin looked out from his nest, and when he saw both the stork and the kitty cat dead on the ground, he sang soft and low these verses:

When the sun is shining,
And the breezes blow,
When the birds are twittering,
And the streams are flowing,
All the world of life and song
Goes on as if the stork and kitty were Ever to murmur or complain
At our sorrow or our pain;
God, who every sparrow feeds,
Knows what every creature needs.

SHINGWANK HOME, SAULT STE. MARIE.

DEAR POSTMISTRESS.—A kind friend sends us HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE. I am all boys here. My father is the principal of two Homes for Indian boys and girls; the one for boys, where we live, is called the Shingwank Home, after an Indian name, and the other is called the Wawanosh, that means sailing gracefully. We have a beautiful little chapel here, built in memory of the first bishop of Algoma (that is the diocese in which we live). There is also a little cemetery at the back of this Home, and a lovely lake; the river comes in, and in the summer boats go up and down on it. There are forty boys here, of all ages from four to eighteen, and we are expecting many more. Many thanks to Horace for his papers. Very glad to see the pictures at the top of the little black head is poked in, and a sly voice says, in broken English, "Please, me, and Waboose want to look at your picture." The paper has come out, and is fully appreciated. Father wants to get some more Homes built in the Northwest like these for the poor ignorant Indians. We are only waiting for money to build them. The clothing, toys, or papers will be very thankfully received by the Rev. E. F. Wilson, Shingwank Home, Sault Ste. Marie, Ontario, Canada. WISNIFRED L. W.

ROCHESTER, NEW YORK.

I am a little girl nine years old, and I like HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE very much. I have a big brother, James, who is fifteen years old, and a big older sister, Mary. I have a pet donkey, that will stand on his front feet and kick with his back feet real hard. I wrote this letter myself, and I would like to see it in print. Good-bye to your friend, GESSIE M.

Robbie E. F., Edith Vanderpoort, Willis W., E. B. V., Elizabeth B., Katie P. M., Bental E., Annie Z., Thora, Josie K., B. L. C., and Ida D.: Many thanks to each of you for your kind letters. Send puzzles and answers freely, but remember that the answers to your own puzzles must be sent at the time you send the puzzles, and also remember always to send answers to puzzles which you solve on a separate sheet of paper, and not in the middle or at the end of your letter to the Postmistress.

Once upon a time, my friend (a city in Italy), dressed in her best (a city in France), put on her cap (the peaks in the Sierra Nevada mountains), and took her cousins (a river in Montana and a city in Nebraska), to the Zoological Gardens, where they saw a city (a line of figures), a branch of the Columbia River, a black (a river that empties into the Great Salt Lake), a very large wild (a country in Europe), and many other curiosities. When they were tired they refreshed themselves with a loaf of (a city in Austria) bread, and a drink of (a river in Montana), which made them rather (a country in South America). (A river in Montana) found (a river in Mississippi) a ring, and (a city in Nebraska) bought (a place in Africa) pocket-book, and then (a city in Italy) took them home.

FRENCH ANAGRAMS.

OUR young readers have shown themselves so bright in guessing our Puzzles from Paris that now we venture to give them some that are a little more difficult than those offered at first.

It will not be necessary to explain it, for you all know the meaning, whether written in French or English, of the word "anagram."

Now to solve the first one, think of the pleasant journeys you have made, think of the sidewalks where you frighten pedestrians with your roller-skates, and then of the ragged street boys who often look so enviously at you.

Dont on fait, les remanant,
Une force motrice,
Un terrasser, un mendiant.

Think first of your barnyard friends, then of what you will have to do when you get old like grandpapa, and your eyesight begins to fail.

De cinq lettres je me complique.
On y trouve, on les changeant,
Certain oiseau domestique,
En optique un instrument.

What do we take our tea

(3.)

J'ai cinq pieds; l'on peut le croire
Pour peu qu'on ait l'esprit fin
J'offre quelquechose pour boire,
Et ce qu'on possède à chaque main.

What month is all smiles and tears, and whom do we dislike to have about us in our studies, our games, and, indeed, in nearly every relation in life?

De la belle saison
J'annonce le retour,
Si vous me renversez
L'on me craint en amour.

A little word very often used; then who knows the French name for the game of ninepins, or skittles?

Je dirai même objection.
Retourné je deviens un joll jeu d'exercice,
Et c'est sur un endroit bien lisse
Qu'on dresse mes soldats et qu'une chose arrondie
Fait tomber plus on moins pour gagner la partie.

BUILDING THE NESTS.

BY GEORGE COOPER.

"TWIT! twee!" sang the robin; "I think we'll build here; I like the location," "And so do I, dear," His little spouse chirruped. So, high in the tree, They set to work making their nest merrily.

"See! see!" piped the bobolink; "here's a nice nook, Just down in a hollow, and over a brook."

"Oh my! how delightful!" his mate exclaimed. "Look! What a sweet, pretty mirror we'll have in this brook!"

"Sweet! sweet!" trilled the bluebird; "the stump of this tree A very nice site for a mansion would be." "So sheltered and cosy! and then it's so new!" Replied Mrs. Bluebird. "And look at the view!"

"Dear! dear!" cried a cat-bird; "these house-hunting days A good, steady bird will be likely to craze. I've searched all the bushes—" "There, darling, don't fret," His sober mate sang; "don't be seen in a pet."

"Twit! twit!" chirped the swallow; "the old home is there. We'll move in this minute, its comfort to share. Let other birds wander to build a new nest, But, all the world over, the old home is best."

CHAPTER XI.

A PROPOSITION.

DURING the entire night Jerry sat in a chair by the side of Pete's bed, refusing to lie down even for a moment lest he should fall asleep, and watching anxiously each movement made by the sick boy.

The little musician alternately slept and awakened, at intervals of about half an hour, and whenever he opened his eyes his first words would be to urge Jerry to lie down.

"I'll be all right in the morning," he would say; "and so long as there ain't anything you can do for me, why don't you come to bed?"

"There might be something you'd want if I should go to sleep," Jerry would reply, "and so I won't risk it. You see, I've been staying in bed too much lately, I think, and it'll do me a right smart o' good to sit up one night."

But when the morning came Pete looked worse than on the day previous. He was too ill even to make a pretence of being better, and lay so still and pale that several times Jerry leaned over to listen to the beating of his heart before he could feel certain that he was yet alive. The cordial which the young nurse administered very early in the morning failed to have as good an effect as before, and it was even difficult to arouse the invalid sufficiently for him to swallow it.

Jerry was in the greatest distress of mind. He sat by the side of the bed, his eyes full of unshed tears, until about seven o'clock, when Abe arrived, who entered the room softly, in marked contrast to his manner of the day previous. He took Jerry by the hand instead of speaking to him, and then leaned over the little sufferer, his face telling that he observed a decided change for the worse.

"I've got a carriage down stairs, so that we can carry him up to that woman what's going to take care of him," the cook whispered. "Do you know where she lives?"

"I don't believe I do," replied Jerry, in the same low tone; "but Billy does, and I think he's in his room now."

"Go and turn him out, while I stay here with Pete."

It required but a few moments to awaken Master Chick, tell him what was wanted, and have him dress himself, after which Jerry led him to Abe.

"I'll take little Pete in my arms, with some of these bedclothes around him," the cook said; "and if the woman of the house goes to making any fuss, you tell her that we'll fetch 'em right back. Billy, you go on ahead to open the doors, and Jerry will bring Pete's clothes."

Abe lifted the little musician from the bed tenderly, while Jerry not only gathered up such articles as he thought the sick boy might need, but he also took Sweetness, knowing full well that when Pete was able to take notice of anything around him, his first thought would be of his beloved violin.

Billy mounted the box to show the driver in which direction to go, for while he could not tell either the number of the house or the street it was on, he knew perfectly well how to find it. Abe, with Pete held carefully in his arms, got into the carriage, followed by Jerry; and the coachman, after being cautioned by the cook against fast driving where the streets were rough, started the horses.

"Do you suppose the old French lady can help him any?" Jerry asked, his voice trembling with suppressed emotion.

"I think a woman's care is what he needs more than anything, and if she's what you say she is, he'll be as well off with her as he could be anywhere."

After this question had been asked and the answer given, nothing more was said until the sudden stopping of the carriage told that they had arrived at their destination. Without waiting to be told, Master Chick ran upstairs to inform the old lady that the sick boy had come, and almost before the carriage door was opened she was on the steps to show the way to her rooms.

"The poor child!" she murmured, half to herself, as Abe entered the house with his burden. "I had no thought he was so ill—and without father or mother!"

The old lady led the way to the room which the boys had entered when they called upon her, and where every preparation had been made for Pete's reception. The lounge had been transformed into a bed, whose snowy sheets and embroidered pillow-slips caused it to look wonderfully fresh and inviting, and after Pete had been laid upon it, Abe said: "Axes your parding, missis, for being so bold; but I'm going to get a doctor for this little shaver, and I wants to say as how I believe that folks like you who takes a stranger in like him will get paid sometime or another for their goodness."

"It would be a hard heart that would not be warmed to a child like this," said the old lady, as she smoothed the sick boy's hair from his forehead. "I think it is well that a physician should see him, but I have not the means with which to pay him for his visits."

"Don't you be worried about the money part of it, missis, for me and them of my shipmates as was saved from the old Chio will take care of all that."

"Oh, you are, I think, the good cook of whom the poor child spoke when first I saw him?"

"Well, I allers ships as a good cook—A No. 1, according to articles; and if it so be that the little shaver thought enough of me to tell about it, I'm glad. Now where'll I find a doctor?"

After he had gained the desired information Abe turned to Billy, who was standing near the door, watching every movement made with the liveliest curiosity, and said:

"Now, then, my hearty, you carry them 'ere bedclothes where we got 'em from, and tell the woman that they've come back, so she won't accuse us of stealing."

Master Chick gathered up the clothes in a not very neat-looking bundle, and left the house in company with the cook, while Jerry, crouched close by Pete's side, neither spoke nor seemed to pay any attention to what was going on around him. All his thoughts centred on his sick friend, who lay, with closed eyes, almost as white as the snowy bedding with which he was covered.

"It is not well that you should sit there mourning," the old lady said, kindly, to Jerry. "You shall help me care for him; but first do you go out and buy the French paper in which the notice was to be printed. We will read it when he is better, and then he will know that everything has been done as if he were well."

While Jerry was out in search of the newspaper, the doctor and Abe arrived, and the former shook his head in an ominous way when he saw the sick boy, although he did not venture any opinion concerning him. He wrote a prescription, directed the old lady, whom he called Madame Bonn, as to what should be done for Pete, and then took his departure, after promising to call on the following day.

When Jerry returned he knew that the physician had been there, because he saw the prescription on the table, and he asked, eagerly:

"What did the doctor say? Does he think Pete is very sick?"

"He didn't have very much to say about it," replied Abe; "but he left this 'ere for you to get the medicine with, and he wouldn't a done that if he hadn't thought he could help him; now would he?"

Jerry believed, as Abe seemed to, that the physician's prescription was sufficient proof that he was sure he could help the invalid, and his heart was very much lighter as he ran to the druggist's for the medicine.

Abe waited until he had returned, and while Madame Bonn was following the doctor's directions he called Jerry into the hall.

"I'm going down to the dock to find Captain Sproul. He'd take it kinder hard if I didn't let him know poor little Pete was sick, and likely he'll come up here with me to-night or to-morrow."

"You'll surely come back, won't you, Abe?" Jerry asked, as if he feared he might not see him again.

"Of course I will. What are you thinking of to suspicion that I wouldn't hang around, now that I'm loafing, just as long as I thought I could do Pete any good?"

"I know you will, Abe; but I hate to have you go, 'cause you're the only man I know in all this big city, and while he is sick I want to have somebody to tell me what to do."

"I'll be here every day, lad, though I don't know as I'll be of much use; but I'll come all the same."

Then Abe left the house, and Jerry went back to where Madame Bonn was waiting upon Pete as tenderly and lovingly as if she had been his mother. Now that everything possible had been done for the sick boy's comfort, Jerry was in a painful state of uncertainty regarding himself. Madame Bonn had offered to care for Pete, it is true; but whether or no she was willing to have his friends in her apartments was quite another matter, and Jerry actually began to believe that he might be obliged to leave the boy he loved so dearly. Determined to settle the matter at once, he said:

"I don't suppose you want a great big fellow like me around in this little room after you've been so good as to let us bring poor little Pete here; but you don't know how much him and me think of each other, and if you'll let me stay as long every day as you can, I'll try to do a good deal to help you."

"Did you think, my poor little man, that I would have your friend brought here to remain without you?" and the old lady drew Jerry toward her in a motherly fashion, with her arm around his neck. "It is true that my apartments are small, but they are sufficient for three of us, as you shall see. It will not be that I can give you a bed, but I shall make for you a couch on the floor, where you will be with your sick friend all the time."

"You needn't fix anything," said Jerry, quickly, and wondering whether the old lady would be angry if he should kiss her. "I can sleep anywhere, and the rug is good enough for me."

"No, no, I would not allow that. When night comes I shall show you how it can be arranged, and now you may fan your little Pete while I read in the paper what the kind editor has said about him."

During the afternoon Master Chick called to learn how Pete was getting on, and Jerry said, as he met him at the door, leading him back into the hall:

"He's asleep now, so you'd better not go in to wake him up. I tell you what it is, Billy, Madame Bonn is awful good to let us bring Pete here; but I'm afraid it'll fuss her if too many keep calling, so whenever you come, stand on the corner and whistle. I'll be sure to hear it, and I'll run out to tell you about him."

"That's all right," said Master Chick, promptly; "but how are you going to get along if he's sick a good while, and can't go out with you to earn any money?"

"I don't know, Billy, and that's what's been bothering me this afternoon. I haven't got very much, and I suppose there'll be a good many things to buy for him. I reckon I shall have to sell papers or black boots, if you'll kind o' help me break into the business."

"Of course I will, any time you say. I'll be up in the morning, and you come out when I whistle."

"I'll be watching for you," replied Jerry, and then, as Billy left the house, he returned to Pete's bedside.

During the next three days the sick boy grew no worse, neither did he appear to be very much better. He would talk with Jerry now and then; but the exertion of speaking tired him so much that the physician forbade him to hold any lengthy conversation with any one. Abe had called each day, bringing Captain Sproul with him the first time, when arrangements were made with Madame Bonn, unknown to Jerry, relative to the expense she might incur by having the invalid at her house. Captain Sproul and the survivors of the Clío's crew, although they could ill afford such generosity, had agreed to pay all bills that might be contracted on Pete's account, and had sent Madame Bonn quite a sum of money for immediate use.

On the second day the cook called he had sad news. The boat in which Mr. Harding and a portion of the crew had left the sinking Clío had been picked up with her bow stove; therefore there could no longer be any doubt but that those who had taken refuge in the long-boat were the only survivors of the ill-fated brig.

Jerry had spent his own money whenever he had been sent for anything which Pete needed, until, on the morning of the fifth day after the little musician had been taken sick, he found himself with but thirty cents. He would have made no question whatever about going to work if it had not involved leaving his friend, and although he knew that Pete would receive every attention from the kind-hearted old French lady, even if he was not there, he had hesitated to leave him. Now, however, he could hesitate no longer. Not knowing what arrangements had been made by Captain Sproul, he believed it would be necessary to spend Madame Bonn's money if he did not earn some, and he was resolved to go to work at once.

The old lady had often urged in vain that he go out of doors more, and on this morning he said, not wanting to tell her what he was about to do: "If you don't care, I'll go down the street this forenoon, and perhaps I sha'n't be back for a good while. Pete, old man, you won't mind my going, will you?"

Pete seemed to be quite as pleased as was Madame Bonn that he had finally concluded to take an airing, and urged him to go. After kissing the sick boy tenderly Jerry left the house, feeling almost that he was doing wrong in leaving his friend, even though the necessity was so urgent. He was going in search of Billy, in order to get his advice as to what business a boy could best start with a capital of only thirty cents; but before he had walked half a block he met Captain Sproul, and, of course, stopped to speak with him.

"It seems to me as if Pete was a little better this morning," he said, in reply to the Captain's question; "but he hasn't asked for Sweetness yet."

"Have you heard anything from the advertisements?" "Not a word. Billy Chick has been to the paper office every day, but there hasn't been any letter there."

"Where are you going now?"

"Out to find some kind of work. You see, we didn't have a great deal of money when Pete was taken sick, and it's about all gone now."

"Don't Madame Bonn pay for such things as Pete needs?" asked the Captain, not caring to tell Jerry what financial arrangements had been made with the old lady.

"She does as much as I'll let her. She 'ain't got a great deal of money, I reckon; and, besides, I'd rather get what Pete needs myself."

"I think you can leave business alone for a while," said the Captain, with a smile. "I want to have a talk with you, and we had better be walking toward the docks than standing still."

Jerry could not have refused to accompany Captain

Sprout even if his need of money had been more urgent, and he followed without hesitation.

"I came up this morning especially to see you," the Captain began, "and I am going to make a proposition which you must think over thoroughly before accepting or declining. I don't fancy that you have made any plans for the future, have you?"

"No, sir, I don't know as I have," replied Jerry, hesitatingly. "I kind o' allowed that after Pete got well and found his aunt I'd go back to New Orleans, for I don't like this city very well."

"And what will you do there?"

"I ain't so sure, unless I scrape up some money and buy half of the fruit stand Felix owns."

"I don't just like to think of your knocking about the streets, Jerry, for, from what I have seen of you, I think you are a pretty smart kind of a boy. Now how do you fancy going to sea?"

"Going to sea?" repeated Jerry, in perplexity.

"Yes; with a view of commanding a vessel some day. I have just got a fine bark, and I would like to have you ship with me. I'll agree to do by you as your own father would—give you a fair education, teach you navigation, and push you up as fast as you can go until you are my first mate."

Jerry was fairly staggered by this proposition, and it was several moments before he could make any reply; then he did manage to say,

"But suppose Pete don't find his aunt at all?"

"I don't fancy that he will, lad. If she had been in the city she would have made some answer to the notices before this, for I see that nearly all the other papers have copied them. Now if he does not find her, it is hardly possible that he will be able to go on the streets playing for a very long time, even if he is ever well enough, and what will you be doing meanwhile?"

"I suppose I'll have to sell papers or black boots."

"And do you never intend to do anything but that? Would you be contented if you knew that when you are a man you could do nothing better?"

"No, sir," replied Jerry, quickly.

"I suppose if Pete gets well, and does not find his aunt, you think you ought to take care of him as you have been doing?"

"Indeed I do."

"Very well; then you ought to look for some steady employment, something in which you could advance as you grow older. Now if you will agree to go with me, at least until you are of age, I will see that your wages are sufficient to pay Pete's board and clothe you both. At the same time I will take care that you receive an education."

"But I can't leave Pete while he's so sick," said Jerry, piteously.

"I do not expect that you will. You shall stay with him until he—until he has recovered, and then you shall come to me. I will advance sufficient money to pay his bills, and it shall rest with you to say when you will leave him. I don't ask for an answer now, for I want you to know your own mind thoroughly before you decide. Go home and think the matter over. You need have no hesitation about allowing Madame Bonn to spend her money, for we will see that she loses nothing."

As he said this, Captain Sprout came to an abrupt halt, and Jerry could do no less than leave him.

CARRIAGE FOLKS.

GENERAL MUFF.

MUFF is more than twelve years old, which is rather an advanced age for a cat, though he still seems in prime vigor. He is a true aristocrat, and so stately and dignified that one of his friends, who writes fairy stories, insists that he must be an enchanted prince. At any rate, he is a drawing-room cat, with dainty tastes and habits, that shuns the kitchen and servants, and delights in the company of poets and artists. His mother was brought direct from Malta, and was so much prized by her owners that it was said of them that they would only give her kittens to persons who brought satisfactory references of respectability.

When only a few weeks old, Muff was carried with his brother from their pleasant New Hampshire home to the great city of New York. The two little balls of animated fur were appropriately named Muff and Tippet. One day a party of mischievous children teased poor Tippet so much that he dashed through the window, and was never seen or heard from again.

Muff, however, remained and grew up, and has ever since been the man of the house in a family of ladies. He feels the dignity of his position, and moves about with a measured tread, unless he chances to catch a glimpse of a mouse, when he is quickly on the alert, and pounces like lightning on his prey, which he proudly exhibits to the household; for he is useful as well as ornamental, and a mighty hunter. On his mistress's last birthday he brought a mouse and laid it at her feet as the best gift he had to offer, and seemed much hurt when it was carried out on a shovel. The rapt expression and glint of eye in the picture, which make it seem so full of life, were called forth by the beatific vision of a bird that chanced to perch at that instant on the window-sill.

Muff is a handsome, large cat, with a long face, drooping white mustache, long, gracefully curving tail, and thick, glossy coat of blue-gray fur, not at all like the ordinary cat's hair, with a pile as deep as an otter's, and looking like plush with its beautiful lights and shadows. His breast, muzzle, and paws are white. His eyes, with their large dark brown pupils, are very fine in a subdued light.

The picture shows Muff in his evening dress, a beautiful lace collar, made by the Maya Indian girls of Yucatan, and presented to him by the wife of a celebrated Central American explorer. This he wears at the entertainments sometimes given at his house, which he never fails to attend, and where he is petted and praised to his heart's content. He is very fond of society, and always goes into the drawing-room to receive visitors and entertain them until his mistresses come in. One day a lady, after waiting for some time, left a note for the latter saying that Muff had made himself so agreeable that she had not missed them at all.

Muff has the gentlest of dispositions, and was never known to scratch or bite. Like Maltese cats in general, he has dog-like sagacity, and is extremely intelligent. He is very affectionate, and welcomes his mistresses after an absence with demonstrations of delight. He has his favorites, and is very decided in his likes and dislikes. He has led a petted life. The only cloud on his happiness has been the recent addition to the family of a thoroughbred Persian cat, named Omar Khayyam, and known familiarly as the Shah, with which he lives on terms of armed neutrality, as he does with the canary-bird Victor, upon which he now persistently refuses to look, after having been several times chastised for looking at it too often.

Muff has a large circle of friends, and more than one artist has wished to paint his portrait, which is now given for the first time to the readers of HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE.

BOYS WHO BECAME FAMOUS.

BY DAVID KER.

A YOUNG WARRIOR.

"I REALLY don't know what to do with that boy," said a school-teacher, in the old English town of Market-Drayton, as he stood in the doorway of the empty school-room looking down the street after the refractory pupil whom he had been "keeping in." "He has good stuff in him somewhere, I'm sure, if one could only get at it; but he's certainly the most unruly fellow I ever had to do with."

Meanwhile the boy of whom he was speaking went slowly along the quaint old street, now all ablaze with the glory of the sunset. Young as he was, he had already a thoughtful, earnest look far beyond his years. He was strongly but clumsily built, and his features were so coarse and harsh that they would have been downright ugly but for their stern, fearless, commanding expression. His defiant bearing and the fierce impatience with which he shouldered his way through the crowd betokened a spirit that must always take the lead among its fellows, either for good or for evil.

"There goes 'Fighting Bob,'" said one man, pointing to the lad as he went past, "with a black eye, as usual. He'd better turn prize-fighter when he grows up, for he'll never be good for anything else."

"Fighting Bob, indeed!" growled another. "Gallows Bob's what I call him, for he'll come to be hanged as sure as my name's Tim Trotter. I tell ye, neighbors, I'd as soon try to drive a mad ox to market as go for to manage that 'ere imp of a boy."

"His heart's in the right place, though, for all that," said the hearty voice of a sturdy, jolly-looking farmer beside him. "That little 'un of mine 'ud have been worried 't'other day by a big brute of a dog if Bob there hadn't run in and choked it off—ay, and he got bitten himself in doing it too."

"You should have seen him climb up the church steeple last spring," cried a fourth, "to get a bird's nest for little Jim Barlow, Widow Barlow's crippled boy. You've heard of it, o' course, but I saw it with my own eyes. 'Twas a market-day, and I was just coming into town, when, just as I got round that corner, I hears a great halloo, and I looked up, and there I saw him right up against the top o' the tower, looking no bigger than a cat."

"Ay, my Jack told me of that," observed one of the others, "for he was in the town that day."

"My heart was in my mouth the next minute," continued the farmer, "for all at once his feet seemed to slip from under him, and some of the women in the crowd gave a scream, and there he was swinging right out in the empty air, hanging by a little bit of ivy, like a spider at the end of a thread. He was a hundred feet from the ground if he was an inch, and I shut my eyes, and felt all noloow for a minute. But just then there came a hurrah from the crowd, and I looked up and saw that he'd got his foothold again, and was coming down all right. And when he touched ground the first thing he did was to give little Jim the nest and the eggs, which he'd kept safe and snug inside his jacket all the time."

"Well, that's better than I'd have thought of him, too," said Mr. Trotter, with unwilling admiration; "but, mark my words, he'll come to a bad end yet."

Whether the boy heard these complimentary remarks or not, his dark firm face moved no more than one of the statues which some of these very men were to set up in his honor years later. But all at once he started and looked round as a shrill cry of distress reached his ear, and the next moment he was flying across the street at full speed, with a flash of anger on his face which made it glow like heated iron.

Four or five big, coarse, rough-looking lads, who had been hanging round the corner of the market place, had suddenly pounced upon a small, thin, pale-faced boy, evidently meaning to plunder the big basket under the weight of which he was staggering.

"Leave 'em alone—do!" pleaded the poor little fellow; "they're for mother, and she's sick."

"Hold yer noise, and hand over them things," growled a hulking lout, who seemed to be the leader of the gang, making a clutch at the basket.

But just at that moment a blow like the stroke of a hammer dashed the bully to the ground, bleeding and half stunned, while over him strode Fighting Bob, with a gleam in his dark gray eyes such as was seen there, years later, when he looked through the rolling smoke of the great battle that decided the fate of Southern Asia.

Then, without waiting for the rest of the gang to attack him, he flew in among them like a tiger, striking right and left so fiercely that his strong brown hands seemed to be in twenty places at once.

How this unequal fight might have ended it is hard to say; for while Bob held his own gallantly in front, the hulking fellow who had been knocked down at the opening of the fray scrambled to his feet again, and prepared to attack the young champion from behind. But just at that moment three or four of our hero's school-fellows seeing a fight going on, and their chosen leader, "Fighting Bob," in the thick of it, came racing up at full speed.

The bullies had no mind to await this reinforcement, and disappeared as fast as they could down a dingy by-street, while Fighting Bob raised from the ground, as tenderly as a mother, the poor little fellow whom they had been tormenting.

As he did so he saw a hand stretched out to pick up the child's overturned basket, and, looking up, found himself face to face with a tall, upright, keen-eyed man who looked like a soldier. A soldier, indeed, he was, and a famous one—no other than the renowned Colonel John Blackadder, who had charged the French centre at Blenheim, and had been wounded at the Duke of Marlborough's side at Oudenarde.

"You're a brave lad, whoever you are," said the veteran. "What's your name?"

"Robert Clive," answered the future conqueror of India, in the tone of a general commanding an army.

"Well, you'll fight greater battles before you've done, I'll be bound," rejoined the old soldier, nodding his gray head approvingly. "I shall remember your name, for it will be heard of yet."

The Colonel was right, for both he and all Europe heard enough of that name twenty years later, when Fighting Bob came home from the East as Lord Clive, Baron of Plassey, and commander-in-chief of all the armies of British India.

THE LAMENT OF THE ALLIGATOR,

BY MARTHA CAVERNO COOK.

"WHAT trouble can be greater,
By Asks a frightened alligator,
"Than has happened to our family of late?
My brothers and my consins
Have been massacred by dozens;
And, in truth, I fear the same unhappy fate,

"We are now the ruling passion
Of those who follow fashion
Implicitly in every latest craze,
And the money market eaters
To this taste for alligators,
And seeks to serve us up in tempting ways.

"What makes the matter worse is—
Besides the bags and purses
Which ingenious wretches make from our skins,
Besides the boots and slippers—
Our teeth (those pearly nippers)
Are set with gold, and worn as jewelled pins.

"If they catch us young and tender,
Our chances are as slender
As if our precious hides were tough and old;
For they killed my baby sister,
And, before we really missed her,
She was stuffed, and for a paper-weight was sold,

"It fairly makes me shiver,
When I crawl from out the river
To take my sweet siesta in the sun,
To think of all the dangers
We risk from sporting strangers
Who murder us for profit or for fun.

"One day I met a tourist;
His aim was not the surest,
But he hunted me with ardor so intense,
In a momentary madness,
To my everlasting sadness,
I had to eat him up—in self-defence.

"Now it seems that my aggressor
Was an erudite professor,
Engaged in zoological pursuit

Of a lucius crocodilus

(As the scientists may style us),

Just to teach the young idea how to shoot.

"So I might have gone to college

With this man of wondrous knowledge,

And beautified a scientific room,

Where my sealy skin for ages,

In the company of sages,

Would have carefully preserved its youthful bloom."

WHY THEY GO WEST.

BY ALICE WELLINGTON ROLLINS.

WHAT has become of the boy who used to run away to sea? Not long ago he was a prominent feature of our social life and literature, but he has run away in good earnest at last, and it is long since we have heard anything about him. Mothers no longer tremble lest, at the very moment when Tom seems especially appreciative of the buckwheats of home, he should make the startling announcement, "Father, I want to go to sea!" But what is he doing now, that he no longer cares to go to sea?

For the mothers still tremble. There is still a thunderbolt that may fall any minute on their hearts from the boys' lips. The spirited, adventurous lad who longed in the olden time for the excitement and novelty of the hard life on board ship still longs for excitement and adventure of some kind. Some morning, when he too appears to be very much absorbed with the buckwheats, there will fall quietly from his lips the simple announcement, "Father, I wish you would let me go West!"

West? into the country of Indians and rattlesnakes, and cyclones and grasshoppers, and rough people and disappointing crops, and hard work and no society—is this to be the end of their ambition for their boy?

If, however, they have been West themselves often enough, and to the right places, they will begin to understand the boy's point of view. They may still object to his going, but they will not object quite so seriously. Not because they have seen such desirable results from Western ranching, but because they have experienced that nameless fascination of Western life which makes them capable of appreciating the boy's feeling about it. For the singular part of the Western craze is that it not only lasts, but deepens and strengthens, even through disappointments and repeated failures. The boy who ran away to sea usually came back after his first voyage completely cured, and willing to take up any life that was not on the wild rolling wave. But the boy who goes West rarely comes back to the East again, except for brief and impatient visits.

It must not be inferred, however, that this fondness for the prairie comes from finding the work less difficult or success easier than the young ranchman had expected. On the contrary, practical ranching is far harder than any one who has not tried it can imagine; and probably any great success, certainly any very sudden success, is the rare exception. On the other hand, the explanation of a good deal of the fascination undoubtedly lies in the fact of the young man's feeling that if he doesn't succeed, failure at the West is easier to bear than even limited success at the East. To be young and poor in New York, with refined and expensive tastes, and rich acquaintances doing the things you would like to do but can't afford to do, is a trial intensely irritating to young blood full of spirit, and feeling in itself the right to happiness and the ability to conquer it. At the West you cannot make much difference in your life whether you are making money or losing it. All you can possibly do is to live simply. As there is no Fifth Avenue to aspire to, so there is no Tenth Avenue to be looked down upon. The young ranchman who is doing pretty well cannot "show off" in anything but his bank account or his increased acres or animals. The young ranchman who is doing very badly need not go to bed supperless, as he would have to in New York if he happened to be without money in his pocket, and he can crawl into his bunk at night with an infinite cheerfulness born of the comforting thought that at least nobody knows how miserable he is.

I believe this, after all, to be the great factor in every young man's eagerness to try the West: "At least if I fail, I shall not be mortified."

To be sure, this apparently desirable phase has also its drawback. There are temptations in the life of a young man in a big city, where the effort to "keep up appearances" leads him into the speculations for trying to make money fast which are so apt to be fatal both to the money and to the young man's nature. But there are other temptations on the prairie of exactly the opposite kind, but still temptations: the temptation to grow indifferent to refinements or culture or grace; to think it of no consequence to sit down to dinner with clean hands; and having no interests but one's own to consider, to grow absorbed in self, indifferent both to the great political excitements moving the world, and to those opportunities for daily considering the comfort of other individuals which discipline character and give strength as well as grace.

But granting that the young man is to go, what is it that he goes to?

Certainly to far harder work than he anticipates. Whether he is rich or poor, he ought to begin prairie experience in the same way, with the practical training as to its simplest details without which he cannot hope for any great success. The young man with money and a fancied taste for ranching who buys a ranch, hires a foreman, and then settles down at a hotel in Denver, or Kansas City, or Omaha, or Taconia, with the praiseworthy intention of running down, or up, or over to his ranch once a month or so, to keep "a sharp lookout" on the management, will never succeed in ranch life nor enjoy it.

He must begin at the very foundation, with herding sheep, if he happens to have chosen a sheep ranch. He will be expected to rouse himself before dawn from his slumbers in a rude "bunk" in the wall, where, nevertheless, he has slept extremely well, to swallow a very simple breakfast, for which, however, he will have an excellent appetite, to put some thick slices of ham between some very thick slices of bread, and carry them in his pocket or a pail for the lunch, to which he will be entitled when he finds, if the day is bright, that he can put his foot on the shadow of his head, and not to come home, however foot-sore, hungry, wet with rain, or threatened with sunstroke he may be, till just before sunset. If the day is bright he starts out gayly, rather in love with the fine air and the novelty and the certainty of an easy day's work. For nothing seems simpler than to lead a gently wandering flock to the right spot on the prairie, somewhere near a clear spring, where the sheep can nibble quietly at the plentiful grass, while the happy herder throws himself on the ground, pulls out an illustrated magazine from his pocket, and beguiles the time with amusing or elevating literature.

Alas for such fond hopes! The sun grows hotter and hotter; there is no tree, not even a single bush, anywhere to be seen for miles and miles. He pulls his felt hat down over his eyes, and determines, anyway, to forget the heat in reading. But the timid, gentle herd, that seem so absorbed in feeding and to move so slowly, are really getting over the ground remarkably fast. They are slipping away from him before he knows it, and he must pocket his magazine and run after them.

Ah! how many a herder have I seen—sometimes a mere lad, sometimes a strong young fellow of twenty-five—come home at night from a first day's herding, too brave to complain, but with feet so swollen with weariness that it seemed as if he could not possibly start out again the next morning; but he does, and perhaps to even a harder day. The sky is overcast; the youth glances about, and decides that it will rain; but the sheep must go, and he has a vague impression that he would be laughed at if he took his umbrella. There seems no very good reason why one should not try to protect one's self on the prairie with umbrellas, but it is nevertheless a fact that the "tender-foot" would be unmercifully ridiculed who should take one; and indeed it is probable that the very first breeze would whirl it out of his hand in a minute, and that even if he could keep hold of it it would be no protection against the merciless sheets of rain that pour down on the prairie when it does rain.

But drenched to the skin though he may be at nine o'clock in the morning, he must not go back to the ranch till just before sunset. He used to think that a ranchman's life was infinitely easier than a farmer's; but he thinks now with a sigh of the men to whom farming has become the most lady-like of pursuits with the invention of machines that do all the hard work. But worse trials are in store: there are signs of the dreaded "scab" in the herd, and every individual sheep must be dipped in a horrid preparation of tobacco that nearly kills the herder if it saves the herd.

Then there are the busy seasons of lambing and shearing, when the men are often up all night. And oh, to go out now with a herd of lambs, skipping, frisking, dancing, running, each in a different direction, perfectly tireless, and liking no playfellow so well as the poor herder, who leaps and plunges and runs, and only fires them with still greater energy to defeat him!

Then there are the dreaded prairie fires, when no man on the ranch must think of sitting down till the fire is out, though it may rage for hours; and the terrific thunder-showers, perhaps in the middle of the night, when all hands must turn out to protect the sheep from the floods of rain. For sheep are the most delicate animals in the world; if one falls on the side of a hill, with his back down, he cannot pick himself up, and he will die in a few hours. If you miss two or three from the herd after you think they are all safely corralled for the night, you must go back on the range and hunt them up; for a ranchman never becomes so hardened to his thousands of creatures as to be indifferent to the fate of one.

Then if anything happens to make them all rush together, the chances are that many of them will die from the crowding against each other, so that when the great blocks of rock salt were put out on the range, herders had to be stationed near them on horseback to prevent the eager sheep from rushing too violently toward the coveted delicacy. And in winter there are the snow-storms; they are not violent, as a rule, though this last winter they have been unusually severe; but the slow, quiet, innocent little flakes are like the slow, quiet, innocent little sheep—capable of working infinite mischief. And often in these storms the men are up all night, relieving each other at intervals, keeping the herds clear of the accumulating drifts.

Yes, it is a hard life. Even when the young ranchman comes to the dignity of having sheep of his own, he will hardly have any easier time; for then, in addition to sharing much of the hard work with his men, he has all the responsibility, and all the disappointments of fluctuations in the market.

Then what are the compensations?

Truly, it is hard to say. The word "fascination" alone explains the charm that the life, for all its wildness, has for even the most cultivated. It is easier to particularize the difficulties than the pleasures, but the advantages may perhaps be summed up for the anxious mother in the one sentence, "Your boy will like it."

CRICKET'S CONTRIBUTION —SEE STORY ON PAGE 523

RUTH'S CRAZY QUILT

BY SYDNEY DAYRE.

"I've passed! I've passed! Only one more year of study, and then—no more hard work for poor old mother!" Ruth flung down her books, and threw her arms around her mother's neck. "Mr. Blake has promised me a school next year with good pay. Sit down, mother; you sha'n't do another thing to-night. I'll get tea. Here, Cricket—won't Cricket have plenty of new shoes when sister's making plenty of money?" And the lively girl lifted the little one to her shoulder, and seizing a pail, danced out to the spring, singing,

"Ride a fine horse to Banbury Cross."

She was the very picture of girlish health and happiness. Happiness in spite of her life of struggle, for those who know can tell that few things in life bring more joy than the overcoming of difficulties through the strength of the blessings of a loving heart and fresh young courage and energy, all borne up by bounding health. For years Ruth had shared as far as possible all her mother's cares, always looking forward to the time when she could bring her own earnings for the general help, little dreaming how far the every-day help given by her sunny sweetness of temper and her bright hopefulness went in lightening the load.

"I'll frow oo in," said the merry youngster, as she set him down beside the spring. "Zen oo be a bid fis." He gave her a little push, but she just then stooped to the water, and he lost his balance. With a little scream he seized her arm as she quickly turned to catch hold of him, and Ruth never could tell how it came about, but the sudden weight, coming in a manner for which she was not prepared, caused her to miss her footing. With a desperate effort she managed to swing the child back upon the grass, but in doing so she fell heavily upon the edges of the stones which bordered the spring.

"No, mother, I'm not much hurt; don't be frightened," as her mother ran out at sound of Cricket's cries. "But her face was white, and she could not stand up, much less walk. She was obliged to wait until some of the nearest neighbors came and carried her in.

"I'll just lie down for an hour or two," she said, trying to laugh and to hide the pain she was suffering. But hours passed into days and days into weeks of the holidays which were to have been so full of delightful recreation and of help for mother. The doctor came and went, but never looked encouraging as she would say, "To-morrow I can sit up; yes, to-morrow I surely must be up, I have so much to do before school begins in the fall."

And the summer was almost gone, when one day she looked suddenly up into his face. "Doctor, do you know that school begins the week after next?"

"I believe it does, Ruth."

"And I'm not getting strong very fast. Vacation is almost gone. I can't help that now; but—how am I going to school if I am not stronger?"

He looked pityingly at her without any answer.

"Doctor, can't I begin school when it opens?"

"No, my dear," he said, gently.

"Then when?"

He could not bear the look of appealing misery with which she gazed in his face, as if waiting a sentence of life or death.

"Oh, some time. Soon; yes, very soon, my dear," he said, soothingly. "Be a patient, brave girl until you are well again." He went out of the room.

"Mother! mother!" she cried, in an agony of dismay, as the tender face appeared at the door. "What does he mean? When can I go to school? When can I be helping you again?"

The loving arms went around and drew her close. "Oh, my daughter! my darling! the good Lord knows when. Try to bear it for His sake and for mine."

"Mother"—her face was pressed against her shoulder—"will it be long?"

"I'm afraid so, dear."

"Will it be months?"

"Perhaps."

"Years?"

No answer came.

And then Ruth turned herself, body, mind, and soul, to the wall, and felt as if all the joy had gone out of the world. There was no brightness in the sunshine, no color in the flowers, and no music in the voice of the birds. Nothing was left in it but hopeless days of pain and weariness for her, and drag and drudgery for her mother.

"It would have been better for us all if I had been taken away at once," she said one day. "I used to think I could turn everything into gold for you, mother. But that was when I was well, and thought the world was full of gold." She added, bitterly.

"You keep all your gold away from me now, Ruthie," said her mother, shaking her head sorrowfully.

"I haven't any gold left, mother; I only give you more trouble, when my heart is aching to do something for you, and it cuts me like a knife to see you work so hard."

"You can do it yet, dear. I used to find half my courage in your cheery smile and your cheery ways. It's hard to lose them when I seem to need them most, daughter."

Ruth knew it, and began wondering if it would not be better to try to help in little things, now that the great things were gone beyond her reach. Mother's dear face and the affection of the little ones who came around her with soft cooings of, "Poor sister Ruthie!" were something to be thankful for yet.

"Give me the stockings to mend, mother." It tired her at first, but she found it pleasant to be busy again. She had her lounge brought into the family room, having fully made up her heroic little mind that she would smile for mother if she could never do anything else.

"I used to do a great deal of that sort of thing," her mother said, as Ruth finished her mending by working a rose-bud in satin stitch on the front of one of Cricket's stumpy little stockings.

"Let me have their best stockings, mother. I've read that it's the fashion for children to wear embroidered stockings, so ours shall be very stylish."

The soft, pretty work seemed just suited to her strength, and she amused herself by ornamenting the stockings with delicate flowers and traceries worthy of appearing on far finer hosiery than that of the little country children.

"Look what I have found for you!" said her mother, when these were done.

Ruth exclaimed in delight over the bundle of bright silks and velvets, and began busying herself trying how the pretty things could be wrought into things still prettier. She had seen little fancy-work, but the children brought flowers, and with patient fingers, now no longer round and firm and ruddy as formerly, but thin and delicate, she copied the daisies and pansies and lilacs until they almost seemed to stand out from the silk. With little aim but to pass away the long hours, she worked piece after piece, and her mother was fond of looking them over and declaring they were as pretty as water-color paintings, which indeed they were.

"Ess, ma'am, Oofie deede 'e' posies on my toekies. S'e dess sew 'em on wiv a needle 'n' fred. I'll so oo."

Ruth from her couch could hear Cricket chatting very freely with some one at the door, and called her mother, who presently brought in a lady, followed by Cricket with one bare foot, the stocking of which he held up for inspection, in happy disregard of its streaks and stains. The visitor sat down beside Ruth, saying:

"I have been staying for a few days in the neighborhood, and I saw on Sunday some embroidered stockings on some little tots, the prettiest I have ever seen—the embroidery, I mean, and the tots too," she laughed, as Cricket still pressed his stocking upon the general attention. "And some one told me that if I came here I could see the person who worked them. You poor child, how long have you been lying here?"

The face was so bright and kind, the pressure of her hand so warm, and the voice had such a ring of earnest interest, that Ruth felt encouraged to tell all about her great trouble, and of all the trouble growing out of it, and to show her the other stockings; and she even ventured (so little did her visitor seem like a fashionable lady, or at least like Ruth's idea of a fashionable lady) to look curiously at a wonderful bag she carried.

"Crazy patchwork, you see. Did you ever make any?"

Crazy indeed it looked. Bits of silk of all colors and shades, square, round, three-cornered, oblong—every shape or no shape at all—were pieced together in a style utterly at variance with the old-fashioned ideas of careful measurement and straight seams. And from each piece a quaint bit of needle-work peeped out—a cat's head, or a squat teapot, or a sheaf of wheat, or an autumn-tinted leaf, or what not, all joined by stitches of various patterns, on which Ruth's eyes fastened.

"No, I never saw anything so beautiful," she said.

Mrs. Hill wanted some stockings embroidered. She came again, and came often, as she grew more and more interested in the young girl, and at last, in wishing her good-by, handed her ten dollars, and told her to work her best work on the silk pieces she should send her.

She worked through the fall and winter months, finding her fingers more skilful and her fancy more fertile as she went on. She had also begun putting together her own bits of work.

"I'll make a pincushion of crazy patchwork," she said to her mother.

But it grew fast; and she next said, "It will be big enough for a bag—a good-sized bag, too!" Then, "It will make a lovely sofa-pillow."

After that she rolled and basted it up to keep it clean as she worked at intervals upon it, grafting in piece after piece, beautified by the daintiest work her hands could do.

"There's a carriage coming up the hill. Who can it be?"

Ruth looked up from the apple blossom she was shading with infinite painstaking, and stared with the others at the unusual sight.

"It's stopping here—yes. It's Mrs. Hill!" The next moment she held Ruth's hands in a firm clasp.

"Ruth, I've come to take you home with me. Will you go?"

Ruth looked in her face in blank amazement. "I! Such as I to go any where?" She laughed, and then cried.

"My dear child, I've got it all arranged so that you can make the journey without pain or injury. There is to be a great exhibition of art work in the city, and I want all your work to send to it; and I want you to try change of air, if your mother can spare you. I have found just what I want," said Mrs. Hill, looking over Ruth's beautiful embroidery with great satisfaction; "something different from every one else's work. I did not send you a single pattern, because I wanted you to work out your own ideas. Fairies might have done this."

Last of all Ruth unrolled her crazy patchwork—a bundle which had not been undone for months.

"Here, mother, I have made this for you."

It had grown into bedquilt size, and was heavy with its weight of exquisite needle-work. Into it she had wrought everything in the way of lovely model or original fancy which had come to her during these months of patient waiting. Upon it her mother could read a history which brought tears to her eyes; to any one else it was a study for more than one pleasant hour.

"This must go too," said Mrs. Hill, very decidedly. "I want to show it; it will make a sensation."

This is what mother found in a letter from Ruth about six weeks after she went away. A little bit of paper had fallen from it, which waited for notice until the letter was read:

"—So you see that is ninety dollars for the work Mrs. Hill sent me. And, oh! mother darling, I've sold your quilt—the quilt I have been eighteen months making for you, and which I thought you'd keep all your life; but I know you'll forgive me. For that is the reason I am sending you a check for three hundred and ninety dollars, mother—yes, indeed! Three hundred dollars for a crazy quilt! Just think how much money these city folks must have! And they all say it is not a bit too much for the work on it.

"The way it came about: Mrs. Hill sent it to the exhibition with the other things, and one day she told me that a lady had offered three hundred dollars for it. I knew you'd be thankful enough for the money, mother, but I told them about the bits of your wedding things and grandmother's dress and the scrap of father's army coat, and the lady said I could take those out. So I'm very busy just now putting other pieces in their place, and you may be very sure I'm putting my very best work upon it, when she is paying me so much money. So, mother, look and see if you ever thought such a little bit of paper could ever mean such a heap of money. And show it to Jack and Polly and Cricket; they'll hardly believe it, but you try to make them understand. And, oh, darling mother, I'm helping you after all!"

Polly danced about, and Jack flung his hat up to the ceiling, and Cricket rolled over on the floor, while mother wiped her eyes, and wondered if the dear daughter would not come home very soon now.

But she did not. Spring grew into summer, and Cricket, who had begun to believe that pretty things were made for the sole purpose of copying in silk embroidery, mourned over every new leaf or bud or flower which he brought in, and Ruth not there to admire and "sew it." Summer wore away, and latterly Ruth had not said one word about coming home. How long those days seemed!

"Somebody's coming! Hooyah! hooyah!" shouted Cricket one afternoon in late August. Once more a carriage was making its way up the hill.

"It's Ruth!" screamed Jack, rushing in. "I saw her face. Give me a chair to help her out." He seized one, and tore down the path, with Cricket toddling after. Mother would have followed, but sat down with trembling limbs on the door-step. Some one else was coming too—some young person, for she was running up to the house with light-stepping feet; and then mother's eyes dimmed, and her strength seemed gone, for it was Ruth's own bright face which looked lovingly into hers, and Ruth's arms which held her up.

"Oh, mother, here I am. Look at me. I'm well again, and strong, and come home to help you at last."

"All the gold has come back to me," she said on the morning when she was going again to resume the studies she loved and to carry out her old cherished plans.

"Refined gold now, dear," answered her mother, as she looked in the sweet face, and could read there much which only the two years of patient suffering could have written.

"Ah, Ruth, if you hadn't settled yourself to stocking-mending when you could do nothing else, this might never have come about."

PERCHING BIRDS.

BY SARAH COOPER.

SOME of our most attractive birds belong among the "Perchers." Here are placed the sparrows, thrushes, robins, wrens, humming-birds, and other favorites of our fields and gardens. Birds of this class live in pairs, and mostly build their nests in trees, displaying great skill in their construction. Their slender, flexible toes with long claws are well suited to these delicate labors, and their legs are so weak that these dainty, graceful birds have a habit of hopping instead of walking.

The pretty little song-sparrows are among the commonest of our summer visitors. Their cheery, melodious note is repeated over and over through the long spring days from early in the morning until nearly dark. Their snug little nests are generally hidden away in a grassy bank, or placed on some low vine or bush, the male carrying the materials for building it, while the female weaves the nest. He is attentive to his mate, and when their home is completed, and she sits contentedly upon her eggs, he brings her food, and lingers near by to cheer her with his song.

The snow-bird is also one of the sparrows. Coming with the first cold weather, and staying with us through the winter, when most other birds have left us, it is a general favorite. Snow-birds mostly go to Canada and other northern countries in summer to raise their young ones. Their nests are made on the ground, near the root of a sheltering tree.

Our pretty yellow-birds, or goldfinches, also stay with us through the cold weather, but their appearance at this season is so altered by their plain winter garb that they are scarcely recognized as the same bird, and we might easily fancy that the yellow-birds had all left us. With the early spring flowers they again assume their gay coats of yellow and black, cheering the landscape with their bright color, and delighting us with their sweet songs. These birds are fond of thistle seeds, and they quickly tear to pieces the downy tufts to obtain them.

Notice the peculiar, crooked beak of the cross bill in the picture. This was formerly looked upon as a deformity, but an acquaintance with the habits of the bird shows that its bill is well suited to tear in pieces pine cones in order to reach the seeds which form its food. Clinging to a twig of the pine-tree with one foot, it grasps a cone with the other, then inserting its bill underneath the scales, it pries them apart by a sideways motion of the mandibles, and scoops out the seeds with its tongue.

Cross-bills are bright, happy birds. They fly in small flocks, often visiting our gardens and flitting among the evergreens, but their movements are very quick, and they will dart off as unexpectedly as they came.

The nest-building habits of the two-horned hornbill are exceedingly odd, as you will suspect from the picture. Having selected a hollow tree, the female takes her place within the hole, and makes a nest of her own feathers, while the male, from the outside, plasters up the hole with mud, leaving only a small opening for the beak of the imprisoned female. Through this hole she is fed by her mate until her young family is fully fledged, and she requires so much food that it is no slight task to keep her supplied.

Birds-of-paradise live only in New Guinea and neighboring islands, and there twenty different species are found. The ordinary birds-of-paradise most familiar to us are largely destroyed for the plumes of downy golden feathers growing beneath their wings. The natives who capture them usually cut off their legs; hence the mistaken notion was formerly held that these birds had no legs, that they suspended themselves by their long feathers, and that they never touched the earth while alive.

Another interesting bird of the eastern hemisphere is the bower-bird in Australia. Its chief peculiarity consists in the curious bowers which it builds of branches and twigs closely interwoven. The bowers are entirely separate from their nests, and are used only as playgrounds, where these birds meet apparently to display their charms to the birds whose affections they wish to win. The entrance is brushed perfectly clean, and decorated with bright pebbles, shells, feathers, little bleached skeletons, and other ornamental articles, which must often have been carried for a long distance.

Our Baltimore oriole is a gay bird, with rich orange and black colors. The female bird has the same markings as the male, in duller tints, and a pair of these birds forms a handsome ornament to a lawn. The males arrive first from the South, and are not joined by the females until a week later. The males are then full of song, and devote themselves to wooing and trying to secure a mate.

The nest of the Baltimore oriole, like the robin's nest, is placed near the house, and is suspended from two or more twigs by strings and threads. Through these threads is woven a sort of coarse cloth into the form of a pouch, and inside is placed the true nest of fine grass or hair.

THE TWILIGHT ELF.—By J. M. L.

WHEN the Sun, in his white cloud nightcap,
Gets tired, and says, "Good-night,"
And sinks, where the sky is reddest,
Completely out of sight.

And the man, with his torch and ladder,
Goes tramping up and down,
Setting the lamps a-glowing
And flickering through the town,

Then the little Twilight Elf,
With a laugh and a merry smile,
Slips out from his cosy corner,
And travels many a mile.

O'er land and water goes he,
This elf, with his face so mild,
And as he goes he kisses
The eyes of each tired child.

As soon as the kiss has fallen,
They follow the drowsy elf;
They climb up the Dream-land ladder,
And reach the Land of Nod.

Then all night long they travel—
The journey wondrous seems—
The elf still beside them,
A-whispering, "Pleasant dreams."

Ten O'clock.

The Children drone
In sing-song tone,
The Master's shoes creek on the Floor.
They're baking Pies
At Home, and Flies
Buzz in and out the open Door.

The Beds are made:
The Pans are laid
Out in the pleasant Sun to dry.
Good Gretchen takes
Some Dough, and makes,
For little John, a Saucer Pie.

FALSE WITNESS.

A SERIAL STORY.

By LUCY C. LILLIE,

AUTHOR OF "NAN," "ROLF HOUSE," "JO'S OPPORTUNITY," ETC.

Our readers will hail with delight the announcement of a new serial by Mrs. LILLIE, whose charming stories have won her an enviable place in the admiration and affection of thousands of young people.

"False Witnesses" will present characters as life-like, and an interest as fascinating, as any of the author's previous works, while the task of illustrating the story has been entrusted to the dexterous and sympathetic pencil of Miss ALICE BARNER, whose charming work in "Rolf House" will be remembered by those who read that story.

OUR POST-OFFICE BOX.

RED LION, OHIO.

I have two dolls; their names are Lottie and Lizzie. I have a scrap-book and a wagon. I study geography, arithmetic, and Third Reader. Santa Claus brought me at Christmas a pair of gold bracelets and a picture. I have one sister and one brother. I have a pet dog. I had a kitten, and it died. I go to school every day.

MAGGIE F.

NEWBRITAIN, MASSACHUSETTS.

DEAR POSTMISTRESS,—I take HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE, and like it very much. This is the first letter I have written to you. I have only one sister; her name is May. I have only one pet. And that is a large cut, yellow and white, and his name is Bandleon; we call him Bandy for short. I am a little boy named Henry. I go to school, and like it very much. I am nine years old.

HENRY P. R.

SCHEPPE, WISCONSIN.

DEAR POSTMISTRESS,—We have taken HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE since Christmas, and like it very much, especially "Jo's Opportunity," which my oldest sister reads aloud to us. I say so, as there are five girls in our household, besides myself (I am eight) and the others younger. Our home is at the head of Lake Superior, and is a lovely place in summer, when the bay is free from ice, and we can go boating. Across the bay is Minnesota Point, which is a beautiful place for picnic parties, as also is a nice point a little farther distant, in our own State. Some of the largest boats on the lake visit this place in the shipping season, loaded with coal and iron. My papa is the editor of the Superior Times, and sets type for him. I have for two cats and some chickens, which I help take care of. I go to school, and study grammar, spelling, reading, arithmetic, and writing, and like my teacher very much.

ALICE CARY C.

ALLEGHENY,

PENNSYLVANIA.

I am twelve years old. I live in the city, I have two big brothers and one sister. I do not go to school; I study at home. I have seven pet rabbits, named Pink, Tod, and Dr. Tanner.

NELLIE MAY M.

CAVE SPRING, GEORGIA.

I live near the pretty little village of Cave Spring. It has a cave and a spring, from which it gets its name. In the summer boarders come from further south to enjoy this pretty place. I have one dog, named Charlie; he is a big dog. I have two cats, one for a Christmas present. I am nine years old. I wish some boy of my age would write in the Post-office Box to me.

ELBERT J.

Having taken HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE for some time, and read letters from many children, I thought I too would write. I am very fond of books, and I like best are Louisa M. Alcott's works, Longfellow's poems, and Dickens's novels (my favorite being Old Curiosity Shop). I should be very happy if some girls of my age (thirteen years) would write to me, and I will answer promptly.

EMILY SHIELDS.

3 Collins Block, Woodburn Street,
East Walnut Hills, Cincinnati, Ohio.

ESPENAY, INDIANA.

DEAR POSTMISTRESS,—I thought I would write and tell you about the "Pop-corn Man." That is what he is called, because he has a very large wagon, all lined around the top with white and yellow paper to wrap the balls in, and there is a very small stove, on which he pops the corn where every one can see him. It does look so delicious, and it is because you can say it hot and see it made, and then, if you put some butter and salt on it, I think it is still better. I only wish you could have some of it. I go to a school called Classical School, and take study, arithmetic, grammar, spelling, reading, writing, and gymnastics. We have eleven dogs, eight of them being pigs, two herring dogs, and one a little Borelem spaniel that came all the way from Scotland in a basket. At the Glasgow dog show his mother took the first prize, and he the second. I write very well now, because I have to study my lessons.

NELLIE A.

BROOKLYN, NEW YORK.

I am a little girl ten years old. I go to school, and study reading, writing, drawing, and arithmetic. I have a pet cat named Daisy. I have two sisters and one dear little brother. My sister has written this for me, because I can not write very well yet, but I have told her what to write.

EDITH H.

HOSPITAL FOR THE INSANE, MIDDLETOWN, CONNECTICUT.

I thought, as so many of your readers write to me, and study reading, writing, drawing, and arithmetic, and tell a few interesting facts about the hospital. There are three large buildings, the main one built of stone, the other two of brick. My home is a pleasant new house on the grounds, built for the superintendent.

The three buildings altogether contain over one thousand of these people. The superintendent and the doctors invite different people to lecture or give entertainments. There is a large amusement hall and a very nice stage. The doctors and attendants give very nice plays. In the winter they have roller-skating and dancing; it is very amusing to see some of the patients try to skate and dance. We have chess, and different numbers and professors from the college preach on Sunday afternoons; the patients enjoy the service, and are as still as same people. It is a sad sight to go through the ward, although many of the patients are very happy, and others harmless. I never feel afraid of them, as I have lived here about twelve years of my life, and am used to seeing them. I have a private school, and study arithmetic, grammar, English history, and French; I like history and French the best. I have taken HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE for three years, and like it very much.

ALMA E. F.

MERRIM, OHIO.

I am a little girl nine years old. My brother Artie takes HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE, and I like it very much. I like to read the letters which the little children write. I have a little kitten which has one blue and one yellow eye, and I have some nice plants, and one is in blossom. My brother Lou has a guitar, and I have a melodeon. I wish to see a dog; he is blind, but his name is Sheep; he is a good watch-dog. My papa and one of our neighbors made maple sugar this spring; they opened 750 trees.

MAMIE E. B.

GERMANTOWN, PENNSYLVANIA.

I am a little Spanish girl ten years old. We are now living in Germantown, six miles from Philadelphia. I have two brothers and three sisters. My sister and myself take this charming paper. I think "Jo's Opportunity" was a splendid story. Does "Jo" live in England? I wish to see it. I should like to know how much it is.

QUINITTA.

No. "Into Unknown Seas" is not published as a book.

OPHELIA, ALABAMA.

I am ten years old, and love to read HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE, and I am much interested in the Post-office Box. I wrote to Annie S., and received a beautiful letter in reply. She sent me some pressed English roses—timothy, daisies, and magnonette. I go to school, and study arithmetic, philosophy, dictation, history, geography, and French. I have a dog, and I wish to see it. I would be very glad to correspond with a little girl in France or Germany.

MATTIE LOUISE ROSS.

NEW SALEM, MASSACHUSETTS.

I took HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE in the year 1882. This year my sister and I take it together. I am thirteen years old; my sister is eleven. I have two brothers and three sisters. I wish to see it. I should like to know how much it is. I like to pick out the puzzles, but I do not send in the answers. I think "Jo's Opportunity" is a very interesting story. Will some of the little readers or the Postmistress please tell how to play some interesting games that can be played by any number of players out-doors and in-doors? I have one pet squirrel, and he is just as cunning and pretty as he can be. We had some very pretty kittens, but they died. We felt sorry.

GUYA S.

You will find directions for two or three pleasant games in the Post-office Box this week. Please send in your answers to puzzles hereafter.

TORONTO, CANADA.

DEAR POSTMISTRESS,—I am a Canadian girl twenty years old. I have taken HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE since January, and I think it is a lovely paper. I have no pets, but once I had a pretty little kitten, and it lost itself. I took a great deal, and I thought I would send a receipt for the Little House-keepers. I will put it at the end of my letter. I have been to England twice, and I like it very much. I learn French, drawing, and a number of English lessons. My greatest friend's name is Lilla A. L., and every Saturday we take turns in going to each other's homes to cook.

GRACE E. E.

LOISAN JELLY.—Half a packet of gelatine, soaked in water about ten minutes; then wash it in a potato-masher two large lemons, or three small ones, taking away all the juice; then pour the water from the gelatine and wash it in the process with it, and boil. Let it boil until all the gelatine has been dissolved; then strain through a piece of fine muslin into the mould and let it then stand out in the cold air for a half-hour.

FORT MONROE, VIRGINIA.

I am a little army girl, and my father is a first lieutenant in the Second Artillery. We are only stationed here for two years; our tour will be up in September. This is an artillery school.

Officers are sent here for two years, after which they go back to their regiments. This is a lovely fort. Outside, about one hundred yards distant, is the Hygeia Hotel, accommodates one thousand people; at this time it is full. Being a little army girl, I have no permanent home; I have lived in Iowa City, Fort Worth, Fort Carolina (this fort is right in the little village of Smithville, at the mouth of the Cape Fear River, about twenty-four miles from Wilmington); from this castle we went to the Arsenal, Washington, now called Washington Barracks; from there we were ordered to this post. I am commending one to go to Mount Vernon Barracks, Alabama. I have no pets. Last summer I raised lots of chickens; the little things were so cute and lovely. I have not time to write you any letters. Who you can find room for this letter.

MAGGIE TURNER S.

DEBUNKING, ONTARIO.

I am a boy ten years old. I go to school; I study arithmetic, drawing, verbal diction, grammar, reading, geography, and writing. I love I have two chickens, a bird, and a cat. Eva and I have a calf. I have two sisters. Eva has a cat which will jump about four feet. I have two birds. I hope there will be room for this letter, as it is the first one I have written. My brother-in-law gave me HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE for a Christmas present. I think it is lovely. I was highly interested in "Jo's Opportunity"; I am now reading "Silent Pete." I live in a large house, with a large garden in front of it, with trees and flowers. Good-by.

CHARLIE N.

COTTONS, NEW YORK.

My sister takes HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE, and I enjoy having the stories read to me, as I am only six. I wanted my sister to send you a letter with one of our tea parties in it, but she has not time. I have asked my auntie to write for me. I tell her what I wish to say to you. I began to go to school in April. I read in the Second Reader. We speak pieces every two weeks. I learn mine by having it read to me; I think I learn easily to speak them. Oh, dear Postmistress, I wish you could be here, and go in the woods with sister and me; you would be delighted to see the wild flowers. But, best of all, I wish you could see my grandmother's flowers. Her yard is just splendid.

Next week the tulips will be grand, some mornings, after the sun gives them a peep, we have counted them by hundreds. Do you know that nearly all the flowers go to sleep at night? My sister says so, and she knows, for she has so many, many years watched them. What a pretty thing for flowers to sleep at night, like children. We have a farm, and we have young lambs, chickens, goslings, and ducks; they are so soft and nice, just like a bunch of down. I think it would be so nice for you to see all the trees in blossom—apple, plum, pear, cherry, pear—and the green grass, instead of those tire-some pavements and brick walks, to rest your feet on. I wish I could bring you here by wishing. Sister and I could amuse you for some time. Wishing you would receive my flowers kindly, I am one of your last friends.

HENRY F. B.

Thank you for the flowers, Harry. I wish I could see grandmother's garden, and sister and you.

AN OUT-DOOR GAME.

My Household.—Gather all the boys and girls, form them in a circle with hands clasping, and select one to stand in the middle of the ring. Let each child choose an animal: dog, cat, parrot, rabbit, bear, wolf, lion, mouse, etc. When each has selected his or her animal, the one in the middle must sing the following words, making care to introduce a different animal in every stanza:

"I had a little rooster, and my rooster pleased me;
I fed my rooster beneath that tree;
My rooster went to cockery-cooery."
Other kids feel their rooster.

"I had a little lamb, and my lamb pleased me;
I fed my lamb beneath that tree.
My lamb went bla-a-a.
Other kids feel their lamb,
I fed my lamb too."

And so on. When the proper time comes, the child who represents an animal must imitate its cry, and the children who have already figured must join in with their cries. As this is not a very quiet game, it would be well to play it on a lawn or in a field at a little distance from the house. It might give mamma a headache or distress the nerves, and very much better to avoid disturbing papa if we were reading the newspaper; but it is a very innocent as well as fun-provoking game, and if you all lived in my house, I should certainly let you play it. Perhaps you might even persuade me to be the one in the middle. Another version of the rhyme was printed in the last number of HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE.

ANOTHER GAME.

Frog-Pool.—Each child must practice hopping like a frog. One child must be the duck that tries to catch the frogs. Escaping from the duck, every little froggie must have a den in which the duck does not dare to touch him. This is the frog's song:

"Come, friends, the moon is up,
It's pleasant out here on the bank—
I'll stick my stick in the water,
And let us sit, before we snip,
Go 'Kough, kough, kough."
And let us sit, before we snip,
Go 'Kough, kough, kough."

"'Kough, kough, kough,'" you must croak exactly like a frog; and do not let the duck gobble you up, for if you do, you must then be the duck yourself.

For evening amusement in the parlor, I know no pleasanter game than "Come to Come"; Anna says, "Come to come." Mabel inquires, "What do you come by?" She answers, "I come by c' or 'by's," or "by p," as may happen, giving the first letter of something in the room, which all the children proceed to guess. Whoever first guesses the right word has the privilege of giving out another. It is very amusing to listen to the different guesses, as many things may be in a room and quite hidden from sight, as, for example, the lining under the carpet, the nails on which the pictures hang, or the springs in the easy-chair. Sometimes a letter is chosen which indicates an article in plain sight, and just because it is so easily viewed it is the last thing guessed.

The out-door games here given are more fully described in Games and Songs of American Children, published by Messrs. Harper & Brothers.

BOOKS, MASSACHUSETTS.

DEAR POSTMISTRESS,—I thought I would write to you to-day, as I have not much to do. Some little girls and I have a literary club; there are six of us. We meet every Saturday, and make a book of brown paper. In this book we paste stories, poems, pictures, and puzzles that we write or find ourselves. Some of the books must be original, but the pictures may be copied. On the following Saturday the president reads the book aloud, and we then make another. We choose characters from Little House. ALICE W. T.

A very happy thought to make a book in that pretty way. Your club deserves to be very successful.

Elise C.: I do not wonder that you enjoy our Post-office Box. I think it is really unique, and if you will hunt up that word in the dictionary, I am sure you will agree with me. How can a Post-office Box help being charming when so many charming young people take an interest in it? Trachten: To write stories and illustrate them too is to do very clever work, and I am delighted that you can amuse yourself in so pleasurable a manner.—Eva B.: Try again, and make an enigma on some other theme than your name: it is not easy for children to guess an enigma to which the answer is somebody's name, to which they have no clue. Do you not enjoy writing letters? Well, many people say the same, but most of us enjoy receiving them. And if you wish to receive letters, you must write them. It is not that fair.—Lettie G. B., Mary M. W., M. C. C., Bessie Josephine E., Ida G., A. G. E., Ida M., and Kate R., Harry M. L., Harry W., Eliza P., Myrtle E., Ethel B., Eve H., Maude B., Herbert C., Emma B. I am so sorry, dear, but there is not room for your story. Freddie J., Nina L. B., Edith B. (your story also is very pretty, but cannot be published for the little letters must always come first. Marion W., C. Lester O., N. B., M. H. M., Charlie B., M. L., Mary B. W.'s name is on Annals; we received some pleasant memorials, dear, of that delightful old city, May Be, Mamie J. D., Dora B., Louis W., Robert M., Ida E., W. H. L., Albert S., and Marion Lucy O.: Will each of these dear children accept for himself or herself the thanks of the Postmistress for the letter which cannot appear in the Post-office Box. There are thousands of you writing me, dear, and if you will count the letters in this number you will see how impossible it is to publish everybody's letter. Some, which are acknowledged in this list, have been kept some time in the hope that room might be found for them. The little correspondents may all write again. The Postmistress is always pleased to hear from them.—Allen G.: "Rabbits as Pets" was published in HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE, No. 133, May 16, 1882.

Exchanges are reminded to read the notice of the publishers at the head of the column. Many disappointments and misunderstandings would be prevented if there was always an exchange of letters or postal cards, explaining everything fully, before the articles which you so much prize were sent away.

I hope every one who uses the Exchange column will try to act with perfect honor and honesty. It would often be well, other things being equal, to effect exchanges, especially of large or heavy articles, with young people residing near your own home, so that there would be less expense in the way of postage or express rates. If you have only a few hundred stamps or specimens, you know that you cannot keep on exchanging to the number of thousands, and so it will be well to be quite sure that you are satisfied as to your correspondent's terms and articles before you exchange at all.

Please send each kind of communication by itself to the publisher; answers to puzzles on one sheet, puzzles on another, and exchanges always on a separate sheet.

A COACHING PARTY.

SEAL AND CYGNET.

BY JOSEPHINE POLLARD.

A SEAL had crawled from out the tank,
And lay asleep upon the bank—
A very great comparison
To one who has his sea-legs on.

Within the tank a white swan kept
Its stately way; the seal still slept;
And all was peaceful and serene,
With not a cloud upon the scene.

But presently the seal awoke,
And saw a chance to play a joke.
He winked his eye, he flapped his fin,
The tank so near he tumbled in.

The swan extends its wings in fright
And screams, and skips with all its might,
While those who stand along the shore
Wonder what causes this uproar.

The mystery they understand
When Mistress Swansdown comes to land,
The seal in tow, who, just for play,
Has torn her rearmost plumes away.

Perhaps he needed such a quill
To write a letter or a will,
Or sought in this way to reveal
The cygnet's likeness to a seal.

THE EARTH'S CHILDREN.

BY WILLIAM H. HAYNE.

THE flowers and the grass must be Devoted to each other,
For they can claim with equal love
The old Earth for a mother.

I fancy when the Earth was young
She told the birds and bees;
"My children are the grass and flowers,
My grown folks are the trees."

SOAP-BLIND.

"Where's that towel? Seems it must be over here somewhere."

"Rough as a gunny-sack. Whew! it's my best coat instead of the towel."

CHAPTER I.

THE PIERSONS.

"THERE! that is done, I declare, and it doesn't look so bad either."

Fanny Pierson, saying this, turned toward her mother and sister for approval. On her blond masses of hair was perched a bewitching dark red velvet "toque," the result of her afternoon's labor, and Miss Fanny, smiling serenely, did not need the duct of approbation with which her work was received.

"I declare you are a genius, Fan," exclaimed Louise, the younger sister. "I'm sure no milliner could have done better."

"Well, I hope it will have some effect," said Fanny, gayly, with another look into the mirror, which reflected a pretty pink and white doll face, blue eyes, rather a sharp mouth, and a round chin scarcely strengthened by the deep dimple which was Miss Fanny's special pride.

Mrs. Pierson leaned back in her arm-chair, regarding her eldest daughter with admiration and pride. "Fanny was decidedly the beauty of the Pierson family—far and near," as the mother would have said. "If strangers often found something more attractive in Louise's plain, sweet face and its look of patient content, neither the mother nor elder sister understood it: Fanny's wax-doll prettiness was so obvious, the grace of her slim figure so noticeable, and then her voice was, to use the family expression, so "divine."

Just what use this heavenly organ was to be put to no one had yet decided, but the Piersons expected a triumph somewhere, either with the voice or the ten supple fingers which Fanny rattled over scales and in and out of sonatas daily, feeling herself a prodigy, and quite content with the admiration her family and particular friends lavished upon her until the supreme time came when she was to electrify an entire public.

"I tell you what it is," said Fanny, still studying her reflection; "I hope it won't be copied right off by half the girls in town. Do you remember the way they acted about my muslin hat last summer?"

Mother and sister murmured a sort of assent, and Fanny continued:

"That Leigh girl wears a sort of a toque; she looked at her own somewhat doubtfully. "It's old and shabby, to be sure. This will start all the others, I'm afraid."

"Never mind; yours is the first," said cheerful Louise.

And Fanny, smiling again, said: "That's so," and fastening it a little more securely upon her fluffy waves of hair, began to search for her gloves.

The room in which the family party was assembled was a sort of back sitting-room in the house which the Piersons had occupied in Halcorn, Connecticut, since Louise was a baby and her mother left a widow. It was an old-fashioned cottage on one of the principal streets branching off from what was known as The Avenue, where the wealthiest and most exclusive Halcorn families lived; people like old Miss Dyer, whose house with its gambrel-roof was historical; like Dr. Clinton, the principal physician; Mr. Crane, the leading mill-owner; and at one end, back of an elm-planted lawn, Mrs. Mostyn's fine old stone mansion, with its gardens, conservatories, picture-gallery, and endless attractions, making the young people of Halcorn wonder why Mrs. Mostyn cared to leave it six months of the year, and long for the day when her nephew Guy would be old enough to leave school and settle down with his adopted mother.

A little more refinement would have made the Piersons' house a very attractive one, but unfortunately Mrs. Pierson was one of those women with no idea whatever of the beauty of grace in a home, whether it be in the decoration of a sitting-room or the modulation of a voice in the family circle. Fanny's taste was for everything showy, and Louise was of too little consequence to have her ideas taken into consideration; so rather cheap chromos and photographs in flimsy frames adorned the walls of the front parlor and the little sitting-room; what Fanny called the "latest thing" in crevel-work, of glaring colors and on poor stuff, was made into portières and mantel hangings, and the horse-hair or wicker furniture was on company occasions arranged at angles which took away from its homely appropriateness, and deprived the room of looking even as well as it might, while its every-day appearance was of general untidiness or a hurried-up sort of dusting and putting to rights at inconvenient hours.

Fanny attended the Academy, or principal private school in the town, where she was supposed to be one of the favorite pupils, and indeed she was popular both with teachers and the girls; her pretty face and manners, her quickness in learning by rote, her facility for carrying the class over hard places, and her general good-humor made her an easy and profitable pupil, while among the young people of Halcorn the fifteen-year-old school-girl, with her dimpling laugh and her bright eyes, was noted for that sort of wit which seems so valuable to many young minds, but which unfortunately requires some personal peculiarity for its purpose. In school, Fanny's so-called witty sarcasms were quoted and laughed over by her own particular set; the flippant, rattling comments she made upon teachers, new scholars, visitors, etc., etc., were regarded by her friends as most worthy of imitation.

But occasionally there came a period when, having exhausted her field, Fanny's chief occupation was gone. Such a time seemed to have fallen upon her a few weeks before. School offered not the slightest animation to Fanny. She came and went, yawned through the classes, talked the old subjects threadbare, and could find nothing new under the sun with which to start a laugh or cause any excitement. Perhaps, had her companions known it, Fanny came nearer in those days than she ever did before to abandoning her foolish ideas, for better things began to interest her. Activity of some sort was absolutely necessary to the girl, and the mere conning and reciting of lessons did not satisfy her. Suddenly an object for her interest or curiosity appeared.

Coming into the school-room one cold day like a full-blown rose in a gale, Fanny's eyes detected at once that something unusual had occurred.

The group of girls around the fire had evidently been whispering eagerly together, and glances of varied meaning from half a dozen pairs of eyes were shot at Fanny, whose entrance was welcomed by voices high and low, shrill and drawling, the principal demand being that she should "hurry up" and "come and hear."

Now it must be confessed that Fanny preferred being the one to give rather than receive any information, but school life had been so dull of late that any diversion was regarded by her as a boon. So she had joined the other girls very graciously, only remarking, as two or three began talking together, "Pray remember two ears can only stand one tongue at a time"—a sally which produced a laugh, Belinda Myers, the tallest and most excited in the group, flushing a little as she answered, "All right; you'll be sorry not to hear me first."

And there was a general murmur of disappointment an instant later as a door was heard to open. Miss Leroy entered, followed by a girl of about Fanny's age, and Belinda said, in a tone of suppressed elation, "There now, Fan, you can't hear about the new girl until recess."

CHAPTER II.

THE NEW PUPIL.

MISS LEROY came into the school-room with something less brisk and vivacious than usual in her manner. She was a tall, bright-faced, handsome, middle-aged lady, whom every one in Halcorn liked and respected—a woman of pleasant words and kindly ways, but perhaps not given to reaching the depths of her pupils' affections. The warmth and enthusiasm of their love was reserved for her younger, more timid, and less brilliant sister Jane, who rarely came into the school-room, but was house-keeper and general provider of comforts, material and mental, for all the girls. To Miss Jane every one of the pupils, boarders or day scholars, carried her joys and sorrows. Many a question considered too trivial for Miss Leroy's time or attention was settled by tender-hearted little Miss Jane, who, in spite of a dread of ever interfering with her more important sister's province, continued to have a great deal to say where the girls' actual comforts were concerned.

Naturally enough it took a new scholar a long time to understand this. The girl who, with an evident shrinking, followed Miss Leroy into the large school-room on this winter morning, had not heard of Miss Jane as yet. She had come late the day before, had gone out soon afterward, and now was for the first time to be formally presented to her companions.

Twenty pairs of eyes were turned upon the stranger. But even before Miss Leroy spoke one word, Fanny Pierson had observed everything—the young girl's dress and general bearing; had decided she was poor and rather plain, and, in fact, a "nobody." But Belinda's hint made her keener to detect something unusual. As she stood still, Fanny swiftly decided that the girl had a "mystery" about her of some kind or description, and might it not be as well to conclude that she was "sly"? Just what meaning this adjective conveyed to her mind Fanny could hardly have explained, and perhaps it was the very vagueness of the word that commended it to her. Whatever of a questionable nature might be found against the character of the new-comer, Fanny Pierson could always point to the fact that she had from the first known her to be "sly."

A girl of fifteen or thereabouts was the new pupil—tall and slender, with a very childish though earnest face, certainly not justifying Fanny Pierson's swiftly formed opinion. Nothing could have been franker or more honest than the expression of the dark eager eyes that were fixed with a gentle sort of pleading upon the group of girls standing at a distance from her, and nothing more indicative of firmness of character than the lines of the mouth and chin; while if the face, with its framework of soft dark hair, was plainer than Fanny's pink and white countenance, there was something about it very attractive, and certainly suggestive of maidenly gentleness and high spirit combined.

The new-comer was dressed neatly, but so plainly that it amounted, indeed, to shabbiness. Her clothes had a well-worn, well-brushed, and carefully mended aspect, which suggested the toil and perhaps privation of her home, but no further complaint could be made; and as she stood waiting to be introduced to her new companions there was a certain air of dignity about her, which, had Fanny not been bent on another kind of criticism, she could not have failed to be impressed by or to appreciate.

But, as I have said, Fanny's state of mind was antagonistic, and she had been too long without any object upon which to vent her wit and sarcasm. The title of the "Marchioness" for the new pupil rushed into her giddy head, based on the recent reading of Old Curiosity Shop, and an idea that anything so opposed to the new-comer would be funny, and she longed for an opportunity to give the girls the benefit of her brilliant idea. Fanny, indeed, was fond of giving everybody a title of some sort. She intended to be sarcastic and witty, and it had sometimes chanced that these nicknames, passing from one to another of her companions, reached the ears of those so called, and produced a feeling of animosity, if not of wounded pride. But Fanny had not received, so far, many lessons; she had, for some reason or another, glided over all the rough places made by her own folly, and had yet to learn that anything particularly unpleasant to herself might be the result of her fondness for sarcastic wit and small gossip.

"Young ladies," said the voice of Miss Leroy, "allow me to introduce to you a new pupil, Agnes Leigh. Belinda," the teacher added, addressing the owner of that name, "will you take Agnes to the desk next to yours—the one which Sadie Jennings left last week?"

No more could then be said. Class work was to begin in five minutes. Belinda led the new pupil off to the desk at her side, the other girls fell into their places, and although a great deal of half-suppressed whispering went on, books had to be opened, for the French master, M. Le Maître, was not one who tolerated any confusion during his hour of recitation.

When M. Le Maître addressed the new-comer in French, and was answered by Agnes in fluent words and with a very good accent, the girls stared a little, but to Fanny it only increased her feeling of animosity. When and how had this girl, with her shabby dress and—according to Miss Pierson's standard—half-formed manners, acquired the language over which she was struggling almost in despair? Decidedly there was something back of this; and so on during the morning Fanny fed the flame of her suspicions, until, before the hour of the general recess at mid-day, she had decided that the new pupil must have something in her history which, if found out, would be very unpleasant.

The recess bell had hardly sounded before Belinda and Fanny had rushed tumultuously to each other, the former delighted to find that her admiration and model, Fanny Pierson, was anxious for all the information she could give.

"Now, then," was Fanny's prompt exclamation, "do tell me, Belinda, all you know about her. Did you ever see such a looking dress? When she stood up I saw a large patch in the side breadth which her black apron could not hide."

"She comes from Boston, I believe, or somewhere near there," said Belinda, breathlessly; "and do you know she has not a soul belonging to her here, and she is boarding all by herself at Mrs. Jones's, and I believe she does some of the family house-work for her board?"

"Mrs. Jones!" Fanny exclaimed; "why, she lives just across the way from us! Now I know! I saw her arrive last week. She came up in the depot back with a boy about seventeen years old, who went away and left her. What does Miss Leroy say?" added Fanny, knowing that Belinda as a boarder would be likely to hear more from the school-mistress herself.

"I heard her say to Miss Jane that she hoped we girls would be kind to Agnes Leigh," returned Belinda, with a sort of sniff, "and not mind her being poor and shabby; and then I heard Miss Jane say, 'I hope they won't make it unpleasant for her about her father.'"

By this time a half-dozen of the girls had gathered near, while the object of their discussion was seated at her desk writing so eagerly that it was evident she had entirely forgotten the fact that her fate among the Halcorn school-girls hung in the balance.

"OUR SISTER."

BY MARY D. BRINE.

HAVE you never seen our sister? Take a look at her to-day. I tell you she's a master-hand at mischief, romp, and play. Father calls us "his four fellows." There's Hal and Will and me, and sister Flo she makes the fourth; papa's "tomboy" is she.

But we—we wouldn't change her for the best real boy at hand. There is no game a fellow plays that Flo can't understand. She pulls an oar, I tell you, like any fellow out. And when it comes to playing ball, Flo knows what she's about.

Climb trees! Aha! a squirrel's a goose to sister Flo: Why, there was never tree so high that she dared not to go, and coasting! You should see her fall face down on her sled; and be a fellow ne'er so swift, Flo always shoots ahead.

She wins no end of marbles; we're all afraid of Flo. You needn't think 'cause she's a girl we let her beat—oh no! She'd see right through that business, for our Flo is mighty 'cute, though we wear the knickerbockers and she the "misses' suit."

She runs, she shouts, she "yodels" as we other fellows do. You can't play leap-frog with us, though I think she'd like to, too. That's about the only thing that she never yet has tried; but in all things else she's with us, neck to neck, and side by side.

Oh, we're sorry for those fellows whose sisters "put on airs." That kind of girl who only for her dress and "fixings" cares. Give us our tomboy sister, our mischief-loving Flo—Just one of us "four fellows," the best boy of all, you know.

A TALK ABOUT CRICKET.

BY HOWARD A. TAYLOR.

SHOULD this number of HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE be the centre of a little group who have gathered this evening on the tree-shaded porch of some large country farm-house, with its white sides gleaming in the descending sun, the reader of the party will note perhaps the fading light, and hurry on over the remaining pages. Possibly he is the captain and catcher of his village "nine," and when his eye glances upon anything connected with cricket, he thinks of the Fourth of July, his patriotism and his base-ball, and hastily passes on with a snuff of disgust.

Another group of young folks are seated at the same time around the library lamp in some city house, wondering why they ever had to be born in such a place, where no green fields stretch out for play-grounds, but where instead only the big policeman is visible, with his face peering around the corner of the street, a hindrance to all fun, and only made to trouble small boys. But the young folks in the library, and the old folks too, have lately wondered about this to some purpose, and the number of cricket clubs whose pretty grounds are now bordering the large towns and cities of the East attest the popularity of the old game in its new hands.

Every afternoon the cricketers are crowding the way-trains from Philadelphia to its suburbs, and from twenty such places as Nicetown and Stenton and Ardmore and Belmont the shouts of the players are mingling with the whack of the batting and the whiz of the hard balls as they fly through the air. Just outside of Boston, at Longwood and Cambridge and Jamaica Plain, the practice nets are now up, and hundreds of boys and young men are getting into form for the next match. A cricket bat is seen here and there of a summer afternoon on the deck of a Staten Island ferry-boat, or with its owner crossing the North River to the St. George's grounds in Hoboken. Baltimore, Detroit, and Chicago present the same sights, and the "Stars," the "Alerts," and various other "nines" seem lately to have been pretty much left by the city boys to the care of the street Arabs. During this last year the official authorities in Boston and New York have each set apart separate grounds for the old-time game. And so all these facilities for play have proved a great piece of good luck for thousands of boys who had formerly no other play-ground than a city lot. We can certainly adopt cricket as an American game.

No doubt there is many a boy who can well remember that happy moment when his first good-sized trout was safely landed, or perhaps when his new pony first successfully brought him over that little fence in the field behind the farm-house, or when that home run of his snatched the victory away from the "nine" who lived in the town across the river. Then if he has well before him all these remembrances, he can pile them up one on top of the other, leave plenty of room for more between, and he will form some idea of that blissful hour—for it lasts more than a moment—that he made his first big cricket score. He went to the bat perhaps a little nervous, and was half surprised that the first ball didn't take his wicket at once. But his confidence returned, and pretty soon the balls were skimming over the field on this side or that, while running between the wickets was not the least trouble so long as some disgusted fielder was running too, though for a different purpose.

Finally, after a good hit for four to the border, he was a bit careless, and down went his wicket. But it really didn't matter, for the game was won for the side, and its best part was yet to come, as he ran up to the club-house blushing and smiling, his hat raised a little from his head, and hearing the last of the applause only as the door of the club-room shut behind him, and he was ready to dress for home, and hear the battle told again and again.

Yes, cricket taken rightly is the most fascinating of sports. But, such as no other, it requires the utmost attention and practice. And so it must be set down as a disagreeable but true warning that those who have not the facilities for joining some club, and being taught to play in correct style, will never be able to find the true pleasures in the game, will never see that hour whose delights are chronicled above. But if a number of boys club together, they may not be able to afford a professional to teach them the game, yet they can doubtless find some Englishman who may be a "bit out of form," perhaps, but has not forgotten the right way. But before they start in there is one other thing to remember. The general quality of their grounds may not be of particular moment if they do not object to an occasional knock on the nose, but without a twenty-five yard square of perfectly level turf which can absolutely be depended upon for a correct bound, the batting cannot be worthy of the name.

The description of the game itself can be found elsewhere by such boys as do not know it already, for it is only intended here to give a few hints on some of the plays. For this purpose it is best to divide the game into its three departments—fielding, bowling, and batting—remembering always that through every part of the game extend the three "p's" (named in order of their importance) that constitute a basis for every successful player. They are "patience, pluck, and practice."

Cricket fielding is what has chiefly brought the game into disrepute in this country, and yet I fancy that the first time our base-ball captain of the farm-house porch gets in the way of a swift "liner" he will find it a more difficult job to hold on than if he was merely playing at short stop on his nine. The fielding, however, goes upon the same principle in both games. Base-ball requires a greater quickness of thought on account of the varied nature of a fielder's duties. Remember that in cricket there is nothing to do but to get the ball as quickly as possible, and, unless specially ordered by the captain, to return it every time to the wicket-keeper. There is no use commenting on "fly catches." A boy isn't worth much who doesn't take to them naturally. As regards the "grounders," it is always best to run for such a point in fielding the ball as will enable the fielder to arrive there first, fielding on the run always being a bad plan. Always field with feet touching, and the knees as little bent as possible. Face the coming ball directly when possible, and put out both hands to it squarely, instead of making a flying dab at it with one, and then a grimace as it passes.

The bowler holds the one position in the game that requires a good head, and in bowling this should always be kept in mind. In order to get a correct "pitch,"* he should see to it, even in practice, that the wickets are the correct distance (twenty-two yards) apart. Young players in learning to bowl are too anxious to acquire speed, or "pace," and this idea usually so upsets all their other bowling qualities that they become total failures in the art. Accuracy and "pitch" are the great essentials, and until they are acquired nothing further should be attempted. It is a good plan to practise bowling without a batsman, simply endeavoring to hit a piece of white paper fixed securely on the ground, eight on nine feet from the batsman's wicket, in a direct line between the "stumps" (wickets). A bowler who has perfect pitch and accuracy, even with nothing else, is not to be despised by the best batters.

It is a better plan to bowl from "around the wicket" than from "over the wicket," as in the latter case the ball, coming directly at right angles, is easier for the batter to gauge. The next accomplishments to be acquired are the "spins." "Shooters" (balls which do not rise from the ground after pitching) are generally a matter of luck. Last of all comes speed, which to an inferior batsman is an obstacle, but not at all so to experts.

A thorough command once attained over the ball, the bowler must next bring in his head-work. He should endeavor, before the game, to find out the peculiarities of each opposing batsman, and place his field and suit his bowling accordingly. Pace, pitch, spin should all vary continually. But of course suggestions on this score are unnecessary to a boy of fair common-sense. Mr. George Wright, perhaps the most successful amateur bowler of America, finds a varied pace of more use than any other change. After one swift delivery, a slow ball straight on the wicket is often sufficient to put the batsman into enough of a hurry, and lead to a most thorough "hole in his bat" and his immediate disappearance from the scene of action.

But, after all, in the batting lies the great beauty and skill of the game. The first thing to recollect is that though plenty of science is necessary for good batting, it is strictly a mechanical performance. There is one and only one correct method of meeting every ball. A little variation of free or close hitting is sometimes allowed in consideration of the state of the game or the position of the field, but this is only in the case of a thorough expert. Patience is the most important virtue for the young batsman, and yet the one which he is most often tempted to neglect. His base-ball friends will taunt him with his "poky" methods of play, and he will perhaps see some of them take the bat, and in a few hard "swipes" run up a score of twenty. But never does the motto of "slow and sure" apply better than in this case. "Driving," even in good cricket style, is always dangerous, and assuredly a beginner should content himself with simply "blocking" all balls that come on the wicket. But in a correct block it should not be that the ball hits the bat, but rather that the bat should be brought out cleanly to meet the ball. A stray run is often made in this way.

HIT TO LEG.

BACK PLAY.

In blocking use a distinctly forward or distinctly back play, and in each case make up the mind as to which it shall be as speedily as possible. If the left shoulder is not well thrown out in the forward play, the bat will not come straight down upon the ball, the first requisite for a true defence.

Patience being, then, the first necessity in defensive play, pluck is the first in offensive play. A leg ball to a beginner is always a disagreeable matter, for if he takes the privilege of the base-ball player and gets out of the way, he can never accomplish anything at the bat. Let the front foot wander where it will, the back foot (except for a deep cut) must stand absolutely in its place, no matter if a leg ball or any other is coming down the crease bent on destruction. Request the bowler to bowl leg balls in practice very slowly at first, as otherwise a nervous manner of play is often the result. There are for leg balls distinctly forward and back plays just as in blocking, and one or the other always should be used. The pluck to stand his ground once acquired, a player will seldom get out on a leg ball, and at the same time will be surprised to find himself much less frequently hit when looking squarely at what he is doing than if he makes a mere dab at the ball, accompanied with a leap to get out of its way.

The "off" side of the wicket looks as if it were the ideal place to hit the ball, but in truth it is a sad deceiver. The least bit of carelessness there or the least poke will pop the ball right into the hands of "slip" or "point." The first rule for successful play in the "cuts" consists in recognizing the fact that a great many balls there must be entirely let alone. A beginner especially should avoid hitting all balls that come to the "off" side on a short bound, as he will almost surely pop up an easy fly. "Slips" should always be avoided as slovenly plays, as a deep cut, a much prettier and safer hit, produces the same result. If in beginning a cut a player lifts his bat above his head, it will produce that necessary habit of cutting down. As regards playing on or off the wicket, the ball must always be returned in exactly the same direction as it comes—for example, an off ball should never be pulled across the wicket to leg. Finally, in the words of old Morley, the Philadelphia professional, "Never be in a hurry to it; but when you do it, it 'ard."

THE READY RANGERS' NEW MEMBER.

BY KIRK MUNROE.

TWO years before Tom Burgess went to spend a summer in Berks, Billy Barlow was called the brightest and at the same time the stupidest boy in the village. He was the son of widow Barlow, who lived in a little cottage on Squire Bacon's place which the Squire allowed her to occupy rent free because she was so poor, and because he and Mr. Barlow had been classmates in college.

Billy Barlow had worn patched clothes ever since he could remember anything, and had always been on the lookout for chances to earn money, even if it was only a penny, with which to help support his mother and younger sister Beth. He never joined in the games of the Berks boys, because he had no time for games. He did not attend school regularly, for the same reason, but only went when he could do so without neglecting whatever work he had on hand. Thus it was impossible for him to keep up with the other boys, and he was always nearly or quite at the foot of his classes. In fact, he went to school so little that the wonder was how he managed to keep along with his classes as he did.

This would have been explained to any one who could have seen his mother going to his room night after night, and hearing her say:

"Now, William, you really must go to bed. It is after midnight."

"All right, mother," he would answer, cheerily, or more often, "Yes, mother, the moment I have finished this problem."

So most of the boys called him a stupid fellow, because he did not know any games, nor even how to swim, and because he was always at the foot of his classes.

Their fathers, for whom he worked, and who had a suspicion of how his evenings were spent, thought differently, however, and some of them went so far as to say that he was the brightest boy in the village.

Will Rogers did not understand Billy Barlow, and though he had never spoken a word against him, he had not invited him to join a single one of his secret societies. This was understood by the others to mean that Will did not care to associate with the poorly dressed, hard-working Billy.

When Squire Bacon was elected to Congress he found that he was entitled to make an appointment to the Naval Academy at Annapolis of a boy from his district, not over eighteen nor under fourteen years of age.

One day he came home from Washington, and that same evening called at the little cottage of the Widow Barlow. After chatting with her for a while, and petting little Beth, who was a great favorite with him, he asked where Billy was, and if he might see him.

"William is in his room reading, I think," said Mrs. Barlow. "I will call him."

"No," said Squire Bacon; "don't call him. If I may I will go up to his room, for I want to have a little private talk with him."

A minute later Billy, who sat in his shirt sleeves digging away at a problem of geometry, was greatly surprised at receiving a visit from the Squire.

"Billy," said this gentleman, proceeding at once to business, "how would you like to enter the United States navy?"

"Not at all," answered Billy, promptly, who thought the Squire meant how would he like to ship in a man-of-war as a sailor boy.

"Why," said Squire Bacon, "I thought almost any boy would jump at the chance of going to Annapolis."

"Annapolis" cried Billy. "I should like to go to Annapolis; but I don't suppose I shall ever have the chance."

"Yes, you will," said the Squire, "for I am going to offer it to you. I am going to obtain your appointment to the Naval Academy, where, if you can pass the examinations, you will be given a splendid education, and have a life-long career of honorable usefulness opened before you. Not only this, but you will be paid for receiving your education. The government allows cadets $800 per year, which not only supports them while in the Academy, but gives them a nice little sum of pocket-money when they graduate. In addition to this, four gentlemen of this place have agreed to give $50 apiece each year for four years to the mother of the boy who shall represent Berks creditably in the Naval Academy. What do you say, now? Will you undertake to sustain the honor of your native village in this way?"

What could Billy say but, "Oh, yes, sir; indeed I will!" Wasn't he one of the very happiest boys in the country that night? Didn't he tear down-stairs, even ahead of the Squire, in his breathless haste to tell his mother the wonderful news? And wasn't the little household thrown into such a flurry of excitement that they hardly thought of becoming sleepy or of going to bed at all that night?

Within three weeks after Squire Bacon's visit Billy received an imposing looking document from the office of the Secretary of the Navy, in which he was ordered to report immediately at Annapolis for examination.

The Squire had already provided the money for his expenses, and so Billy started that very night on a train that passed through Berks at ten o'clock in the evening. Thus his departure was unknown until the next day, and even then his destination and the object of his journey were unsuspected.

The boy's first experience at Annapolis was not very happy. Even his best clothes, in which he went to be examined, were patched, and as not another candidate wore patched clothes, his was very noticeable; and, as soon as they saw him, all the cadets called him "Billy Patch." Although he passed a splendid physical examination, and did fairly well in mathematics, in English grammar, composition, history, and geography he was very nearly found deficient. So when it was finally announced that he had passed and was actually admitted to the Academy, his name was the very last on the list. As one of his fellow-cadets put it, "You're in, Billy Patch, but you had a narrow squeak of it."

The news created quite a commotion amongst the Berks people. Some of them said it was splendid; but others, and among them most of the boys, every one of whom would have liked to be in Billy's place, said that Squire Bacon might at least have made an appointment that would reflect some credit upon the village.

"To think he stands at the foot of the list, too!"

"If he had only appointed Will Rogers now!"

"Or his own son Hal!"

"It is a wonder that a fellow who always stood at the foot of his class ever got in at all!"

All this and much more was heard on the street and in the houses.

Will Rogers said nothing about the matter, because, while he had his doubts of Billy Barlow's ability to become a credit to Berks in his new position, he was too manly a boy to judge any one without giving him a fair trial. Nor did Hal Bacon say anything regarding the appointment, for he was too well-bred to question anything his father might see fit to do. Finally, as the Berks people saw nothing more of Billy Barlow for two years, they ceased to talk of him, and almost forgot his existence.

Of course many letters from Annapolis found their way to the Barlow cottage, and Squire Bacon used to go down to hear them read. Most of them were brave, bright letters, though at first they told of many discouragements and unhappy days. But they also told of the natty uniform that had taken the place of the patched clothes, of the warm friendships that were being formed, of the gradual rise, step by step, from the foot toward the head of the class, of the pleasant summer cruise in the frigate Constellation, and of a hundred other things of interest to him and them.

At last, early in the summer that Tom Burgess was spending in Berks, Mrs. Barlow received a letter from Billy saying that he was to have a two months' furlough, and would be at home about the end of June.

About this time also, the Ready Rangers, an organization of which Will Rogers was Captain, and to which most of the boys in the village belonged, were making preparations for a day at Berksmere, a pretty lake about a mile beyond the village. They had, for the time being, formed themselves into an athletic club, and their day at the lake was to be devoted to private trials of their athletic skill. These were to determine who were the best men for the club to enter in the athletic games they were to contest with the boys of the neighboring village of Clester on the Fourth of July.

This picnic, though a strictly business affair, as the Rangers told their friends, was thoroughly enjoyed by them, and the results of the games were most satisfactory.

It was late in the afternoon when they came to the long-distance swimming-match, which was the last event on the programme. For this the only starters were Will Rogers and Hal Bacon, who were to swim across the lake, a distance of a mile, run up the beach and touch a certain big boulder, take to the water again, and swim back.

As Hal had just finished his mile walk when this last event was called, his cousin Tom begged him not to try it, as he was too hot and tired to undertake so long a swim. But Hal said:

"Oh, pooh! the swim will do me good, and, besides, my joints are all limbered up now, so that I'm in prime condition for it."

So they started; and, with long graceful strokes, swam swiftly and evenly across the lake. They were seen to reach the opposite shore, rush up the beach and touch the boulder apparently at the same instant, and then plunge into the water again for the home stretch. On this they had hardly started before one was seen to be gaining on the other, but which was ahead could not be told. Both were seen half-way across the lake, and then three-quarters of the way, with one of them far in the lead.

"Will Rogers is ahead!" cried some of the boys.

"No, it's Hal!" exclaimed others.

Just then came a loud shout of "Hello, boys!" from behind them.

All turned in time to see a light open buggy drive up. In it were seated jolly-faced Squire Bacon and a tall slender lad wearing a blue navy cap on which the device was a single foul anchor, a blue shell jacket with brass buttons, and white duck trousers.

Such a uniform had never before been seen in Berks, and at first the boys did not know what to make of it.

Then some one shouted, "It's Billy Barlow home from the navy!"

Sure enough it was Billy Barlow, or "Billy Patch," as his fellow-cadets still called him, though now as a term of affection rather than one of reproach. The handsome, sun-tanned fellow had reached home that very day, and after spending some hours with his mother and sister Beth had accepted Squire Bacon's invitation to drive out with him to Berksmere and surprise the boys.

For a minute the Rangers were so occupied in greeting these new-comers that they forgot all about the race they had been watching so intently, and were only recalled to it by sudden cries of "Help! help!" from the lake.

As they turned and looked for the swimmers, they saw only one where a moment before had been two. The one was Will Rogers, and he was no longer swimming toward them, but back over the course he had just come.

Suddenly there was a rush past them, and the newly arrived naval cadet, without cap, jacket, or shoes, sprang far out into the clear water, and with such strong, splendid strokes as they had never before seen, swam rapidly toward Will Rogers.

As he reached Will he exchanged a few words with him, and then with a great spring he disappeared beneath the water.

How slowly the seconds passed! Fifteen, twenty, thirty, forty, forty-five! Surely the brave cadet must be drowned. No; there he is!

They saw him rise at quite a distance from Will, dash

"BILLY BARLOW ORDERED THE BOYS TO STAND BACK."

the water from his eyes, and begin to swim slowly toward shore. He was evidently bearing a burden of some kind, and in a moment Will Rogers was beside him helping him with it. As they neared the beach, Squire Bacon, who could not swim, rushed into the water, and taking from them the body of his son Hal, bore it to the shore, and laid it, limp and lifeless, on the grass.

"Roll him on a barrel!" "Hold him up by the heels so that the water will run out of him!" shouted the boys, in their ignorance of what really should be done, as they pressed eagerly about the unconscious Hal.

"I think, sir, I can restore him to life if you will let me try; it is one of the things they teach us at Annapolis," said Billy Barlow, stepping up to the group.

The unhappy father was chafing his son's hands, and moaning piteously that he was dead and would never speak to him again. He was so helpless in this emergency that he willingly allowed the young cadet to take charge of the case, saying, "Oh, Barlow, only save him, and you will save my life as well."

Armed with this authority, Billy Barlow at once ordered the boys to stand back so as to give Hal plenty of air. Then he sent Tom Burgess in the buggy to the village for a doctor, blankets, and stimulants. Turning to his subject, he stripped him to the waist, and laid him face downward on a cushion made of several rolled-up coats, and placed directly beneath his breast. Covering his right forefinger with his handkerchief, Billy carefully removed a frothy substance that had gathered in Hal's mouth and throat. Then placing Hal's right arm under his head, and telling one of the boys to keep it in that position, the young cadet began to turn his patient quickly on his side and back again on his face, pressing with both hands on his back, between the shoulder-blades, each time that the body was returned to the latter position. He turned the patient in this way about fifteen times each minute, and kept up the operation for about five minutes.

Squire Bacon and the boys watched all this with the most anxious attention, and when at length Hal drew a sort of a gasping breath, and then another and another, they gave a suppressed cheer of joy.

Billy Barlow did not stop to shout, but began to rub Hal's cold limbs briskly upward, and told his assistant to do the same. All this was so successful that by the time Tom Burgess returned with the doctor and blankets and stimulants in a carriage, Hal was breathing easily, and the blood had again begun to circulate through his veins.

Fifteen minutes later he lay in his own bed, very weak and tired after his terrible experience, but conscious, and on the high-road to recovery.

Standing beside the bed, Squire Bacon held Barlow's hand in both of his, as he said, reverently and with deep feeling, "I do thank God, William, that He directed me to send you to Annapolis, where you gained the knowledge that has enabled you this day to save my dear son's life."

At the same moment the Ready Rangers were holding a meeting outside, under the trees of the lawn, and their Captain, Will Rogers, was saying, "All those in favor of this motion will express themselves in the usual manner."

"Aye," shouted all the Rangers, as with one voice.

"Contrary-minded?" A dead silence.

"Then," said Will, "I declare William Barlow, of the United States navy, to be unanimously elected a member of our noble order of Ready Rangers."

A LITTLE WAIF.

TOM FAIRWEATHER AT MANILA.

BY LIEUTENANT E. W. STURDY, U. S. N.

"It is a curious old place," was what Tom Fairweather said after his first trip ashore at Manila. "There are more churches and monasteries and barracks than in any place I have ever seen, and the houses have such funny little windows. They told me that the panes were not made of glass, but of thin oyster-shells; and if that is so, I don't see how any light gets inside."

"You must have been looking at the older part of the town, Tom," replied his father; "for there are some very modern houses."

"I don't know what part we were in. We only had an hour to-day, and we went through the plaza, and then on through a lot of crooked streets. On the plaza there is an old tumbled-down cathedral, and it is the most beautiful ruin you ever saw. One side of it has completely fallen, and the moss and vines have almost hidden the rest. Just as we were coming back, the sun going down behind it made a perfect picture. We saw some young men dressed in a very strange way. They wore checkered trousers, patent-leather shoes, tall hats, and carried canes; but they had no coats or waistcoats. They wore their shirts outside in the most extraordinary manner. But they strutted along with an air as though they owned the most of the place."

"Those were the Manila dandies. Didn't you see any of the poorer people dressed in a similar fashion, but in homespun material?"

"I don't know that I noticed their dress so much."

"Did you remark anything about the native women?"

"Do you mean their beautiful hair?" asked Tom. "Why, it reached nearly to the ground. I think Manila must be a very nice place, and I am going ashore early to-morrow. I only had a glimpse to-day."

The next day he did see a great deal more of Manila, as he had more time to look about in; he found that every one was not dressed quite as he had imagined the day before.

The streets were clean and well paved, and were filled with busy people, whose costumes varied, but were always picturesque in their contrasts. The dress of the Europeans seemed plain and sombre as it appeared here and there amidst the striking colors displayed by the half-castes. Portly priests moved sedately along, and glittering Spanish officials clanked their swords as they marched on; while Chinese coolies and porters in the scantiest of costumes squatted at the little eating stands for their noon-day meal of rice and stew. In and out of the shops tripped the young native women—delicate and pretty girls, with their fair complexion framed in a wealth of dark hair which fell in a careless but graceful way almost to their very feet.

The river Pasig divides Manila into two parts. On its banks the cocoa-palms grow in perfection, and close by them another stunted species of the same tree. Here many of the native dwellings are built. They are not much more than huts erected upon piles, and are made so light of bamboo and palm leaves that house and furniture will hardly weigh two hundred pounds. As Tom walked along, it was an interesting sight to see whole families bathing and frolicking in the river, girls carrying water vessels on their shoulders, women and children gathering shell-fish on the banks, and canoes paddling up and down. But the most curious spectacle was afforded by a half-dozen urchins standing upright on the backs of huge buffaloes, and riding, with shouts of laughter, into the water. Every one seemed happy and lazy, as though there were nothing to do but eat rice and fish, frolic, and sleep.

On the river were odd boats called cascos, used for transporting cargo to vessels in the bay. They were long and narrow, with square bows and sterns, and had ridiculously large rudders. At the banks were platforms of bamboo poles, along which the natives propelled the cascos by poling. Both ends of the boat were covered over with thatch-work. In the after-part the coxswain lived with his family, and forward were housed the native crew. There were little passenger-boats, with bamboo outriggers to keep them from capsizing, and the passengers were protected from the sun by awnings made of bamboo strips. Then there were curious little ferry-boats for the animals that run through the city—square boxes with stanchions at each corner to support an awning. For a penny you could be pushed across the canal in one of these primitive ferries.

When Tom and his companions went to lunch at a hotel on the plaza he had a chance to see something of the interior of a Manila house, and he found that it was furnished very much in the style of houses in other places, but he had never before seen the ground-floor used for stables and ware-rooms. It was odd to see men drive horses into the house, turn them into stalls, and then quietly and as a matter of course walk up one flight to the parlor. Over the stable Tom thought there should be a loft, but instead here was a fairly appointed hotel.

"In Manila, people do not use the ground-floor on account of the damp," said Mr. Jollytarre.

"That is very well, I suppose," replied Tom; "but I would put my animals in some other place. Why, I saw pigs running about in one of those rooms below, and it can't be very pleasant."

During lunch a Mr. Lalla, the proprietor's son, suggested that he should walk about with them during the afternoon. He spoke a little English, and as neither Tom nor his friends felt very sure of their Spanish, they were induced to accept his offer. In that way they obtained many interesting details. The cathedral, which Tom had before remarked, was brought to its present condition by an earthquake, and if Mr. Lalla was right, Tom considered that Manila must be an undesirable place to live in, for at nearly every turn there was pointed out some ruined building with the remark, "Earthquake." Manila is indeed subject to very severe shocks, and only a few months afterward, when the Neptune was in Japan, news was received of an earthquake which brought even the cathedral ruins level with the ground.

Mr. Lalla took them to the cigar factories. These are in the hands of the government, which monopolizes all the trade in tobacco. In some of these factories as many as nine thousand people are employed, and it was a wonderful scene to which Tom's party was introduced. In one of these low stone buildings they were first shown into an immense room over one hundred feet in length. It was light and well ventilated, and along its whole extent stretched rows of benches about two feet from the floor. At each bench ten or fifteen young Indian girls sat cross-legged in the Turkish fashion. Each had a quantity of tobacco in her lap, and each was certainly as busy as any bee. Their hands fairly flew, and it was surprising how quickly a handful of tobacco assumed shape under their dexterous fingers, and how readily a cigar was finished, tossed aside, and another begun. They are paid according to the work they do, which had the natural effect of stimulating their zeal and attention. At some benches the girls combined: one selected the tobacco and rolled it, another cut out the wrappers, and a third finished the cigar.

Every four benches had an elderly woman for an inspector, whose duty it was to preserve order, give instructions, and provide everything that was necessary for the work to be carried on. The girls were too industrious to talk much, but each had a little flat piece of iron with which she hammered the leaf to give it a smooth and glossy appearance. The noise from a thousand hammers was something deafening to the stranger visitors. As soon as their presence was noticed throughout the room the spirit of mischief arose in these young women. As though by a signal, down came all those hammers at once, with a most startling effect.

It was in Manila that Tom for the first time got into trouble. He had heard his father speak of buying a supply of Manila cigars, and it occurred to him one day that he would get them and make his father a present. Cigars were very cheap, and he knew just where to buy the best. So, late one afternoon, he made his purchase, without consulting even his friend Lieutenant Jollytare.

He had started about dusk to find a shore boat to take him on board. He had several boxes of cigars under his arm, and as he sauntered leisurely along he wondered whether his father would like his selection. Near the wharves he found himself suddenly confronted by a stalwart policeman, or custom-house guard, who demanded in Spanish to know what Tom had in his packages. Now Tom didn't understand Spanish, and, moreover, he was a good deal startled by the brusque manner in which he was addressed. He stammered and flushed up, not from any sense of guilt, but from mere embarrassment, and this action on his part was evidently very differently construed by the guard. The customs regulations in Manila are very strict in regard to the exportation of cigars, and the officials exercise great vigilance to prevent smuggling by the merchantmen in the harbor. Tom was dressed in plain clothes, and ought not by his appearance to have given any cause for suspicion; but as he could not make himself understood, even after he had regained his presence of mind, he utterly failed to put himself in a proper light. If only some one would come along who could speak both English and Spanish, or if he could get word to his friends, there would be an end to this absurdity. The more helpless he felt, the more annoyed he became, until at last his tone grew angry and threatening.

That was a bad policy to adopt, for the tall guard, with sword and cloak, stalked up, and taking him by the shoulder, turned him in the direction of a guard-house near by. There was nothing to do now but march, and march Master Tom did straight into a little bare room with nothing but a bench for furniture. To his repeated questions in English he gained now but one reply, "Mañana," which word he understood very well as meaning to-morrow. And he knew too that Spaniards never hurried themselves, and that he had a very good prospect of remaining all night in this den of a room as an arrested smuggler. He stopped talking, and the guard left him behind a locked door. Tom was hungry and tired, and did not fancy the situation, but he hoped that when he was missed on board, something would be done toward looking him up. But an hour passed, and then two hours: no one came near him, and he fell asleep to dream that he had been captured by a band of smugglers and put to work in a cigar factory. The hammers made a monotonous din, and suddenly came down with a bang. He opened his eyes to see his father and a custom official standing over him.

"Well, young man," said Captain Fairweather, "what have you been doing? Here I have had all the guard-houses in town inspected, and all the streets and suburbs searched. I'd like an explanation."

"Father," said Tom, "I have done nothing to warrant my being arrested. I bought some cigars for you, and as I was coming down to the wharf I was arrested and brought here. I tried to explain, but I couldn't. There are only three little boxes of cigars, and I have seen the officers carry off many more than that."

"Ah, but they were wise enough to first obtain permission from the authorities. I'll have to put you into some sort of uniform, or else you'll have to learn French and Spanish, that you may tell who you are and what you are on demand. Come along now; you are released, cigars and all, and can leave this hole at once."

So Tom went on board, and the next morning he was seen busily at work with a Spanish grammar.

CHAPTER XIII.

THE SEARCH ENDED.

AFTER the conversation with Captain Sproul, Jerry neither went in search of work nor directly back to Madame Bonn's. He wanted to think over what had been said to him, and in order to do so calmly and uninterrupted, he walked around the block at least half a dozen times. He was a boy of rather more than average common-sense, however, and the more he considered the matter, the stronger was his belief that he should do as the Captain proposed, especially if Aunt Nannette was not found. When his walk was ended, Jerry had decided, and he went home to learn his friend's views on the subject.

Very much to his delight and surprise, he heard the sound of Pete's violin while he was yet on the stairs. It was the first time he had heard Sweetness "speak" since the little musician had been ill, and he entered the room with a glad smile on his face.

"Well, if that don't do me more good than anything I ever heard, my name ain't Jerry Hicks!" he exclaimed, as he seated himself on the floor by the bedside, listening and watching Pete as he tremblingly drew the bow across the strings, calling forth the sweetest but saddest strains Jerry had ever heard.

The invalid was too feeble to play very long; but as he laid Sweetness on the bed beside him in a tender, loving fashion, he really looked as if the music had done him bodily good. His face was slightly flushed, his eyes unusually bright, and, as it seemed to Jerry, his movements were less languid than they had been for several days.

"Why, Pete, I do believe you're going to get well right away! You look almost as good as you did the day we got here," and Jerry wondered why it was that Madame Bonn should be crying, when the invalid had improved so very much.

"I'm feeling different every way, and the ache has all gone from my head," the little fellow said, as he held out one thin, wasted hand for Jerry to clasp.

"Well, now, I'm gladder to hear you talk like that than I would be to get a hundred dollars. I wanted to tell you something, Pete, but I didn't know as I dared to, 'cause you were so sick."

Then Jerry told his friend of the conversation he had just had with Captain Sproul, and he concluded the story by saying, "You know, Pete, we haven't found your aunt Nannette yet, and it may be a good while before we get at her. Now it ain't no kind of use to talk about your playing on the street when you get well, for I ain't going to have it. If I do as the Captain wants me to, I can earn money enough to keep you like a regular nob. Some of the time you can go in the vessel with me, and when you don't do that you can board here with good Madame Bonn. I'll pay all the bills, and you can 'tend school and fiddle all you want to, and have a good time every day. Now what do you think of it? Shall I tell Captain Sproul I'll go with him?"

"Come closer, so I can touch your face," and as Jerry laid his head on the pillow, little Pete put his hands on his friend's cheeks in the old caressing way that was so sweet to Jerry. "You've been awful good to me all the time, and if I do go up in the sky like we talked about when we were on the boat, and thought we were going to be drowned, the very first thing I'll do will be to tell God all about you. I've heard Madame Bonn and Abe talking of it when they thought I was asleep, and though I knew before what a good boy you'd been, it seems as if I remembered everything all at once. I wish I could treat some other fellow like you've treated me, just so he'd love me as much as I love you. Now, Jerry, don't cry, but I want to tell you something. I heard the doctor say that when the ache went out of my head, I'd die sure, and this morning it seemed to me just like if I saw nother waiting to have me go with her. I wouldn't like to leave and have you sleeping in the streets like we used to do sometimes in New Orleans, and if Captain Sproul is going to take you with him, I'll feel better about it, 'cause I know he and Abe will be good to you."

"But, Pete, old man, don't talk about dying when everything is going so nice for us!" said Jerry. "What would I do without you? Don't go away and leave me here all alone! Don't do it, Pete! don't do it!"

"Don't you feel bad, Jerry—don't feel bad. I wouldn't go away from you if I could help it, though I know you'll get along better when I ain't here to bother. I'll wait for you up in the sky, and I'll be just as glad as God will when you come too. But you'll go with Captain Sproul, won't you, Jerry?"

"I'll do anything you want me to, Pete; but—"

Jerry could say no more. The sobs that shook his frame prevented the words from being spoken, and nestling his face close to Pete's neck, he gave way to his great grief.

It was while he was in this position that a low knock, all unheeded by him, was heard at the door, and in another moment Captain Sproul and Abe entered, the latter carrying in his hands a large box. Madame Bonn whispered a few words to them, and they approached the bed softly, Abe patting Jerry's head tenderly, while the Captain looked inquiringly into Pete's face, seeing there a change that told him that the little musician was fast drawing near to that valley whose shadow is death.

It was some moments before Abe could control his voice sufficiently to speak; and then he said, almost in a whisper, "Do you know, Pete, my lad, that Bill Barlow and some of the rest of the crew made up a little purse to buy you a new fiddle, 'cause Sweetness got used up so bad, and I've brought it to you with their best love?—that was what Bill told me to say."

As Abe spoke he held up a violin, inlaid around the edges with bits of pearl, and glistening with varnish.

"They sent it to me?" said Pete, in a low tone. "Tell 'em that I won't ever forget, not even after I'm up in the sky, how good they all were to Jerry and me. And tell 'em that I wish I could play to them once more; but I like them just as much for sending it as if I could."

"Won't you try it?" the Captain asked, and as Abe handed the instrument across the bed, Jerry moved his head that Pete might receive his gift.

The little fellow looked at the violin in a listless way for a moment, and then as he handed it back to Captain Sproul, he said, "Yes, it's fine, and a good deal more handsome than Sweetness; but I wouldn't give her for a dozen like that," and he hugged the patched and worn violin to his side as if it were a living thing that could return his caresses. Then turning to Jerry, he said, "You'll always keep Sweetness, won't you, Jerry?—you won't let anybody take her that would use her hard, will you?"

"Nobody shall touch her, Pete," replied the weeping boy, as he kissed the little fellow's lips again and again.

Then, as Jerry covered his face, Pete pulled the old violin closer to his side. With his eyes shut, his head resting on pillows softer than he had ever known before, he gently touched the strings of his beloved instrument until it seemed to be whispering to him.

"Bill was awful good to send me a fiddle," Pete said, in a low voice, as if talking to himself; "but I couldn't use it, 'cause it would be like throwing away the only friend I had for a long time—except Jerry, of course. Sweetness has talked to us when Jerry and me have been alone; made us forget when we were cold or hungry; been sorry when we were sorry, and glad when we had some place to live in. Sweetness loved me and I loved her, and she would feel just as bad to see me playing on some other fiddle as I would feel if she talked for somebody else. If I should play any more, she shall—she shall—be—the one—"

The voice grew lower and more indistinct, while the whisperings from the violin became fainter and fainter as the fingers grew weaker, until all was silent, save for Jerry's sobs.

A joyous band of choristers who sing eternal hallelujahs had come for the gentle soul, thenceforth to make melody before the Throne; and who shall say that even there is Sweetness forgotten by Silent Pete?—silent on this earth for evermore.

OUR POST-OFFICE BOX.

ALABAMA, PORTO-RICO.

DEAR POSTMISTRESS.—THE SUGAR-CANE CROPS have at last begun, rather later than is usual here, and I think it will interest you to know how sugar is made, though I must describe from the time the cane is planted. The ground is first ploughed deep, the plough being drawn by a yoke of bullocks, which are generally driven by a negro, and some boys. After the ground is ploughed, they pass the harrow over it; then a band of negroes, men and women, with their hoes make some square holes, of a certain depth and at equal distances apart, all along the cane patches. In straight and even rows, in which they plant three pieces of cane. After a few weeks it has all sprouted up, and looks very pretty—a bright green color, resembling somewhat a field of Indian corn. While it is yet young it requires great care, and must be frequently weeded, and on those estates where there is irrigation it is carefully irrigated, as the cane requires it, and with proper care it thrives wonderfully, and grows rapidly very tall. As so many estates adjoin each other, when viewed from some height you see for miles nothing but plains covered with canes, that are leaves a bright emerald green, which, as they wave and bend with the breeze, resemble a vast ocean as it swells and recedes. Sometimes they grow so tall that they have to be topped off, otherwise they bend down to the ground. Even when the cane is quite tall the weeds grow around it, but the negroes go inside of the pieces, with their hoes and weed; as they are so thick and tall, no breeze reaches them there, and with the hot, broiling sun overhead, it is very hard work for the workers almost suffocate with the heat. After some time the lower leaves of the cane have to be stripped, and the earth banked up to the roots, when the tops are exposed. Just before the cane is quite ripe it flowers, and it is a pretty sight to see the cane fields then, the flowers all standing up tall and straight over the green leaves, looking from a distance much like a regiment of soldiers' bayonets; the flowers measure from four to five feet, and look like immense fluffy feathers of different shades of gray. The flowers, cut and put in the house as an ornament, are very handsome, as they preserve their color and form when dry. Some cane pieces are only planted for six or three years, those that are planted freshly from one year to the next, for grinding, are here called "gran cultura," and if they are left to sprout up after cutting them down, for the next year they are called "pauca cultura," and if for the third year, and so on, "matanzas." When the cane is quite ripe and ready to be cut down, the negroes and zabangos (who are the country people of Porto Rico, are hired to cut it down, each earning five reales a day, which is about sixty-two and a half cents). They come with their machetes, or cutlasses, and in a short time a cane patch is cut down and the canes carted off to the mill. Some estates employ fifteen to twenty carriages, all drawn by negroes, having a long-stick with a sharp ball at the end. The canes are piled in great piles round the sides of the mill and in front of the sugar-heap, and the empty space being left there for the purpose. The negroes and zabangos then make small bundles of the canes, which they lift and carry on their heads, and cast into the mill, the heavy rollers of which crush the canes, the gabano, or trash, falling on the other side, which, being carted away to dry in the sun, is used towards serves as fuel; the juice is caught underneath the rollers in a cup which the zabangos empties it into the clarifiers; there it is warmed up and clarified; lime is also added, and the scum as it rises up, thick and black is skimmed off, and the ready it passes off through canals into the coppers, where it boils and bubbles, and the negroes standing before them skimming and boiling, and when the time, from one copper into another, there are generally four coppers, and when they have reached the fourth copper, where it boils most, and the boiling-point of sugar is reached, it is allowed to run off, and is carried into the coolers. There, as soon as it is cool, it gets as hard as possible, the negroes having to come in with their axes, and fill the wooden tubs with it, other negroes carry and empty them into sugar hogsheads, which stand in that part of the building, the floor of which is all open planks, and underneath them the molasses drips down; the molasses drips from the most sugar in the hogsheads down there, and not until the sugar is quite over the top into fresh hogsheads is it cut off of the ends by the merchants who buy the sugar and ship it to different parts of the world. The molasses, when sold, is pumped up on the top into molasses casks. Both the sugar hogsheads and molasses casks, before being shipped, have the brand and name of the exporter painted on their head. My brothers, who buy a great deal of sugar, always have a spread eagle as their brand, with the name of their office painted underneath. With much love to you, I remain, &c.

Your affectionate friend, ABLE McC.

This is a very interesting letter, and we are delighted to hear again from a correspondent who uses her bright eyes so well.

ALABAMA.

MY DEAR POSTMISTRESS.—DO YOU know how to make floating island? If not, I will tell you. Take two eggs, and beat only the whites of them to a stiff froth, and then add, little by little, some vanilla jelly, which must be first mashed with a spoon until quite soft; then go on beating it until it becomes quite white and stiff; and after this put it in a original dish, and then pour some cognac or brandy around it, upon which it floats; this is why it is called floating island. I know also how to make other sweetmeats, as the pineapple and the mango and many others. I like very much "do's opportunity"; it is a very interesting story; and, indeed, I like all the stories by the author of "Sam."

THE BIRD'S NEST.

Once there were two little birds, and one day the mother bird set to her husband, "Let's build us a nest," she said; "Yes"; and they set to work, and with their bills they dug a hole, and in pretty soon there were some little speckled eggs, and quite a while after that some little birds began to peep out, and the mother was very proud of her babies. One day the father was out, and a hungry boy came and took the birds home, and when the mother bird got back she was very angry. That night the boy got up, and went to bed, but he dreamed that a great giant came and took him away from his father and mother, and he felt very bad; so the next morning, when he got up, he took the birds and carried them home; so all was happy after that.

ETHEL (aged 7).

HARRISBURG, PENNSYLVANIA.

I am twelve years old. I go to Miss T.'s school. This is Decoration Day. I am going out to the cemetery to attend the afternoon service for my father and two sisters. Our only pet is a little dog named Rex. We have a very large yard, with a play-house, a hammock, and a seesaw in it. Last Saturday we had a May party. I think a smart Pete, or the Stowaways, is splendid. Not long ago one of the churches near our house was burned down. But I must stop now. Good-bye.

ALICE A. G.

NORFOLK HILL, NEW YORK.

I go to school every day. I like my teacher. I love to gather flowers, and give my teacher a bouquet every morning. I study geography, arithmetic, writing, and reading. I take HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE, and think it is a very nice paper. I love to read the letters in the Post-office box; mamma reads me the other stories. I am seven years old.

ADA L.

KEMPSTON, LONDON, ENGLAND.

We are three little American girls, fifteen, thirteen, and nine, at school in London. Our home is in Portland, Oregon, which is a very pretty place in a country which we can see very lovely snow-capped mountains. We all like HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE very much, and also say that "do's opportunity" is ended. At home we had three lovely dogs. Polly, that was a very big dog for her part, but of course at school we have none. We are very fond of reading, and like Miss Alcott's books very much. We should be very glad to get jobs in America, or could see this. With love, your constant readers,

THE LITTLE MATCH GIRL.

Wandering alone in the noisy street,
With her poor little numb, bare, dirty feet,
Watching the crowd with a languid eye,
As they hurriedly, heartlessly pass her by,
This is the poor match-girl's lot day by day,
As she sadly and hopelessly goes on her way.

With her tangled hair and her careworn face,
Wearily wanders on poor little Grace,
And while plaintively calling out,
"Who'll buy?"

She watches the crowd with a sorrowful eye,
This is the poor match-girl's lot day by day,
Oh, who amongst my readers would envy her, say?

She gathers her shawl round her shivering form,
For the winter is cold and she cannot keep warm.

And blue is the poor little pinched, haggard face,
Oh, hard is the lot of this young match girl Grace!

There is but no one to mourn when her soul flies away,
From this darkness and night into light, joy, and day.

And though through her life her path may be sad,
Yet heaven her soul may rejoice and be glad,
If her thoughts on her Maker be all the time bent.

And though doing His will her life-time be spent,
And though with the cold her bare feet may have bled,
Yet shining gold pathways those feet may yet tread.

I am a new subscriber, so this is the first time I have written to you. I think that the story "Silent Pete, or the Stowaways," is a real nice story, and I hope it will end in Pete finding his aunt Nannette. I go to a public school, as we have to practice school in our city, and study reading, spelling, writing, arithmetic, geography, and language. I also have a music-master, who comes to my house and gives me lessons on the piano.

A charming budget of letters, accompanied by a note from the teacher of the youthful writers, arrived not long ago from Bellewood Seminary. Only three of the letters can appear, but all are deserving of the honor if we should like to insert them.

ANDOVER, MASSACHUSETTS.

DEAR POSTMISTRESS.—I am a Bellewood day scholar. I study Latin, grammar, United States history, arithmetic, and composition. I enjoy the composition class more than any of the others, because we use HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE as a reading book. I read with great interest the pieces of "do's opportunity." I like very much that kind of exercise very much, but I am afraid I do not ride in a scientific way. I have been a Belle-wood scholar for nearly five years. Each year is longer than the year before. This school year is nearly over. I want to take your paper next year.

BELLEWOOD SEMINARY.
DEAR POSTMISTRESS—I have been taking HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE ever since the first copy I received, and like it very much indeed. I am away from home, going to school, and you know how lonely I get. I have never been away before. My home is in Tennessee. I live with my mother. My little cousin and I go out on the mountains and gather wild flowers and berries of every kind, and my little folks love to follow me. My name is Jack. My kitten wants to follow me, but I am afraid she will get lost. I go to Alabama every summer to see my mother. I have never been getting tired of this letter, so I will close. Love to all of the little readers. Your unknown friend,
LURA D.

BELLEWOOD SEMINARY, ANCHORAGE, KENTUCKY.
DEAR POSTMISTRESS—I have been taking this paper since last September, and all seem to like it very much. Bellewood Seminary is a beautiful place. I live in a pretty little town called Anchorage, which is twelve miles from Louisville. I like the school about as well as any place except home. We will all go home in about two weeks, as the school closes. We are going. Our teachers will soon begin to prepare for Commencement. There is an orphanage just on one side of the school, and a church on the other. I think mine is one of the strictest schools I ever saw, but I do not mind the rules very much.
Your friend,
GEORGIA S.

DEAR POSTMISTRESS—I am the boy who sent the card to you about a little dog we had. We live opposite a park called Monroe, and then we have a letter box, a fire-alarm box, two water-plugs, two electric lights, and a fire-engine house. All those things are very convenient, I think; don't you? When Jimmy Brown is going to write again? He has not stopped writing altogether, has he? I like his stories and those of Mr. James Ott's best of all. I hope you will like mine. I like to write and read. I have had HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE for a long time, and I like it very much, but I have not got all the numbers, for I sent them to my cousins in England.

Perhaps Jimmy Brown has reformed, and is therefore less entertaining than formerly.

I am a little girl ten years old. My sister takes HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE. I have three sisters and two brothers. We have no pets. FITZVILLE, NEW YORK.
DEAR POSTMISTRESS—I am a little girl eight years old. I have been going to school about five months; I like it very much, and I like my teacher. I have HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE; it is given to me by a friend. I enjoy reading the stories, and I like to write. I have a dog named Dick, and a horse named Harry. When mamma and I were at Ocean Grove I had a delightful time with a beach and in the water with the children, shell-fishing, sand, and building houses. We live in the Mohawk Valley, on a hill; it is a delightful place. I am very fond of flowers, and will write about them another time.
LELA G.

LEAVENWORTH, KANSAS.
Perhaps some of the little readers are fond of hunkers for the front-end of a horse. I am fond of luck. My little sister and I find a great many, and I will tell you of a piece of it invented to preserve them. I took a piece of white card-board and drew in lead-pencil an outline of a horse and shoe on it; then, after pressing the four-leaf clover, I pasted it on the outline. It was very easy to make, and it was a great deal of fun to make corners, or ornament it in any way you choose. I know there are many little boys and girls whose bright eyes will not wait for the Post-office Box to see if their letters are printed, so I will not take up any more of your space, in order to leave room for others.

We had a tame crow, but he was so noisy we could not keep him, so now we have no pets. I have a twin brother; his name begins with G, and mine begins with G, and guess what their names are. We each have flower beds and lots of other flowers.
ONE OF THE TWINS.

I am afraid I should not get the right names if I tried to guess them, so many names for boys and girls begin with G. I think if the dear angel came to see me, I should be tempted to call them Jack and Gill.

I am a little girl nine years old. Our pets are two dogs and two cats; our cats' names are Jack and Waif. I thought you would like to hear about our dogs. One day when I was busy I heard a splash. I looked out of the window, and I saw the two dogs, Jack and Doggie, and I thought I suppose they wanted some water. Well, they got on their hind-legs, which is just and plumped up their heads, and they said, "I like your names are Sydney, Edwin, Clara, just thirteen, and Edith ten." I like "Little Miss Santa Claus," "A Christmas Turkey, and How It Came."

We have also a dog called Lion; he really looks like a lion in the country, and have quite a distance to walk to school. I study reading, spelling, geography, dictation, and grammar. The school-house stands on a hill, from which we have a pretty view. My mamma has been away to St. John, and brought me a book named Ulla's Own Cabin.

It is some time since this little story of an excursion was written, but it is still worth reading:
WE GO A-FISHING.

In this part of Louisiana it is quite the fashion in the spring, when the doves are full of eggs, to resort to the small streams on fishing excursions. Our father is a minister, and he has little time or inclination to engage in such sport, but we children made him promise that he would take us out some afternoon, and yesterday was the time. Such a delightful ramble through the woods and along the shady banks of the creek we did have. The woods were ringing with the merry notes of sweet little birds. The deep green foliage was dotted here and there with the large blue and white of the dog-woods. In the most of the modest little wild violets, and other small flowers keeping their company. Near the creek the air was fragrant with the white honeysuckle, and the hum of bees you could hear among the trees, gathering honey for their bites. The roots of the trees on which we stood or sat while fishing were covered with a beautiful dark green moss.

"Well, you would like to know what was our luck," said Pappa soon after we began brother catching our own fish. "I had a pair of blue eyes," said Pappa—"a mosquitto bite." And these were the most numerous bites we had. "Yes," said Pappa, "I know if you had caught and these were taken home and served up at supper for mamma and little brother Fred." While fishing we heard a strange noise behind us in the pretty, you may say, it was a horse, croaking kind of a sound. We all felt uneasy about it, but each one was ashamed to let the others know it. After a while it was decided that it was a frog making the delightful music. Fortunately he did not keep up his croaking enough to interfere with our enjoyment. It was a shame that he should croak at all amid such pleasant surroundings.

With hands full of wild flowers, with rosy cheeks and bright eyes, and with a basket full of memories of the woods, we returned home from this our first fishing excursion of the season.

A SUMMER SCENE IN THE CITY—THE DRINKING FOUNTAIN.—DRAWN BY JESSIE SHEPHERD.

AT THE HELM: A WORD TO YOUNG SKIPPERS.

BY LIEUTENANT WORTH G. ROSS, U. S. N.

WHILE boat sailing cannot be taught by precept alone, an intelligent knowledge of the theory of the art will enable any one, with a little additional practice, to handle a boat with skill, freedom, and perfect safety. The limits of so brief an article will not admit of minute instructions bearing on every situation likely to arise, yet the few practical hints and details that follow will, if carefully noted, be found of service to the youthful mariner. The latter will understand that the principles of true seamanship apply with equal force to all boats, of whatever size, build, or rig. These remarks will in great part have reference to the sloop—a simple type of craft, with a single mast, main-sail, and jib.

Helm.—This is a term applied to the steering gear, including the rudder and tiller (or wheel).

When a boat carries a weather helm, her head has a tendency to come up "into the wind," or nearer the direction from which the wind blows, necessitating an action of the rudder to keep her on her course.

This troublesome habit is generally caused by too much after-sail or a faulty stowage of the ballast. To carry a lee helm, or an inclination to fall off or away from the wind (the opposite of that just described), is even a worse trait, and should be counteracted, if a smaller jib, a shorter bowsprit, or a larger main-sail will remedy a defect due to too much head-sail.

When the helm is "put to starboard" or "port" (to right or left), the tiller handle is moved in the direction named, but the boat's head is carried the contrary way by the operation of the rudder. Fig. 1 will illustrate this point, the arrows denoting the course the vessel will take with each helm. When the boat is pressed backward through the water (or has what is called stern-bow), the action of the rudder is reversed.

The Care of the Sheets.—Sheets are ropes that confine and trim the jib and main-sail when set. They usually lead along the deck to the helmsman, and in squally or threatening weather should never be so tied or made fast that they cannot be eased or cast off at a moment's warning. It has been truly said that the main-sheet is the key to the whole science of boat sailing, and for that reason great care should be exercised in its proper management. No good boat will capsize unless the sails are hampered by the sheets. A skilled boatman will take advantage of every change of the wind, however small, to trim the sheets so that the sails will stand full and receive the most favorable pressure.

FIG. 3.

Close-hauled, or By-the-Wind (Fig. 2).—This is the situation a boat is in when she is pointing as near the direction or "eye" of the wind (with the sheets trimmed flat aft) as will insure her progress through the water. The boom is kept at a small angle with the keel, as shown in the cut. A well-balanced craft will sail within five points ($56^{\circ} 15'$) of the wind. If the boat gets too close, an experienced eye will detect a ripple along the forward edge of the main-sail, owing to the fact that the wind is pressing the opposite side of the canvas. When the sail "shakes" in this way, the helm should be put up by moving the tiller slightly toward the side upon which the wind blows, allowing the boat to go off a trifle, so that the sails will stand full. To keep a craft up to her work, without letting her shake or fall off, is one of the surest signs of a good helmsman, and many a race has been won, or bad weather saved, by skillful management in "beating to windward." A boat's sails can be trimmed flatter aft in smooth water than in rough, as it is impossible to sail so near the wind with a lumpy head-sea against you; neither will she lie so close after reefing.

Before the Wind (Fig. 3).—When the sails receive the direct force of the wind from astern the boat is said to be "running before it," or "scudding." With a sea on, and the boat first rising on the top of the wave, and then burying her bowsprit under at the next moment, this will be found the most difficult situation for steering. Great care should be taken not to let the main-boom jibe; that is, allowing it to swing around on the opposite side by the sail getting aback (the pressure coming on the forward surface) either by a shift of wind or bad steering, which would easily happen to a heedless yachtsman. Such a manoeuvre might carry away your mast in a jiffy.

Tacking (Fig. 4).—The process of putting a vessel about by working her up against the wind, so that the latter will act on the opposite side. When the gear is all clear, the sails full, and plenty of headway, give the order, "Ready about!" then put the helm down by pressing the tiller end a-lee (in an opposite direction to that from which the wind blows), and as the boat starts into the wind, "Ease off the jib-sheet!" When nearly head to the wind the jib is borne out to leeward and held abaek to assist in sending the bows around. As the craft gets past the direction of the wind, and the main-sail begins to fill, pass the word to "Let draw!" and at once trim down the jib-sheet. If the boat gets sternway (goes stern foremost), the helm has to be shifted. Pushing the main-boom over to windward as soon as the jib-sheets are let go will aid a sluggish craft in this manoeuvre.

Jibing, or Wearing (Fig. 5).—This is a delicate evolution, and should only be adopted, unless by the most experienced, in light summer winds. When the boat will not go about by turning to windward, the helm is put up, and she is allowed to go off before the wind. With the latter pretty well on the quarter, haul the main-boom rapidly amidships, and as the helm is gradually shifted, the sail will take on the other tack, and the main-sheet may be slackened. If the boom is carelessly allowed to jibe, it will whip round with force enough to part the sheets or snap the mast. It is a good plan before jibing to settle or lower the peak of the sail.

Reefing and Furling.—As soon as the boat begins to wet, it is a safe plan to reef, and always before bad weather sets in. Bring the boat to the wind by putting the helm down. In reefing a jib lower away on the halyards so as to tie the reef-points beneath it, lash the outer clew to the bowsprit, and shift the sheets. To shorten a main-sail lower it a trifle below the boom in order to get at the reef band; stretch the foot out by means of the reef pennant, make fast the tack, and pass the points last (tying with a square knot) either around the boom, or foot of sail, or to a jack-stay on the boom, according as the boat is rigged. The boat is kept hove-to (stationary), head to the sea, by securing the tiller a-lee. In shaking out a reef (the boat being brought to the wind), first undo the points, then cast off the tack, and lastly the reef pennant. Always keep to windward of the sail.

Getting under Way.—Hoist the main-sail and loose the jib; leave away on the cable until it is short. If in a tide-way, east the boat's head in the direction you want to go, by means of the rudder; break out the anchor and set the jib. If there is no tide-way, east the boat's head with the sails.

Anchoring.—On the approach of a thunder-shower it is advisable to go quickly to a harbor. If caught in a gale of wind, however, on a bad shore, often the safest plan is to anchor at once, if you can find a good place. Let the boat come to the wind, haul down the jib, and as soon as she has sternway let go the anchor, and pay out considerable cable before checking it; then veer away as much more as will hold her. Furl the main-sail and make everything snug.

Some Practical Advice.—Be particular about the sails being properly set; get the wind out of a sail if you want to manage it. Do not sit on the gunwale, stand on the thwarts, or let go the tiller. If caught in a hard squall, put the helm down at once, let fly the sheet, and lower the sail. Do not overload a boat; keep weights amidships; a laden vessel carries her way (progress through the water) longer than a light one. Endeavor always to maintain steerage-way, and do not put the helm down suddenly or too far over. Abstain from all reckless exploits; the best sailor is the one who shows the greatest caution. Be cool in emergencies. Keep the halyards and sheets clear. Do not attempt to navigate strange waters without a chart and compass. Learn to swim before sailing, and never play pranks in an open boat.

BY HOWARD PYLE,
AUTHOR OF "PEPPER AND SALT," ETC.

ONCE upon a time there was a man whose name was just Master Jacob and nothing more. All that Master Jacob had in the world was a good fat pig, two black goats, a wife, and a merry temper, which was more than many a better man than he had, for the matter of that.

"See, now," says Master Jacob, "I will drive the fat pig to the market to-morrow; who knows but that I might strike a bit of a sale?"

"Do," says Master Jacob's wife; for she was of the good sort, and always stroked him the right way, and nodded when he said "yes," as the saying goes.

Now there were three rogues in the town over the hill, who lived in plenty; one was the Clerk, one was the Provost, and one was the master Mayor—and which was the greatest rogue of the three it would be hard to tell.

"See, now," says the Clerk to the other two, "Master

MASTER JACOB BRINGS HIS PIG TO MARKET.

Jacob, who lives over yonder way, is going to take his good fat pig to market to-morrow. If you have a mind for a bit of a trick, we will go snacks in what we win, and each of us will have a rib or two of bacon hanging in the pantry, and a string or so of sausages back in the chimney, without paying so much as a brass button for them."

Well, of course that was a tune to which the others were willing to dance. So the Clerk told them to do thus and so, and to say this and that, and they would cheat Master Jacob out of his good fat pig as easily as a beggar eats buttered parsnips. So the next morning off starts Master Jacob to the market, driving his good fat pig before him with a bit of string around the leg of it. Down he comes into the town, and the first one whom he meets is the Master Clerk.

"How do you find yourself, Master Jacob?" says the Clerk, "and where are you going with that fine fat dog?"

"Dog!" says Master Jacob, opening his eyes till they were as big and as round as saucers—"dog! prut! it is as fine a pig as ever came into this town, I would have you know."

"What!" says the Clerk, "do you try to tell me that that is a pig, when I can see with both of my ears and all of my eyes that it is a great fat dog?"

Just then who should come along but the Provost, with his hands in his pockets and his pipe in his mouth, looking as high and mighty as though he owned all of that town, and the sun and the moon into the bargain.

"Look, friend," says the Clerk, "we have been saying so and so and so and so just now. Will you tell me, is that a pig or is it a dog?"

"Prut!" says the Provost; "how you talk, neighbor! Do you take me for a fool? Why, it is as plain as the nose on your face that it is a dog."

"Come, come," says the Clerk; "let us have no high words over the matter. No, no; we will take it to the Mayor. If he says that it is a pig, we two will give you ten shillings; and if he says it is a dog, you will give it to us as a bit of a penance."

Well, Master Jacob was satisfied with that, for he was almost certain that it was a pig. So off they marched to the Mayor's house. Then the Clerk told all about the matter, for he was used to talking. "And now," says he, "is it a pig or is it a dog?"

"Why," says the Mayor, "it is a dog, and a big dog, and a fat dog into the bargain!"

So there was an end of the matter, and Master Jacob had to march off home without his pig, and with no more in his pockets than he had before. All the same, he saw what kind of trick had been played on him, and, says he to himself, "What is sauce for the goose is sauce for the gander. If one can pipe, another can whistle. I'll just be about trying a bit of a trick myself." So he went to his wife and told her that he had a mind to do thus and so, and that she must do this and that, for he thought of trying his hand at a little trickery as well as other folks.

As I told you before, Master Jacob had two goats, both of them as black as the inside of your hat at midnight.

Well, the next day Master Jacob tied a bit of rope around the neck of one of the goats, took down a basket from the wall, and started off to the town over the hill, leading his goat behind him. By-and-by he came to the market-place and began buying many and one things, until his basket was as full as it could hold. After a while whom should he see coming along but the Clerk and the Provost and the Mayor, walking arm in arm.

And what was Master Jacob going to do with his little black goat? That was what they should like to know.

Oh, Master Jacob only had a bit of an errand for his little black goat to do, that was all.

Then what did Master Jacob do but hang the basket around the goat's neck. "Go home to your mistress," said he, "and tell her to boil the beef and cabbage for dinner to-day." And he gave the goat a slap on the back, and off it went.

As for the Clerk, the Provost, and the Mayor, you may guess how they grinned at all of this. Did Master Jacob really mean to say that the little black goat would tell the mistress all that?

Oh yes, that it would. It was a keen blade, that little black goat, and if they would only come home with him, Master Jacob would show them.

So off they all went, Master Jacob and the Clerk and the Provost and the Mayor, and after a bit of a walk they came to Master Jacob's house. Yes, sure enough there was a black goat feeding in the front yard, and how should the Clerk and the Provost and the Mayor know that it was not the same one that they had seen before?

MASTER JACOB GOES TO TOWN WITH HIS GOAT.

THE LITTLE TIN HORN HAS NO EFFECT.

And just then out came Master Jacob's wife. "Come in, Jacob," says she; "the cabbage and the meat are all ready."

"Dear! dear! how the three cronies did open their eyes when they heard all of this! They would like to have such a goat as that—indeed they would!

So they bargained and bargained, till the upshot of the matter was that they paid Master Jacob a hundred dollars, and went off with the goat as pleased as could be.

Well, the three rogues were not long in finding out what a trick had been played on them. So, in a day or two, whom should Master Jacob see coming down the road but the Clerk, the Provost, and the Mayor, and anybody could see with half an eye that they were in a great rage.

In Master Jacob went to his good wife. "Here," says he, "take this bladder of blood and hide it under your apron, and then when I do this and that, you do thus and so."

Presently in came the Clerk, the Provost, and the Mayor, bubbling and sizzling like water on slack lime. [What kind of a goat was that that Master Jacob had sold them? He would run on no errands, and would do nothing that was told.

"But stop a bit," says Master Jacob. "Did you say, 'By the great horn spoon!' when you told the goat to do this or that?"

No; the cronies had done nothing of the kind, for Master Jacob had said nothing about a great horn spoon.

"Why didn't you remind me?" says Master Jacob to his good wife.

"I didn't think of it," says she.

"You didn't?" says he.

"No," says she.

"Then take that!" says he; and he whipped out a great sharp knife, and jabbed it into the bladder under her apron, so that the blood ran out like everything.

"Ugh!" says the good wife; and then fell down and lay quite still, just for all the world as though she were dead.

When the three cronies saw this they gaped like fish out of water. Just look now! Master Jacob had gone and killed his good wife, and all for nothing at all. Dear! dear! what a hasty temper the man had!

"Tut! tut!" says Master Jacob; "the broth is not all in the ashes yet. Perhaps I am a bit hasty, but we will soon mend this stocking."

So he went to a closet and brought out a little tin horn. He blew a turn or two over his wife, whereat she sneezed, and then sat up as good and as sound as ever.

As for the Clerk and the Provost and the Mayor, they thought that they had never seen anything so wonderful in all of their lives before. So the end of the matter was that they paid down another hundred dollars, and marched off with the little tin horn.

By-and-by they came home, and there stood the goat in front of the house.

"So!" says the Provost; "was it you that would do nothing for us without our saying, 'By the great horn spoon?' Take that, then!" And he fetched the goat a thwack with his heavy walking staff, so that it fell down and lay with no more motion than a stone. "There," says he, "that business is done. And now lend me the horn a minute, brother, till I fetch him back again."

Well, he blew till he was as red in the face as a cherry, but the goat moved never so much as a single hair. Then the Clerk took a turn at the horn, but he had no better luck than the Provost. Last of all, the Mayor had a try at it; but he might as well have blown the horn over a lump of dough, for all the answer he had for his blowing. "We'll put this Master Jacob in prison right away," said they. And off they went to do as they said.

Master Jacob saw them coming down the road, and was ready for them this time too. He took two pots and filled them with pitch, and over the top of the pitch he spread gold and silver money, so that if you had looked into the pots you would have thought that there was nothing in them but what you saw on the top. Then he took the pots off into the little woods back of the house. Now in the woods was a great deep pit, and all around the pit grew a row of bushes so thick that nothing was to be seen of the mouth of the hole.

By and-by came the Clerk and the Mayor and the Provost to Master Jacob's house.

Master Jacob's wife did not know just where he was, but she thought that he was in the little woods just back of the house yonder gathering money.

Phew! and did money grow so near to the house as all that? So off they went to the woods, hot foot.

Yes: there was Master Jacob carrying two pots, one on each arm.

"Hi, Master Jacob! what have you there?" said they.

Oh, nothing much. It was little or nothing that Master Jacob had. The pots were almost full of pitch, and there was only just a bit of money or two on the top.

Yes, yes, that was all very well, but they knew the smell of money from the smell of pitch. Now, where did Master Jacob get that money?

Oh, Master Jacob could not tell them that; if they wanted money, they would have to look for it themselves. Only they must not go near to those thick bushes yonder, for there was a deep pit hidden there, and they would be sure to fall into it.

When the Clerk and the Provost and the Mayor heard this, they nudged one another with their elbows and winked with one eye, for they thought that the money was hidden in the bushes for sure and certain.

"See, now," said the Clerk to the others, "just you stay here while I go and see whether there really is a pit, as he said." For he thought to himself that he would just go and get a pocketful of the money before it would be shared and shared with his comrades. So into the thicket he jumped, and—plump!—he fell into the great deep pit, and there was an end of Number One.

By-and-by the others grew tired of tarrying. "I'll just go and see what he is waiting for," says the Provost; for he thought to himself, "He is filling his pockets, and I might as well have my share." So into the thicket he jumped, and—plump!—he fell into the great deep pit, and there was an end of Number Two.

As for the Mayor, he waited and waited. "See, now," says he, at last, "what a fool am I to sit here twiddling my thumbs, while yonder two rogues are filling their pockets without me! It is little or nothing but the scraps and the bones that I will come in for."

So the upshot of the matter was that he too ran and jumped into the thicket, and heels over head into the great deep pit, and there was an end of Number Three.

AUTHOR OF "NAN," "ROLF HOUSE," "JO'S OPPORTUNITY," ETC.

CHAPTER III.

AMBITION.

ON her return home Fanny Pierson had given her mother and Louise her own version of the new pupil's appearance, and had expressed her opinion that there was "something" concealed in her history or the reason for her entering the school. She admitted that in the short conversation she had had with Agnes Leigh, nothing very trustworthy had been said. The girl seemed, indeed, to have nothing especial to say about herself. She had questioned Fanny about the studies of the class, and had spoken of her music as being what she chiefly desired to improve. A day or two later it was learned that she was taking lessons on the violin of old Herr Hofmeister, and it was reported among the girls that she played remarkably well.

Fanny had discovered that Mrs. Jones, their opposite neighbor, knew no more of Agnes Leigh than that she had come to her, recommended by a former boarder, all alone; but then the good woman admitted her friend Mrs. Robertson had written her that she hoped Mrs. Jones would look after the child as though she were her mother.

All of this, you may think, was slight enough material to build up a story which would create a feeling against the new pupil at Miss Leroy's school; but there is nothing so powerful as prejudice. Belinda Myers was one of those girls of weak enough mind to be glad of any position in which they can seem important or conspicuous, and as Fanny's ally in ridiculing or disapproving of Agnes Leigh she had a sort of reflected glory. Fanny having at once asserted that she for one would not accept Agnes on the ordinary terms of school-girl comradeship, felt compelled to prove her case.

Miss Leroy herself had accepted Mrs. Robertson's recommendation of Agnes as a pupil, and asked nothing further; the girl was quick, studious, and well-mannered. With the smaller feuds among her girls Miss Leroy never troubled herself; indeed, it was said in Halcorn that the good lady was too unobservant of such matters, since, provided her scholars did her credit in a general way, she troubled herself but slightly about any personal considerations which entered into their daily lives, and Miss Jaue was always snubbed by the elder sister when she attempted too decided an interference on behalf of any girl.

As is the case in many country towns, Halcorn contained a "set" of youthful society, girls and boys of Fanny Pierson's age, who had various small clubs and societies, and were, if not always included among the elders at tea parties, etc., frequently invited to certain houses when charity organizations were on foot. Fanny looked forward to a day when her good looks and perhaps her own special brilliancy would make her a sought-after guest among that set of people known in Halcorn as the "best," and where, it must be confessed, the young girl never felt quite sure of her own powers to please. The afternoon when we found her finishing her red velvet toque was a very pleasant one for the Pierson household; Fanny had received an invitation to tea that evening at Dr. Clinton's, and as she stood before the mirror in the room she shared with Louise, putting the finishing touches to a very elaborate costume, she rattled on to her younger sister, promising her a treat when she returned.

"Kate Lewis is sure to be there in her eternal brown silk," she said; "and I know just how she will sing! Oh, if only Guy Mostyn were there to have some fun with!"

"Well, he won't be," said Louise; "for he never goes out nowadays, even when he comes up to Erie Lawn. I wonder why it is. Do try to find it out to-night, Fanny, when his aunt is expected home."

"I hope she will stay in Europe all winter," said Fanny, for Mrs. Mostyn was Fanny's one dread—the grande dame of Halcorn was this elderly widow lady, whose beautiful, luxurious home on The Avenue had been closed this year longer than usual. In spite of Fanny's fear of Mrs. Mostyn's criticism or disapproval of herself, she could not but long for an acquaintance which would put her on an intimate footing in the well-known mansion, and often, when passing and repassing the beautiful iron gateway she had looked up the garden paths to the wide threshold of the gray stone house, wondering if the day would ever come when she would really be received there as an invited guest. Well enough Fanny knew how kind and loving the tall, dark-eyed lady could be, and something in the foolish, flippant nature of the girl told her that such affection would be hard to win. No, she would say to herself, she knew she was not Mrs. Mostyn's "kind." But Guy—the lad of sixteen, who, of all Mrs. Mostyn's nephews, was the only one left to comfort her in life—Guy was a different person. He was a gay, good-humored boy, fond of anything like fun, and whatever his private opinion of Miss Fanny Pierson might be, he always enjoyed an hour's talk with her, and encouraged her wildest sallies of sarcasm and ridicule of others.

CHAPTER IV. SOWING THE SEED.

DR. CLINTON'S house was a very pleasant one, two or three blocks distant from the street in which Mrs. Pierson and her daughters lived. Fanny always enjoyed going there. On this occasion she found the room full of young people, most of whom she knew, and with whom she chatted with eager familiarity while wraps were laid aside and loose locks of hair and ribbons and laces set straight. The toque had been worn, and on being laid aside in a conspicuous place occasioned a chorus of admiration.

"Yes," Fanny admitted, standing before the long pier-glass, "I think it is pretty; but red is such an awfully trying color. But the worst of those things is the way they so soon become common."

Suddenly Fanny became conscious of another reflection near her own. A slim little figure in a plain dress of dark green serge, with only a gold chain for ornament, and some carefully mended and very fine old lace in neck and sleeves, Fanny stared in surprise. Could it be? Yes, it certainly was Agnes Leigh, and in one of her school dresses, but without the little old-fashioned gray felt bonnet which Louise had called motherly, and Fanny had ridiculed as an old poke.

Fanny flashed around a quick look at her as she acknowledged her salutation with a careless nod—a look curious, eager, intrusive, all at once—and somehow Agnes Leigh's return glances made Fanny feel her own cheeks burn.

"I beg your pardon," Agnes said, pleasantly, as she moved into Fanny's recent place at the glass, and quietly—a very little anxiously, perhaps—scanned her own reflection, while Fanny, wondering how she had come to be invited, joined the group going down the stairs.

"What are we expected to do?" she said to Josephine Phillips, one of her chosen friends. "Of course Mrs. Clinton has not asked us here for nothing."

"I think Dr. Clinton is going to tell us about the new hospital," Josephine answered. "At all events, I know that Mrs. Clinton said something to mother about it. But there will be some music."

"Oh! indeed." Fanny pursed her lips together significantly. "Then that accounts for it, I suppose. I wondered why that Leigh girl had been invited."

All unconscious that the Leigh girl was behind them, Fanny swept down the last steps of the staircase, and giving her dress a few little pulls and shakes, made her way into the front parlor.

Agnes had caught the tone more than the words. She stood still a moment on the staircase, clasping the balustrade suddenly with her hand. What did it mean? Why should her invitation have to be accounted for? It had seemed quite natural to her when old Mr. Hofmeister had told her that Mrs. Clinton wished to hear her play, and to have her spend that evening at the Doctor's house.

Everything in her young life, even the hardships she had encountered, had seemed to come so quietly, that she had never learned to suspect people's motives. But Fanny's tone, the laugh which had accompanied her words, were unmistakable, and Agnes hardly knew what might follow. From the stairway she could see the bright, well-filled rooms: Dr. Clinton's portly figure just by the centre table; Mrs. Clinton, kindly and attentive, moving from one to another of her young guests, who looked smiling and well cared for. All evidently felt themselves at home, while she was fairly bewildered, and as she made her way to the parlor door and stood still an instant, seeking for a familiar or a kindly face, it was hard to keep the tears from her eyes.

Tea was over, some games had been played in the parlor; then, while sitting by two of her most admiring friends, Fanny suddenly thought of Agnes, and looked quickly about, wondering where she was. The long rooms were well filled; at the further end of this one she saw Agnes Leigh and Mrs. Clinton speaking together. A moment later the young girl had risen and taken her place at the piano, where an old gentleman was waiting for her. Presently a violin case appeared and a violin, and Fanny saw that the young girl was about to play upon it.

The music began. The gentleman at the piano accompanied Agnes Leigh, and every voice was silenced as the beautiful strains of one of Raff's cavatinas floated upon the air. The simple, almost childish, little figure in the homely green serge dress was the centre of respectful attention. Never had Fanny heard anything like that music, yet all that occupied her mind was the singularity of a "girl's playing the fiddle," as she expressed it to her neighbor. When the music ended, there was a rapid murmur of applause, and several people began talking of the young stranger. In Fanny's party was Kate Lewis, who was an acknowledged favorite, and when she began to talk of this Agnes Leigh, every one listened.

"She comes from somewhere near Boston," said Kate, "and is taking lessons of this old Mr. Hofmeister. It is queer that she should board alone, but then, I suppose, she can't help it. She wants to get some children as pupils. Think of a girl of fifteen trying to do such a thing!"

And here was Fanny's opportunity. What she said could not have been recalled five minutes later in actual words, but she contrived to give her companions an impression that there was something hidden or "sly" in the life of the young stranger. Perhaps if Fanny Pierson had known how all-important tones, gestures, and half-veiled suggestions can be, she would have been silent; but her tongue rattled on heedlessly.

A little later Kate Lewis was saying to her mother: "Mamma, I wish that Agnes Leigh was not a queer kind of girl. Fanny Pierson says that there is some curious secret in her life."

And Mrs. Lewis, who was one of the best of women, but foolishly afraid of her daughter's knowing any but the "right kind of people," said, quickly: "Well, my dear, it's well to know it in time if she isn't the proper sort of person to teach Freddie."

"Oh, perhaps—" Kate was beginning, a little dismayed at the quick effect of her words, but Mrs. Lewis added, "My dear Kitty, we can't be too careful!" and when the minister's wife came up to discuss Agnes Leigh's music, a cold look had settled upon Mrs. Lewis's face, and, without actual words, a strange impression was conveyed, which dampened the ardor of little Mrs. Bland, who had settled in Hallowton too recently to feel entirely at home among her husband's parishioners.

As for the innocent cause of these feelings, she sat somewhat apart after her beautiful music, but very well contented with her evening. When Dr. Clinton came up to thank her and talk to her, the girlish face brightened, and she looked up at the kind old gentleman with a glance in which was so much sweetness and simplicity, and such a curious something in the eyes, that the good Doctor felt a little spasm cross his heart and send a queer feeling to his throat. If his girl had lived, she would have been just this one's age, and would have looked like her, too. The same quiet, trustful, innocent young face, with that power in it which came from lessons patiently learned within.

"You play as if you loved it, my dear," said the old Doctor, sitting down by Agnes and smiling half sadly.

"THE GENTLEMAN AT THE PIANO ACCOMPANIED AGNES LEIGH."

"Love it! Yes, indeed, sir!" she said, earnestly. "I have always loved it. It was my father's wish that I should do something good with my music."

"And where is your father, my dear?" the Doctor asked.

A faint blush came into the girl's face. "Near Boston, sir," she answered, in a low tone.

"Ah! And you have come here to school, I believe?"

"Yes, sir," was the answer, more readily given. "I used to know people here; at least when I came, there seemed to be an opening—I mean for pupils."

"Oh, you'll get them, no doubt," said the good Doctor, cheerfully. "You must only have a little patience."

Poor little Agnes! After the Doctor left her she had old Mr. Hofmeister to talk to for a few moments, and then she sat still in her corner of the sofa feeling quiet and tranquilly happy, planning a golden future of work and honestly earned money, and then— Agnes felt her cheeks flush and her heart beat as she thought of the end and aim of all this, and had no suspicion that Fanny Pierson from the other side of the room was watching her with profound curiosity, had noted the quick color in her cheeks, the misty look in her eyes, and ascribed them to affectation or pride in her musical triumphs.

"Don't you hate to see a girl so set up?" Fanny remarked to Dick Clinton.

"I didn't suppose a girl could play the violin so well," he replied, coldly; and to Fanny's surprise, with a hurried word of excuse, the lad strode across the room, and in a few moments he and Agnes were chatting pleasantly over her beloved instrument.

"I wish you could hear Guy Mostyn play!" young Clinton said, eagerly. "He has a real genius for music."

Agnes looked delighted. "Oh, I know," she began. And added, "I am so sorry his aunt is away!"

But, indeed, as the young girl might have told him, many such things had been a disappointment since her coming to Haleom, bravely borne because of those at home whom she wished to spare pain. She might have gone on to speak of how her courage had failed when day after day had come and no answer to the letter forwarded to Mrs. Mostyn. How long ago it did seem since the winter morning, when, on calling at Brier Lawn, she was told that Mrs. Mostyn had just sailed for Europe. Guy was standing in the hall at the time, and had volunteered to forward the letter Agnes had brought directly to his aunt, adding, in his cheerful voice, "You are sure to have an answer in a few weeks." But so far none had come, and the young girl was beginning to feel that chill of disappointment which long-deferred hope so surely brings.

"I believe you are going to teach, yourself, are you not?" said honest young Dick, who thought it a very plucky thing in the fifteen-year-old school-girl.

"Yes," she answered; "if I can get the pupils. I thought I might find some small ones, you know—children who would like to learn."

All of this was very interesting to Dick, who shared his friend Mostyn's enthusiasm for music. So it was rather dampening when, the next morning, on his beginning to talk of Agnes Leigh and her violin playing, his mother said, quietly: "I am not so sure, after all, that we did right in inviting that girl here. It seems, from what Mrs. Lewis tells me, no one really knows anything about her. As Mrs. Lewis says, we cannot be too careful with whom our young people associate."

WILYUM NYCE'S EARTHQUAKE.

BY H. C. BUNNER

I KNOW that it is not customary to spell or to pronounce William "Wilyum"; but I think there must have been an exception in the case of Wilyum Nyce, for I never heard him called anything but Wilyum. That is the way his mother pronounced it when she went to the door of the shabby old farm-house on Shale Ridge and mournfully intoned, something as strawberry venders sing in the city streets, "Wilyumwilyumwilyum—WIIII-yum! Wilyumcometodinner—Wil-yum!"

As often as not, Wilyum did not come to dinner, being far away, with his mind bent on higher things than mere food and drink. When this happened, Wilyum got no dinner at all. Fortunately this did not distress him much. He made up for it at supper. And it did not distress the rest of the family at all. They were all too dismal and depressed, the people at Shale Ridge Farm, to pay much heed to the absence of any one member from their gloomy noonday meal. There were Wilyum's father, his mother, his two elder sisters, and his aged grandfather; and it was a very poor and scanty living that they got out of Shale Ridge Farm. For the farm lay in what poor Farmer Nyce justly called "the meanest part of Pennsylvania or anywhere else." In the distance you could see on one horizon the furthest outpost derricks of the old oil region, deserted now, and its wealth a tradition. And on the opposite horizon you could just discern the foot-hills of the rich and fertile mountain country. But about Shale Ridge was nothing but the loose, slaty stone which gave the place its name, broad stretches of sand, and patches of low, scrubby woods. Mr. Nyce had the poorest farm in all the region. He could hardly make a living out of it and pay his taxes. He raised a little buckwheat, a little corn, and a few vegetables. He had two thin and weak cows, some thin and muscular chickens, and a herd of razor-backed swine. The swine were the only things on the place that flourished. They took care of themselves. Nobody knew what they ate. Perhaps they liked shale.

Although Wilyum was thirteen years old, he did not greatly help his father on the farm. He was not needed, however. There was not even enough for Mr. Nyce to do, so little could be got out of that barren land. And Wilyum was not by any means a practical person. The other members of the family had no more imagination or originality than so many wet dish rags; but Wilyum's head was full of the crotchets of genius. When he was not hunting for robbers' caves or Captain Kidd's treasure, he was trying to make the cat hatch out a "set" of robins' eggs. His poor father said of him once, kindly but despondingly, "I know what's goin' to come of that boy: some day he's goin' to invent perpetual motion, and then they'll put him in the ijot asylum and bring down my gray hairs in sorrow to the grave."

But although the rest of the community agreed that Wilyum was not worth "shucks," the boys worshipped him. He was a born leader, and they looked up to him. He made himself a cross-bow, after a picture in a school-book, and with his cross-bow he shot three squirrels and cut a gash in Jimmy Brink's scalp. This little accident did not lessen his popularity, for he himself sewed up the wound—it was a small one—and for some time thereafter it afforded great amusement to the rest of the boys to pick the basting threads out of Jimmy's head. Young Brink, being a humble and grateful boy, felt repaid for the annoyance by the conspicuousness and importance of his position.

It was in vain that Mr. Nyce endeavored to win his son to more serious occupations. The old man had had a proud ambition for Wilyum. He had hoped that some day Wilyum would go to Reading, like Bart Nobles's eldest boy, become a clerk in a grocery store, and send home two hundred dollars a year to his aged parents. But this wild dream seemed unlikely to come true. Wilyum grew fighter and fighter every day, and devoted himself more and more to the boys.

It was on a day in May some twenty years ago—for, you see, it is an old story that I am telling you—that Wilyum Nyce conceived the plan whose performance led him to sever his connection with Shale Ridge. Wilyum had been inactive for some time, and he felt that he must do something to assert his supremacy as a leader. He summoned the twelve boys who delighted to hail him as chief, led them to his latest discovery in the way of a robbers' cave, supplied them with birch twigs to chew, and made a speech. Wilyum was oratorical when he felt important.

"Fellows," he said, "we have never celebrated Fourth-erjuly right. Gettin' up in the mornin' and buildin' bonfires is no good nowadays. We want to do stumpin' new. Now I've got a resolution to propose. I resolution that we celebrate next Fourth-erjuly by an earthquake."

"An earthquake!" cried the boys, derisively.

"Yes, an earthquake," repeated Wilyum, undismayed.

"Where are you going to get your earthquake?" asked Johnny Otis.

"Goin' to make it," answered the undaunted Wilyum.

"G'way!" shrieked the boys, in chorus.

But Wilyum would not go away. He proceeded with his discourse, and unfolded a plan so simple that even the least scientific of his hearers could see that it was practicable. He proposed to dig a hole one hundred feet deep and as broad as a well, and at the bottom of this hole to place a barrelful of gunpowder. The hole was then to be filled up with wet sand, through which a well-wrapped fuse would establish connection with the powder; and this buried magazine was to be exploded at one minute past twelve on the morning of the Fourth of July. Wilyum reasoned that the explosion would be unable to lift the wet sand, and would expend its force laterally—"sideways all round" was what he said—and would communicate to the crust of the earth a gentle but satisfying thrill, which would be felt, according to his calculations, in Philadelphia, probably in Constantinople, and even possibly in New York.

There had been an earthquake a year before, which had broken three plates in old Mrs. Dimmick's kitchen; and it had struck the boys as being a pleasantly exciting event. The notion of having an earthquake of their own making seemed to them an inspiration of genius. Only Jimmy Brink, who, not being ignorant of suffering, had learned to feel for the woes of others—only Jimmy Brink suggested that there might be danger of shaking down the whole Ridge and hurting somebody. But it was argued in reply that if a real earthquake, which it was well known had gone all around the world, could do no more than break a few stone-china plates and shake old Mrs. Dimmick out of her rocking-chair, it was not likely that a small private earthquake would give anything more than a gentle wobble to the surrounding country.

The motion of Chairman Nyce was put, and was carried without a dissenting voice; and then the congress excitedly resolved itself into a committee of ways and means. It was determined to form gangs of three and four to do the digging in leisure hours, and it was unanimously resolved that every boy should give every cent he could get during the next two months to the purchase of powder, even to the point of giving up the circus, which was due in June. You see, they were in earnest.

The job of digging a hole one hundred feet deep did not frighten them at all. If Wilyum had proposed to them to excavate a thousand-foot shaft they would have taken the contract with the utmost confidence. But the getting gunpowder was a more difficult matter. It was not, however, impossible. Everybody in the region was a sportsman, after some fashion. As soon as a boy was big enough to shoulder his father's heavy old-fashioned muzzle-loading shot-gun, he tramped off into the woods squirrel-shooting. Every house had its stock of ammunition; and, as some of the bolder spirits suggested, so good a cause might justify a boy in drawing on the family magazine to any extent that would not excite comment. Then there was gunpowder, of a poor quality, to be bought cheaply at the cross-roads store. And besides all these there was a still more promising source of supply. Sportsmen from Philadelphia and southern Pennsylvania often stopped at the Junction, three miles down the Ridge, on their way home from Pike County, and these good-natured strangers generally had a few ounces of powder left in their flasks, which they were willing to give away to any one bold enough to ask for it.

From the date of the meeting until the end of June there were eleven boys on Shale Ridge who were incessantly and mysteriously busy when they ought to have been idle. They disappeared from the sight of man, and nobody even suspected that they went to a deep-sunken hollow in one corner of the Nyce farm—a place far below the level of the surrounding country, thickly covered with low woods, and far out of sight or hearing of the fields where their seniors were working. But that first week in May four farmers on the Ridge earnestly but vainly inquired after four missing spades.

Of course Wilyum met with some discouragements in his great task. The impossibility of digging a hundred-foot hole soon became clear even to his sanguine mind, and he compromised on fifty, and then on thirty. The boys got tired more than once, and became as mutinous and skeptical as the sailors of Columbus. It needed all his generalship to keep them in order. And in June Phil Dimmick broke the solemn compact, and spent twenty-five cents to go to the circus. For this he was promptly expelled by the United Order of Earthquakers, and had to buy his way back with seven pounds of powder. I should state that it was the sense of the meeting that it would have been indelicate to ask Mr. Dimmick where he got the powder; and if his relations with his father were strained for some days afterward, no one was inconsiderate enough to comment on the fact. It is very probable, however, that Master Dimmick had good reason to regret that he had ever doubted the success of Wilyum Nyce's great undertaking.

In the end pluck, perseverance, and Wilyum Nyce carried the work through, and on the 3d of July, which happened to fall upon a Saturday, eleven highly excited boys gathered around the mouth of a pit nearly thirty feet deep, and wide enough at the bottom to hold the carefully calked and tarred flour barrel which they lowered into it. In the barrel they put forty-nine pounds of gunpowder. There were just forty-nine pounds less half an ounce, for they measured it laboriously by means of a six-ounce powder-horn. Wilyum drew up a memorandum showing the amount of each individual contribution. This is the memorandum:

|------------------|----------------|
| W. Nyce | 16 pounds |
| Sam Burgess | 5 |
| Jimmy Brink | 3 |
| Jimmy Otis | 7 |
| Frank Robles | 5 |
| Phil Dimmick | 6 |
| Pete Smith | 2 |
| Rube J. Jaeson | 2 |
| Sam Haty | 1 and 10/100s |
| Curtis P. Ritter | 2 |
| | 49 and 1/2 lbs |

Having a taste for statistics, Wilyum added to this a further analysis as follows:

|----------|------------------------|
| lost | 17 pounds |
| borrowed | 10 pounds 4 ounces |
| given | 8 pounds |
| found | 15 pounds 8 1/2 ounces |

I do not know where they "found" it. But then why should I?

When the powder had been carefully laid in the barrel, it was covered up, all except one small opening, where the end of the fuse was fastened. The fuse was made of rags wrapped about a core of powder, like the "tail" of a fire-cracker. The boys had found two worn-out cucumber-wood pump shafts, and had spliced them together "end on," and this tube two of them held upright with the fuse stretched through it, while the others shovelled the excavated dirt back into the hole, and packed it down.

They had plenty of time, for it was a Saturday. The Fourth falling on Sunday, of course the holiday was changed to the fifth.

But that Sunday was a hard period of inactivity for General Wilyum and his aids. They wandered restlessly and nervously about, meeting by twos and threes in out-of-the-way places, and trying to look as if nothing was going on. This ought to have awakened the suspicions of the community, but it was a sleepy community, and it did not notice the boys.

At two minutes before twelve that night ten very uneasy boys stood at the end of the long fuse that stretched over a hundred yards of carefully cleared ground to the mouth of the buried pump shaft. There were only ten of them, for Jimmy Brink had been overcome with fear at the last moment, and could not be aroused by any amount of gravel thrown against his window-panes. So with chattering teeth they had voted him a coward and a traitor, and had left him to inglorious loneliness.

In the deep silence of the summer night they could almost hear their hearts beat. Their mouths were dry, and each boy felt as though he had a large cold empty space inside of his small body. Wilyum held a lighted match in the hollow of his hands. At last the church clock at the Junction sent the first note of twelve on the air, and with it came the dull report of the old howitzer with which the Junction Sons of Liberty saluted the new year of Independence.

Wilyum bent and touched the match to the fuse. The boys started as the quick flash lit up their faces. They saw the first yard of the fuse go in a breath, and then they turned and made one wild, panting, choking rush for the hill. It was a mad scramble, and when they dropped on the damp grass, two hundred yards higher up, their hearts thumping and jumping, and turned their white faces toward the hollow, they saw the tail of the fiery snake disappearing in the mouth of the shaft. There was a horrible long half second; then came, all together, a little shiver of the earth, a heavy boom, like a "plunk" on a gigantic bass-drum, and a spout of dirt and barrel staves above the bushes. And then—a crash, an awful tremor of the earth, a terrible long drawn roar and push, like a thousand peals of thunder, and something burst from the pit, and flew hundreds of feet into the air, and staid there, roaring and thundering, a great wavering column that flashed in the moonlight.

An hour later Farmer Nyce, guided by Jimmy Brink, found ten sick, trembling, frightened boys lying on the wet hill-side.

"Who done it?" he asked.

Wilyum crawled up, and grasped his father's leg.

"It was me, pop," he said; "but I didn't mean to. Can't you stop it? I don't care how much you lick me, if you'll only stop it."

"I ain't goin' to lick you, Wilyum," said Mr. Nyce; "and I ain't goin' to stop it, neither."

"Is it an earthquake, pop?" gasped Wilyum. "Shall we all be killed?"

"It's ile," said Mr. Nyce—"it's ile you've struck, and your old pop's a rich man; and I guess you can have your own grocery store down to Reading."

He did better than that. Wilyum lives in New York to-day. Since his father's death, five years ago, he has been president of the International, Occidental, and Shale Ridge Petroleum Company. I meet him sometimes on the street, and he always speaks kindly to me, although he is a very rich and influential citizen. And I always say, very respectfully, "Good-morning, Mr. Nyce." But I am sure that up in his handsome house on Madison Avenue his wife calls him Wilyum.

HUMMING-BIRDS AND OTHERS.

BY SARAH COOPER.

OUR pretty little humming-birds are universally admired for their small size, as well as for the metallic lustre of their plumage. Their throats are especially brilliant, and are often adorned with a variety of beautiful colors. The bills of these birds are always long and slender, but it has been observed that they are either straight or curved, according to the shape of the flowers they frequent.

These active little birds visit the flowers not so much to obtain honey as to capture the insects that have been attracted there by the sweet juices. The tongue, however, contains two hollow tubes, and it is divided at the end, thus serving the double purpose of catching insects and of sucking the juices from flowers.

RUBY-THROAT AND NEST.

The humming sound which accompanies the flight of these birds, and from which they take their name, is produced by the exceeding rapid motion of their wings. They seldom alight when taking their food. By beating the air they hover before the flowers long enough to secure the feast; then they dart so suddenly from one blossom to another that we are scarcely able to catch more than a glimpse of the glitter and sparkle of their bright colors.

Humming-birds live in pairs, and the male defends his little family with much spirit. Indeed, the female herself is not wanting in courage, and is slow to abandon her nest even after it has been torn down. A brave little humming-bird once won the admiration of her observers by sticking to her nest and raising her brood after the branch on which the nest was situated had been cut from the tree. As soon as it was discovered, the branch was immediately tacked up on a fence near by, and fortunately the birds did not allow their domestic arrangements to be interrupted by the accident.

These birds sometimes return to the same tree for several seasons in succession, and the young birds appear to stay with their parents until the fall, when they all go south together.

The cup-shaped nest of our common humming-bird (the ruby-throat) is a tiny affair, made of soft down taken from the stems of ferns. It is then covered with mosses and lichens so closely resembling the branch on which it is placed that it is extremely difficult to find the nest.

In many cases of discovering these nests the birds have betrayed their own secret by their suspicious activity. In one instance that came to our notice the birds made frequent visits to a black-berry bush, where they collected cobwebs and carried them to a certain spot on the branch of a tall tree. Curiosity was excited by their movements, and on examining the spot, after some time had been allowed to pass, a beautifully finished nest was found, containing two white eggs scarcely larger than peas.

Bobolinks arrive in New England early in the spring, and sing very sweetly for a few weeks. They are mostly seen perched on twigs or spears of grass in the meadow, pouring out a flood of melody as they tilt up and down on their slender supports. Their nest is generally placed near by, at the root of a tuft of grass. At this season the male is dressed in a mottled coat of black and white, while the female is of a yellowish-brown. Later in summer the male assumes the quiet garb of his mate, and they set off toward the south in search of good things to eat. They find attractive feeding grounds among the reeds and marshes of the Delaware River, and they grow fat upon the seeds which are so abundant at this season. They are now called reed-birds in Pennsylvania and New Jersey, and being considered a great delicacy, they are shot in large numbers to supply the tables of the luxurious. Those that escape the gun of the sportsman next visit the rice swamps of Carolina, where they feast greedily upon grains of rice, and pass by the name of rice-birds.

The character of the bobolink undergoes a complete change during this time. In spring the bird is very musical; it seems to know that it has come among friends, and it becomes tame and familiar. But after starting on its southern journeys, it loses its refined and musical taste, grows silent and shy, and gives itself up to the pleasures of appetite. Thus the bobolink in its extended migrations, which are supposed to reach from Labrador to Patagonia, plays the part of three birds, differing in character as well as in appearance.

Swallows are excellent fliers, since their long pointed wings and forked tails are both favorable to great speed. It is estimated that these birds fly from sixty to ninety miles an hour. They delight in places where insects abound, and here they are seen during twilight flying in large circles. All swallows have a sticky, glue-like saliva, which serves them a good purpose in nest-building.

The edible birds' nests so popular among the Chinese are built by a species of swallow. These nests are made of a certain kind of sea-weed which when boiled yields a good quality of glue. The birds first swallow the seaweed, then deposit the softened material from their mouths in layers around the edge of the nest, and the whole hardens on exposure to the air. So the birds' nests are in reality a fine gelatine. These nests are glued upon rocky cliffs and inside of deep caverns on the sea-shore, where they are gathered with great difficulty and danger.

NEST OF EDIBLE SWALLOW.

Bank swallows, when seen at all, are found in large companies. They dig holes for their nests in perpendicular bluffs of fine sand near some sheet of water. These holes extend into the bank for two or three feet, and at the farthest extremity is placed a loose nest of hay jauntily lined with a few short goose feathers, stood upright. The holes are placed so close together in the bank that it would seem almost impossible for each bird to know its own; still they return to their respective nests with unerring precision.

THE LITTLE BANTAM.

A TRUE STORY.

"Is it not a little beauty, Ruth?" said a little girl of about eleven, showing to a friend a very small baby chicken.

"Yes, indeed it is. But why do you keep it in the hen-house?"

"Well, I will tell you Bantie's history, for so we named him. Grandma set a hen on six-ban- am days, all of which were hatched. The same day another hen came off with twelve golden chickabiddies. The bantams were not many days old when Duke, the yard dog, made a dash for them, and they were so very much afraid of him that they were left orphans. We put them under the other hen, thinking she would regard them as her own family, but she soon discovered the strangers, and pecked them so furiously that we only saved this one, which we brought into the house, where it is very lively. We kept it in a pasteboard box at first, but I got it early to the hen-house (chicken sleepy-time), giving it its supper just before shutting it up for the night. I feed it on grits mixed with green, which is very much liked. It has been so domesticated that it does not wake up until our breakfast-time, while when we first brought it in it began chirping with the peep of a hen. I take it often to scratch in the flower garden, but it is miserable until it gets back into the house. I think it a much nicer pet than a bird, which has to be caged. We all play with Bantie, and my grandfather, and it loves to be stroked as much as my kitten Pez, but of course it can't pass its satisfaction. The elders predict a tragic end for Bantie, such as being crushed under a roller, stamped by large feet, or devoured by a cat; but for the present it seems to be at the height of chicken felicity.

ALICIA T. H. (aged 11). GREENVILLE, SOUTH CAROLINA.

This is a very pretty little story.

ALMA, IOWA.

You cannot imagine how I enjoy the dear HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE. Mamma and brother Horace enjoy it very much. Horace is thirteen and I am eleven, and I have a brother and sister younger than myself. We have kept a hotel for a very long time, until last year, when we moved to a new place, and now my papa is editor of one of the papers here, and we get a great many nice papers in exchange, but of all we get I like yours the best. I think "Silent Pete" is just splendid, and I think "Jo's Opportunity" was good. My papa is Anna, but every one calls me "Fudze." My name nicknamed me that a long time ago, and no one but my little brother knows me Anna. ANNA M. B.

JERSEY CITY, NEW JERSEY.

I have just been reading some of the letters in HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE, and I thought that perhaps there might be room for one. My little doll has a very handsome French doll, with dark eyes and glossy golden hair; she is jointed, and can stand up alone; I call her May. I have another French doll, but she was put together with an elastic, and the elastic wore out, and she came apart. I have a very cunning baby doll also. My sister has a little doll that my aunt lives in Switzerland. It is only about two inches high, but it has a cloth body, and the head, arms, and feet are put on just as they are on the other dolls. It is dressed in a madras Swiss dress, with a scarlet cloth skirt trimmed with black velvet, a velvet waist laced with gold cords, a green silk handkerchief and two bonnets, tiny shoes, and a tiny Swiss apron, and the cunningest little straw hat trimmed with red ribbon. I am eleven years old, and I am in the third of the highest class in school. We must do this spring and the first three in seven years. I was then a very little girl. We children think morning is great fun, but mamma and papa do not like it so well.

HELEN, NEW YORK.

I am a little girl nine years old. I am always glad when HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE comes, so I can hear the letters read. As this is my first letter, I hope to see it in print. I have no pets except my dolls, and I love them very dearly. I take music lessons, and play duets with my brother. With much love.

KRITZ L. C. GRAVESDORF, KENT, ENGLAND.

I have not written to you before. I like HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE very much, and I hope to see it in print. I have some very interesting stories. I hope I shall see this letter in print. I have only one sister, Carrie. We do not go to school, but have lessons at home. My name is Emma, studying geography, grammar, arithmetic, reading, writing, history, French, music, and plain and fancy needle-work. My brother and I go to a violin class. I have a very handsome cat, named Dick. We have two other cats and a dog. I have a little horse named Dick since I was a little, and I am thirteen now. KATIE M. C.

I have been very much interested in the stories and the Post-office Box in HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE. It is a splendid paper, and I like to write about it. "The Winner's Prize" was my story. I have a little black kitten, called Tommy, that sits up and begs like a little dog; it is such a pet. Please could any of the editors of HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE tell me how to make Johnny-eaks? I am eleven years old, and my sister is thirteen; her name is Katie. We have forty-two dolls between us. I hope this letter will be printed, as it is my first. CARIE W. C.

Now what little girl in Virginia, Tennessee, or Kentucky will send to our little English friend a receipt for Johnny-eaks? Little maids in Massachusetts, New York, and Ohio may send their too, and so may little house-keepers all over the land.

ORONONGA, PENNSYLVANIA.

DARLING POST-MISTRESS.—I have just received my paper for this week, and I saw Fanny's story. I would like to know her ever so much, for I think she must be a nice little girl. I have no playmates here that are the kind I would like to be very intimate with. What does your father do, Fanny? My father is the superintendent of two furnaces and rail roads. I have two cats, and a black dog that came here; one of the cats came too. Have you any pets? I used to have a lovely large black pointer Newfound-dog dog, but he died. My brother is an ensign, and he got him for me when he was at Halifax. I think it is a very good thing that the birds' eggs are not allowed for exchange, for I think it is a shame to rob the little birds' nests. Fanny, have you any brothers or sisters? I am the youngest of our family, and I often wish for a little sister, but she has died. My father and I am finishing it with a peacock blue velvet border with tulips painted on it. Can you paint in Kensington style? I think it is so nice and easy. We have a big yard, and a swing and two hammocks. Oh, I forgot to tell you I have three dear little yellow ducks; I had five, but two died. ADDIE.

SENeca FALLS, NEW YORK.

I am thirteen years old. I was born on Christmas, therefore I am a Christmas present. I have two old hens and ten little chicks, they were hatched the first day of June. Just twenty-two years ago to-day was the battle of Cold Harbor, whose my father was wounded. I have a cat, my name named Fritz; he came from Germany. I think "Silent Pete, or the Stowaways," is a very good story. EDWIN F. B.

WEST POINT, MISSISSIPPI.

West Point is a beautiful little town of about three thousand inhabitants, situated near the Tombigbee River. I have for pets a dog and a horse. HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE is just what I need, and our teacher underlining the words which are difficult to define. ORVILLE W. G.

I am a little boy who lives in Minnesota. I have taken HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE since Christmas; my aunt in New York sends it to me for a present. I like the stories so well, and can hardly wait until the next issue comes, and writing, and we want you to print this if you can.

ISAAC L. T.

Here is a letter which shows that the writer is observant. It is from an American boy abroad:

BRENSWICK, GERMAN.

I am a little boy thirteen years old. I have taken HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE for a year, and I like it very much. I started for Brunswick on the first day of April. We arrived at Bremerhaven on the 11th, after a pleasant voyage on the Rhine we came here. Brunswick celebrated its thousandth anniversary in the year 1861. There are some very old buildings here, and it is very interesting to drive about and see the high red roofs coming almost down to the ground. There are lots of soldiers here walking through the streets. There is a theatre, but I don't like to go to the city. Tomorrow anniversary. We have been to the cathedral, which was begun by Henry the Lion in the year 1172. Up under the pulpit is an altar with a slab of marble held up by five brass pillars. It was given by the Duchess Matilda, in the year 1161. On the wall are some pictures, and on the wall with old paintings that were whitewashed over in the time of the Reformation, and have only lately been discovered. We saw the large bronze statue that Henry the Lion brought over with him when he came from one of his Crusades; it is about thirteen feet high, and on the base of it all kinds of animals are engraved. We saw the door that Henry the Lion used to go out of when he went home from church. Then we saw his drinking horn and hunting horn. His old castle was burned down in the year 1874, but the ruins still remain. Good-by from THEODORE H. B.

PLAINFIELD, NEW JERSEY.

My brother George and I have been taking HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE ever since Christmas. I have a baby brother named Roland. There is a little girl here whom I play with; her name is Helen, Helen, George, and I all go to the same school. I like to write letters, and I hope mine will go in the book. Good-by. ELSTIE H. PUZZLES FROM PARIS.

THIS time we shall introduce a new word to our puzzle solvers. Heretofore the names of our puzzles, borrowed from the Greek or Latin, have been the same in French as in English. But unless we use the unsatisfactory term "puz," we have no name for the amusing jeux de mots, or play upon words, which the French call

"CALEMBOURS"

This is a mistake which I do not think any of our young readers would have made. They are too well acquainted with French history:

(1.)

Un maître d'école dictait à son élève: "Louis XIV, roi de France et de Navarre," etc. L'élève écrit: "Louis XIV, roi de France était au arars," etc.

Boys and girls who like to lie abed late in the morning will solve this:

"Savez-vous mon ami que mon père m'a grondé?" "Et pour quoi?" "Parce que j'étais trop poli."

Think how alarming it would be to meet with such an experience as this:

(3.)

Ce monsieur m'a effrayé, car il entra dans ma chambre sans avoir sou nez.

There are a good many ways of becoming rich. This is one that would soon make lion-hunters and the proprietors of menageries millionnaires:

(4.)

"Vous seriez bien riche," disait-on à M. Van Amburgh, "si vous comptez votre lion en deux." "Comment cela?" "Vous auriez alors deux millions."

Here is a new way of getting warm when one has no fuel to burn and no blankets for one's bed:

"Si vous voulez avoir chaud en hiver comment ferez-vous?" "Je louerai un appartement avec cinq fenêtres, et je les ouvrirai; j'aurai alors cinq ouvertures."

How pleasant it would be if we could change winter into summer as easily as this!

"Que faut-il faire pour changer l'ordre des saisons?" Il faut donner les thés d'avant en hiver et par ce moyen on fait de l'hiver le saison d'été.

See how the addition of a single letter changes the following thought:

Il ne faut pas avoir peur de son ombre; mais quand on est cerné par l'ennemi on peut bien être épouvanté de son nombre.

The business of a bookseller does not resemble that of a grocer very much, yet the following may be true:

(8.)

"Monsieur, quel est votre état?" "Je vends les livres de théologie. Vous êtes libraire?" "Non; je suis épicier. Je vends des livres de thé au logis."

THE TRAVELLING SHOWMAN'S STORY.

BY DAVID KER.

I REMEMBER well enough when I first took up with a circus, although I was quite a small boy then, and a good reason I have to recollect it, too. You see, there was a lot of fever all round the west of England that year, and it was particularly bad in our village. Ever so many folks died, and others got frightened and ran away, and at last there was hardly anybody left.

I also was among those who suffered, for though I did not have the fever myself, my father and mother were both taken with it, and before I realized how ill they were I found myself an orphan. You may guess how I felt—at least, I hope you can't, for I hope you never lost one of your parents, let alone two within a few hours of one another. But, as I was saying, I had hardly got it through my head that I was actually alone in the world, with no one to love and care for me, and was sitting down crying, when I heard a step at the open door.

"Hallo!" cried a strange voice behind me; "what's the matter here?"

In the doorway stood a tall man, with a big stick in his hand, looking in at me in a puzzled kind of way. When he heard what had happened, he seemed quite taken aback, and he came up to me and said,

"My poor boy, you can't stay here all alone. Will you come with me?"

I went with him, not knowing what else to do; and we walked right out of the village to a great wide common, with two or three wagons in the middle of it, and a lot of people sitting round a fire eating their supper. But the thing that took my fancy was a real live elephant, the first I'd ever seen, standing among the wagons as if he were quite at home there. I was so taken up with staring at him that I hardly noticed a thin little man with a rather pleasant face, who came forward to meet the man that was with me. They whispered together for a minute, and then the small man said to me, in a little chirping voice just like a bird's,

"Come and have some supper with us, my boy; you look as if you wanted it."

When I awoke next morning, the people were packing everything into their wagons and harnessing their horses for a start. Presently up came the little man with the jolly face, and told me that he and his brother (the one who had brought me in) were owners of a travelling circus, which went from place to place all round the country, and that if I hadn't any one to take care of me, I'd better just stop with them till something turned up.

It wasn't long before I got to be as much at home with them as if I'd known them all my life; and great fun it was. Now and then, to be sure, we had a hard time of it; for circuses travelling isn't quite the paradise that those silly boys think who read about it in penny papers, and run away from home to join 'em—and the more fools they, say I. Many's the time we've dragged along all day through the mud and the rain, and then had to perform at night with hardly anybody there, so that we didn't even earn enough to buy our supper; and then we'd go to bed as tired and hungry as soldiers on a march. Then it was that "Chirpey," as we called the little thin man, showed what he was worth. Just when we were at our very worst, in he'd come with as jolly a face as ever, and say, in his cheery way, "Never mind, boys; we must just take the rough with the smooth."

But in the fine summer weather it was quite a treat to wander among the green lanes with their tall hedge-rows, and the mossy banks covered with wild flowers, and the queer-old-fashioned farm-houses, where the creepers twined round the little diamond-paned windows. Then in the evening we would halt our wagons under a big tree on a bit of smooth greensward, and light our fire and cook our supper; and I used to laugh to see "Hassan the Terrible Turk" washing the black off his face and starting to fry sausages, and "Seraphina the Fairy" throwing aside her shining wings, and stirring the onion soup.

My greatest chum, however, was the big elephant, which drew our largest wagon. I used to bring him nuts and cakes whenever I could, and he soon got to know me so well that I could make him do anything I liked.

Well, it would make too long a story to tell you how, bit by bit, I got to be head man of the company, and how at last the whole thing passed into my hands when Chirpey and his brother grew old and retired from the business. For some time after I took the command we made money fast; and then, all at once, business began to fall off like anything. But I soon found out what was wrong. In the big towns, which we were trying now, the elephant (our great attraction) wasn't such a wonder as among the village folk. Worse still, all his tricks were just what performing elephants always do, and he was getting too old and cross to learn anything fresh.

I was strolling about the outskirts of Stafford one evening, thinking all this over, when suddenly I heard a great shouting and screaming a little way ahead. I ran forward, and found three big fellows pitching into a poor old ducky in a queer outlandish dress, something like our circus Arabs. One whack of my big stick felled one of them flat; but the other two showed fight, and I seemed likely to come off second best, when the coming up of some of my men scared 'em away, and we carried the old Hindoo (as he turned out to be) home with us in triumph.

The elephant was standing by his wagon as we came up, and the minute he caught sight of the Hindoo he threw up his trunk and ran forward, trumpeting like a post-horn, and went round and round him just like a child about its father. The old fellow seemed to know him too, and said something in his own lingo, when down popped the beast on its knees, picked him up with its trunk, and put him on its neck.

Then a bright idea struck me. Out I went, and soon had bills all over the town announcing "the great performing elephant, accompanied by the veteran Asiatic hunter whom he had carried so often through the pathless jungles of Bengal," and all that sort of thing; and then I added that he'd pick out the Hindoo, among thousands of people, in any disguise whatever; for, you see, this old chap had had the charge of the beast when it first came over, and it hadn't forgotten him a bit.

Well, that took first rate, and the next night there was as big a crowd as I'd ever had. I rigged up old Ismail as like an Englishman as possible, and put him in a dark corner where his brown face wouldn't show, so that nobody knew whether he was really there or not. Then, when the time came, I brought out the elephant, with a crimson cloth on him, and ever so many bright-colored ribbons about his head, and I whispered to him some gibberish that Ismail had taught me, meaning "Go and find your master."

Away the beast went, right up the passage to the corner where Ismail sat, and touched him with its trunk. Up he jumped, and throwing off his English dress, appeared in full Asiatic rig, with a dagger in his belt, and his turban all asparkle with sham jewelry. The elephant perched him on its neck, and he rode round the ring in such a shouting and cheering as I'd never heard before.

Well, sir, that elephant trick just coined money for us, and we're keeping it up yet. When it's done, we send round the elephant with a hat to collect for his master, and if anybody pretends to put in and don't, it'll shake the hat at him, and give a roar, and set everybody laughing. We're going to have a special performance to-morrow night, and if you've nothing better to do, you might come and look at us, and make a story of it for the papers.

Recitation.—THE KING.

Why and wherefore sound those bells?
Horrid bells!
Much I fear their din foretells
Something in a sort of crime
I'm forgetting every time.
Horrid sounds! Though in his prime

Once a Poet wrote about 'em;
Called their jingle Runic Rhyme!
Faith, I'd gladly do without 'em,
For their tin-tin-tinabulations.
With their sharp and flat and trills.
Mean a public fete—free rations—
For which I must foot the bills.
Oh, the hills, bells, hills, bells, hills, bells, hills,
Oh, the horror and the "sorra" of the bills!

RECITATIVE, DUET, AND CHORUS. (Airs from "Pinafore.")

RECITATIVE.—"Hail, Men-o'-war's men."

KING. Ha! cooks and scullions, wherefore this commotion?
To give the Queen a feast I have a notion.
It costs so much? Oh, would her debat here
Were February twenty-ninth-leap-year!

Duet.

Air: "I'm called Little Buttercup."

KING (examining cupboard, etc.).
Now, what's in your cupboards?
Sure, Old Mother Hubbard's
Was never more empty and lean.
No bone's here for Trowser,
No crumb for a mouse, sir—
Spratt's platters were never so clean.
What! no crutty powder?
There should be clam chowder
Left over from yesterday's lunch.
Why, as I'm a sinner,
Here's nothing for dinner—
Not even a flask of cold punch—
There's Bosh and there's fish, sir,
Whatever you wish, sir,
If Kitty to market may go.
I'll think it all over,
And when I discover
My mind, I'll at once let you know.

Chorus.—COOKS.

Your Royal Highness,
We hope that no shyness
Prevents you from speaking your will?
KING (weeping). Oh, deem not these tears, sirs,
Arise from my fears, sirs,
I'm sly, not of you, but the bill.
[Exit King (R.), with handkerchief to his eyes. The Cooks dance the grand chain.

Curtain.

SCENE 2.—The parlor. The King discovered seated on a throne "counting of his money." A table and money-bags before him.

Solo.—KING.

Air: "Oft in the still night."

Oft in the still - y night, When slumber's chain hath bound me,
D. C. Off in the still - y night, etc.

MAID. Sir, that last sentiment, though no eavesdropper, I overheard, and think it highly proper.

I fain would serve your Majesty's command, sir,

But as this poor fatigues me, beg to stand, sir.

KING. Hse, faithful maid. I think your name is—hum!—ha!

MAID. They call me Kitty: 'tis my nom de plume—ah! [Sighs.]

[Aside] Since I stole oranges I never show Under the name my sponsors did bestow.

Until that little accident—ah me!

My friends all called me Dingy Diddlety.

KING. A royal feast I give at three—not later!

And for the banquet you, my dear, shall cater.

But list; I'm tired of fish-balls, though no glutton,

And ditto as to caper-sauce and mutton.

MAID. What shall I choose? Her Majesty likes scallops,

And lobster salad, and, I think, veal collops.

KING. Better one dish that's savory and tasty;

I should prefer it in the form of pastry.

Let it be done, and quickly, too. Now tread it.

MAID. Your Majesty, I cannot buy on—credit.

Duet.—KING and MAID. (Air: "Am I not fondly thine own?")

(First verse, King solo; second verse, Maid solo.)

1. Here, here, here is a six-pence. Take, take, take it and buy

2. There, there, there in the mar-ket. Where, where, where fowlers lie;

Birds, birds, birds for a ban-quet. Let there be plen-ty of Snipe, snipe, snipe will I pur-chase. There shall be plen-ty of Yes, yes, yes, yes, let there be plen-ty of pie.

I wake up in a fright, Lest there be burg-lars pie-a-yune, And these six-pen-ny pie-ces.

Though in the stilly night, etc.

When I remember all
The pains I've had, and trouble,
To fill these bags so full,
And make them weigh just double,
It is not strange I love my change,
Each crown, and mark, and shilling;
Yet when 'tis meet that I should treat,
To spend six-pen-ny I'm willing.
For in the stilly night, etc.

(Enter Maid, and kneels before the King.)

The Maid & the Peddlers

KING (The Royal Privy Council now must know (spoken), of this transaction. Fare thee well. I go.

MAID (courtesying profoundly). Sire, au revoir, KING. Without there, guards! What ho!

[Exit King (L.) in a dignified manner, with his arms full of money-bags, which he keeps dropping. MAID examines the sixpence curiously, starting which enter two Pedlers (R.) with baskets of wares, etc. MAID receives them with delight.

Scene and Duet.—PEDLERS.

Air: "Buy a broom."

FIRST PEDLER.

From Boston I come, with a pack full of notions; No pedler has prettier trifles, I trow. Here are ribbons and neck-laces, powders and lotions, And here is a pretty and stylish new bow. Buy a bow—buy a bow; 'Tis only just sixpence, this stylish new bow. (The Maid shakes her head sorrowfully.)

SECOND PEDLER (A: "Pretty, pretty Polly Ho-pinkins"). Here's a cap to catch a lover; 'Tis as sweet as can be. Set those pretty tresses over; How becoming! only see! No one can deny who has half an eye That it lends you grace and improves your face. If the cap fits, you must wear it. Prithree buy—prithree buy.

[The two airs are then sung together as a duet. The Maid's reluctance is gradually overcome; she permits the Pedlers to fasten on the cap and bow. They lead her to looking-glass (B. C.). Delighted with her appearance, she turns and gives them the sixpence. The same airs are now played as a duet on the piano, to which music the Pedlers dance, after which they go off (R.). The Maid turns again to the looking-glass. Enter Jack-a-Bandy, Lady Dorolot, and Lady Dorolay (L.).

DOROLOT } Aha! 'tis thus you waste your time in (spoken). } prinking; } You will regret it some day, I am thinking. DOROLAY. Such vanity too oft doth lead to sin. MAID. Bother this bow! I say, have you a pin?

JACK. The King desires you'll straight to market go.

DOROLOT. He gave you money.

DOROLAY. What's the matter? (Maid searches her pockets.)

MAID (in accents of anguish). Oh-h-h! (She shakes her head and wrings her hands in dismay.)

ROUND.—Tutti. (Air: "Day is gone.")

1st Voice. 2d Voice. 3d Voice. 4th Voice.

Where has it gone? How should I know? Here's a ver-y pret-ty go..... We are un-done.

[The Maid swoons, and falls very stiff on chair (C.). The others assume attitudes of tragic despair. Tableau. Curtain.

SCENE 3.—The kitchen. A chair and footstool (C.). Tall step-ladder (L.), on top of which is a jar labelled "boney," and a large tin spoon. Table (R.); on it a large loaf of bread, and a huge carving-knife. Enter Chief Cook (R.), and casts himself dejectedly into chair, wiping his brow, fanning himself with a large fan, and showing many signs of fatigue.

Recitation.—CHIEF COOK.

I've searched the larder through myself, I've searched the scullery. But every pot and pan and shelf is bare as bare can be. Nor lord nor lackey without cash Will to the market go. The Queen declares she won't eat hash, And echo answers, "No."

[Enter Maid, weeping violently.]

Ballad.—CHIEF COOK.

Air: "Kathleen Mavourneen."

Kitty mavourneen, oh, what is the matter, And why do you sorrow and take on like that? Though you broke my dish, and though you spoilt my batter, Fear not; for I blame it all on the cat. Oh, have you forgotten the oranges, Kitty, You hid in your pocket and hid in your sleeves? Such deeds have you found neither safe, wise, nor witty? Oh, say, over evil counsels, do't grieve? Such deeds have you found neither safe, wise, nor witty? Oh, say, as aforesaid, Kitty mavourneen?

The Queen & the Court Physician.

MAID (spoken). I know that in this cap and how I'm pretty, But I am good no more, and more's the pity! Sir Jack-a-Bandy thinks himself so fine, I longed to show him some one else could shine, And so I've gone and done a horrid thing! You have? What is it? One, two, three, four—sing!

Duet.—KITTY, CHIEF COOK.

Air: "Gobble, gobble," from Mascolto.

MAID. The sixpence I have lost, Oh dear, With grief I own I've speculated, Grief cause to stay, I'm told, whenever Trust funds are misappropriated. But I repent; behold these tears! Oh, how shall I my sorrow smother? Poor little Maid, dismiss your fears; Regard me as a man and brother.

[He brings from enpouret the pocket of rye.

MAID. What's that? A pocket full of rye? Go, strew it where the blackbirds be. When they sing their sweet warble, warble, warble! MAID } shaking } When they twitter, "Chee, chee, chee." MAID } his head. }

Ah—h—h!

Why should I accept this rye? Then you can catch the birds, you see, As they sing their sweet warble, warble, warble! As they twitter, "Chee, chee, chee," etc. Warble, warble, warble, "Chee," etc. Oh! I sought good fairy, lent my cry, And help me by assistance bringing. Just take this pocket full of rye: And he where dickie-birds are singing. I don't see how 'twill help me out Of this great trouble and disaster. Bring me the birds—no and don't you pout; I'll bake them in a pie for master. You'll bake them in a game pie? Yes; you may trust to me. And they'll never more warble, warble, warble. No more twitter, "Chee, chee, chee."

Ah—h—h!

You'll bake, etc.

[Repeat.

[Exeunt Cook and Maid on opposite sides of stage, weeping bitterly. Enter Queen, attended by Lady Dorolot, Lady Dorolay, and the Court Physician.

DOCTOR (spoken). Desist, your Highness, from your rash intention. The consequences dire I scarce dare mention. QUEEN. Don't take the trouble to hunt up a rhyme. We shall know, doubtless, in the course of time.

DOCTOR (anxiously). To eat so soon again will, without question, Superinduce a compound indigestion. Oh, gracious Highness, your physician pardon; of your majestic health I am the warder. The King declares were you to eat your fill, He could not live, and much less feed, the bill. That's public business. Doctor, do not prate; I never meddle with affairs of state. Now some refinement, ladies. I entreat: I certainly shall faint unless I eat.

Dist.—DOCTOR and QUEEN. (Air: "Hear me, Norma.")

DOCTOR. Hear, your Majesty, in pity hear me! I would fain reduce the malon's bills. At thy feet behold thy Door kneeling. [Kneels. Oh, take this physic, or else accept these pills

(He first presents a large rind, then a pill box.)

QUEEN. When the breakfast's cold, as 'twas this morning, Only codfish-balls and weak, weak tea, Wouldst thou have me wait for lunch? Thou wouldst not! My only hope, alas! is the buttery.

DOCTOR. Hear, my sovereign!

QUEEN. Ah! in vain you thus implore me!

DOCTOR. Implore thee! I implore thee!

QUEEN. Only food can now restore me.

DOCTOR. (If thus you try your)

QUEEN. Oh, he who tries my constitution,

DOCTOR. I'll give you pain, and cause us sorrow,

QUEEN. Who gives me pain, and causeless?

DOCTOR. You'll suffer some swift retribution,

QUEEN. And I'll ere dawn the morrow.

DOCTOR. Let this vital thy peace restore.

QUEEN. No denial! my

DOCTOR. And pills—pills. The dose is four.

QUEEN. What pills—pills. No more! no more!

[The allegro is omitted. Queen sinks exhausted on chair (C).]

QUEEN (spoken). Quick! bring me food. I will no longer wait. Some little tidbit, rare, and delicate.

A plum-burr, my dear, is very nice, you know, Especially if made by rule of Bob.

DOCTOR. Your Majesty, I really can't agree;

Far, far above wholesome is the rule of Three.

QUEEN. Then there's pease porridge, whether hot or cold,

I like extremely well—if nine days old.

In fact, most anything would be a treat;

I don't care what so long as it is fit to eat.

(Meanwhile her Ladies have searched. Dorothy has ascended at the stair-ladder and found the honey. She now brings the pot and spoon, and kneeling before the Queen, feeds her with honey. The Queen eats and smacks her lips.)

QUEEN. That's nice. Another spoonful—

DOCTOR (tragically). Pray don't ask it!

QUEEN (to Dorolot). Some bread.

DOROLOT (sadly). Alas! pray empty's the bread basket.

(Dorolot turns the basket upside down.)

QUEEN. It is! it is!

DOROLOT (goes to table). Oh, I have found a slice.

[She cuts the loaf, brings a huge slice, and kneeling before the Queen, offers it. Queen takes a bite, and during the rest of dialogue the Ladies feed her alternately. The Doctor examines the loaf, and shakes his head dolefully.]

DOCTOR. 'Tis baker's bread, and scientists have stated

The stuff is horribly adulterated.

They make it white with aims, light with soda.

Alas! to eat like that will overload her.

QUEEN (with her mouth full).

Doctor, you may retire. [With a profound bow, exit Doctor.]

I'm very sure.

There's no such bore known as an-interviewer.

Now let us eat and have good times, say I.

We'll laugh to-day, and let to-morrow cry.

[The Ladies B and L nod to her mysteriously.]

Hey? What? [They whisper.] My turn now? You provoking thing!

Well, anyway he shall not hear me say.

Alena! [Coughs.] I've got an awful cold, you know.

[To piano.] Give me the pitch, please. Alena! Do me, so, do-o-o.

Solo.—QUEEN. (Air: "Annie Laurie.")

Oh, hot cross-buns are bonnie,

And so are herrings red,

But I much prefer this honey

With slices thick of bread—

With slices thick of bread

All over with butter spread;

Though if offered some plum-pudding,

I would take that instead.

On cookies full of spices

I wish I could be fed,

Nince-ple extremely nice is,

And so is gingerbread—

And so is gingerbread.

If full of errands red;
Yet I'm quite content with slices
Of this with honey spread.

[Spoken.] There! Now I've done it. Glad am I 'tis o'er.
I'm so exhausted, I will—take some more.

[She sinks on chair (C.), and opens her mouth invitingly.]

(Enter Jack-a-dandy and a train of Courtiers, who salute the Queen with great ceremony.)

JACK. Dinner, your Highness, will be served anon.

QUEEN. 'Tis well. With faithfulness I was almost gone.

JACK. The King requests your ill taste of his game paste.

QUEEN. What! Pie!? Alas! why, why was I so hasty?

QUEEN. Well, I will try to pick some dainty pilonks.

On to the banquet hall. Attend me, ladies.

[Exit in stately procession. Curtain.]

SCENE 4.—The banquet room. King on throne (C.), behind table, on which stands a huge pie. The Queen sits beside him, and in her impatience eats pickles, and tastes the sauces in the custer. Ladies and Lords in attendance. Jack-a-dandy and Ladies of Honor stand with the Doctor near the throne.

Chorus.—COURTIERS and LADIES.

Air: "O'er the bright blue sea."—Finagle.

Lo! in this pasty fine

The royal pair desire to dine.

What is the matter, pray?

Why do the cooks so long delay?

Oh, in procession fine,

Lo! they come, and we'll proceed to dine. [Repeat.

[Enter procession of Cooks, headed by Chief Cook, who bears a huge carving-knife. As he carries the pie, bird whistles are heard. Great consternation and surprise are manifested by all the court. The Chief Cook lifts the cover and starts back in dismay. All the other Cooks run off in afright and sing the bird chorus behind the scenes.]

Chorus of Birds.

(Sung by Little Children behind the scenes.)

Air: "O'er the hills, free from care."

Allegro.

(Birds rise from the pie and all fly away.)

KING. To Mr. Bergh, of the S. P. C. A.

They will give information, did they say?

COURT. They did.

KING. Oh, horror! they'll present their bill!

I shall be fined! I find myself quite ill.

A horse! a horse!—I mean sal-voi-taire!

[King faints. Dorolot and Doralay slap his hands. Doctor holds a flask of snuffing-salts to his nose. Angry and confused bird whistles are heard, followed by a loud shriek. Maid runs on screaming, "Ah! ah!" and holding a handkerchief to her nose.]

QUEEN. What is the matter? Do somebody stop her. To make this hubbub here is most improper.
 MAID (tragically). 'Tis gone!
 DOROLY. What's gone?
 MAID. My nose. See how it bleeds.
 DOROLY. Thus wicked people pay for their misdeeds.
 QUEEN. You've been dishonest, if report says true.
 JACK. And soon or late all sinners get their due.

Solo.—JACK-A-DANDY.

Air: "Juanita."

Kitty, oh, Kitty, you've been doing very wrong,
 Which is a pity, as I'll prove in song.
 'Tis what everybody says,
 And no doubt it is quite true,
 She who pilfers oranges
 Will prig lemons too.
 Kitty, oh, Kitty, though I know 'tis not your name,
 It is a pity, but you're much to blame.
 Go with your tricks hence, we can give no "recommend."
 You've stolen sixpence, and betray'd your friend.
 Girls who do such things as these ('Tis as true of boys, I deem),
 Money take, and oranges,
 Forfeit our esteem.
 Kitty, oh, Kitty—though 'tis not your name, I know—
 It is a pity; but you'll have to go.

QUEEN. The character you've lost I can't restore;
 But here's your salary, and there's the door.
 KING. Madam, the moral is—well, not to prose,
 As plain to see as is—or was—her nose.
 But let that pass. It's getting very late—
 A fact, it seems, quite impolite to state—
 So each assume your station and your pose;
 It is high time to make our boxes close.
 Permit me to conduct your Royal Highness.

(He leads Queen to the throne, where they sit.)

Now, chorus, give us something nice for fins.

Finale.—CHORUS (in unison).

Air: "Oh, come, come away."

(To audience.)

O, please go a - way, Our play is now con - clud - ed, We're ver - y tired and sleep - y too, O, please go a - way.

Our en - ter - tain - ment we'll re - new Some oth - er time, to plea - sure you, But now a - dieu, a - dien, O, please go a - way.

(Kiss hands to audience.)

Oh, please come again,
 When we are not so weary.
 We'll sing for you and play for you
 On some other day.
 Just now we can but yawn (all yawn) and sigh
 Upon our little beds to lie;
 And so—good-by; good-by!
 Oh, please go away!

Oh, please don't be vex'd!
 (This verse concludes our chorus.
 The curtain then will be "rang down,"
 And so end the play.)
 We thank you more than we can tell;
 For—(bell): Hark! there goes the promoter's bell.
 And so—farewell! farewell!
 Oh, please go away!
 (All bow and courtesy. Curtain.)

CHAPTER V.

THE HOFMEISTERS.

MR. HOFMEISTER, the old musician, who, with the exception of his daughter and of Dr. Clinton, was Agnes Leigh's only friend in Halcorn, lived in a little house curiously situated at the back of a little court or alley, and thither Agnes on this morning directed her steps. Youth and a natural buoyancy of temperament still kept the young girl's spirits equal to her battle, and she had not lost her sense of enjoyment of certain small things that brightened the way. She liked the little quiet court-yard and the look of the old musician's room, with its window full of plants and its strip of red curtaining. The brick walk of the court was shaded in summer by a fine old tree, enclosed when the street was built up at either side; and hung with icicles, that shone in the sunlight, which Agnes called the old man's jewels, it gave in winter a look of cheer to the still place.

The narrow staircase leading up to Mr. Hofmeister's abode had an old-fashioned window, where the musician's only daughter, a cripple, kept two geraniums, and Agnes had grown fond of their color and bloom as she passed them in her weekly visits, and was given to nodding a good-morning to them as she went. But to-day her heart was almost too heavy to greet her little scarlet friends, who were waiting for her, freshly watered, and in a sunny part of the window. She hurried up the stairs, and knocked with a nervous hand upon Herr Hofmeister's door.

The "come in" was cheery enough, and Agnes obeyed

"'I SUPPOSE I AM TIRED,' SHE SAID."

it quickly. Margaret, the musician's daughter, was in her accustomed place near the fire, and she looked up with a bright smile of welcome for the visitor, which faded as she saw how pale and tired and anxious Agnes seemed.

Margaret, or Gretchen, as her father liked best to call her, had been a cripple from childhood, but, like many so laid down in the rush of life, she was happy and contented, caring only to see her father prosperous enough for their daily bread, and living a life of her own among her books and flowers, and giving out the rare sunshine of a peaceful, blessed spirit to those who came within her circle. These were few enough—in Halem, besides Agnes, only some little children of the neighborhood who came daily to her for lessons, and who learned at her side more than their primer and multiplication table. They were poor little waifs whom Margaret had found out with her usual instinct for those who were in need, and priceless as was their friendship to the lonely girl, it did not enlarge her exterior life. They came and went daily; but their crippled friend, who made them so happy for two hours every morning, was never known through them to any but their tired, overworked, sometimes careless, mothers.

"Agnes, my dear," Margaret exclaimed, stretching out one of her thin hands to her visitor, "how tired you look!

What is it, my child? Papa is out for a little; come here and sit down. You are cold!"

Agnes slowly obeyed. She took off the little gray bonnet and pushed her hair back wearily from her brow.

"What is it?" Margaret urged, gently.

Agnes tried to smile. "Oh, Gretchen dear," she said, looking at the other's quiet, fair face, "nothing; only I have failed in some pupils, and one or two people have said harsh things to me, and—I suppose I am tired." Two tears formed under Agnes's dark lashes and rolled silently down her cheeks.

"Ah, poor little one!" said Margaret, compassionately; "it is hard, but don't mind it. Don't be downhearted; something better may be done."

"But, Margaret," Agnes continued, "I find I must give up my room at Mrs. Jones's. She told me yesterday she had a better offer for it, and that she could not undertake the care of me any longer; and I don't know what to do."

"But your friend Mrs. Robertson," said Margaret, eagerly—"where is she?"

"She has gone to Florida," returned Agnes. "I wrote last week, and my letter was returned with a line from the house-keeper. The doctor has ordered her away for her health; and she is not to be troubled about anything, so the house-keeper says."

A SUMMER SHOWER.—Drawn by F. S. Church, N.Y.

Margaret looked thoughtfully into the fire for a moment before she said anything. Her interest in the little stranger was intense. Begun from motives of pure kindness, a real love for the child had grown up in the German girl's warm heart. She appreciated better than Agnes could the loneliness of her position, yet she had hesitated to ask questions which, it was evident, pained the child to answer. She saw her working and studying patiently and bravely day after day, and she knew how sweet and true and generous a nature Agnes possessed.

"Listen to me," Margaret said, finally. "The landlady of this house has a little room to let upstairs. Why not come here, and then you would not be so lonely. There is father," she added quickly, with a smile, as the door opened on the tall, slender figure of Herr Hofmeister, who came in, bringing with him a whiff of crisp air and a feeling of good cheer to the quiet little room. Gretchen was the first to speak, and she laid before her father Agnes's perplexity and her own suggestion. He received it very hopefully, and at once proposed that they should go and look at the little room.

They found the landlady in her part of the house; and as she conducted the musician and Agnes upstairs, she eyed the latter narrowly, and questioned her in a pert, although well-meaning way, much to the old man's annoyance; but he knew that Mrs. Slater's intentions were kindly, and whispered a word of encouragement to his little pupil when they were shown into the attic room.

When these arrangements were made, the master and his pupil went to their lesson. Gretchen delighted in their music. The strains of the violin awoke in the invalid girl's mind the remembrance of old days in Munich, when she had "dreams," and lived on hopes that came to nothing; but when one thing was taken, more had been given her.

Margaret leaned back in her chair, her eyes fixed lovingly upon Agnes's slim little figure against the light of the window. "Perhaps," she was thinking—"perhaps it was the very best thing that could have happened to me. I should have been carried away by music that was so much mine. As it is, I can love it and think of it best as part of other people's lives." And some thought came into the cripple's mind of how that morning, when one of her little friends had said to her, "Miss Hofmeister, you are always happy, and you know how to be good too, don't you?" a pang had crossed her heart, and then a thrill of calm joy. Yes, she had learned to say, "Thy will be done," and to feel that she might perhaps be thankful for that which had been actually taken from her.

"You will come in at tea-time, dear," said Margaret to Agnes, when the younger girl was preparing to depart.

Agnes returned her kiss and smile with a grateful assent. As she passed the little court, pausing this time long enough to nod to the geraniums, she was conscious of a new light in her heart. It is true that that morning she had received a rather grumbling and unsatisfactory letter from her only brother, who was in a store in Boston, but she had too long been the little mother of the small household which had once included her father and brother and herself, not to feel kindly toward the boy. He had not approved of her taking so much of their small capital for the winter's enterprise in Halem, and he had announced himself as very much disgusted with Mrs. Mostyn for not answering Agnes's letter. Still, perhaps, thought Agnes, as she passed the iron gateway of Briar Lawn, that kindly door would soon be open to her; perhaps the mistress of the mansion would come home, Bob assisted to the employment out West he longed for, and she— But Agnes's hopeful "perhapses" were too many to recount. She had one more errand before returning to Mrs. Jones's. There was a letter to be mailed, and she bent her steps in the direction of the post-office.

Some one whose figure was familiar stood at the little stamp window when Agnes, holding her letter still in her hand, approached. It was Fanny Pierson, and, seeing Agnes, she flashed a quick look upon her, a criticising, contemptuous smile just touching her lips.

In the next moment this look had vanished. Fanny's heart fairly stood still. Here, within two hours of her decision against Agnes, was what she considered proof positive in support of her most malicious theory.

Agnes, as I have said, held her letter with frank carelessness in her hand, and Fanny's eyes, travelling from the little music teacher's face to the square envelop, were riveted upon it. The superscription was in Agnes's own plain and precise hand, easily read, as follows:

HERMANN LEIGH,

Dorefield Prison,

Dorefield, Massachusetts.

The unconscious girl put on the stamp, dropped her letter in the box, and went on her way, but she left an enemy behind her.

For a moment Fanny stood still, fairly bewildered by her new piece of information. What could she do with it? was her first reflection. The mystery, if it had grown, was nearer solution. "That girl's" father was in prison! For what? Visions of terrible crimes floated through Fanny's excited brain. She saw in herself a sort of heroine who would be distinguished in Halem as the person who discovered an impostor. But to whom should she go first with her terrible discovery?

"I must be careful," was her shrewd reflection. "Perhaps it will be well, however, just to give Mrs. Lewis a hint of this;" and Fanny turned her steps in the direction of the Lewises' pleasant home.

CHAPTER VI.

MORE DISAPPOINTMENT.

A CHEERFUL little party sat down to tea that evening in the Hofmeisters' humble sitting room. Lamp-light and fire-light combined to illumine the dark furniture, and Margaret's good taste and refinement showed even in the simple arrangement of the tea-table, the few ornaments of the room, and the prettily draped windows.

Margaret and Agnes were both puzzled by an incident of the afternoon, but all determined to make the best of it. Mrs. Bland, the minister's wife, had sent for Agnes, and, much to her surprise, told her that it would not be possible to give her the desired place in the Sunday-school. The kind-hearted though easily prejudiced little lady had tried to soften this, murmuring something about Agnes's youth and inexperience, and hoping she would get on, etc. And so the poor girl had been politely dismissed, reaching the outer air of the minister's house with a chill at her heart keener than the November weather.

Agnes, as she made her way toward the Hofmeisters', wondered what it meant. Perhaps, after all, the young girl tried to think, it was only one of the chances of life; yet looks, half-tones, cool bows and words, from people she had fancied took an interest in her, came back; and on going to school for the afternoon French lesson the air of coolness among all the girls had been unmistakable. We all know that nothing is more depressing than this undefinable "manner" which can suggest so much. Agnes, standing in one of the doorways waiting for a special word with M. Le Maitre, had been passed by half a dozen of the girls with a hastily polite though chilling manner.

Agnes felt decidedly cheerful by the evening. It gave her a peculiarly home-like feeling to busy herself about the room, putting away the tea-things, settling Margaret comfortably in her arm-chair, and then taking out her little roll of mending for a quiet hour of talk and work by the pleasant fireside. The two girls planned their home life with all the enthusiasm of their age and experience. Margaret had long wanted some more active assistance in her household cares; Agnes was eager and anxious to render them; and in return, was it not much for the poor little lonely stranger in Halcorn to have the protection of even so humble a home as this?

Thirty dollars remained of her small capital. Her school bill at Miss Leroy's was paid up to the end of next month, and of course her living and various other expenses had to come out of this sum. Two pupils she had obtained—nice little boys, young enough to profit by her instructions; but, thought Agnes, with a chill, and then a rush of color to her cheeks, what if she should lose them like the others, and for what reason? Was it, she thought, the way all who struggled for themselves might expect to be treated?

THE OLD FLAG.

BY MARY E. VANDYNE.

THE martial strains that filled the air,
And of the nation's birthday told,
Were borne by wandering zephyrs where
A battle-flag, all worn and old,
With reverent fingers had been hung,
Its stars had long since lost their gleam,
And blood-stains lurked its folds among;
But as I saw it proudly wave,
I fancied that its memories woke;
And then, as if some spirit gave
It utterance, thus methought it spoke:

"Again, again the rolling year
Brings back to me the day of days;
Again the bugle call I hear,
And greet the cannon's joyous blaze,
When through the land, from South to North,
Rings out the welcome to the Fourth.

"My starry crown and milk-white bars
The stains of many a conflict bear;
My tattered folds are but the scars
That veterans ever love to wear.
I am the sign of Liberty,
Beneath whose folds all men are free.

"Your grandsires gave a wondrous shout
When first upon the lambent air
My glowing colors were flung out,
And they could see me waving there.
They knew that radiant summer morn
Had seen a powerful nation born.

"Our mother-land beyond the sea
Forgot how old her sons had grown,
That in our parents' likeness we,
Who were so much her very own,
Must surely claim our freedom when
From boys we changed to grown-up men.

"But, ah! upon this cottage wall
For full a hundred years I've hung;
I've learned how time may conquer all,
And many changes may be rung.
Full wondrous are the things, I ween,
That in this hundred years I've seen—

"A hundred years and half a score,
And all forgotten is the strife.
Our mother country, ours once more,
Now feels with us a common life;
With mutual love our pulses thrill,
And we are England's children still.

"Her adult strength with ours combines,
And faith and confidence increase,
And o'er our common pathway shines
The radiance of the Star of Peace.
While, ever clasping hand in hand,
Land echoes back again to land.

"I've lived to see my Stripes and Stars Blend with the banner of St. George,
While all forgotten are the scars
Of Lexington and Valley Forge.
Old England with Columbia vies
To see where most affection lies."

FIRE AND WATER.

BY SOPHIE B. HERRICK.

THE sea along the western coast of Scotland is filled with numberless islands, which look on the map as if they might have been broken from the solid land. One of these is a tiny island lying close in the embrace of a larger one. Though it shows as a mere speck on the map, this little island of Staffa is known the world over for its wonderful natural formations. On the edge of the sea, rising direct from the water, is the well-known Fingal's Cave. The regularity of its formation is so remarkable that it is hard to believe it to be a work of nature. Lofty columns of regular shape stand up out of the sea, built up, it would seem, of block upon block of solid stone carefully chiselled and as carefully laid upon each other.

On the northern coast of Ireland, at the point which is nearest the Scottish coast, is another wonderful assemblage of these columns, roofless, and running out into the sea, called the Giant's Causeway.

An old story makes these two wonders the ruins of castles built and inhabited by two unfriendly giants. The cave has received the name of the Scotch giant Fingal. There are many old poems, sung among the Highlanders in the far past, of which Fingal is the hero, but we now know that no man's or giant's hand helped to lift these great blocks of stone one upon the other. They were built up by the fires under the earth. The melted stone poured out of the volcanoes above and spread over the land, and there, as it hardened and cooled, split up into great crystals or columns. The water dashing for thousands of years against them washed away the earth around and the broken fragments, but was dashed back again by a few of the hard unbroken columns, and so were left Fingal's Cave, the Giant's Causeway, and other formations like these.

Too long ago for you even to imagine it, there was a great bridge of these columns reaching from Scotland to Ireland; the Giant's Causeway was one abutment, and Fingal's Cave another. In the thousands of years that have passed since, the rest of the bridge has been swept away and destroyed, with only here and there an island of columns between to tell the tale.

These rocks—hardened volcanic rock—are called basalt. They are not the only things which in drying contract and split into crystals. Take some common starch, dissolve it in water, and let it gradually dry; you will find that it is not a plain flat sheet, but that it, too, has split up into crystals. Nothing, however, splits up as regularly as basalt does.

Sometimes where there has been a wide crack in the older rocks the melted basalt has run into and filled the crack. In that case the stone as it hardened split up the other way, and instead of columns, it looks like piles of logs. On the coast of Lake Superior there is a remarkable instance of this; the surrounding rock has worn away, leaving the hard basalt lying like a carefully arranged pile of cord-wood.

The great central fires of the earth are constantly at work, sometimes acting with shocks, and sometimes quietly and steadily changing the face of the earth. In India, seventy years ago, one of these sudden changes took place which was very remarkable. There was an earthquake shock, and a great piece of land fifty miles long and sixteen broad was suddenly lifted up ten feet higher than the country around, and there it has staid, with a straight wall around the edge called by the natives "Ullah Bund," or, "God's Wall," from the mysterious way in which it arose.

Without any earthquake shock or sudden movement continents are in some places slowly sinking and in others as slowly rising. It might seem as if it were the waters which were rising or falling, but a moment's thinking will show you that this cannot be so. Water soon comes to a level, and as there is nearly the same quantity in the oceans all the while, it must be the land that is changing.

There was a great many years ago, before Christ came into the world, a temple built on the Gulf of Baïæ near Naples. Three pillars are still standing of this temple, though they have seen many ups and downs since their building. The original pavement was of beautiful mosaic, and so well built that it still remains, though the earth on which it stands slowly sank for many years. About two hundred years after Christ a new floor was laid six feet above the old one, showing at that time how much the earth had sunk. Down, down the pillars went into the sea, till they had sunk twenty-six feet. Then came a terrible eruption of volcanic lava, and the temple was lifted bodily more than twenty feet, the pillars still standing upright. Twenty-six feet above the first pavement, and for twelve feet below that line, the pillars have been fairly pitted by some small sea animal which had burrowed into the marble when it was under the sea. The story of the temple's travels is written on the face of the pillars. Now the temple is again slowly sinking at the rate of an inch a year.

Our own continent is tilting up in some places and sinking down in others. The Florida coast is sinking, the North Carolina coast is rising. Near Boston the land is rising, and Greenland for six hundred miles is sinking so manifestly that the Greenlanders have learned not to build their huts close by the sea. An island in the Gulf of St. Lawrence is gradually tipping; its southern coast is dipping down and its northern rising into high bluffs.

The water and the fire in doing these mighty works, in gradually turning and tilting continents and islands, and wearing them down again, do not forget some smaller duties in the way of carving and ornamenting and beautifying the earth.

Near where famous old Troy stood are some marvellous salt springs. The place is a valley enclosed in mountains, colored by the minerals in the water—gorgeous reds and blues and yellows. The floor of the valley is a variegated crust, through which jets of hot, intensely salt water come up. In one place from the rocks at the side jets of boiling water spout out like fountains at play, and flow away as a rivulet of salty, steaming water.

But there is no country in the world which has more wonderful hot springs than our own. The hot water, filled with carbonic acid, which comes from the fires beneath the earth has the power to dissolve certain minerals; these it brings up to the surface of the earth. The carbonic acid goes off in gas when it comes to the air, but the lime and other minerals are allowed to settle; they harden and form a cup, from which the water drips down, forming limestone icicles or stalactites. Finally cup after cup is formed in this way (Fig. 3), most wonderfully ornamented. In one place in Italy such a spring, which is at the top of a hill, has encased the whole hill in a layer of stone formed from its settlings.

In carbonated springs like those in Fig. 3 most of the lime settles at the bottom, as earth will in water; but there is a still more wonderful kind of spring which builds its own basin, and after a while makes itself into a fountain. Such a spring is called a geyser. These are very rare, because it takes so many different things acting together to form them. They are the children of fire and water. Geysers are found in Iceland, New Zealand, and our own Western country (Fig. 4). Those in the Yellowstone National Park, in Wyoming Territory, are perhaps the largest and most curious in the world. Indeed, that region abounds with wonderful examples of Nature's handiwork, which must be interesting to all students of geology.

A geyser begins by being a little hot spring; it ends by being a natural fountain. Geyser water has been put into a basin, and allowed slowly to dry up. It is then found that the settlements from this water are not on the bottom, but that, as the water dried, it left a solid rim around the basin, and as it sank, the rim broadened downward.

In the geyser water there is a white and glassy substance that, as it settles, builds a cup for itself; when the water overflows the cup, it naturally runs out of the lowest place. Here the solid rim is built up by the glassy silica till that gets higher; the water then shifts and flows over the lowest place left, building slowly the lowest places in the rim, till, instead of a cup, it makes a high tube with a mound of silica all around it.

Sometimes the water will lie quiet in the tube for a good while; but the fires beneath are turning water into steam, and when enough steam forms, it lifts the water in the tube, in its struggles to get out, until finally the water is thrown up into the air violently, like the jet of a mighty fountain. The steam escapes in a single burst or in several; the water sinks back and lies quiet for a while, till steam is again formed, and the fountain jets again.

A toy geyser can be made of an upright tube of iron filled with water, and two gas jets burning against the tube, one above another. Every different way that a geyser plays can be imitated on this simple little arrangement. It would take too long to explain why some geysers are too young to play and why some are too old; why some play at fixed times, and others only when a clod of earth or something of the kind is thrown into the tube; but if you could see the experiment tried on the toy geyser, it would not be hard to understand.

WHICH IS YOUR FAVORITE FLOWER?

OUR POST-OFFICE BOX.

WE give the place of honor this week to a young writer whose home is in Honolulu. She tells us about the Hawaiian Islands. Using the word "Aloha," she does not translate it, but the Postmistress knows what it means, and so, Mary, in the name of all the children, she says, "Aloha!"— "Love to you."

Away out on the Pacific Ocean, with a beautiful climate and most charming scenery, which suggests paradise to the weary sea-worn travelers, you will find the Hawaiian Islands. As you look from the deck of the steamer gliding quickly along their shores, no scenery can be more picturesque—the clouds resting upon their mountain tops; the slopes of the mountains broken into numerous gulches, covered with ferns and trees, and green with the richest summer foliage; with the water falling here and there into numerous little streams. They present the most beautiful picture of nature you can imagine.

As you approach nearer the land, plantations of sugar cane attract the eye, with groups of cocoanuts bordering the wide-sanded shores, and near by the native huts, the natives themselves strolling along the beach or sporting in the waves.

As the steamer passes Diamond Head, Waikiki, with its cocoa-nut groves, comes into view; then the city of Honolulu, almost hidden from sight by the trees, in the distance; behind all, the lofty mountains; in front, the white-capped breakers, rolling high up on the beach—form a grand sight, and one that will never be forgotten by the stranger. The land rises so suddenly that the ocean keeps its dark blue till within a mile of the shore, then as suddenly changes into a variety of colors.

Another thing that adds to the beauty of these islands is their wonderful sunsets.

Honolulu, the capital, seat of government, and residence of the King, is the only city in the group. The stranger is amused at the unusual sights that meet him at every turn. The dark faces and bright dresses of the natives look very curious to him before he leaves the deck, but the cheery "Aloha" which greets him as he steps for the first time on the shores of Honolulu, makes him feel at home. Away from the busy center of the city the houses of native and foreign inhabitants are found.

The foliage of the trees is beautiful, a few of them being the cocoa-palm, louloua (or screw-palm), the bread fruit, ohia (or native apple), the koa, the hau, and kukui (or candle-nut-tree). Many of the trees have been imported from foreign countries, and have grown large and spreading. Among these are the tamarind, the mango, the Chinese orange and the sweet orange, the lime, the alligator-pear, the citron, the fig, banana, peach, date-palm, almond, monkey-pod, the royal and fat palms, the vanilla, and the loquat. The houses are almost concealed by the foliage of these trees, while the gardens contain plants and magnificent flowers in great variety. Among the most showy of creepers is the Bouganvillea, which, in spring, attracts the attention of many strangers by its brilliant clusters of flowers.

Some of the views of the Hawaiian Islands have very few superiors in the world. The view from the Pall cannot be surpassed by even Tallon's Front View. From the mountain called the View, also from Round Top, and still higher, Mount Tahtalua.

Among the most varied of creeper is the tree-fern, which grows profusely in the valleys and mountain gorges. The valleys of Nuanou, Pauva, Paloua, and Manoa are very beautiful.

HONOLULU, HAWAIIAN ISLES.

MISSOURI, LOUISIANA.

I was very much interested in Fairfax Payne, and hope the Sunday-school will be a success. My favorite stories in HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE were "Iola House," "Our Little Dinnee," "Pearl's Easter at Merrick's," "W. Wakali's Story," "The Nature in Florida," and "The Ring." I also think "The Ice Queen" and "Left Behind, or Ten Days a New-Year," very interesting stories. My aunt likes "Silent Pete." I remember when the Postmistress asked Maria C. if she had ever read "We are Seven." I think she must have found it a very pretty piece of poetry. I like "The Bird's Nest," thinking Miss Alcott's Little Men and Women very interesting; I wonder if she felt sorry when our little Beth died?

The flowers are just out to plant the portulaca, or sun-plant, in the sunniest spot in the yard. We have planted them so for several years, and find that a shaded spot is better; the seedlings soon will benefit the ardent rays of our Southern sun, and after ten o'clock A. M. the lovely blossoms with their gorgeous colors will be in their bright petals. The following morning, when they bloom again with the sun's first kiss upon the dewy buds.

There are a great many moose-birds here, but none so gentle they fly down on our flower beds while we are looking at them. I was out walking a few days ago and saw a little bird nest in a very small tree leaning over the waters of the Atchafalaya. We have a cat named Shikat, so called after a battle fought in this country's warfare and history; the pretty bird, as soon as the eggs are hatched, he eats all the nestlings. There is a little wren building just under my window. I have seen a great many wren's eggs, and found a great many nests, but have never seen their young. I once saw a flock of thirteen young partridges, all in the wood-innery, and they were very tame. On looking at them that the mother had flown far away. I think there must have been a hawk near. Her object in doing this was to coax the hawk to the spot where she was, and then fly back to the ones.

EVA K.

It is hard to be patient with Puss, although she only follows to her nature when she sets her affections on your pet birds. There is a gray cat in the neighborhood of my home, which stole into the house one evening, and frightened a pet rooster, and has not sung a note since. I have no doubt the prowler would have killed my darling bird if I had not heard a flurry of wings and a cry of distress, and rushed to the rescue. What a close watch I am keeping on the gray cat you may all imagine!

BOSTON, MASSACHUSETTS.

DEAR POSTMISTRESS—I should like to write and tell you about my visit to Hoxey's Garden at Cambridge. I went last Friday with my mother and some friends. There are a great many rhododendrons there—about one thousand, I believe; we went principally to see them. They were perfectly beautiful, and were of many different colors—dark and light, pink and white. There were a great many azaleas too, which were very beautiful, especially the flame-colored ones; other colors were scarlet, crimson and pink. An arbutus hedge was around them. I must close now; and I send a puzzle. With love,

ALICE W. T.

Thanks for both letter and puzzle.

BOSTON, MASSACHUSETTS.

DEAR POSTMISTRESS,—Seeing so many girls write to you, I thought I would try, and see if my letter would be published. I am eleven years old, and I have a brother Louis, and a dog named Bois. He takes the Bois's Companion, and HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE. I have a canary bird and a collie dog for my pets. This summer my father got me a mouse as a present of a pet, and a black Bois has a gray squirrel and a chestnut horse Roney. We expect to have a nice time this summer, because now we can all ride together. We go to Newport in summer. I must tell you something funny. A few mornings ago Louis woke up, and to his astonishment saw a large mouse sitting on his nose. He was so gravely crying him. When Frisky saw his master awake, he gave a little squeak, and jumped around him so much that Louis thought something was so he got up, and he saw a little squirrel. He called me in to see them. They were both looking at your finger. We named them Specky and Brownie.

NATHALIE S.

MEMPHIS, INDIAN TERRITORY.

I have never seen any letters from the Indian Territory, so I will write one. I am twelve years old, and have lived here six years. I go to a primary school, and expect to go to a common school this fall, for two hours every morning—until we go out camping. I have five brothers and four sisters. My youngest brother is eight months old. Every summer we go out camping, and have had our first camp stay every year, but this year we are to camp up the spring and have a bath-house and new tents and a large arbor. The place to which we intend to go is called Timpanog Mountain, made up of two immense stone chimneys; and we have another arched Skeleton Hill, for there is an Indian grave upon it, and there are lots of beads in it besides a skeleton.

MAUD S. T.

WARREN, MASS. HAWAIIAN ISLANDS.

DEAR POSTMISTRESS—I am a girl fourteen years old who lives on the Hawaiian Islands. I have taken HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE for four years, and think it is a delightful book. I enjoy reading Mrs. Child's stories so much, I wrote to Annie first, and hope I shall soon see it in print.

ADELE C. W.

NORTHWOOD, PENNSYLVANIA.

I have attended a private school at Northwood, one while, about a mile away. It closed last week for the summer vacation. I have one sister and one brother, and we all went to the same school. My sister is in the second grade, and my brother, I have taken HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE for two years; it was given me by an aunt for a Christmas present, and I think it makes a very good story. I have enjoyed the pieces by Annie Child more than any others in the book. I also enjoyed some of the pieces by Howard Pyle, but of all I have seen yet I like the story of "The Boy and the Dog." My mother and she sent me a very pretty pattern mat. I have never written to HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE before, and I do hope I will see this in print.

ANNA L. T.

JACKSONVILLE, GEORGIA.

There is no river within ten miles of this place, though two small streams flow into it. My mother, I go to school and study reading, spelling, writing and practical arithmetic, physiology, grammar, and geography, besides music and writing. Not wanting to crowd out your correspondence with others, I will close. Asking some little girl that is also a lover of HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE to correspond with me, I remain your obedient servant,

ESSIE FISHER.

COLUMBUS, OHIO.

DEAR POSTMISTRESS,—Permit me to give expression to the great interest I feel in reading HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE. From the issue of the very first number to the latest date I have found each one more attractive than the last. I have enjoyed the pieces by Annie Child so much that I excite an interest in the inexhaustible text-book of Nature, and will lead to a higher appreciation of the beauties of the world. I hope that your publication—the placing in the hands and before the minds of children, not merely amusement but also instruction—deserves the consideration of home circles.

The continued stories are calculated to arouse an interest in reading, supplemented as they are by just enough of illustration, and by the introduction for another chapter of "Silent Pete" as any boy or girl, though no longer a young person. What lessons of kindness and respect to the young may be learned from a story so charmingly written!

The letters in "Our Post-office Box," from home and abroad, awaken interest among the young people, and will result in the cultivation of habits of observation and description.

In conclusion, I can but express the wish that every one, both old and young, who can read, may become, as I am, your grateful, TOWNS, TEXAS.

I am a boy of thirteen, and live in Texas. My brother has been taking your paper for the first time, and he expects to take it another year. I am going to try to get a cow, but I do not think any one else here is taking it. I have four brothers and three sisters, and I am the eldest of the males. My names with my brothers, their names are Tom and Tip. We are not going to school now, but we have plenty of work to do at home. We have a nice large flock of goats, which I help feed. I have a cow, and I have a pair of chickens, which I help to milk; a nice pony, bridle, and saddle, which I have much fun in riding after the cows.

BERTIE W.

BROOKLYN, NEW YORK.

This is the fourth year I have taken HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE, and I enjoy it very much. I am ten years old, and study English, French, arithmetic, grammar, spelling, reading, writing, dictation, and I am in Compound Numbers in arithmetic. I take two other papers besides HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE: they are My New Year's Book. If I wish to say to M. E. S. that Gipsy, Dot, Spot, Topsy (if one is black), and Beauty are nice names for kittens. I think the cats are different kinds of cats, and I have had them several times, but my only pets now are a large black cat and her little gray and white striped kitten. I am very fond of reading, and my favorite authors are Miss Aleott, "Paris," and Miss Warner (author of The Wide, Wide World), which is one of my favorite books. I do not use a capital letter in my sponge-cake. Let me know how you like it, girls. I also send two puzzles. With lots of love from your little friend, FLORENCE J. A.

Thanks for the puzzles. Here is the receipt:
SPONGE-CAKE.—Three eggs; beat the yolks with one cup of sugar and two tablespoonsful of cold water; beat the whites to a froth; then mix and add a teaspoonful of baking powder; add one cup of flour; beat all together. Flavor with lemon, and bake immediately.

PHILADELPHIA, PENNSYLVANIA.
My father gave me HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE for a Christmas present. This is the second year that he has given it to me. I have five sisters and two brothers. My favorite authors are Mrs. Lucy C. Lillie and David Kez. My favorite stories are "Into Unknown Seas," "Two Arrows," and "Sisters and Sons of Lincoln." My favorite children's literature is a pamphlet or a book, and what is the price, and where can it be obtained?

MADISON, WISCONSIN.
DEAR POSTMISTRESS,—I have a cousin living in England who takes your paper. She is much older than myself (she is over twenty), and I am older than she is. I am nearly your age. I love you very much, and I love her dearly, although I have never seen her. She has asked me to write a letter to you, and if you are so kind as to publish it, will tell her how her friends that she could not see from her American cousin. I cannot think of a more interesting subject than my ponies, but I think you will like to hear about them. You seem fond of pets. When I was four years old, Uncle "om bought me a pony. Her name was Bessie, and every one who saw her used to say, "What a pretty pony!" She was so cute she could run away with or throw almost any one, but always behaved well with children. I used to ride, and drove her in a carriage. When mamma was with me. The third summer I had her she became lame, and papa said she must be turned into the pasture, and have a long rest, so she stayed there until the first of September. One evening, when it was nearly dark, papa was walking through the pasture, and found Bessie standing quiet still, and a little weel coil with her legs. Papa tried to start her, but she refused to move; so he took the dear little coil in his arms and started, thinking the mother would follow. She still did not stir, so he whined piteously; then papa went back, and found that her leg was broken. We never found out how it was done, and although the bone was set, and everything done for her that could be done, she got worse all the time, and suffered so that she had to be killed when the coil was a week old. The coil was the loveliest I ever saw. I would tell that I could lift her easily, and get black like her mother, with only a white stripe down her face. Early the morning after papa found poor Bessie he discovered the comet which was so brightly visible that fall; so he called the coil Comet, and that was how my second pony got her funny name. After her mother died, she was sold for a milch, and for a long time we did not expect her to live, for she was so weak she could not stand alone; but after a while she began to mend, and then it was not long ere she was the fattest and most roguish of ponies. She was put in a loose stall, and every night that winter at twelve o'clock papa went to the barn to feed her. Now she is over three years old. Mamma and I drive her, and this summer I shall ride her. Papa has taught her several funny tricks, and is now teaching her to "sit up." He says, "Ollie, you love mamma?" and she shakes her head every time. Then he inquires, "Do you love me?" and she raises her nose against his neck, and the most delectate mane I should like so much to take you for a ride behind her. She weighs eight hundred, and trots very fast for a pony. I think you will enjoy
Your loving little friend,

NAUGHTY WILLIE.

In a remote part of a village named Creston, in Iowa, there was a large house used only in summer. Being summer, the family were all there, and the mother, the father, the two boys and the children, Alice and Willie. Now Alice had a beautiful French doll, of which she thought a great deal. Alice's doll had the same name as Willie, and she was playing with it, and which was not far from the house, Alice dropped her doll into the water, and it was carried away by a current, before she could get it. She ran to the house, and told the cook that Alice was drowned in the brook. The cook said, "It can't be possible." "Yes, it is," said Willie.

Cook ran to Mrs. H., and told her. As soon as Mrs. H. heard the news she fainted. Mr. H. ran to the brook, and there he found the doll floating in the water, and went to capture it, but found it nothing but Alice's doll. They ran to the house shouting for joy, and there they found the real Alice with her mother, crying for her doll. It was soon restored to her, but it was injured by having a little Willie will never do such a thing again. Do you?

The hero of this little story played what we call a practical joke, and if the story is true, he ought to have been sent to bed, with bread and water for his supper. Practical jokes are never very amusing, and are almost always cruel.

RACINE, WISCONSIN.
I live at the Taylor Orphan Asylum, which is situated about three miles from the city. I have two brothers here and two away from here. We find a good many wild flowers out in the woods, but they will not press very well, there are twenty-eight children living here. In winter we go out skating, and have nice times. I am thirteen years old.

I am a little boy eleven years old, go to school, and study geography, reading, spelling, arithmetic, grammar, and composition. I have the first volume of HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE; I received them while at "Cisco." I have lived here about one year and a half. I wrote once before this, but it was not published; I hope to see this letter in print. I would like to correspond with some boy about my age, in Canada, who has no pets. I am making a collection of stamps.

DEAR POSTMISTRESS,—I am a little boy ten years old. I have one brother and three sisters. We have a very pleasant view from where we live. I have a very good pony, and we take a twenty minutes' walk from the Suspension-Bridge. We go to the Zoological gardens nearly every day. We have only one pet; that is a canary, which we keep up in the nursery. We have one of HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE for nearly a year and a half, and like it very much. I have been to a day school for two years, and I won a prize and five certificates.

LINCOLN, NEBRASKA.
DEAR POSTMISTRESS,—I have written to you before, but I suppose you do not remember all the long letters I wrote. I am now in a beautiful new brick school building. I study arithmetic, grammar, history, writing, spelling, and reading. I have a population of over twenty thousand. We are about to put in a new system of sewerage. We have electric lights in our city. There are many baseball games going on here now, and it is funny to see the cars so full that people are sitting on top of the car. I am only eleven years old. I am over five feet in height, so that no person who is over twenty thinks I'm under fifteen. I have taken HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE ever since it was first published, and I have now four. I have Volume I, No. 1, and only two or three numbers missing.

A word to those of you who have the care of pets. Please remember that the little bird or pigeon, rabbit or squirrel, which is your own, depends on you for food, shelter, and comfort. See that it has fresh water to drink, plenty of the food it likes, and three-fourths, a clean cage or house, a nice bed, and a happy life. It is very sad, but some children—never mine, I trust—allow their pets to suffer cruelly, simply from want of thought. Pets should receive care every day.

LAWN-TENNIS IN DARKYVILLE—AN EXCITING MOMENT.

A USEFUL DOG.

THIS animal, whose intelligence was certainly greater than that of a good many men and women, belonged to the French statesman M. Léon Gambetta, and those who knew him say that he was never tired of telling stories about his favorite. One day M. Gambetta was returning to his home at N—, a short distance from Paris. He was driving his own light carriage, and having a great deal to think about, was letting his horse take its own easy way. Suddenly the animal started and reared, almost overturning the vehicle to which it was harnessed. M. Gambetta jumped out to see what had caused the disturbance, and found a peasant lying almost across the road, so that he must have been severely injured had the horse gone on.

Annoyed at the man's recklessness, he addressed him sternly, and asked what he meant by thus risking his life. The unfortunate peasant replied that he desired to die. He had been sent by his master to collect a bill. The money was paid in gold, but owing to the ragged condition of the pocket where he placed it, he had lost it, piece by piece, until now only two of the coins were left.

M. Gambetta smiled, and took the gold pieces in his hand. Then he called to a fine pointer dog which had been following his carriage, and allowed the dog to smell them.

"Allez chercher!" he cried, pointing down the road.

The dog understood him at once. He started on his ear-rand at full speed, and, one by one, picked up the coins in his mouth, and brought them to his master. The joy of the poor peasant knew no bounds. As for the dog, he already had all the world could give him. He had added to his fame, but his place in his master's heart had long been assured.

A CHILD OF THE SUNRISE LAND.

BY MARGARET E. SANGSTER.

A DEAR little child of the Sunrise Land!

Far and away o'er the deep green sea
A friendly breeze, that came as I fanned
With a Japanese fan, told this to me—

That Iso San,
Born in old Japan,
Is a little lady of high degree.

This gossiping breeze, if it told me true,
With its thrilling whispers of East and West,
Said, what with the learning of old and new,
Poor Iso San will have little rest.

She must try to please,
She must write Chinese,
She must prattle in English with the best.

She must hold her teacup with dainty grace;
In the prettiest way she may coquet
With her lap-dog's ears; with a smiling face
Her singing-bird or her doll may pet.
I have understood

She must not be rude,
And they'd send for the doctor should Iso fret.

She is sometimes naughty and sometimes good,
Like other people, I have no doubt;
But what would happen if Iso should Sulk or clamor, or frown and pout?

The breeze confessed
He had never guessed;
He had sought in vain, and had not found out.

The Sunrise Land is a land of flowers,
Beautiful things that had and blow,
Timing their lives to fragrant hours
'Neath Fusiyama with crown of snow;

And Iso San,
Learning all she can,
The lore of the flowers will surely know.

The blossoming quince, a torch ablaze,
In hedge and garden shall kindle pyres,
And hint to children in merry days
Of nights illumed by the fairies' fires.

Of wishes three
That may granted be
If the wee folk list to the child's desires.

Small Iso San, of the Sunrise Land
Miles and miles o'er the deep green sea,
With a fluttering fan as I softly fanned,
I beckoned a breeze that talked of thee,
Sweet Iso San,

Born in old Japan,
A quaint little lady of high degree.

LIVING BAROMETERS.

BY E. D. WALKER.

BAROMETERS are instruments which foretell the weather. The best are long glass tubes filled with mercury, the upper end closed, and the lower end resting in a basin of mercury. The height of the silvery column changes with the atmosphere. It falls when a storm is coming, and rises before fair weather. A commoner barometer, hanging by many doors to give advice about umbrellas, is a chemical solution of camphor, which becomes cloudy as rain approaches, and clears before a fair sky. At least it is supposed to do so, but it often shows only when it is raining and when it is not, which most people can tell without a barometer.

Many animals are weather prophets, and their predictions are more reliable than instruments, almanacs, or signal bureaus. They are very convenient indicators of the coming skies, as they are scattered everywhere, and always attend to their duty. One who is familiar with nature can find in all places some friendly creatures warning him when storms are near, or inviting him to enjoy a rainless day. Bugs, birds, and beasts shout at him their secrets about the changing atmosphere.

Do you ask how they know what the weather will be, and how they tell others? In the same way that the true barometer does. The air about us is an ocean fifty miles deep, constantly moving in wind tides and taking new forms. As our life is at the bottom of this thin sea, which weighs down on us with a pressure of over a ton to each square foot, everything about us feels the influence of these changes. We cannot see them, any more than we can see the clear breezes, warm and cold, which unite into a black thunder-cloud. But the tubes of mercury or of camphor solution notice the lighter weight of the air, and tell us hours or even days ahead that a storm is preparing. Thus the smoke from the chimney rising in a straight line prophesies that it will be a fine day, for the air is dry; but when it hangs near the ground, the dampness causing this behavior proves that rain is near. The moist air preceding showers sets the furniture to snapping also, and makes the atmosphere wonderfully clear, so that distant objects are seen as through a telescope.

Men are barometers as well as other animals. We often hear folks say, "I feel in my bones that it will snow soon." Some persons are oppressed or exhilarated in advance of the weather by the subtle influences which are brewing foul or fair days. Rheumatic people can tell coming storms by their aching joints. As soon as the rain begins to fall they are relieved. Their painful members are always a day or more ahead of the weather. A rheumatic limb or a well-developed corn is a small fortune to a wise farmer, though he is not always as thankful for his infallible indicator as he should be.

The "lower animals" are higher than man in their sensitiveness to the delicate suggestions of the air. Birds fly from a place where cholera or other infection is advancing. It is a familiar saying that rats desert a doomed ship.

Dogs act very queerly before large storms—eating grass, biting wood, and seeming to have changed their natures. Cats also take unusual freaks, and are very drowsy. Cattle are very uneasy because of the flies that bother them specially then. The screaming of hawks, the low flight of swallows, the jerky motions of the crows, and the general disturbance of the whole bird creation, are also storm signs. The herons flying inland from the sea-shore caution farmers to hurry in their hay, or it will soon be wet. All the sounds of animals are peculiarly shrill before rain.

The sympathy of animals with atmospheric changes is most noticeable in small creatures. Insects are the most sensitive of all, being violently affected by the delicate shiftings of electricity and moisture which usher in new weather. Those which fly near the ground for hours before the rain, and the birds feeding on them follow suit. Crickets chirp with twice their usual voice to announce rain; the ants run very wildly about, and the flies bite more fiercely, as if excited to bloody vengeance by the disturbed elements. Spiders order their web-making by weather principles. When you see numbers of newly spun webs in the morning grass, you may be sure of a rainless day, however cloudy it may appear. Ant-hills built to an unusual height are another assurance of a pleasant sky. These dainty little architects feel all through their joints, far more keenly than a gouty invalid, what the skies are going to do, and never waste their precious time by raising useless houses. On the ocean rocks the whelk shells crawl very high when storms are at hand.

Reptiles are intimately acquainted with weather matters. It is claimed that a very accurate barometer can be made of a frog in a bottle of water. Give froggy a stick to climb up on, and he will stay out of the water during fair prospects, but will go below for a long bath when rains are nigh. A turtle or water lizard would do as well as a frog, and a careful observation of its habits in connection with the weather would develop many useful indications.

The most surprising prophecies are those which point to probabilities months ahead. Occasionally the opossums make their winter-quarters in trees instead of in the ground, relying upon a mild winter. When the hibernating creatures, as snakes, toads, flies, etc., come out unusually early, an advanced summer is sure.

Many similar signs will be noted by those who study out-door life. But any one or two marks are never safe alone. The sea-captain compares the winds, the clouds, the glass, and the magnet before he speaks with confidence of the next day's weather, and sometimes makes a mistake even then. It must be remembered that in a long stretch of monotonous weather, drought or rain, the ordinary indexes fail, but there are always some signs which a good judgment can use safely. The common weather proverbs are misleading, frequently false. The best collection of weather maxims, based chiefly upon animals, is contained in the following verses by Dr. Edward Jenner, the English physician who discovered vaccination. All of these indications were verified by the naturalist Darwin.

SIGNS OF RAIN.

Forty reasons for declining a friend's invitation to a long walk.

1. The hollow winds begin to blow,
2. The clouds are black, the glass is low,
3. The soot falls down, the spaniels sleep,
4. And spiders from their cobwebs peep,
5. Last night the sun went pale to bed,
6. The moon in halos hid her head;
7. The boding shepherd heaves a sigh,
8. For, see! a rainbow spans the sky,
9. The walls are damp, the ditches smell;
10. Closed is the pink-eyed pimpernel,
11. Hark how the chairs and tables crack!
12. Old Betty's nerves are on the rack,
13. Loud quacks the duck, the peacocks cry;
14. The distant hills are seeming nigh!
15. How restless are the snorting swine!
16. The busy flies disturb the kine.
17. Low o'er the grass the swallow wings;
18. The cricket, too, how sharp he sings!
19. Puss on the hearth with velvet paws
20. Sits wiping o'er her whiskered jaws,
21. Through the clear streams the fishes rise,
22. And nimbly catch the incautious flies,
23. The glowworms, numerous and light,
24. Illumed the dewy dell last night.
25. At dusk the squalid toad was seen
26. Hopping and crawling o'er the green.
27. The whirling dust the wind obeys,
28. And in the rapid eddy plays.
29. The frog has changed his yellow vest,
30. And in a russet coat is dressed.
31. Though June, the air is cold and still,
32. The mellow blackbird's voice is shrill.
33. My dog, so altered in his taste,
34. Quits mutton bones on grass to feast.
35. And see you rooks, how odd their flight!
36. They imitate the gliding kite,
37. And seem precipitate to fall,
38. As if they felt the piercing ball.
39. 'Twill surely rain. I see with sorrow
40. Our jaunt must be put off to-morrow.

Barometers are used also to measure the height of mountains, and the live creation matches them in this respect too. Every kind of growing thing is limited to a small range of elevation, and is seldom found on lower or higher ground. The varieties of flowers, insects, birds, and quadrupeds dwelling on lowlands are unlike those on the hills. As one ascends a mountain-side, these keep changing, becoming scarcer and more brightly colored, until on the highest peak the few living things are of more brilliant hues than any of their kindred further down. On the Alps and Andes the blossoming plants receive a richer quantity of the sun's coloring power, and their shades are livelier than any of the similar species below, just as the tropical plants and animals have stronger hues than those in temperate zones. A skillful naturalist, therefore, climbing a mountain, can tell his height at any time with fair accuracy by the life around him.

CARL THE LAPP.

BY ELLA RODMAN CHURCH.

LITTLE Carl Nossar was wakened from a sound sleep, one cold winter night, by such a commotion that he thought at first a wolf or bear, or perhaps one or two of the reindeer, had got into the tent; for Carl lived in Lapland, and when night came he fell asleep as soon as he got under his sheepskin.

Yes, he slept under a sheepskin, and over one too; and in very cold weather he got into a sort of bag made of reindeer-skin, with fur inside. This was in place of a night-gown, and it kept him as warm as toast. Carl liked the warmth, and he dearly liked to be comfortable. It was not at all comfortable to hear this noise and talking in the night, and at first he tried to go to sleep again, and forget all about it. But presently the thought of his mother and little Marta, and Lars, the kind, generous father, made him feel ashamed, and he started up, quite awake, to see what the trouble was.

It was a queer-looking place inside the tent. Right in the middle, under the opening at the top, a bright fire was burning, and over the fire was swung a large brass kettle with reindeer meat cooking in it. How good that meat did smell, and how Carl wished that he could have some! They were making coffee, too, and he liked the smell of coffee.

There were the large chest and reindeer-skins on the floor to sit on; and many things, such as pots, pails, saddles, and clothes, were lying around. Overhead hung the baby's cradle, and reindeer horns, skins, harness, and pieces of frozen meat.

There were several people and two or three dogs. All these things Carl was used to seeing, but the tall stranger in the group was something new. This was an Englishman, travelling to Sweden. An accident had compelled him to halt and arouse these worthy people for a bed and a supper.

After a while Carl's mother saw the boy's great round eyes wide open, and when the guests had been attended to, she slipped over to the bed with a nice bit of meat, whispering, as she popped it into his mouth, "Lie down to sleep again, little one; the stranger will not hurt thee."

"Then he isn't a giant, mother?" whispered Carl.

"No, indeed," said the mother; "he is a good man and very tried. See, I'm going to make his bed."

Mrs. Lars spread fresh skins on a pile of young birch-tree branches, and soon all was quiet once more.

The next morning the little Lapp boy took breakfast with the strange gentleman; and when he saw his pleasant, laughing eyes and kind smile, he thought he would like to show him his own reindeer that was given to him when he was born, which is the fashion with Lapland babies.

When he saw this wonderful reindeer, Mr. Thorne praised its handsome antlers and its pretty color, and laughingly asked what Carl would take for it. But Carl only hugged his pet the tighter, and the animal replied with an affectionate grunt.

Then Carl put on his snow-shoes, which were queer things made of fir wood, and longer than Carl's height. But he strapped them on and ran about, leaping from one snow-heap to another, and shouting with glee. When the stranger tried to get about in them he tumbled down awkwardly, and made Carl laugh.

They became good friends during the next two days, while the visitor was getting ready to proceed on his journey; and when the time came to start, Mr. Thorne offered to take Carl home with him. He had fallen quite in love with the little Lapp boy.

At first the good Lars and Margarita looked troubled, for they did not want to lose their little Carl; but then they said, reverently, "God will take care of him as well there as here. God is everywhere. It is for Carl's good. We will consent."

Then Carl got his beloved reindeer and his snow-shoes ready, never doubting that he should need them in England. His mother made up a little bundle of clothing, which she gave him with a long good-by kiss; his father solemnly blessed him; so, feeling quite like a man, Carl started off with his new friend.

After a while he began to ask: "Do they have such beautiful snow in England? Are there forests there of birch and pine and fir? Do you have warm skins to sleep under, and nice bladder-puddings to eat? And do you hunt wolves and bears?"

"Oh no," replied Mr. Thorne, laughing. "You will not need your snow-shoes. And I'm afraid your reindeer will starve unless you can get it to eat something else besides moss."

"Then," said the boy, solemnly, "I'll go back to mother, and stay in Lapland. It is not good to be where everything is strange."

And Carl went back to the tent with the queer hole in the top to let the smoke out, and all sorts of handy things scattered around.

Mr. Thorne was not offended, and when the guide went back he sent the little fellow a box full of delicious candies, and just in the middle was a white sugar reindeer. It was beautiful; and around its neck was a slip of paper on which was written "Selma," the name of Carl's own pet reindeer.

"It must have come all the way from Stockholm," he said, in a tone of awe.

On top of the box was a dear little Bible with Carl's name and "A gift from his English friend" written in it.

This was a great prize, for though the Bible was well known in the tent of Lars Nösser, Carl had never had one of "his very own."

The good Margarita clasped her boy in her arms when he returned, and said, "It is well; the home and the Bible are all that one needs."

A NAUTICAL EXPERIMENT; Or, WHO KNOWS BEST?

BY KIRK MUNROE,
AUTHOR OF "WARULLA," ETC.

Part I.

NO boys had happier or pleasanter homes than Nelson Bryce and Harry Teller; and yet no boys along the entire length of the river were more anxious to leave them, and seek their fortunes elsewhere, than they. They lived on the eastern side of the Hudson, just above its grand Highlands; and as their fathers were wealthy men, they were indulged in all the luxuries that money could buy or boys desire. They had ponies and boats and bicycles to their hearts' content; but of these they had become tired, and had decided that what they wanted most the shed roof, and down the grape trellis, to the ground. He very nearly screamed with fright as he reached the bottom of the trellis, and something black, with glaring eyes, sprang from close beside him, and darted away like a shadow, or a cat, around the corner of the house. At the same moment, however, a soft whistle sounded from a clump of shrubbery near by, and Harry's courage was restored by the knowledge thus conveyed that Nelson was there waiting for him.

From Nelson's neck hung, by a cord attached to a ring in its handle, the kitchen carving knife, and in his arms he bore a bundle of what he called "stores for the cruise," and which had been made up in his mother's pantry. He waited for Harry to put on his shoes, one of which had been stuffed into each pocket of his jacket, and then they stole like a couple of young burglars down the well-known path leading to the river.

It was so very dark in the boat-house that if Nelson of anything was to go to sea. In this their fathers did not think it best to indulge them, as in their judgment going to school was, at the age of fourteen, more important than going to sea. But Nelson and Harry were not to be convinced that they did not know best, and after many grave consultations they determined to take the matter into their own hands, run away, and enlist on board the naval training ship that they had seen lying at anchor in the Hudson off the foot of Twenty-third Street when Harry's father had taken them to New York about a month before.

"Just think," said Nelson, who was a few months older than Harry, and who generally took the lead in their expeditions, "you only have to stay on board the Minotaur two months, and then you get transferred to another ship and sent off to the West Indies, where pirates live, or to the Mediterranean, where you may fall in with corsairs from the 'barbarous' coast, and so you go sailing all over the world, and have all sorts of adventures."

"Yes," said Harry, who was not fond of his books, "and you don't ever have to go to school; you only take lessons in seamanship, climbing masts, and making knots, and belaying, and such things."

It was very dark and very still that night when Harry, trembling with nervousness, slipped out of bed, drew on his clothes, climbed out of the back entry window, over had not had a couple of matches in his pocket they would not have found the oars belonging to the Nelly Bly, Harry's pretty little row-boat, in which they were to attempt the journey down the river. At length everything was ready for the start. Harry sat in the boat holding an oar with which to push off, and Nelson, with his precious stores under one arm and the end of a lighted match in his hand, was about to step aboard. Suddenly the mate went out, and in the dense darkness Nelson missed his footing, stepped on the gunwale instead of into the bottom of the boat, and, with a smothered cry and a tremendous splash, pitched head-foremost into the water.

"Oh, Nelse!" cried Harry, who had been nearly thrown out of the boat by Nelson's mishap, "where are you? are you drowned?"

"Hush!" said Nelson, who had regained his feet, and now stood in water up to his waist groping about for the "stores" that had been flung far from him as he fell; "don't be a goose. You'll wake the whole house if you call out that way."

That the noise in the boat-house had roused somebody was evident from the hoarse barkings of Rover, the Newfoundland house-dog, who always slept on the front piazza, and whom the boys now heard bounding down the path toward the boat-house.

"Shove off—quick!" said Nelson, as, abandoning the "stores" to their fate, he crawled in over the stern of the boat. "If Rover catches us, we can't get rid of him."

The Nelly Bly shot from the boat-house out into the river, and Harry tugged vigorously at the oars; but it was too late; Rover had scented his young companions of many a jolly frolic, and, determined not to be left behind this time, he sprang into the water with a joyful bark of recognition, and swam after them.

Harry rowed hard, and Nelson, as sternly as his chattering teeth would admit, said, "Go back, sir! home with you!" But Rover seemed to think he said, "Come on, sir! in with you!" and only swam the faster toward them.

At last Harry said, "It's no use, Nelse; I can't row any harder, and I'm afraid the poor old dog will keep on till he drowns if we don't take him in."

So they waited, and when Rover reached them, Nelson helped him in over the stern of the boat. Once safely in, he gave himself such a shake that poor Harry, who was nearest him, received a shower-bath from the shaggy coat that left him nearly as wet as Nelson.

After some trouble, they got Rover to lie down in the bow of the boat, and each boy taking an oar, they rowed vigorously for some time in silence, intent as much upon getting warm as upon making headway; for it was nearly two o'clock in the morning, and two o'clock of a morning late in the fall is apt to seem a pretty cold time even to boys who are not wet. The silence was at length broken by Harry, who asked, "Do sailors have to stay up much nights, Nelse? and do you think they get very wet?"

"Of course all sailors have to stand their watches, and dog-watches, and tricks at the wheel; but they have sou'westers and oil-skins and things, and it's only fun."

"I guess we'll let Rover stand all the dog-watches on this cruise, won't we, Nelse?" and at this joke they both laughed so that for the moment they forgot that they were a couple of very wet, uncomfortable, runaway boys.

In the deep shadow of old Storm King they met a fleet of small sailing vessels slowly stemming the tide on their way up the river. These moved so noiselessly, and appeared and disappeared so suddenly, that with their shadowy sails they seemed the ghosts of old Hudson River packets, and it was with difficulty that the boys avoided being run down by several of them. As they narrowly escaped being struck by the bluff bows of a schooner that rose suddenly dead ahead of them, and which they probably would not have noticed but for Rover's warning bark, a hoarse voice called out: "Why don't you fellows show a light? Don't yer know it's agin the law to be out on the water after dark without showing a light ten feet above yer deck? It's my opinion ye're no better'n river-thieves, but yer can't catch the cap'n of the Nancy Jane a nappin'."

The boys knew well enough, for they had often heard it before, what the hollow booming sound was that reached their ears while they were in the narrow passage between West Point and Constitution Island, where the great iron chain once spanned the river. It was the beat of the wheels of one of the Albany night boats on her way down the river, and as she drew rapidly near, the hollow booming increased to a roar, echoing among the Highlands until the air was filled with it, and it produced in the minds of the boys such a sense of terror and impending danger that they would have gladly abandoned their expedition if they could have been safely at home again and in their own beds. On came the boat, like some huge fiery monster, seeming to occupy the entire breadth of the river from bank to bank, until the boys thought they must be borne down and ground to atoms by her. As they screamed aloud in their terror and helplessness the vast fabric swept past them, so close that the spray from her wheels dashed in their faces, and left them hardly able to realize that they had escaped.

Soon after this a gray light began to steal over the surface of the river, and a few clouds sailing over Bear Hill took on a pinkish tinge. These promises of day were welcome enough to our two would-be sailors, who by this time were thoroughly benumbed with cold, sleepy, and hungry. Five miles below West Point, in the mouth of a little creek emptying into the Hudson near Fort Montgomery, the boys saw a bum-boat at anchor near the shore, and they determined to board her and see if they could not obtain something to eat.

A "bum-boat" is a sort of a floating grocery store, and looks like a big scow with a low house built along its entire length. The roof of the house is generally covered with boxes and barrels, and inside of it are kept all sorts of goods, to be sold to the crews of passing sailing vessels, or canal-boats being towed in great rafts up and down the river. The goods are carried off to these, and the trading is done by means of small steam-launches, one or two of which are attached to every bum-boat.

The sun had just risen as the tired boys pulled up alongside the bum-boat, made the Nelly Bly fast, and, followed by Rover, clambered on board, and walked aft to where a most savory smell of breakfast and considerable smoke were issuing from a small door in the low house.

[TO BE CONTINUED.]

BITS OF ADVICE.

BY AUNT MARJORIE PRECEPT.

THE WAY WE TALK.

AS you are all studying grammar, as a matter of course you are expected to speak properly. Aunt Marjorie is convinced that most of you know why some modes of speech are right and others wrong, according to the rules of syntax and of polite usage, but she fears, nevertheless, that you do not always pay attention to these rules in your home conversation.

Charlie's sister Bertha asked him at breakfast this morning whether he intended to go to the great base-ball match in the afternoon, and he promptly answered, "You bet!" Fancy such a reply addressed by a young gentleman to a young lady in the presence of a refined family circle!

"Ain't that lovely, mamma?" said Louise, alluding to a white rose which was blooming on the bush in the window. Now, in the first place, the word ain't is so vulgar that it makes your Aunt Marjorie almost faint whenever she hears it drop from pretty lips, and in the second place, being a contraction of are not, it is not possible to parse it if you use it instead of is not.

"I ain't coming!" shouts naughty Phil when his brother Tom calls him from the play-ground at dark. But Phil, naughty as he is, need not break a well-known rule which does not permit a plural verb to tie itself fast to a subject or nominative in the singular. "I'm not coming," is what Phil meant to say.

A great many of you have quite fallen out of the pleasant habit of bidding each other and your friends good-morning and good-evening when you meet, and you say, by way of greeting, "Hallo!" Aunt Marjorie confesses that she never has grown used to having her boy friends hail her in this manner, and she always glances around to see whether they do not intend the salutation for somebody in the background. But when Ed Wells and Theo Haight say, distinctly, "Hallo, Aunt Marjorie!" she cannot help returning the salutation with a courteous "Good-morning, boys." Perhaps they expect her to say, "Hallo yourselves!"

Hundreds of people, when they speak of persons, say party when they should say person. "I met a party down-town, and he told me there had been a terrible accident on the Central Railroad." The person speaking should say, "I met a person."

Some of us say nice, when we mean charming or beautiful or satisfactory. HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE, for instance, is not a nice paper only, it is an excellent paper—nice because it is neat and clean, but worthy of much higher praise than that, as you all are agreed. A nice taste in the use of words will prevent you from using nice except when you mean particular, fastidious, or dainty. "Grandma is very nice about her caps," as any one may see who observes the snowy bit of lace above the silvery hair; but grandma is more than merely a nice old lady, which sounds too patronizing when one is speaking of the dearest grandma in the whole world.

FALSE WITNESS.*

BY LUCY C. LILLIE,

AUTHOR OF "NAN," "ROLF HOUSE," "JO'S OPPORTUNITY," ETC.

CHAPTER VII. SICKNESS AND WANT.

"WHAT is that?"

Agnes put down the cup and saucer she was wiping, and looked at Margaret. It was a bitterly cold night, although snow was falling, but mingled with it were hail and sleet, so that the two girls in the Hofmeisters' sitting-room did not expect any visitors; but the sound which had attracted Agnes was certainly a knock at the door.

"It is a child's hand," said Margaret; and Agnes hurried forward, opening the door and sending a blast of cold air into the room. A curly-headed little boy of seven years of age, Margaret's special pet and pupil, stood outside in the entry, his eyes bright and his round cheeks flaming. Quickly as he entered the room, Margaret detected something unusual in his manner. His step was languid and his eyes looked heavy.

"Phil," cried the invalid, stretching out her hands, "come here. What is it? You don't seem well."

The little fellow nestled close to Margaret, who lifted him tenderly in her arms and let him rest a very tired head against her shoulder.

"I'm tired," the child said, wearily. "My head aches." "It's very hot," Margaret said, soothingly. "Do you want to stay with me to-night?" she added, coaxingly.

The little fellow nodded slowly, and Margaret beckoned to Agnes, who was standing in the window.

"See," she whispered. "Will you go with the other little one to Phil's mother, and say I will keep him for the night? It is very near."

Agnes was glad of any errand of mercy, especially for Margaret; and taking the other child's hand in hers, she hurried down-stairs and out into a side street, to the house where Phil's father and mother lived.

Lived! Could it be called living, Agnes wondered, as she made her way into a crowded, dirty tenement, in one room of which Mrs. Finegan and her idle, good-for-nothing husband were sitting with some neighbors. The request was speedily granted. Mrs. Finegan followed Agnes to the door, blessing Margaret for her goodness to the "child," and explaining, with much elaboration, that he hadn't been well for days.

"It's from running down in thim marshes, miss," the poor woman said, as if apologetically; "but I can't keep my eye always on 'em; sure there's sivin more of 'em besides him!"

Agnes knew too little of illness to understand just what this might mean. She had heard that in spite of the frost a great deal of fever existed in certain parts of the town, but the woman's words did not carry to her mind any suggestion of danger. Cheerfully enough she returned home and assisted Margaret in arranging a bed on the sofa for the little fellow.

Coming in at five o'clock the next day, Agnes found Margaret waiting for her with feverish impatience. Little Phil was unquestionably very ill. Dr. Clinton's assistant had been there, and the child was to be sent at once to the hospital. It was undoubtedly scarlet fever.

Agnes felt appalled. She looked at Margaret with eagerness, but saw at once that no fear of contagion had occurred to her friend, and only that very day she had learned that in parts of Halcorn the fever was raging. She did not, however, hesitate to make the sick child ready to go, and herself accompanied him in the hospital ambulance.

A special ward had been prepared for the children suffering from this fever and diphtheria. As Agnes followed the nurse and little Phil into it, Dr. Clinton's assistant, Dr. Tabor, looked at her in some surprise.

"Is it possible," he said to her, when she had announced herself as Margaret's friend, "that you do not know how contagious this fever is, Miss Leigh? Your friend Miss Hofmeister told me she had never had it; yet she did not seem in the least disturbed."

Agnes smiled. "Oh no," she said; "Margaret is always peaceful over everything. I do not think she is afraid."

"But she must be careful," he said, urgently. "I think I will call in a day or two and see how she is."

But three days went by before Dr. Tabor appeared. The fever was increasing rapidly; not only children, but many grown people, had been taken with it, and Agnes rejoiced that she had gone through the disease, so that she had no such new foe to dread; but it was different with poor Margaret. Weak as she was, it was easy to strike her with any disease so contagious, and before a week was over she was in the delirium of the fever.

Agnes determined to care for her friend. She banished Herr Hofmeister to her little room, so that he might carry no contagion to his pupils, and installed herself as Margaret's nurse. Happily for herself, at this time her thoughts were all absorbed in the care of her friend; for the feeling against her had risen to a decided prejudice; indeed, to more than that, since Mrs. Lewis and Mrs. Pierson and half a dozen other ladies, anxious to preserve their daughters from all possible association with evil, had decided to exclude Agnes from their firesides.

"Whatever it all means," was Mrs. Pierson's carefully worded decision, "it is best to be on the safe side."

But Agnes, watching day and night at Margaret's bedside, grieving as she saw Mr. Hofmeister's diminishing work and saddened spirits, guessed nothing of all this. Poverty—not only straitened means, but actual poverty—was staring her in the face; and from Dorefield came word before November ended that her father lay at death's door, and she dared not go to him.

Care as she might for Margaret's slender store of money and her own fast-failing purse, Agnes could not but see that soon they might actually need food and fire. The Doctor came daily, praised Agnes's skill, and gave her a tonic to bring some color into her own face, but he could not minister to wants of which he suspected nothing, and he too had heard the floating gossip of the town.

"The daughter of a murderer!" he said to himself, one dark, snowy afternoon, as he stumbled down the dimly lighted, narrow staircase. "Can it be possible?—and her mother a strolling player! Well! well! who would believe it?" For by this time the town of Halcorn had arranged Agnes Leigh's belongings in this fashion; what had before been only hinted at was now openly spoken, as if it were fact, and Mrs. Pierson said she shuddered to think how near they had all come to "taking her up."

Agnes stood at the window on that very afternoon, watching the softly falling snow, while Margaret dozed in the twilight room, thinking over a far-away past.

* Begun in No. 347, HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE.

"'I'M TIRED,' THE CHILD SAID, WEARILY. 'MY HEAD ACHES.'"

The picture this snowy scene brought back was not an unpleasant one. It was of a large, old-fashioned, firelight room in the house on The Avenue whose gates had so long been closed. She could see herself, a tiny child, standing in the window watching the snow-flakes falling in soft showers on the stone flagged terrace, and wondering how soon it would be Christmas. It was a beautiful room, as Agnes recalled it, with oak-wood wainscot and dark crimson hangings, and near the fire her mother, her pretty, dainty mother, was seated with Mrs. Mostyn. What they talked about, Agnes could not remember. She knew it was her mother's school days at Habon, and Christmas times, but that one picture faded quickly; others took its place, with the shifting colors, the changes of an eventful life, and for the most part it all looked to the girl shadowy and dim; but was there not always a to-morrow.

Agnes's tears gathered, and she dashed them away. Hope is hard to deny to youth, but want and suffering will do much toward it. The poor girl turned to look at Margaret's white face upon the pillow, to listen to her weakly drawn breath. The Doctor had ordered beef tea. She must go out for the needful materials, so she hurried down stairs and out into the snowy streets.

When the meat was purchased, Agnes looked into her purse with dismay. It contained every farthing she possessed—exactly one dollar and a half—and only that morning Mr. Hofmeister had declared himself too ill to work any longer. He had said he would go to the hospital if Agnes would remain with his child. There seemed to be no other course to follow; and yet to what would it lead?

It was snowing fiercely; the streets were crowded, and Agnes hurried through them, feeling weak and exhausted, and yet only anxious to get home.

Just at Marsli's door she stopped a moment, struck by something familiar in the face and bearing of a lady who was coming out—a tall, beautiful old lady, with dark eyes and a proud, sweet face. She was richly wrapped in velvet and furs; a footman held an umbrella over her head as she made her way to the luxurious carriage in waiting.

Once, for half a moment, the lady turned her beautiful dark eyes on the slender, weary young figure, half hesitating, lingering near her. Where had she seen that face before? thought Agnes; but her tired brain refused to work it out. The lady entered her carriage, and was driven swiftly away over the snow-covered roads, while Agnes hurried on, memory growing more and more confused as she tried to make clearer her impressions of the past.

TENTING BY THE SEA-SIDE.

ANDREW MCINTYRE, Jun., and his sister Pansy, were very much afraid that their summer vacation would have to be spent in the city this year, and great was their grief over the prospect. Ever since they could remember, they had spent at least three of the summer months at their grandmother's, among the New England hills. Now the dear grandmamma was in heaven, the old homestead had passed into stranger hands, and their father said he felt so poor that he did not see how he could possibly take them to any of the sea-side or mountain resorts, where they would be obliged to board.

Their mother, to whom the children went for sympathy in their disappointment, said: "My darlings, the prospect of spending your vacation in the city is one of God's trials, sent on purpose to test us. He will not make it too heavy for us to bear, and in good time He will sweep away all difficulties."

As the school term came to a close, and the prospect of going away seemed as dim as ever, impatient little Andrew cast many an anxious glance at his mother's face. Although he did not say anything, she read his meaning, and answered him with such reassuring smiles as comforted him greatly, and made him feel that her faith was still as strong as ever.

One evening, about this time, Mr. McIntyre told his wife that on the following day he should be obliged to visit a place on the New Jersey coast called Ocean Grove. He explained that it was a Methodist camp-meeting ground, and that their Sabbath-school had been especially invited to visit it in July to take part in the opening exercises of the great Annual Sabbath-school Assembly to be held there.

"We have accepted the invitation," he said, "and I must run down there, get acquainted with the place, and make all necessary arrangements."

The following evening, when Mr. McIntyre came home to a late supper, wearied and hungry after his trip, his tired face was radiant with such a look as the children could hardly remember having seen on it before.

They knew it meant something good, and they besieged him with questions about the excursion and about Ocean Grove; but he bade them have patience until he had become sufficiently refreshed to tell them a long story.

So the children waited, and wondered what the story could be about, until their father had pushed his chair back from the table, and then, big boy and girl as they were, they clambered on his knees, and begged him not to tantalize them any longer. The mother sat down close beside the little group, and Mr. McIntyre began his promised story with:

"Well, my dears, from what I have seen and learned to-day, I believe that you can spend your vacation in the country after all."

"Oh, goody!" cried Pansy.

"Hoo-ray!" shouted Andrew.

"Really, husband?" exclaimed Mrs. McIntyre, while a little choking sensation arose in her throat.

"Yes, really," answered Mr. McIntyre; "and not only in the country, but at one of the most charming of sea-side resorts. I have found at Ocean Grove the very place best suited to us. It is inexpensive, unfashionable, easily reached from the city, is delightfully cool, perfectly healthful, and, above all, it is a community of religious, God-fearing people, who maintain peace, quiet, and perfect order within its limits. It is about six miles south of Long Branch; is two hours' ride from New York by train, or three if you take a steamer to Sandy Hook, and train from there. It is a village of pretty cottages and white tents, nestled in a grove of oak and pine trees, with a beautiful fresh-water lake on each side of it, and the ocean in front. It is laid out in streets, broad avenues, and parks. There is a fine church, an immense open-air auditorium in which the camp-meeting services are held, and an especial building for children's services. The entire grove is supplied with delicious water by means of Artesian wells, and the sanitary regulations of the place insure perfect cleanliness. Besides all this, there is a broad sea-beach of clean white sand, grand surf bathing in the ocean, and still-water bathing and absolutely safe boating in the lakes."

"Are the roads good for bicycles?" asked Andrew, who is an enthusiastic young wheelman.

"Capital," replied his father. "I saw several boys riding bicycles while I was there."

"And can we learn to row?" asked Pansy.

"I shouldn't wonder if you could," was the smiling answer. "And, moreover, I shouldn't be at all surprised if your children could have a boat all to yourselves, for I find that for $10 I can engage a safe light rowing skiff for the entire season."

"Oh!" gasped the children, almost bewildered by the extent of the vista of pleasure opening up before them.

"But, husband, can we afford it all?" inquired Mrs. McIntyre, with just a trace of anxiety in her tone.

"Yes, my dear, I believe we can. I find we can hire a cottage for the season, which means until the end of October, for from $150 to $300, according to its size and location. I also saw large tents, with kitchen and dining-room attachments, in the shape of tiny cottages, to rent for $75 the season."

"Oh, a tent! take a tent!" cried both the children, in a high state of excitement. "Won't it be jolly?" And, "Just think of living and sleeping all summer in a tent!"

"What! do you look forward to sleeping all summer?" inquired the father, with a merry twinkle in his eyes.

"Oh no, of course not," replied the embarrassed Pansy, who had made the remark. "I only meant that when we did have to sleep, how perfectly lovely it would be to sleep in a tent."

"And how do you regard the tenting plan, my dear?" inquired Mr. McIntyre of his wife.

"I think it a good one. It has novelty and cheapness to recommend it, and but very little furniture will be required in a tent. Yes, I vote for a canvas house."

A week later found the McIntyres established, and making themselves thoroughly at home for the summer, in Ocean Grove. Their tent, with its canvas windows, little canvas portico in front, boarded floor, and tiny cottage in the rear, seemed to them a marvel of airy beauty and compact comfort.

Last Saturday they had the pleasure of welcoming some of their city friends, who went down on the excursion to take part in the opening exercises of the Sabbath-school Assembly, and with them they marched in procession through the principal avenues, with banners flying, to the music of sweet songs.

A feature of Ocean Grove life that the children especially enjoy is what Andrew calls "Beach Church," and what other people call "Surf Meetings." These are the open-air Sabbath evening services held on the sea-beach to the accompaniment of the foaming breakers or singing wavelets of the ocean. Sometimes these services are held entirely for children, as is shown in one of the illustrations on page 589.

Already the little McIntyres have formed many pleasant acquaintances among the other children of the Grove, who call Andrew "Good-Morning," and Pansy "Good-Afternoon," because their initials are A. M. and P. M. They are enjoying all the more their summer in the country because they expected to spend it in the city; and if any readers of HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE choose to call on them this summer at Ocean Grove, I think they will find them having about the very best time of any two children in the country.

HAND TO HAND WITH A GRAY WOLF.

BY ERNEST INGERSOLL.

I HAVE a friend up in Canada who is an engineer, and has spent several years in laying out the lines for, or in superintending the building of, railways on the frontier. He has brought a good many trophies home from the wilderness, and can tell many a story in respect to them. One of these trophies is a wolf-skin, which lies before the fire.

"Where did you get that?" I asked him once.

"Well," he answered, with a comical, shame-faced kind of smile, "I'm not sure I want to tell that story, for it doesn't sound very heroic. Still, as I do not pretend to be a hero, or even a hunter, and as I came out ahead in the encounter, I suppose I needn't hesitate."

"Was it a fight?" I exclaimed, eager to hear a thrilling tale of some hand-to-hand struggle.

"Partly; at any rate, it came within one of it."

"How was that?"

"After we had stopped surveying on that railway in northern Manitoba last fall, with the coming of the snow, I staid in the region a while hunting buffaloes with a party of French métis, and on our return I thought it would be a good thing to trap one of the big wolves that are always hanging about a herd of buffaloes in the hope of getting a meal by dragging down some calf or a wounded or very aged animal. These wolves do not move in large packs, like the European ones that are the subject of so many Russian stories, but in small family parties of three or four, and, perhaps for that reason, are generally very cowardly, so they are not much feared by the plains-men unless cornered. Well, one night we set a steel-trap close by the carcass of a buffalo cow which had just been shot."

"Had you seen wolves about?" I interrupted.

"No, but that was of no consequence. The wolves get so white in winter up there that they are all but invisible, and spring out of the snow, at the most unexpected times and places, like spirits. Their scent is amazingly keen too, and I knew it would be only a short time before some wandering band would discover the quarry."

"We baited and set our trap in the afternoon, and after our camp supper that evening, it being moonlight, we sallied out to see whether anything had been caught. Sure enough there was a big fellow nipped by one foot."

"As I was a stranger and their guest, my French friends insisted that I should have the excitement of going forward and despatching the captive with my rifle. Now I am not a very good shot, and I wanted to get as near as possible, in order to kill him with my first barrel; so I walked up to within twenty yards of the trap. Even this did not quite satisfy me, however, and I was going on a few paces further, when, to my amazement, he suddenly sprang forward, broke the chain of the trap, and dragging it along with him, came bounding toward me, with open jaws and the angry howl of a wild beast at bay."

"The hero and sportsman I have spoken of would have coolly dropped the brute in his tracks, no doubt; but I confess that I was so startled and frightened that I dropped my gun, and would certainly have run if he hadn't been upon me almost before I could turn around. I had just wits enough left to remember my belt knife, snatch it from the sheath hanging by my side, and hold it before me in a trembling hand with a confused sort of hope that the wolf might run against it and so kill himself."

"Just what happened then I hardly know, but I saw the beast spring as if into my face, heard a rifle crack right at my ear, and when the smoke cleared away there was the wolf lying just at my feet, with a bullet through his shoulder, and a stab in his breast."

"It was a fearful shock, and I am not sure I enjoy even looking at the skin, which, as you see, shows the hole where the Frenchman's bullet entered, and so saved me a good mauling, if not a miserable death."

MR. THOMPSON AND THE CRAB.

BY ALLAN FORMAN.

THOMPSON was lying in the stern of his boat, one warm morning last summer, thinking of nothing in particular, and was just dropping off into a doze, when his attention was attracted by a crab partially concealed under a bit of sea-weed in the water.

The crab was slowly waving its claws back and forth and hitching from side to side with a sort of rhythmic motion, as if performing some sort of a dance in time to imaginary music. Mr. Thompson watched its antics for some moments, and finally muttered, "What on earth is the thing doing?"

The crab paused for a moment, and said, snappishly, "I'm not a thing, and I'm doing nothing on earth; I'm shedding in the water."

"Shedding?" queried Mr. Thompson.

"Yes, shedding. What do you do when your clothes are too small for you?" said the crab.

"I get some that are big enough," replied Mr. Thompson, mildly, heaving a sigh as he thought of his tailor's bill.

"Well, I shed," said the crab, resuming his mystic dance.

Mr. Thompson leaned a little further over the edge of the boat, and watched the operation. The upper shell slowly began to separate from the lower at the back, and small triangular cracks appeared in the large claws.

"Why, your shell is bursting at the back!" exclaimed Mr. Thompson, in surprise.

"Of course it is," replied the crab. "What does your coat do when you outgrow it?"

"It generally gives way at the buttons," said Mr. Thompson, with a smile, as he glanced down over his ample waistcoat. "But how do you get new clothes when you have a—a—"

"Shed," interjected the crab.

"—When you have shed your old ones?" pursued Mr. Thompson.

"They grow on," answered the crab. "Come over here, and I'll tell you."

"But I'll get wet," objected Mr. Thompson; "I'm doing nicely where I am."

"Take hold of my claw; it won't hurt you as long as you keep hold of me," replied the crab, extending one of his big claws.

Mr. Thompson grasped the claw readily, and dropped over the side of the boat. He says that he can't exactly tell when the change took place, but when he touched the water he was a crab—a big, well-made, hard-shelled crab—and remembers admiring the beautiful blue tint under his claws, and the dark olive green of his back, for he could turn his eyes so as to see all over himself. He experienced a strange feeling of delight on touching the water, and the first thought that entered his mind was that he would be obliged to pay for no more clothes, but when he wanted a new suit he would "shed."

"How jolly it must be to be a crab!" he murmured.

"Well, I don't know," answered his new friend, evidently well pleased, and taking Mr. Thompson's remark as a compliment. "We have our troubles as well as other people. Men try to catch us. Now I have dodged your net three times this morning, and just escaped being pulled into a boat by letting go of a most delicious piece of meat that I was making my dinner off yesterday."

Mr. Thompson thought of the crab that he had failed to catch, and said nothing.

"Then while we are soft," the crab continued, "we have to be continually on the lookout. Men appear to be especially anxious to get us when we are soft. Do you like men when they are soft?" he continued, inquiringly.

"No, I don't," answered Mr. Thompson, emphatically.

"That's funny," mused the crab; "yet you said yesterday that one soft one was worth a dozen hard ones." Mr. Thompson ventured no explanation, and the crab continued, cheerfully, "But, you see, we have to hide when we are going to shed, for, besides the men, the toad-fish are after us, and sometimes swallow us whole." Just then one of the hideous toad-fish swam lazily by, and the crab shrank behind Mr. Thompson. "He can see you are hard, and dare not touch you," he said.

"How long does it take you to shed?"

"About an hour," replied the crab. "It depends upon the weather; we shed more easily on warm days. When we first come out of our old shells our skin is as soft as that on your face, and we are very weak from the exertion, but quickly gather strength, and in about four hours the skin begins to grow rough and papery, like brown paper, and in about seven hours our new shell is almost as hard as the old one; we are very thin, though, and are awfully hungry, for we can eat nothing while soft."

"That's the reason why the soft crabs in the markets are so thin and watery," exclaimed Mr. Thompson.

Fortunately the crab did not understand what he meant, for it said, doubtfully: "Perhaps so. I can't say, I don't think I've ever been in the markets; but I've noticed a curious change when some of my relatives have been killed at that time. The fat in a healthy crab is yellow, like the yolk of a hard-boiled egg, and in a paper shell it is a dirty greenish-brown. When we are first hatched we are not much bigger than spiders, and are very lively; then we shed three or four times a day. When we grow very large we only shed once or twice in a season. Another curious thing is that if one of our claws or legs is broken off, a new one forms, and remains soft for a long time, folded close up to our body until we shed, when it comes out as good as the old one."

"Well, that is nice," exclaimed Mr. Thompson. "I think I'd like to remain a crab." He suddenly thought of Miss Angelina, however, and regretted his wish; at the same moment he heard a feminine scream, and realized that he was lying in the water.

"Oh, Mr. Thompson is drowned!" shrieked Miss Angelina, rushing to the bank, and pulling Mr. Thompson out of the water before he fairly knew what was the matter. Then, when she found he was all right, only a little wet, she promptly fainted.

After Mr. Thompson had succeeded in reviving her, she inquired, "What were you doing in the water?"

"I was talking to a soft crab," replied Mr. Thompson, with as much dignity as he could assume under the disadvantages of a very wet alpaca duster.

"I can't believe it. You must have been dreaming," said Miss Angelina, briskly.

"But there is the soft crab," urged Mr. Thompson, pointing down into the water where his friend, who had in the mean time succeeded in getting rid of his shell, was lying in the first exhaustion and helplessness of softness.

"Oh, isn't he a beauty!" exclaimed Miss Angelina. "Do get him for me. You know I adore soft crabs."

Mr. Thompson felt guilty, almost like a cannibal, as he stooped down to catch his friend. But Miss Angelina's word was law with him, and reaching down into the water, he handed the unfortunate crab to Miss Angelina. All the way back to the house that young lady commented admiringly upon the softness of its shell and its plumpness and weight. But Mr. Thompson insists that he could see an accusing look in the poor creature's eyes when she announced her intention of having it fried for lunch. For his own part, Mr. Thompson remembered his wish that he might always remain a crab, and shuddered at the thought of the fate he had escaped.

My Wife is famous, you will see,
At pouring cups of fragrant tea;
That is, would be if all her due
Were dealt to her—: But thⁿ'tis true
Were Fortune not so fickle, you,
And maybe I, were famous too,
Time out of mind.

The tea was drawn at four for three
(My Wife of course, and you, and me)
And pleasant chat began to flow
With easy zest, just as you know
It will in such a bright trio:
The dainty cups were passed—
When lo!

"My dear, look here"
Wife said, "I see
I have not poured a cup for me."

OUR POST-OFFICE BOX.

LEICESTER, SOUTH SHROPSHIRE, ENGLAND, May 21, 1896.

MY DEAR POST-MISTRESS—I am a girl living in a pretty little town near Wales, once its capital, situated on the river Teme, a tributary of the Severn. We had a most frightful flood this month, so thinking that it may interest the many readers of HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE, I am going to try and describe it.

It was so great that even the oldest inhabitant, an old lady over ninety years old, does not remember any flood like it. Houses, hay-stacks, men, children, cows, horses, sheep, pigs, and fowls were whirled down the stream at the rate of thirty miles per hour.

About 11 P.M. on Thursday, the 13th of May, the water, owing to the steady four days' rain, began to rise rapidly. It rose so quickly that at five o'clock on Friday morning the water was ten feet above its ordinary height. Between 5 and 6 A.M. two dead men floated down, and five cows, six calves, fourteen sheep, and dozens of pigs and fowls followed during the day.

Higher and higher rose the water, as it swirled along like an angry horse, bearing on its yellow crest the débris of walls, houses, palings, trees, and other things which had been washed away. A beautiful row of drawers and a really splendid carved oak clock were seen. People near the water—and some did not live five yards from it—were in their houses, and in some cases, the water was over the floor.

About 11 A.M. the water began to abate, but it was very slow. All the rest of the day, and may say the week, people were in a frenzy of excitement. Our good Mayor called a Council meeting, and a subscription was raised to help those in distress. He had a raft put together, and a boat was also found, and with these and several ladders they rescued the poor frightened people.

But when the water had fully subsided, the mischief done by its angry violence was found to be double what was expected. Two railway bridges were washed away and a road bridge rendered unsafe. A tad-yard had been spoiled, and there was not a bit of bark or a drop of the tan liquor left. The loss in Ludlow alone is between two and four thousand pounds. I think everybody ought to be sorry for a miller who has lost between two and three hundred sacs of corn.

Upon this subject I could write much more, but as I have already written a long letter, I will conclude with best love and wishes to the Post-mistress, from her little girl, MARIE ETHEL C. (aged 13).

PARIS, FRANCE.

I have taken this interesting paper ever since it was first published, and it has been the greatest comfort to me during the last few years, as I have been away from my own country and my playmates. I enjoy the Post-office Box especially; it is like having friends in all parts of the world. I am quite contented here, for I am gaining fast in my studies. When holidays come—which they frequently do—as one does not work on the feasts of the Church, we go to the Bois, or have little excursions down the river to the ruins of St. Cloud, to the old palace of St. Germain, or some other interesting spot. Last Saturday there was a grand Fête des Fleurs, or Flower Festival, in the Bois de Boulogne, and was patronized by the fashionable world of Paris, and as I have been with my mother, we were very much amused and expended on decorations in order to draw a crowd. The park was filled with elegantly dressed people in carriages or sunbathing over the beautiful lawns, and the fireworks were superb. There were fountains of golden stars that seemed to spring out of the lakes. The trees were lit up with red, green, blue, and yellow, and green and crimson lights were thrown over everything. The sky was full of rockets, that burst over our heads, while bands of music were playing under the trees. No one can imagine how beautiful it was, and although we did not leave till midnight, the guests there were just as glad as ever.

MABEL D.

I am a boy of eight, and I take HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE in, and like it very much. I like reading the letters, and thought I should like to write one. I live in the town of Nottingham, where stockings and a great deal of lace are made. I like quite close to the Castle, on its now ruined into an art museum, and which was opened by the Prince of Wales about eight years ago. I often go and look at the pictures. I have only one little brother, we go to school together. We have a dog—its name is Carlo—and a canary.

ALICK G.

Here is a practical letter to two obliging gentlemen, as many of you are working during your vacation, for fairs and bazars to be held in the autumn, or are making your Christmas gifts in good season, you will preserve this letter for reference:

Brooklyn, New York.
We write in reply to repeated inquiries about pen-wipers. We have several kinds, some very simple, others quite difficult to make. One is a miniature boat about six inches long. The outside of the hull is covered with black velvet, the hull is embroidered with a scroll-like vine; the deck is covered with silk as nearly like black walnut and oak as we could get, and is finished around the edge with fine gold cord. The hull is filled with wood. We took a bottle from an old-fashioned wooden inkstand, and let the nose just catch it for an ink. The most is in the centre, and has one sail, and a red, white, and blue pennant from the top. The sail is rigged with fine gold cord. The outside of the sail silk; the inside, flannel, which to wipe the pens.

Another is a large butterfly, about six inches from tip to tip of wings, made of black and bright red velvet, and almost covered with gold and fancy beads and embroidery. The under side of the wings is used for wiping the pens.

Still another is a little dog with three little paws, lying cooily on a round mat of broadcloth, the edges pinked. The dogs are made of the silk covering of a high hat, stripped from the frame. We catch one dog on a pair of red felt shoes, but they always had a very bad habit of straying away. One of them forgot his mistress entirely, and never came back, faithfully.

A simple but droll pen-wiper is made by dressing a negro child doll in two skirts. The doll should be about three inches long. Make the first skirt of red flannel, pinked at the bottom, lower edge; gather and fasten around the waist. Make the outer skirt of dark cloth of the same length and width, pinked at the bottom. Care should be taken not to have the skirts too full, as that would make the doll too bunched around the waist. Strap a narrow ribbon over one or both shoulders, around the waist, to hide the gathering of the skirts, and tie in a small neat bow behind. A little embroidery on the outer skirt improves it. The doll may be made of any size.

Here is one simple enough for the smallest readers; cut four pieces of heavy cloth or flannel, two bright and two dark. Pink or notch the edges all around. Fold them evenly in half, and then in half again; that will make one-quarter of the original size; tack neatly together on the middle. Then all four are finished, place the light, one dark, and one light corner separately, the points all coming to the centre, and you will have a perfect eagle again. Tack neatly and evenly together on the under side. Finish with a bright little pompon or button in the centre. A few stitches of embroidery with bright silks greatly improve this simple pen-wiper. I omitted to say that the four pieces should be round, and the size of a teacup.

Another very simple pen-wiper is made by taking a strip of dark broadcloth three inches wide.

Cut each side into a fringe one inch deep; that will leave one inch in the centre. In the centre of the strip, roll firmly and evenly until you have a roll an inch or an inch and a half in diameter; fasten it firmly, so that it will not become loose. Finish with a bright band one inch and a quarter wide, neatly and richly embroidered, sewed around the centre or plain part. The fringe ends above the band.

Before closing we must tell you how to make people out of apples. Select some very small apples, pare them very smoothly, and insert a small round stick, about three inches long, where the stem is; put it in a warm place near the fire, where it will dry quickly. As soon as it looks withered, take the head of a pin, and make little holes in the apple, about one inch apart. Then increase a little place under the nose for the mouth, and another little dent just below the mouth, and two on the side of the head for the cheek holes; punch a little round place for the chin. Repeat this process every day for about a week, or until the apple is thoroughly dried. Sew on a little hair if you choose, stick black hair in its eyes; on the head put some style of cap; wind the stick with cloth to form a body; if desired, fold some white cloth the required length, sew it to the body of the apple, or on a skirt of heavy writing-paper doubled, that it may stand alone when done. The dress may be made as fancifully as you choose, or you may use any plain dress. Men can also be made, only they require two sticks for legs. It is surprising what a variety of expressive countenances a little patient will produce. For some boys and girls make apple artists of a very high order, if the dear Postmistress doesn't make "PI" of us.

GRACE and MABEL D.

NEW YORK CITY.

I have just begun to take HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE, and like it very much. I am ten years old, and have no brothers or sisters. I have two dogs—a pug, whose name is Smut, and a cocker spaniel, whose name is Fluff. I have a bird with a white tip on the end of her tail, and two birds; and love them all very much. I had a lovely sleigh-ride in Central Park, and in the winter, and like to ride, and his horses went like the wind, so that they almost took my breath away, but it was great fun. He looked like Santa Claus, and his sled was full of toys. I was very much on it, so it was so cold. I go to school every day, take music lessons on Mondays and Thursdays, go to dancing school at Mr. Dodworth's, and like to dance. I have a very nice teacher, and an hour every day; so you see what a busy little girl I am. But I always find time to read my YOUNG PEOPLE.

P.S. I forgot to tell you that I have a lovely little pony, Diamond—because he has a white diamond in his forehead.

BRIDGEWATER, ENGLAND.

I am fifteen years old. I have a brother and sister. My sister had the bound volume of HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE given her for a birthday present, and we all like it so much that we buy it every year for this year. I study French, German, literature, history, geography, music, drawing, etc. I am going to begin Italian soon. My mother and father are both very kind. My brother goes to school. We have a good many fowls, some pigeons, two cats, and a pony. My brother has some white rabbits with pink eyes. Part of the year we live near London, and instead of going up by train, we drive up in a little open pony carriage; it takes two days, so we put up at "Crawley" and "Epsom" and have some fun on my way down three times, and always had beautiful weather. We go to London about the beginning of June, and come down here the end of August. We have a very nice house, called "K. B. Daine," named Bismarck, and the other a Belgian settler; his name is Pith, and he understands nothing but French. Bismarck is the former, and very playful, and one of the best-looking, a beautiful brown and ran off to the front of the terrace where we live. Another day two men were going along, and one had some oranges, and my brother Bismarck seized a piece and went off with it. The man accused his friend of playing him a trick, but he soon showed him our dog, and the man said, "I am sorry, but I am not 'Two Arrows,' and 'Jo's Opportunity' very much, and that the fairy stories are very good. We like 'The Fairy Tales' very much, and I think I like best. I must leave off now, as I am afraid my letter will be too long. But I hope you will print it; if so, I shall be glad to write and tell you more about Bismarck.

NEW YORK CITY.

DEAR POST-MISTRESS—I am a little girl of seven years. I go to school, and study reading, writing, geography, spelling, drawing, and French. I know six or seven French names, like 'Madame' and 'Mademoiselle' very much. I have taken this paper since Christmas, and I like it very much. My sister and I have a very nice teacher, and I always look at the Post-office Box first. My sister takes St. Nicholas, and she used to take The Youth's Companion. I think perhaps some of the little girls who read

Your paper would like to hear about my dolls. I have eleven of them; their names are Madge, Rosa, Jeilima, and Adeline. I have also a doll named Sarah Jane, and Joshua. Don't you see, these are funny names? I have a large dolls' bureau with three drawers, a table, a chair, and a sofa that my mother gave me on Christmas. I have everything for my dolls. My sister is writing this for me. This is a very long letter to a little girl of my age, but I have had to write it so that it will be printed, and my letter was not printed. I must stop now, for I am very tired. F. N.

SPENCER, PENNSYLVANIA.
DEAR POSTMISTRESS,—I am a little girl nearly nine years old. My name is Emily. I have no brother nor sister, but I have a little kitten and some dolls to play with. This is my first letter ever I have ever written to HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE, but I think it is very nice. E. J. S.

LOS ANGELES, CALIFORNIA.
DEAR POSTMISTRESS,—I am a little girl eight years old, without either sister or brother. I do not go to school, and all my lessons were given by my mother. HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE was given me by my father for a birthday gift, and it is great company for me. I am much interested in "Sweet Pea," and look for my weekly treat very anxiously.

I know an anecdote of a Chihuahua dog (pronounced chee-wah-wah), which lived in a kitchen. A. Her wee, wee doggie Lillie had three puppies, which slept in a box with their mother in a warm corner of the kitchen. One day my little niece (a big man's son), who was very fond of and kind to all animals, brought a young kitten, which he had saved from being drowned by some boys, and placing it on the floor gave my mother to permit him to keep it. The cries of the kitty attracted the attention of Lillie, who left her puppies, and going to the kitty, took it in her mouth and played with it as she did with her puppies, and it shared their natural food with them. Poor little kitty lived about five or six weeks, but being younger than the puppies, who were rough and playful, she had not strength to bear their romping ways, though Lillie would often growl and give them a heavy nip when they would play with her. Lillie was dying. Lillie carried her to another room, out of the puppies' reach, and lay down beside her, and seemed to miss her greatly when she died.

My mother always says that I was very fond of like real Christian charity. I hope you will like my anecdote, and that I shall see it in the Post-office Box. ELSIE G. P.

A LITTLE SQUIRREL.
 Once upon a time there was a little squirrel named Dick. He was a real squirrel, with a bushy tail that curled right over his back. Sometimes he would run along on a fence rail, and when he stopped and looked up his eyes were as black and as bright as beads. Dick was very fond of nuts, and when it was pleasant weather in late summer, when the skies were blue and a little white cloud floated about like ships, when the flowers were all in bloom, and butterflies hovered over them, when the birds sung sweet songs, and the crickets chirruped, then Dick would climb up the trees and gather nuts. He would get hickory-nuts, and walnuts, and butternuts, and hazel-nuts, and pig-nuts, and acorns, and carry them down into his hole, which was in a big tree—and there he would pile them up. "For," said Dick, "when winter comes, some of the animals will not have any nuts, and I can share mine with them." So when it was cold and dreary, and there was deep snow on the ground, and the winds blew shrill, and icicles hung from all the trees, Dick would go into the hole his squirrels would come. He asked them into his house, and then he gave them sweet nuts. They would sit and eat, and they were very, very jolly. W. W. B.

It was very kind to send this story to please our little readers.

MY CAT.

A TRUE STORY.

Some cats are very funny, and others are not quite so funny. I have a cat that is old and is not very comical. She would jump upon papa's shoulders at meals and try to eat out of his mouth. Once we had our minister to dine, and the cat taking him for papa, jumped up on his shoulders. He was very much frightened, and knocked him off. We all laughed, and he laughed too. Almost every night Mr. Puss jumps up on the man's nose, jumps on the bed, and if I am asleep he will tap my face gently with his little paw. If I do not awake then, he will put his nose under my clothes, and if I wake up, he will lift up the clothes and he would sneeze down in bed and sleep there until morning. But sometimes he would sleep on my doll's bed. When we were at dinner, he would jump on the back of my chair. Once when papa was standing up carrying the meat, he jumped from my chair to papa's shoulders, which was about three feet, and quite a jump for him.

RES-IE VANSAR (aged 8 years).

CENTREVILLE, DAKOTA.

I have not seen any letters from Dakota, so I thought you might like to hear from me. We live on a farm of 200 acres. We have seven little calves, and two little colts named Dunny and Nau. For pets I have a large gray cat named Tom, and a dog named Tip. Tip is a very good dog; my papa sends him nearly half a mile after the cattle. I am six years old, and can't do much on the farm, but I can wash my mamma's dishes and help her take care of the baby. I will send you a few wild flowers; we have so many lovely ones here.

ARTHUR G. N.

Thank you.

LOUISVILLE, KENTUCKY.

I have been taking HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE for four years, and I have hardly ever failed to read the stories, and I do enjoy them so much! We have a very pretty place in the country, and spend our summers there. I hardly ever see a letter from Louisville, and I thought that I would write to you. I will be obliged to you if you will put my letter in print. BRECKINRIDGE C.

MAMMA'S LITTLE SOLDIER.

Mamma's little soldier

Is very fond of pickin' flowers;

He whistles and he marches

The livelong day.

And when his papa comes,

He climbs upon his knee,

And whispers in his ear,

"Play soldier now with me."

Then Willie takes his sword,

And papa takes his gun,

And then they play they're soldiers,

And have such lots of fun.

Then mamma calls her little boy,

And puts his nightgown on,

Then tucks him in his little bed,

Then free from every harm.

ANNIE H. E.

WETHERFIELD, CONNECTICUT.

I have no pets, but I live near the cove, and my father owns two boats, and I go fishing nearly every day. I do not catch much, but some people catch cod, eels, bass, perch, mackerel, and sauce. I am a boy of ten years of age, and go to school. I went on a picnic twenty-one miles from Hartford, to the capital of Connecticut, where they get away lemonade, and I saw a rattlesnake that had fourteen rattles, hanging to a swing rope. I go over across the river to a grove called Miner's Grove, where there are swings, flying horses, and teeters.

WILLIAM H. L.

I am the eldest of six children. I have two sisters and three brothers. We spent our winter in Paris, and when we saw a great many beautiful ships. My sister and myself went up in the tower of Notre Dame. You could see all over Paris; it was a lovely sight. My aunt sent me the lovely paper to us while we were in Paris. I am eleven years old. Good-bye. LOLA E.

BUNSEY BISH, LONDON, ENGLAND.

I am a little girl twelve and a half years old. I have not written to you before, but I saw such a lot of little girls' letters. I thought I would send one. I go to school, and learn French, music, and drawing. I like my English lessons. I like in HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE, The Girl's Own Paper, and Little Folks. I like HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE very much, and the story "Rolf Horse" especially. I have a little brother named Tom, and a sister named Winnie; Tom is nearly eight years old, and Winnie is five. GRACIE P.

BROKMAN, MONTANA.

I am a little girl ten years old. I was born in Texas, and have lived in Montana only a very few months. This is the third year that I have taken HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE, and I like it very much. I have wanted to write to you for a long time, but was afraid you might not think my letter worth publishing. I have a kitten named Luffa, and three cats, and like it better than any other instrument. I have only two pets—a canary-bird named Bob and a greyhound named Luffa. I found the name in the "Lady of the Lake," and as it was a greyhound's name, I thought it would be a nice one for my dog. I go to school, and study Fourth Reader, arithmetic, geography, grammar, and spelling. I like to go to school, because my teacher is so kind. I have four dolls, and one is a Chinese doll, and is so cute. META A. P.

LEIMORE, NEAR DUNDEE, SCOTLAND.

I once wrote before, but it was so shabby a letter that I thought I should never write again; but I broke this resolution (if resolution it might be called some time ago). My sister and I have taken this paper for a year and a half, and think it delightful. I am afraid I am writing this very badly, being in bed with a very bad cold. My sister and I, with some of our friends, have drilled with a certain Sergeant B. twice a week. I enjoy it very much. Good-bye. MABEL L.

BURBANK, NEW YORK.

I live in New York city in the winter. I am now in the country. I have a large dog, who knows a lot of tricks. I have also a large cat, whose name is Jumbo. I had two pigeons, but they died last winter. FRED C.

NEWBURGH, NEW YORK.

I am thirteen years old, and have taken HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE nearly seven years. I like it very much, and hope I may continue to take it for many years. I have been going to Gornely Seminary two years. During the Easter vacation we had a fair at school for the benefit of the Home for the Friendless, and made $215 19. I have no pets except a flower-garden, which I take care of myself. I would like to correspond with some little girl about my own age. MIRIAM A. HENRY (140 Lauder Street).

"IS OO RINGING OO DINNERBELL?"

THE RAT AND THE RAILROAD.

YES, he was a very wonderful rat. There can be no doubt about that. At the same time we must make allowances for him, for he certainly could not have known what he was doing, or what fearful consequences might result from his awkward attempts to find a hiding-place.

The station-master at the little town of D—, in Pennsylvania, had long been fretted and worried by the rats, which had established themselves in whole settlements and colonies underneath the platform, and in various nooks and corners of the little building where he spent his days and no small part of his nights.

The fact is that there was a freight depot attached to the station, where the farmers used to store their grain whenever they had a quantity to send to market. This it was that attracted the rats, for their sharp teeth enabled them to gnaw through the bags without difficulty; and a good meal of fresh wheat or corn is to a rat what a dinner with all the luxuries of the season is to us.

Finally, however, the rats behaved so badly, they destroyed so many bags, and scattered and wasted so much grain besides what they ate, that the station-master decided upon destroying them or driving them away.

One night, when he knew that they had all left their holes, and were having a fine feast in the main room of the freight depot, he rushed in among them with a party of boys, all beating tin pans, rattling pieces of iron, and making the greatest possible noise and din. The rats started to fly for their holes. But the station-master had provided for that. Two or three boys stood at the head of the staircase, down which they must go, and so their only chance of escape was the open door. Out they flew, and the station-master ventured to hope that after such a scare they would never return.

But an hour later an alarming event happened. Along came the midnight passenger train, and, to the horror and dread of all who saw the occurrence, it ran off the track. The engine ploughed its way into the bank at the side of the road; the cars swayed and bumped, and almost turned over. Fortunately the train was slackening up, or great mischief would have been done.

What was it? Why, one big rat in search of a hole had rushed along the track, fancying, apparently, that he was in some narrow tunnel leading to a splendid refuge. He had come to the switch, shoved the loose rail aside, and thus arranged for the wrecking of the train and the loss of any number of lives.

Had not the train stopped at that station, some terrible mischief would have been done. As it was, no one suffered but the rat. He had run so fast that he had wedged himself tightly in between the rails, and when the train passed over him he was very quickly killed.

AUNT LOU'S PUG.

BY MATTHEW WHITE, JUN.

I AM Dick Plum, and the adventure I am going to tell you about happened last spring. We had moved down to our country house on the Kitterstix River earlier than usual, and my aunt Lou Ripley, my cousin Mabel Cornell, and her brother Frank, were visiting us. Aunt Lou is a young lady, Mabel is eleven—almost as old as I am—and Frank is nine.

"FEELING HIMSELF SINKING, HE DROPPED THE BASKET."

We had been in the country about two weeks, and it had rained a good part of that time, so we didn't have our row-boat put in the water. But at last one Saturday morning the weather turned warm, and on his way to the station father told Sam, the coachman, that he could get Tim, the gardener, to help him launch the Lily, and left permission for me to take Mabel and Frank for the first row of the season. So none of us minded being left behind on the carriage drive, which at lunch mother proposed to take with Aunt Lou down to Ocean Pines. They were going to stop for father at train-time, and a seat would have to be saved for him.

Pink was to go, though, but just before the carriage came mother found him with a chicken-bone under the parlor table, and for punishment Aunt Lou took his best blue ribbon off, put on his every-day one, and said he shouldn't have his drive.

"Now, Dick," said mother the last time, "take good care of Mabel and Frank, remember not to venture near the channel, and be sure to be back by half past five."

"I'm going to row you to the cutest place," I told my cousins, when we were left standing on the piazza. "I call it the shore channel, but it isn't a bit deep, and mother meant the regular steamboat channel, out in the middle of the river. This other one winds in and out among the sedges about a quarter of a mile below the house, and we can have no end of fun down there."

"Oh, Dick," exclaimed Mabel, "then can't we take Pink with us? He always feels so bad when Aunt Lou scolds him. And I can hold him on my lap, so he won't be in the way."

"Yes, I don't care," I answered; and so the pug was put aboard, and we swept off down the river at a fine rate.

"Just wait, though, till we get into that shore channel!" I exclaimed. "Then you'll see her scoot."

And scoot she did, but it had been so long since I had had anything to do with the river that the real cause of this never struck me till we had got more than two miles away from home. Then I suddenly realized that I must have had the tide with me all the way, and that therefore it would be against me going back.

"I must turn around," I said, after looking at my watch. "It's quarter past four now, and we ought to get home before the carriage does."

But I soon discovered that something else besides the tide was going to be against the Lily on the return trip, and that was the bottom of the river. That inside channel was now so narrow that I had to get Mabel to help me head the boat the other way. Then I took to rowing again with a will, for I knew I must beat the tide if I wanted to get back in time for dinner.

But at last there came a time when I couldn't get her to move. Bow and stern were both stuck fast, and after Mabel and I had pushed and pushed on separate oars, and then united our strength on one, and finally got Frank to help too, and then couldn't budge the Lily either way, I just dropped down on the seat and gave it up.

"But what are we going to do, Dick?" asked Mabel.

"Oh, it isn't the doing of anything that's going to trouble us," I replied, laughing. "It's the seeing how long we can sit still without doing anything. But wait a minute," I added, with a glance at the point where my knickerbockers ended, just below my knees. "Perhaps it isn't too late to try one more 'do.'"

Then getting Frank to unlace one of my shoes for me, I set to work with all speed at the other, and in less than two minutes I was ready to step overboard.

Ugh! how cold the water was! It almost seemed as if some sharp steel-pointed instrument had been run up clear through my body. But I ground my teeth together, and began to tug on the Lily's painter. Very soon, however, I discovered that my feet had grown warm in a very queer way, and then it seemed impossible to brace myself to pull. The next instant I found out what was the matter. I was sinking into the muddy bottom of the river, which was enough like a quicksand to make me straddle the bow of the boat quick as wink to keep myself from going down any farther. So that way of getting ourselves out of the fix had to be given up.

"And there's no wading ashore and leaving the Lily either," I added, to myself, as I dangled my legs in the water, trying to get the mud off.

"How long did you say we'd have to stay here, Dick?" inquired Mabel, gravely.

"Why, till the tide goes down and comes up again."

"And how long will that take?" she went on.

"About two hours and a half," I replied.

"Oh, Dick!" exclaimed Mabel, on hearing this, "then we can't get home in time for dinner."

"And I'm so hungry!" chimed in Frank.

"And won't your mother be just wild about us?" continued his sister, in a low voice.

"Can't you holla for somebody to come?" suggested Frank.

For answer I pointed to the woods that lined the shore at this point on one side, and to the wide stretch of sedge-grass that separated us from the main channel of the river on the other. We were quite cut off from the rest of the world, although we could see plenty of houses half a mile or so away.

Suddenly Mabel burst out with, "Oh, Dick, have you got a pencil and a piece of paper?"

"Here's a stub and the back of a steamboat time-table you can write on," I replied, after rummaging in my pockets.

"Oh, I want you to do the writing!" she exclaimed, as she patted the pug in her lap. "Write a note to your mother and send it by Pink."

"By Pink?" I cried, in rather a disgusted voice. "Why, I never heard of a pug being taught to fetch and carry."

"But let me tell you, Dick," interrupted Mabel. "Don't you remember the other afternoon when it cleared off for a while, and Aunt Lou and I took Pink and walked along the shore down this way, looking for a certain kind of seaweed? Well, I'm certain we came as far as this, so don't you think Pink will find his way back to the house by scent, if we should put him ashore here?"

"We'll try it, anyway," I answered. "Now what shall I say?" and I began to write:

"AGROUND IN SHORE CHANNEL,
"HALF A MILE BELOW THE HOUSE."

"DEAR MOTHER,—"

"I don't care," replied my cousin. "Only be sure and ask them to send a shawl for me."

"And something to eat," put in Frank, quickly.

Then I went on:

"Don't worry. We are not drowned, but have got to stay here till about eight o'clock, when the tide comes up. Please send us some sandwiches and a shawl, and don't be frightened.
Your affectionate son,
"DICK PLUM."

Mabel said that would do, and I tied it very carefully to Pink's second-best ribbon with a piece of string I had. Then I picked the pug up, and was just going to drop him overboard, when Mabel caught me by the arm.

"Oh, Dick, stop! He'll sink in the mud, and—and the note'll get all wet."

This last was certainly to be avoided, so I put the trembling dog down in the bottom of the boat, and meekly inquired how I was to get him ashore.

"I—I forgot all about that part of it," returned Mabel.

I looked at the sedge bank, not three yards from the Lily's gunwale, and then proposed building a bridge with the oars. Frank helped me do this, but even after we had put the name-board over the handle part of the oars, the pug would not trust himself on it.

It was now nearly six o'clock, and really chilly, and I could imagine mother walking up and down our dock, thinking all sorts of terrible things had happened to us.

"Mabel," I exclaimed, "Pink doesn't want to leave you. You must be cross to him. Give him a slap, and say, 'Go home, sir!'"

"But, Dick," she objected, "just think how cruel that would be when Pink is going to do so much for us."

"I can't help it," I persisted. "You can make it up to him afterward by stuffing him with chop bones all day long if you like. But, don't you see, this is a case where little things must suffer for the good of great ones."

Mabel seemed to understand what I meant, and having put Pink's paws on the bridge, shut her eyes, and crying, "Naughty Pink, go home, sir," gave him two or three light taps on the head.

I was afraid they weren't heavy enough, but the pug seemed to think differently, and giving a sudden spring, scudded across the oars with a rush that sent the name-board splashing into the water.

"Oh, Pink's tumbled overboard!" screamed Mabel.

"Hush!" I commanded. "Don't call him back. He's off splendidly now."

And he was. After he had got ashore, Pink kept straight on toward the house, and pretty soon we couldn't see him any more.

"Do you think he's got there yet, Dick?" Mabel would keep asking, while Frank wanted to know more than once if I was sure the note had been tied on tight.

At last it got to be half past six, and I had just discovered that the tide had turned, when Frank suddenly jumped up on the seat and cried, "Here they come!"

I hopped on to the bow locker, and began to wave my cap and pocket-handkerchief, as I made out the forms of five people hurrying along the shore toward us. Mabel sprang up too, and began to cry, "Here we are! here we are!" in a succession of shrieks.

In about three minutes I was able to make out Sam and Tim ahead, one with a boat-hook over his shoulder, and the other with a coil of clothes-line around his arm; and behind them was father carrying a basket and helping mother through the tall sedge-grass; and then came Aunt Lou with a shawl, and Pink capering along at her heels.

"Three cheers for the pug!" cried Frank, jumping about in a way that would certainly have toppled some of us overboard had not the boat been so firmly settled.

You see, he thought our troubles were all over now; so did Mabel, for she began to laugh at the funny look that relief procession had as it came marching along the shore, picking its way around the marshy spots in the sedge. But I had my doubts all the time.

I kept them to myself, though, and when they all came up and stood there on the bank about ten feet away from us, I said I was awfully glad to see them, and asked if they had found out where we were by the note Pink had carried.

"Oh yes," exclaimed Aunt Lou, catching the pug up in her arms, and then letting him drop quickly when she found how muddy his feet were. "Wasn't it cute of him? He came panting up to the dock, where we all stood watching, half wild to know what had become of your children, and I saw that bit of paper tied to his ribbon the first thing. And now I've forgiven him for being naughty this afternoon, for if it hadn't been for him, you might have had to stay here till dark night."

But, Pink or no Pink, it seemed as if we would have to stay where we were till dark, after all; for although the boat-hook, the coil of clothes-line, and Sam, Tim, and father were all combined in one tremendous effort, not an inch could they budge the Lily out of the mud.

Father had already flung the shawl to us, but it had gone too far, and landed just out of reach among the sedge-grass on the other side. Now, after they had failed to move the boat, Tim took off his boots, and declaring that "the childer shouldn't starve for their suppers" if he could help it, caught up the basket, and, in spite of my warnings, started to wade out to us with it.

But two steps were enough for him. Feeling himself sinking, he dropped the basket and stretched out both hands toward Sam with the cry, "Och, murder! it's the haythen Chinese are after draggin' me down to thim!"

And there was the basket of provisions floating off on what little water there was, and everybody so excited over Tim that nobody thought to try and fish it out with the boat-hook till it was too late.

I laughed; I couldn't help it, though I was so hungry, and I laugh now whenever I think of how father, mother, Aunt Lou, Sam, Tim, and the pug stood there on the bank for the next half-hour looking at us, and we at them. To be sure, it was worth something to have their company, but then it seemed so aggravating, after we had gone to all that trouble of getting Pink off with the note, not to have the successful delivery of it do us one bit of practical good; for it didn't, and we never got a thing to eat till the tide came in and floated us off in time for an eight-o'clock dinner at home.

THE DRAWING CLUB.

BY ALICE DONLEVY.

IV.

DR. LEE and his three sisters were as much interested as Leonard in the Saturday meetings. All gave cordial invitations to the children to come after school hours during the week to talk over the last drawing or to discuss the next. Aunt Ida always praised something. If the whole length of a line was not right, she would point out the smallest part that was good.

"Do not discourage yourself by drawing small flowers too soon," said Aunt Ida.

When flower day came, the array of lilies showed that the whole Lee family had been busy collecting callas, from buds to blossom. "Look at the Lee lily show," said Leonard to the admiring members of the club.

Just then Dr. Lee came in, bringing a plant potted with its native earth around its roots, in an old tomato can.

"Oh, Doctor, where did you get that jack-in-the-pulpit?" inquired Edith.

"A patient of mine who lives in the woods sent this by mail, at my request," answered Dr. Lee. "I knew how anxious you are to draw flowers."

"I'll ask my Florida cousin to send the club some orange blossoms," said Dora.

"This is not a lily show," said Dr. Lee, looking at the jack-in-the-pulpit, "as Leonard was christening it when I came in. Leonard's aunts tried to select for this drawing meeting specimens of a flower nearest like a leaf during its various stages of growth. Aunt Ida has placed the unfolded leaf and the unfolded developed flower side by side. Look with your eyes half shut, and you will see the likeness gradually. At first the bud seems like a swelling of the stem. Both leaf and flower buds taper to a point. The stem is a very important part of most plants. Slender as stems are, comparatively, I advise you to draw a line (to serve as an imaginary centre) through stem and bud and flower. Then draw the real outlines both sides of this imaginary line. This method will prevent the flower from looking patched on. Growth is gradual. Lines to express a growing plant should be curved. These curves should be nearer to a straight line than a part of a circle. Double curves will give your plant a 'broken-back' appearance."

For several reasons Leonard was very popular. He liked to help. He could use his hands, and was always glad to mend a kite or make a boat. Up in the garret he had a work-shop that had already become a resort for boys on rainy Saturday afternoons. As Leonard liked company, he never complained of the weather. All boyish sports were impossible for him. He could not run, or skate, or jump, for he had been lame from infancy. Dr. Lee had drilled the idea thoroughly into Leonard's head that there was as much bravery in the endurance of physical pain as in the risk of a fall or a bruise.

As Leonard's aunts had read to him since his early appetite for stories had shown itself, and as he had a good memory for the principal points of a historical event (though he could not quote a line), he was very willing and able to help his cousins and other girls with that weekly bugbear, the school composition. In his work-shop there was an illustrated dictionary, an encyclopædia, and a score of classified picture scrap-books. For instance, one was black and white and colored pictures of the animals that school-boys find "too numerous to mention." Another was devoted to birds. A third was filled with tools of all countries and of all ages. Instead of destroying, Leonard's energy had been conducted into acquiring property.

His aunt Ida had suggested them, but Leonard had made the wooden supporters that held up the colored backgrounds behind the flowers. The wood was a foot high, and eight inches broad, and half an inch thick. A quarter of an inch from each upper corner were two screw hooks. The backgrounds were of paper-muslin, such as is used for dress linings, hemmed all round. The pieces of muslin were the same size as the wooden supporters, and had two brass rings sewed to opposite corners, so as to easily fit on the screw hooks. The supporters had each one wooden leg secured by a hinge.

The muslin backgrounds were wrong side out. This was to avoid the glaze of the right side hurting the eyes. Aunt Ida had selected and made the backgrounds, and had arranged the lilies an hour before the club met.

Every background was different in color—white, lemon, orange, rose, garnet, beet-color, gray, lilac, black. The white background was nearest the window, and in front of it the greenish-yellow bud.

"This is easy," said Dora, as she began to draw.

"The contrast in color helps us to see the form better," explained Clarita.

"These backgrounds certainly help," agreed Marian.

"Drawing a white flower against a white wall is like having your dinner all ice-cream," said Edith.

Next to the fullest blown calla, and like it arranged against a black background, was a white piece of paper folded cornucopia fashion. The pointed end was stuck in a bottle of water. The quiet sisters talked about it in a low tone to each other—they were sure it meant something. At last the elder left her seat and stood behind Leonard, who was drawing one of the straightest lilies in the room.

"Mirabel, do you want anything?" asked Leonard.

"Sister and I want to know if the white paper in the bottle is a sign of something we ought not to do?" asked Mirabel.

"Oh no; it is only a silent hint from Aunt Ida to block out the calla lily with straight lines before trying to get the curves," answered Leonard.

"It looks as if it was put there on purpose for something," continued Mirabel, still in the same low tone.

"I am glad you thought about it, Mirabel," said Norman.

"Do you see," said Clarita, "the jack-in-the-pulpit has a comical likeness to the calla? That must be the reason the Doctor sent for it. Look! the lily spreads its flower tip back—Jack folds the tip over."

"I'll try Jack," said Norman.

All the club except Clarita drew the lily too large; they were delighted to find that the lily could be drawn with so few lines. Marion, who was acknowledged to make the best-fitting dolls' dresses in her school, suggested that the drawings be "taken in." Leonard and Norman looked puzzled. Clarita understood. Marion was only applying what she had done with her needle and thread (when making a larger garment fit a smaller doll) to the large flower drawing.

So Clarita and Marion both explained: the present outline was to be considered like a basting thread, and the real outline was to be drawn farther inside all around, "just like taking in the seam of a dress."

"Now comes the comfort of a background!" exclaimed Leonard. "You can work over the first lines very black, and make a dark background."

Several tried this plan, making a coal-black ridge around the lily bud. All were pleased at the prospect of saving "rubbing out," which is as trying to the patience as it is to the paper.

"My drawing is clean enough to please my mother," said Dora, as the meeting broke up.

"All the flowers look white to-day," said Edith.

By contrast with the white background, this was true. None of the club noticed that by repeating the shape of the outline in solid black (as Edith and Dora did around the lily bud and leaf), the object looks as if it were coming out of a hole.

However, they went away feeling that this meeting had taught them how to work quicker, and that next time they could work better. This was a step forward.

Before the members of the club separated, Leonard asked them to let him keep the various studies of the lilies and jack-in-the-pulpit, in order that he might place them among his treasures in his attic room. This they consented to, thinking that it would be very interesting to compare these early efforts with the work they would accomplish a year or so later, and thus the drawings come to be used to illustrate this article.

DORA'S BUD.

THE NESTLING AND THE BUTTERFLY.—BY MARGARET DELAND.

THROUGH the sunny summer sky
Came a sailing butterfly—
Wings that seemed with jewels set,
Gleams of rose and violet,
Bars of black in velvet fold,
Bright with glints of dusky gold—
Dancing through the sweet sunshine,
Glad with clover's ruddy wine,
Stopping just to gayly sip
A wild pansy's purple lip,
Or to softly swing and rest
On an apple blossom's breast,

Or to steal the fluffy gold
That the buttercups do hold.
Or to watch the blossoming grass
Ripple when the light winds pass,
But still sailing on and on Till she finds the sunshine gone.
Frightened then by fading light
And the softly gathering night,
She would chase the flying day.
So she stops to ask the way—
Lights upon a swinging nest.
"Right or left? which way is west?"

And the young bird answers low:
"On toward the sunset's glow.
But just say, before you fly,
Is it beautiful—the sky?
Shall I see it, do you know?
Tell me that before you go."
So, ere her bright wings she spread,
This is what she softly said:
"Yes, oh yes. On some glad dawn,
When night's stars are dimmed and gone,
Look straight up to the blue sky,
Fearless spread your wings, then—fly."

"WILYUM NYCE" AGAIN.

IT seems from the letter which we print below that Mr. Bunner's story, "Wilyum Nyece's Earthquake," has caused a little private earthquake in a respectable family. Master Thomas J. Thompson is a little hard on Mr. Bunner. That gentleman told the story simply to amuse our readers, and to instruct them in the science of earthquakes. Besides, Master Thompson did not follow Wilyum Nyece's plan strictly. If the former had waited until he had dug the hole thirty feet deep before charging it, we feel certain that the accident would not have occurred.

DEAR SIR, I'm a little boy, and I think it's mean for a big man like Mr. Bunner to be getting me into trouble. The way it happened was this: My uncle, Mr. John Thompson, whom that Mr. Forman writes about—and I think he might be in better business than making fun of Uncle John, who is generally a nice man—he sends me the paper. He came out to our house to spend the Fourth of July, and when he came he gave me two dollars to spend for fire-works to keep the Fourth with. Now I'd been reading about Wilyum Nyece's Earthquake, and I thought it would be a good thing to make some money and help papa to get rich, and then we could make all our own kerosene too. So I spent most of the money for gunpowder, except seventy cents that I bought some fire-crackers and some chasers with. I worked all the morning to dig the hole; and Miss Angelina, who was out to visit mother when Uncle John came, said, "Gracious! what makes that boy so quiet?" because I only set off three packs of crackers all the morning. I could not dig a hole thirty feet deep, because I didn't have time, and my hands got blistered, and the dirt was so hard that I couldn't make the shovel go down, so I had to cut it with the carving-knife, and Bridger was using the big one, and said, "Arrah! go 'way wid yez," and I don't see how mother expects me to grow up to be a noble man and President. I guess Mr. Cleveland's mother didn't let him be bossed by a cook. I had to use father's best carving-knife, and the handle came off. Then, when I had the hole all built out in our lawn, where an oil well would look just elegant spouting up under the trees, I put in the powder, and covered up the hole with a piece of turf, and fixed a long fire-cracker fuse to it, and went in to dinner.

I almost shivered when Uncle John asked me if I read YOUNG PEOPLE, and said I must read it careful, because there's lots of instruction in it; and mother said that she didn't like "Wilyum Nyece's Earthquake," because it put bad notions in a boy's head, and Uncle John he laughed, and said it wasn't true, because Mr. Bunner was a yomnorist. And I don't think a man that writes stories which are not true, to get little boys into trouble, is a nice fellow, even if he is a yomnorist, and I just thought how surprised papa and Uncle John would be when they saw kerosene oil spouting up in the yard almost a thousand feet, and worth ever so many dollars. Then all mother would have to say would be, "Bridger, go out to the oil fountain and fill the lamps." In the afternoon I thought I'd wait and set off the fountain in the evening, and Uncle John and Miss Angelina went out and sat under the trees. So I set off some fire-crackers and chasers, and played on my drum, and blew my tin horn, and made believe it was the battle of Banker Hill, and was just as quiet.

I don't know just how it happened, but one of the chasers went off in the grass, and there was a great explosion, and Uncle John and Miss Angelina went up in the air almost ten feet, and came down all covered with dirt, and she put her arms around Uncle John's neck and said, "Oh, darling, are you killed?" and Uncle John revived just as sudden, and didn't mind the dirt on her face a bit, but he kissed her, and they sat with their clothes and hair all full of dirt and bits of grass, and looked and acted foolish; and the folks all came running out on the piazza, and father took me by the collar and talked about my ingratitude to Uncle John, and slant me up in my room, and I wish Mr. Bunner didn't have anything for his supper on the Fourth of July except bread and butter, when the rest of the family had cake and strawberries and ice-cream; then maybe he'd stop writing stories which are not true, and give up being a yomnorist, and getting little boys into trouble. But Uncle John and Miss Angelina came to my door in the evening, and because it was locked, Uncle John slid a five-dollar gold piece through the underneath crack, and Miss Angelina said, "Bless the boy!" When papa lets me out, I'm going to be a pirate, and if I ever catch Mr. Bunner I'll take away his diamonds and make him walk the plank.

CHAPTER VIII.

MRS. MOSTYN.

"GUY!" It was Mrs. Mostyn's voice, speaking from the small study adjoining her library.

"Yes, aunt."

The boy left his seat at the centre table, where he had been diligently examining a large portfolio of prints, and drew back the portiere which divided the two rooms.

The old lady was seated before her desk, sorting over some papers. Since her return from Europe, one month before, she had postponed this task, having so much to see and hear of important household matters; but on this crisp December morning she had decided to devote herself to it.

Mrs. Mostyn held up a small envelop addressed to herself in a girlish hand.

"Guy," she said, anxiously, "do you know when this letter came?"

Guy looked at the letter in a puzzled way, and said he could not remember it.

"It is very strange. How did it get there, and how remain so long? Ring for Mrs. Brent, dear, if you please."

The house-keeper appeared, and Mrs. Mostyn cross-examined her as to what she knew of the letter. But it was some time before she and Guy together suddenly remembered that a young girl had called at the house and left it, to be sent to Europe after the mistress of the house.

"Yes," said Guy, "I remember now: she gave it to me, and I gave it over to Mrs. Brent."

"And all I can say, ma'am," said Mrs. Brent, in tones of anxious apology, "is that I must have forgot it. I remember that I was dusting the desk, so I must have thrown it down, and it went clear out of my mind."

Mrs. Mostyn's face was gravely, almost sternly, anxious. "I don't know how much harm it may do," she said, taking the letter again from its envelop. "That will do, Mrs. Brent; it was very careless of you, but I suppose we can't say anything about that now. Guy," the old lady added, when they were alone, Mrs. Brent having departed with a conscience-stricken, crestfallen air—"Guy, did you ever hear anything in my absence of an Agnes Leigh?"

Guy screwed his face up thoughtfully, and then said: "Why, yes, aunt, I think she was the girl who was at Miss Leroy's school this fall. There was something queer about her, people said. She played the violin. I know I heard from Fanny Pierson that her father was a convict, or something of that kind."

"Nonsense!" Mrs. Mostyn spoke in her sharpest tone. Guy well knew what that ring of decision and rebuke meant. "Fanny Pierson indeed!" the old lady continued, rising and locking up her desk with an expressive snap. "I should think, my dear Guy, you would know better than to care for the idle chatter of a girl like that. Now go and order the carriage to be brought here at once. The poor child!" she added, half to herself, "what must she have thought of my silence?"

The note, written many months before, was as follows:

"DEAR MADAM.—I write to you in remembrance of a promise I made my mother that if ever I was in need of a friend I would apply to you. I have come to Halcorn hoping to take some music lessons, and perhaps to get some very young pupils, as I have studied music since I was a very little girl. Will you kindly advise me, and allow me to come and see you?"

* Begun in No. 347, HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE.

"Mrs. Robertson, an old friend of my mother's, has recommended me to board with a Mrs. Jones, No. 14 Baker Street, and she promises to look after me a little. Will you name any time when I may call? I hope to be no trouble to you. All that I want is work and a little encouragement. Very sincerely yours,

"AGNES LEIGH.

"P.S.—My mother was Kate Barter."

It was like Agnes herself. Simple and straightforward, and it recalled vividly to Mrs. Mostyn's mind the single-hearted, frank Kate Barter of former days, the younger sister of Mrs. Mostyn's dearest friend, whose marriage and home in the far West had separated her from earlier associations. Once only, on the occasion which Agnes had recalled, had her mother visited Brier Lawn, for the tide of life, with its strange ebb and flow, its drift of sad circumstances and poverty, had carried her away from Mrs. Mostyn's knowledge, but the sight of Agnes's handwriting, the few simple words, the modestly put request, brought back a warmly colored past to the old lady's mind. Her eldest son would have been Kate Barter's husband had he lived. This recollection, among many others, stirred deep feelings, and made Mrs. Mostyn's heart beat with painful, beautiful, far-away remembrances.

Mrs. Mostyn decided to go at once to Miss Leroy's. Belinda Myers from the upper school-room window saw the carriage stop, and called the attention of the girls near her to the tall, gracious, elderly figure in rich furs and velvets crossing the garden path and entering the side door which led to Miss Leroy's special portion of the house. It was not an hour for an ordinary visit, and the girls wondered what had brought Mrs. Mostyn. Miss Leroy was no less surprised when the old lady followed her card rather unceremoniously up to the private parlor of the principal of the school, and Miss Jane, who was there for the purpose of discussing a school treat with her sister, jumped up, quite understanding that she was not wanted on any such occasion, but, luckily for what followed, Miss Leroy said, a little sharply, "Sit down, Jane," and Mrs. Mostyn shook hands with both sisters, too certain of her being at any hour a welcome visitor to make much apology for the intrusion.

"Is Agnes Leigh with you?" was the old lady's hasty inquiry.

Miss Leroy looked very grave.

"Agnes Leigh?" she answered. And added in a tone of unmistakable severity, "No, Mrs. Mostyn, she is not."

"Where is she?" demanded the old lady.

"I am sure I cannot tell you," was the answer. "Agnes Leigh— Well, she is not quite the sort of girl I care to have among my pupils."

"Why not?" Mrs. Mostyn asked the question with one of her most direct glances.

"Oh, sister—" began Miss Jane, eagerly bending forward; but Miss Leroy waved her aside.

"It is rather hard to say," she answered, not looking at her younger sister or heeding her supplicating tone, "but, in point of fact, the mothers of several of my pupils spoke to me in such a way of the girl that I could not reconcile it to my conscience to keep her, and then—"

Here Miss Jane broke in, and would not be silenced. "And then the scarlet fever broke out," she said, "and the poor dear child nursed some children and old Hofmeister's daughter through it."

Mrs. Mostyn smiled. "Was that the cause of complaint, Miss Leroy?" she said, coldly.

Miss Leroy's face flushed. "That would have obliged me to dismiss her from the school," was the answer, "but I did not refer entirely to that. Very disagreeable rumors went around about her, and before I had time to investigate them very thoroughly, the fever, as my sister says, made taking her back quite out of the question."

Mrs. Mostyn hesitated a few moments before deciding what to do; then she arose and said, politely enough, but still with some coldness of manner, which, it must be said, troubled the school-mistress: "I will do the investigating, Miss Leroy. I am sorry that, for the child's sake, you did not consider it necessary to continue it, in spite of her having left your school. Did you forget she was all alone in the world?"

And Mrs. Mostyn, scarcely hearing Miss Leroy's fluent and not unkindly explanations, swept out of the room, and, the good-by's over, was leaving the house, when Miss Jane's voice, from the side door of the room she had entered while her sister and the guest were still talking, detained her. The good little lady's eyes were full of compassion, and her voice quivered as she spoke.

"Oh, Mrs. Mostyn," she said, anxiously, "I wish you would find out just what it all means. For my part, I don't believe there was much foundation at all for any of the unkind things said about poor Agnes. Indeed, I never could find any one who could be pinned down to particulars. I really think it was all Fanny Pierson's chatter. If I can help you in any way, do let me know."

"Is Fanny here now?" Mrs. Mostyn answered.

Miss Jane's face fell a little. "Yes," she admitted.

"Then please let me see her."

"Wants to see me?" was Fanny Pierson's exclamation, as the summons from Miss Jane came just as the girls were beginning to wonder anew what had brought Mrs. Mostyn there.

Fanny arose with a decided air of importance, and, smiling at the group, made her way from the room.

Mrs. Mostyn was standing in the window of the little study where she had been talking to Miss Jane, and the latter, half fearing her sister's disapproval, walked about rather nervously, and greeted Fanny with a smile in which was some apprehensiveness.

"Do you know where Agnes Leigh is, my dear?" said Mrs. Mostyn, quietly, and turning her dark eyes calmly upon the showy, animated little figure before her. One of Mrs. Mostyn's greatest charms was her voice. In spite of her years, it was sweet and silvery and sympathetic; and even now, when her face was stern and sorrowful, the musical tones softened what might have seemed an imperative demand.

Fanny flushed, more from satisfaction than from any embarrassment.

"Oh, dear, no, Mrs. Mostyn," she said, smiling significantly. "She was not the person exactly we wanted to know; she was—well, I hardly know what to say—no one could—but everybody felt just so."

Not a very coherent statement of the case, but Mrs. Mostyn's keen mind understood it at once. She had not lived thirty years in Halem to no purpose, and its spirit of gossip, which, unfortunately as she knew, the young people of the town were beginning to take up, always pained, annoyed, and jarred upon her. She looked at Fanny, at the pretty, self-satisfied face, the brisk, alert young figure, and wished that she could for five moments make her feel how much harm or good that careless, eager little tongue of hers could accomplish; for something within her very heart told the old lady that by such slights as Fanny Pierson and her set were capable of giving, Agnes Leigh had been driven from the school.

"My dear," the old lady said, quietly, "I must see you again about this. There has been a terrible mistake made, I feel sure, and I have determined to set it right."

Mrs. Mostyn went at once to the Hofmeisters' former abode, but here a great disappointment awaited her. The rooms were swept and cleaned and advertised to let, and Mrs. Slater, greatly impressed by her visitor's dignity and the fact of the liveried carriage in waiting, related all the story of Margaret's illness, of the poor musician's being compelled to go to the hospital, and finally of how some friends in Boston had come and taken them away. Agnes Leigh had staid on a week—and here Mrs. Slater's account grew somewhat confused, the actual fact being that the poor woman had been unable to keep her for nothing, and Agnes, fearing to pain her by disclosing her own absolute poverty, had gone away in search of the Hofmeisters once more, with whom she hoped to do something. Just where they had gone Mrs. Slater could not tell. She thought it was to Boston.

"GUY," SHE SAID, "DO YOU KNOW WHEN THIS LETTER CAME?"

The old lady wisely said nothing to Guy during dinner. The meal was eaten rather silently. Guy was absorbed in a plan for the next day's skating, and, as we know, Mrs. Mostyn had her own sad thoughts for occupation. As a rule, nothing could be pleasanter than dinner, which, contrary to general custom in Halcorn, the lady of the mansion always took at six o'clock. The dining-room was as beautiful as rich, soft hangings, dark oak, fire-light, pictures, and the glow of wax candles would make it, and the table, furnished with dainty silver and china and sparkling glass, was bountifully laid, and winter and summer made lovely with flowers. The silence to-night between the old lady at the head of the table—with the soft lights falling on her beautiful, tranquil face, on her dark satin, her laces, and the jewels at her throat, and on her delicate white hands—and the fine-faced happy-looking boy at the other end, was most unusual. Parker, the old family servant, noticed it, and felt obliged to put down every dish noiselessly, and to leave the two alone together as soon as possible.

Then Mrs. Mostyn, with a sigh, said, gravely, "Guy, I am going up to see Fanny Pierson about these stories circulated against Agnes Leigh, but first I feel it necessary to hear from your lips just how much of the idle gossip you have been responsible for. We must trace it all directly to its source, and I cannot call a stranger to account until my own boy has rendered his."

Over the lad's face a flush of honest shame passed quickly while his aunt spoke. He looked at her intently. "Yes," he half faltered, "I did laugh with Fanny about her. You know, aunt, how absurd she can be; but I never told anything except when Mrs. Bland and young Dr. John asked me what I thought one evening. I said there seemed to be something queer—really that's all."

"But enough," interposed Mrs. Mostyn, "considering you had not one fact in your possession. Now, Guy, you must help me in this—trace it backward carefully and let me see just where it began."

Guy, really conscience-stricken and anxious to repair any wrong he had done, did as he was bidden, and between what she had heard, with her own intuitive knowledge of the world and what Master Guy could tell her, Mrs. Mostyn came to the conclusion, to the profound conviction, that the origin of it all was in the Piersons' idle chatter; the result of which was that about ten o'clock the next morning Miss Fanny received a little note which surprised her greatly, and set the family party into quite a flutter. It presented Mrs. Mostyn's compliments, and asked Fanny and Louise to come to Brier Lawn as soon as possible.

ARCHERY FOR GIRLS AND BOYS.

BY MAURICE THOMPSON.

AUTHOR OF "THE WITCHERY OF ARCHERY," ETC.

I.

Of all the out door sports in which girls and boys may join, archery presents the greatest variety of exercise, both physical and mental. There is a healthful stimulus to the imagination, as well as the freest and fullest muscular and nervous excitement produced by bow-shooting. The sport fills well the golden mean between the extreme of violent exercise, such as base-ball offers, and the tame dallying with ball and mallet which characterizes the game of croquet. The archer stands erect, expands his lungs, uses his mind and his muscles at the same time, and feels conscious of the picturesque effect of his attitudes and movements.

Bright and happy-hearted girls and boys like beautiful things, and nothing can be more strikingly pleasing to the eye than a target with its rings of gay colors, and its background of fresh grass, when the archery lawn is smoothly mown and the range is fragrant with the breath of early summer. Indeed, everything connected with archery is beautiful. The bow, the arrows, the bright quiver and belt, the gay bracer and tassel, all are symmetrical and suggestive of grace.

Another feature of archery recommends it above almost every other sport; there can be no dishonesty in connection with it. He who excels with the bow does it by perfectly fair means, you may be sure; for there is no way of shooting well except by the worthiest and sincerest effort. In other words, success in archery comes to those who deserve success, and we may begin our practice with the long-bow and arrows in the best of spirits and with a clear conscience.

Yonder stands the target, a circular mat of plaited straw, whose face is covered with a cotton cloth painted in rings of bright colors. It is set upon a wooden or iron tripod, called the stand. The centre of the target's face is a circular spot nine inches in diameter, of a clear golden color; next to this is a ring of brilliant red; then comes a circle of blue, which in turn is surrounded by a ring of black; and lastly, on the outer margin of the face, comes a white circle. When an arrow strikes the gold, it counts nine points; if it strikes the red, it counts seven points; if the blue, it counts five points; if the black, it counts three; if the white, it counts one. Thus the game is easily kept by colors: gold, 9; red, 7; blue, 5; black, 3; white, 1.

The target is four feet in diameter across the face, and is usually about three inches thick. When in place upon the stand, and ready to be shot at, its centre is four feet from the ground. It must not be imagined, however, that because the game of archery is so simple and so easy to understand, the use of the bow and arrows is easily mastered. To shoot is one thing, and to shoot well is quite another thing; the latter requires careful and systematic practice.

The English long-bow is a beautiful weapon, usually made as long as the archer is tall. Its tips, in which are the notches for the string, are of horn, and at its middle is a space covered with green plush, where the left hand grasps it in shooting. The bow does not bend in the middle, but on each side of the plush it begins to curve, and is flexible all the way to each end. The best bows are made of yew-wood, but these are very expensive; therefore I advise boys and girls to buy lance-wood bows, which, if well made, are very durable, and of excellent quality for target practice. Still, if the very best be desired, and the cost is of no consequence, a yew bow whose wood is close and straight in the grain, and of a bright, clear gold-color, should be chosen.

An archer who possesses a genuine yew bow is very proud of it, for it was with this weapon that Robin Hood and Little John and all the merry men of Sherwood Forest so long maintained their freedom, and it was it also that rang at all the glorious battles which England won in the Middle Ages.

Having chosen the bow, let us now look after our arrows, for we must be very careful in selecting them if we wish to be good archers. The arrow must be quite straight, smooth, and perfectly finished in all its parts. These parts are five in number, viz., the stele, or shaft, the nock, the foot, the pile, and the feather, or vane. The stele is the body of the arrow; the nock is a wedge-shaped piece of horn set in one end of the stele, and fitted with the notch for the bowstring; the foot is a piece of heavy wood, from four to six inches long, dovetailed into the end of the stele opposite the nock; the pile is a pointed cap of steel nicely fitted on the end of the foot; and the feather is formed of three vanes of goose feather or peacock feather set at equal distances apart around the stele near the nock.

Finger-tips are open leather thimbles for the first, second, and third fingers of the bowman's right hand; they are worn to prevent the bowstring from hurting those fingers in shooting.

The bracer, or arm-guard, is a shield of hard smooth leather made to cover the left forearm and wrist, so as to guard against injury from the recoil of the bowstring.

The quiver is a receptacle of tin or leather in which to carry the arrows. It is usually worn at the left side, attached to a belt which encircles the archer's waist.

In choosing a bow be very careful not to get one too strong, as it is impossible to shoot well if you cannot draw your bow with perfect steadiness and ease. For a boy thirteen years of age a bow that requires a pull of thirty pounds to draw an arrow up twenty-seven inches is about right; for a girl of the same age, let the pull be six pounds lighter.

All the best arrows are made twenty-eight inches long, and the strength of bows is reckoned in pounds. Thus, if a bow have 30 marked on its back, the figures signify that it will require a pull of thirty pounds to draw the arrow to its full length in the bow; therefore that bow is called a "thirty-pound" bow.

The string of a bow is made about three or three and a half inches shorter than the bow, and with a circular loop at each end to fit in the bow-nocks, or notches. Now, to bend your bow, which archers call "bracing," you slip the larger loop over the upper or longer end of the bow, and place the smaller loop in the notch of the lower end of the bow; then, standing upright, you take the bow by the plush handle with your right hand, and place the lower end of the weapon in the hollow of your right foot, at the same time placing the left hand against the upper end of the bow, with the thumb and forefinger just below the string-loop there, then by pulling with your right hand and pushing with your left you bend the bow, and at the same time slip the loop into the upper notch. In doing this you must be sure to bend your bow from the flat side, or back, toward the rounded side, or belly, as archers say. The centre, from end to end, of the string, is marked by a wrapping of gay colored silk floss to show where to place the arrow's nock in shooting.

Let us now get ready to shoot. The bow is strung, the quiver containing three good arrows hangs at your side, your bracer is buckled to your wrist, and your finger-tips are carefully put on. Take your stand as follows: your left side toward the target, your body erect, your feet six inches apart, with the toes turned a little outward, your face set toward the target, and your shoulders thrown well back. Grasp the plush handle of the bow with the left hand, and with the right place an arrow on the string so that its painted feather is to the left, and so that its nock will fit exactly on the silk floss mark, while its steel rests across the left side of the bow just above and touching the left hand.

Now hook the first, second, and third fingers of your right hand over the string so as to have the arrow's nock between the first and second fingers, and at the same time steadily and firmly extend your left arm, and draw the string until the arrow is nearly drawn up its full length. Now take your aim quickly, finish drawing up your arrow, and let go the string. Of course all these movements must be made with swiftness, steadiness, and care, and it will require a little patient practice to become sufficiently skillful to make the arrow fly evenly.

The act of loosing the string, that is, letting it go at the end of the draw, is rather difficult to do well, and it is of the highest importance to learn it at once. First be careful to have all three of your drawing fingers (nicely fitted with their leather tips) firmly and evenly hooked around the string, so as to draw with ease and steadiness, and, when you are ready to loose, let go with a slightly increased pull, so that your fingers will leave the string smoothly and all at once, meantime holding your left hand and arm perfectly steady, grasping the bow with all your power. In order to shoot with perfect ease and grace you must hold the bow nearly vertical, the upper end slanting a little toward the right.

When beginning to practise, set the target not more than twenty yards from you, and do not think of becoming discouraged because at first you are awkward. Note your faults and failures carefully, and try to profit by experience; you will soon grow interested, and finally you will find a genuine enthusiasm taking possession of you, for archery rarely fails to fascinate those who give it a fair chance. Bright, happy, intelligent girls and boys will find it the most exhilarating game practicable in summer weather. The exercise is not violent, but it is wholesome, and demands action enough to call into play all the principal muscles of the body and limbs, and to excite the mind most pleasantly. When the competition between the shooters is sharp and close the game often becomes extremely interesting, and then it is that coolness, steadiness, and carefulness win.

I will now give you the rule for taking aim in target-shooting: Having taken your stand, as above directed, with your left side turned in the direction of the target, you will draw your bow until your arrow is about four-fifths taken up, when you will look directly over the point of your arrow and thus fix your aim, with both eyes open. By a few trial shots you will discover just how high or how low to aim in order to reach the target; but there are a number of points to be remembered in this connection before you can practise intelligently.

First, you must draw your arrow back just so far each time before you take aim.

Second, you must loose (that is, let go the string) at precisely the same point just below your chin at each shot.

Third, you must draw your arrow so that during the whole act of shooting it lies in a direct line under your right eye.

Put this paper aside and keep it for reference, so that when, next week, you read what I shall say about "point of aim" and the rules of the game of archery, you may be sure to understand it all. Meantime get your bow and arrows, and try to become familiar with the methods of bracing, drawing, aiming, and loosing already described. You will be surprised how clear the rules will appear to be after you have handled the weapons for a while. I say that they will appear to be very clear, but you will find archery a progressive study. Every day you will discover something new in it, and something genuinely fascinating as well. Indeed, the more you study it and practise it, the more there appears in it to learn.

A NAUTICAL EXPERIMENT; OR, WHO KNOWS BEST?

BY KIRK MUNROE,

AUTHOR OF "WAKULLA," ETC.

Part II.

AT the door of the "bumboat" cabin the boys met a man, who said, "Hello"; and to whom Nelson said, "Good-morning, sir."

He was a middle-aged man, large and muscular, and remarkable for the stubby black beard which almost covered his face. He was bareheaded and barefooted, and wore only an old flannel shirt, open in front, and exposing a very hairy chest, and a pair of dirty trousers. The sleeves of his shirt were rolled up to his elbows, and the bottoms of his trousers were turned up to his ankles. Altogether his costume seemed to the boys to be very airy and unseasonable.

"What do you want here this time o' day?" he asked.

"Breakfast, sir," answered Nelson. "We're on a cruise down the river in our boat, and have lost our provisions overboard, so we thought we'd stop and see if you'd give us something to eat."

"Got any money?" asked the man.

"Only a little," answered Nelson—which was quite true, as the available funds of the expedition all told only amounted to two dollars; for the fathers of the boys did not approve of giving them large amounts of pocket-money unless for some particular purpose.

"Well," said the man, "little or much, I don't want your money; but I do want some work done, and if you two are willing to earn your breakfast, I'll give you the best I've got."

The boys were too hungry to be particular as to the terms on which they got their breakfast, and readily agreed to the proposition of the man, who thereupon invited them into the cabin.

The interior of the "bumboat" cabin was dark and dirty, the only light entering through the open door and two very small, cobwebby windows. It was also very close and smoky. On one side were two bunks filled with soiled blankets; on the other were a table, two chairs, and an empty box turned up on end, and opposite the door stood and smoked a little rusty stove.

The man told the boys to sit down, and dragging a second box from under the table, he took from it some tin plates and cups, and some knives, forks, and spoons, and proceeded to set the table. Then mixing a batter of flour, water, and baking powder in a pan, he fried griddle-cakes until he had a large plateful, and had nearly choked the boys with smoke and the smell of grease. These, with a loaf of dark-looking bread, a dish of fried bacon, and a pot of coffee, constituted the breakfast, to which the man invited the boys to "pitch in." There was coarse brown sugar for sweetening the coffee; but no milk to relieve its blackness, neither was there any butter, but only molasses to spread on both bread and griddle-cakes.

At sight of this breakfast the boys looked at one another, and each thought of the dainty, bountifully supplied tables at home. For the first time in their lives they began to realize what a blessed thing it is to have a home, and how much better off they had been than some other people in this world. Still, they were too ravenously hungry to be squeamish, and they managed to make a pretty fair meal from what was set before them.

"Now," said the man, when they had finished, "to pay for your breakfast you shall wash the dishes, sweep out and 'red' up the cabin, and row me ashore in your boat after a couple of buckets of fresh water. Meantime I'll just set here and see that you do it all up ship-shape."

The boys thought this pretty good pay for so poor a breakfast, and Nelson said something in a low tone to that effect; but the man, who was lighting a short black pipe, scowled at him so savagely that he thought it best to accept the situation and do the work laid out for him with as good a grace as possible.

So the boys set to work, and began to wash the breakfast dishes in cold water; but the man, who by this time was comfortably seated in one chair with his feet resting upon the other, and drawing clouds of smoke from his stump of a pipe, advised them to use hot water, as they would find it easier. This advice sounded so much like a command that Harry, who began to think that they had fallen in with a pirate sure enough, hastened to heat some water in a pan on the stove. While he was doing this,

Nelson collected the scraps that remained of their breakfast, and took them on deck to Rover, who had not been invited into the cabin, and who devoured them ravenously.

At last the disagreeable task was finished, the dishes had been washed and replaced in the box under the table, and under the directions of the man, who ordered them about incessantly, the boys succeeded in making the little cabin look cleaner and brighter than it had for many a day. When everything had been done to his satisfaction the man took a couple of water-pails, placed them in the bows of the Nelly Bly, took his seat in the stern, and ordered the boys to row him ashore. They asked if Rover might go too, but the man said, "No, the dog must stay and mind the boat." But Rover had no idea of obeying this new master, and as soon as the Nelly Bly was shoved off, and he saw that they intended to leave him behind, he sprang into the water and swam after them. It was evident that there was no room for him in the little boat, even if the man would have allowed him on board, so the poor fellow was obliged to swim for half a mile.

They landed on a little beach just above an old abandoned mill, at the foot of a water-fall, above which the water of the creek was clear and fresh. Poor Rover, who was too fat for a long swim, was very tired, and lay down on the beach panting, without even waiting to shake himself, while the boys, under the man's direction, filled the water-pails at the spring above the falls, and replaced them carefully in the boat. Then they rowed back to the "bumboat," but without poor Rover, for though when they started he tried to swim after them, he soon gave it up and returned to the little beach.

When the man had stepped aboard the "bumboat," and lifted out the two pails of water, he said:

"Now, my hearties, you've paid for your breakfast according to bargain, and you can continue your cruise if you want to; but my advice to you is that you go back as quick as you can to the home you've run away from. Boys like you, as is evidently young gents, don't go on no cruise without a better outfit than you've got. But if you will keep on, I hopes as how you won't meet with no worse fellows to get along with than old Ben Stubbs."

With this the man disappeared into the little cabin, and our boys turned the head of the Nelly Bly once more toward the place where they had last seen Rover. When they again reached the beach, at the foot of the falls, the dog was nowhere to be seen; and though they whistled, and called, and hunted for him for more than an hour among the thick underbrush, they could discover no traces of their faithful companion, and were finally forced to give up the search and return to their boat without him.

As they pulled slowly down the creek Harry said, "Nelse, don't you think we'd better go back? Seems to me being sailors is pretty hard work, after all."

"I don't know but what we had," responded Nelson; "but I'm too tired to row home now. I tell you what, Harry, let's row out into the river, and wait there for a tow of canal-boats. If the first one that comes along is bound up the river, let's offer the captain of one of the boats a dollar to take us home; but if it's bound down, let's offer him a dollar to take us to New York."

"All right," said Harry; "I'm willing; but I do wish we'd left a note or something at home to let 'em know we ain't drowned. They must be awful anxious about us by this time."

"Shouldn't wonder if they were," said Nelson. "I never thought of that. But we'll write 'em a letter from New York, and that'll make it all right."

They passed the "bumboat" without seeing anything of Ben Stubbs, though they saw that the steam-launch, which had been absent while they were on board, had returned, and now lay alongside.

The sun was now several hours high, and though the day was clear and cool, its direct rays were so warm that both the boys soon became very drowsy. Pulling in his oar, Harry lay down in the bottom of the boat, and saying that he was just going to rest a little, was almost immediately fast asleep.

Nelson also took in his oar, but sat up, determined to keep awake and watch for a tow. As the sunlight on the water dazzled him he closed his eyes to shut out the glare, and a moment later a little boat, containing two sleeping boys, was floating on the broad bosom of the Hudson.

Too! too! too! to-o-o-o-t! sounded a shrill whistle so close to them that both boys sprang up, wide awake, and filled with the idea that they were being run down by a railroad train. Coming down the river, and headed directly toward them, was a great steam-boat, and behind her they saw a long tow of canal-boats, ice-boats, and barges. The boys had just time to recover their senses, spring to their oars, and get out of the way as the steamer swept over the spot.

"They're bound for New York," said Nelson, as the tow surged heavily past them. "That settles the question. Now let's try and board one of them." They pulled up alongside the last canal-boat of the tow.

"Take our line, will you?" shouted Nelson to a boy of about their own age, who stood on deck watching them, at the same time throwing him the end of the painter.

Catching the rope, the boy took a turn with it around a cleat, and held fast to the end. In another instant the Nelly Bly was drawn so violently against the side of the canal-boat that she turned half over, and the water rushed in over her gunwale. Both Nelson and Harry sprang for the canal-boat, and managed to scramble on board; but at the same moment the boy who held the end of their painter, seeing the mischief that he had occasioned by being too accommodating, let go of it, and the poor little boat drifted astern, and in another minute was left far behind.

and seeming happy. My father saw such a funny thing the other day—two Indian women washing their clothes on their backs! One would take a piece of soap and rub it all over the back of the other, and then a bucket of water over her head, and get the soap off. A kind friend of mine has been sending me HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE for over a year, and I enjoy reading it very much. We have been so much here lately that we've had to expect to go away very soon. This is my first letter, and I hope you will think it nice enough to publish. I am ten years old.

HELEK MARGUERITE G.

This is a very good little letter. Thank you for sending it.

DEAR POSTMISTRESS.—I thought I would write you the first letter I ever wrote, and I hope most of the children tell about their pets when they write, but I have no pets. I have four sisters. We love lovely flowers here in the spring. I wonder if many of the girls can embroider nicely? I am just learning, and like it very much. I have been reading some fairy stories, and enjoy them very much.

ROBBERLIN, LOUISIANA.

I am eleven years old, and live on a plantation some miles from Fort Jessup, where General Taylor had his head-quarters in 1829. Our family used to live at Colorado Springs, and the warm weather we are having now makes us think of the cool times we used to have among the mountains. We have been in this State over two years. I have two sisters, Adele, eighteen, and Kitty, fifteen, years old. My mamma has taught us to read, and we came South, as the nearest school is three miles away. Last fall I picked cotton in my papa's field, and he paid me for it, so that I could buy my HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE for my very own. I like it very much.

GRACE T.

BROWNSVILLE, CONNECTICUT.

I have often wanted to write and tell you how much I like HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE, which we have taken now a long time. I notice almost all the little boys and girls have pets. We had the most beautiful little English pug, named Dixie, that we all loved so much, but last week he died, and we buried him in the garden, lying in his own pretty basket and blanket. He had on his harness and silver bells. Now we have only our pony, who is sometimes very naughty, and will refuse to go when we wish him to. Will you please print this little letter, so that my friends will know how I feel about my very own. I like his magazine, and oblige your little friend,

DON.

PLAZ BUTH, ILLINOIS, NORTH WARRER.

I am a girl twelve years old, and my mamma gave me HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE a little while ago, and now I have begun to take it. I like "Roif House" and "Into Unknown Seas" best. Other children tell you about their pets, so I will tell you about mine. I have two birds and a pair of dormice. I like the dormice best. I am not Welsh, though I have always lived in Llanidnoy, Besiden HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE, I take "The Flocks and Sunshine." I have no brother or sister. I am very fond of dolls, and have a great many. I hope this letter will be printed, as it is the first I have ever written. I go to school every day, and like it very much. Please may I write again?

LUCCY C.

PHILADELPHIA, PENNSYLVANIA.

DEAR POSTMISTRESS.—We are two little brothers, Henry and Herbert, aged seven and a half and six years. We can both read very nicely, and know nearly all of the multiplication tables; but we cannot write, so our mamma is writing this for us. We have no pets, except an old pussy who came to us as the other day, who we named her Rachel. She is a very quiet cat, but very cute too. When she wants to go down to the kitchen, and the door is closed at the foot of the stairs, she stands two steps up, and works at the latch till it becomes loose, and then pushes against it, and then she is down. We think it very smart. We like to read your papers so much. When we get older, we will write our selves. Your little friends,

HENRY and HERBERT G.

This letter is specially intended for Emily Shields:

SANTA BARBARA, CALIFORNIA.

I have taken HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE for two years. I live in Santa Barbara with father, mother, and two sisters. One of my sisters is named Barbara, because she was born in the mountains. My father goes camping sometimes in the mountains, about sixty miles from here, and once he comes back, and he has a lot of things for my care, together with two little Scotch terriers. I feed, groom, and exercise the horse every day. It is great fun. I have learned to put the bridle on all my horses. We live near the water, so we go often to gather sea-moss or go in wading.

We do not go bathing yet. We have a large fig-tree in our garden, and a big grape-vine which measures twenty-one inches around the trunk. One of my school-mates, Tommy D., raises lemons to sell. I have made a great many glasses of lemonade from his lemons.

EMILY H. BAKER.

HENSONVILLE, CATERBIE, MOUNTAINS, NEW YORK.

Mamma has taken HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE for us since last October, and we like it very much. I think that "False Witness" the new story, is the nicest one I have ever read. We are spending this summer in the Catskills. I have two brothers and a brother. My eldest sister is fourteen years old, my brother is twelve, I am eleven, and my little sister is six. There is a creek that runs through the place, and sometimes it is very cold; sometimes, too, we fall in it.

LYDIA E. M.

DETROIT, MICHIGAN.

DEAR POSTMISTRESS.—I was eleven years old this 23d of April, and I have a very pleasant birthday, and I received many presents. We had a tortoise-shell cat and four kittens. Two of the kittens we gave away. The two that we kept could not play together, and one of them died out one morning and found them dead. I go to school, and study arithmetic, geography, grammar, and spelling. I think "False Witness" would be a nice story. I have ten dolls. One of them has golden hair, which I can curl and braid.

LIZZIE E. S.

BATHURST, MARYLAND.

I have been looking a long time to find a very long word, and I have found a word with twenty letters; it is philophagotriteness. It is the longest word I have. I have a little friend who lives next door, and she loaned me her paper. Now I get paper to buy me one. I think it is the nicest paper I ever read. I am nine years old, and I like to go to school, and I have my first letter, and I hope it will be published. I have a very old bird; he is fifteen years old. He tries to sing sometimes, and does it too.

EVA O. B.

WARREN, PENNSYLVANIA.

Although I have taken this lovely paper for a long time, I have never written to it. I began to write a long time ago, but never finished. This is at my cousin Charlotte's house; she is writing to St. Nicholas. A good many boys and girls tell about their pets. I have none except a large dog named Dick. I had a square bird, but it died. Charlotte has three cats. I think "Silent Pete, or the Stowaways," is a lovely story.

CLARIETA B. P.

LITTLE ROCK, ARKANSAS.

I live in the suburbs of Little Rock, and we have very nice times. I have never seen any letter from Arkansas in the Post-office Box. For pets I have a dog named Bill and a bird named Dick. I had a little kitten, and last week she was sick, and one morning I could not find her, and I have not seen her since, so I think she must be dead. "Silent Pete," and "The Little's stories, also Miss Abbott's, are very nice.

JEANNETTE P.

FETERBOROUGH, ONTARIO, CANADA.

I am eleven years old, and live in the town of Peterborough. It is a very pretty place. I have been taking HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE since January. I think it is a very good magazine. I have been reading "Silent Pete, or the Stowaways," and think it is a very interesting story. I went to Grimsby Camp-ground last year, and enjoyed myself very much. I go to school, and read in the Third Reader. I have one dog, and he has a little dog; his name is Rex. My grandpa had a pretty dog; his name was Diver. He would be dead. "Silent Pete," and "The Little's stories, also Miss Abbott's, are very nice.

The Postmistress wishes to say to some of her young contributors that she cannot undertake to return their little poems or stories when she is unable to find room for them in the Post-office Box, even when accompanied by postage-stamps for that purpose. The Postmistress is kept very busy reading and selecting from the letters and stories that come to her by every mail, so she hopes her little correspondents will save her time and their own postage-stamps, and not ask to have their manuscripts returned if they are not printed.

A young girl needs no cosmetics except fresh air and cold water. Good health will usually give a good complexion to its possessor. Go early to bed, eat sweet and vegetables with plenty of bread and butter and ripe fruit, take a walk every morning, and assist in the house-work if it is necessary, let candies and sentimental novels alike alone, and you will probably have bright eyes and rosy cheeks. Your mother is right about gardening. It is wholesome, beautiful, and womanly work, and the harder parts of it should be done by your brothers. There is opportunity in the care of even a single flower-bed for much healthful exercise. A sun-bonnet or broad-brimmed hat, and a pair of garden gloves, will protect your face and hands from sunburn and tan. Many persons, like myself, are of the opinion that a little tan does not look badly on a young face. It is the kiss of air and sunshine.—A. M. COUNTRY SCENE.—"DON'T TEASE THE DOG, JAMES; YOU WILL SPOIL HIS TEMPER."

SUMMER NOON.

A TAWNY snake, the road winds up
To where the wood so still is,
And droops the burnished buttercup,
And loll the water-lilies;

The dusty vines are parched and torn,
The gauzy air's a-quiver,
No silken rustle in the corn,
And glares the silent river—
All the long, long summer noon.

The blackberry's beads of jet are strung
Along the way-side fences,
And every bird has lost its tongue
Till afternoon commences;
A locust, hidden in some tree,
Strikes up its drowsy rattle,
And in the brooklet quietly
Are grouped the panting cattle—
All the long, long summer noon.

But deep within a sunless dell
A cricket's voice is shrilling;
Of cooler hours it seems to tell,
With cheer the silence filling.
And hark! a tree-toad's tremulous cry:
"Dear me! I'm not complaining.
We'll get a good shower by-and-by;
I've seen a sign of raining,
All the long, long summer noon."

CHAPTER IX.

THE STORY OF A MINUTURE.

FANNY contrived to let half a dozen people whom she met know where she and her sister were going. When they were ushered by old Parker into the library, both girls felt a little overawed by the very dignified manner in which they were received. It was hard for Mrs. Mostyn to go through the preliminaries which civility demanded, but her first remark surprised Fanny beyond all powers of expression.

"My dear," the old lady said, gravely, "I have sent for you to-day because I wish you to do justice—you and my nephew Guy—where you may have done the contrary. I am trying in every way to find my dear young friend Agnes Leigh, and you, I understand, seem to be the one responsible for the stories told against her—stories which I am sure you will find had no foundation. But now I want you to sit down, both of you, with me, and quietly see how we can set it right, first, by carefully going back to what it was that first turned you against her. From all I can hear, no one thought of anything as wrong or mysterious in her history or family until you had suggested it."

The girls had seated themselves on the long, wide sofa drawn midway in the room, and Fanny had prepared herself for a very pleasant, sociable call, but now her face crimsoned with anger and surprise. She started up, and forgetting her fine manners, the age and dignity of the old lady before her, she exclaimed, indignantly: "I can tell you just what it is, Mrs. Mostyn, I don't mean to have any one call me to account. I believe that Leigh got to be a sly, deceitful thing, and I have said so a dozen times, and I am not ashamed of it either—there! And if you think I have come here—and—"

Fanny, really frightened and ashamed, broke down in a fit of hysterical weeping, while Mrs. Mostyn regarded her in half-pitying, contemptuous silence.

"All this is very useless, my dear," she said at length. "I am not talking without reason. Listen to me." She glanced up, conscious of the other person in the room—a delicate little figure with a plain, though gentle, honest face. Louise was listening anxiously.

"I am going to tell you something of my own life, and then you will understand me better. I am sure, Louise, you wish your sister to tell me all about Agnes Leigh, and why she started any gossip in Halcorn which could hurt her."

The mention of a narration from Mrs. Mostyn's own experience caused Fanny to look up with a quick gleam of interest. Mrs. Mostyn, the great lady of Halcorn, actually offer her a confidence? Fanny dried her eyes with only a remnant of her hauteur and of the fury of only five minutes before, and looked at her hostess anxiously. It occurred to her to be just a trifle ashamed of her own conduct as she involuntarily contrasted it with the beautiful calm and dignity of the old lady before her, but her curiosity was more strongly aroused than any other sentiment.

"Come with me to my own room, Fanny—you and Louise," said Mrs. Mostyn. "And remember, I do not want you to chatter about this," continued the old lady, smiling pleasantly. "You see," she said, "although I have something to complain of in what you have done, I am going to test you by giving you a real confidence."

Fanny and Louise followed Mrs. Mostyn up the oaken staircase to the old lady's special sitting-room in the L of the house which had been part of the original mansion in her grandfather's day. The room into which they went was beautiful and luxurious, yet there were many things within it which at first impressed even Fanny's mind as being out of place: some old pieces of furniture not quite in keeping with the newer ones; some pictures of places and a few portraits of people in queer little old-fashioned frames; tapestry of wool-work done by experienced but long-quiet fingers; an old-fashioned writing desk, and at one side of the room a table which looked as though it had seen some good school-room service many years before.

When her visitors were seated, Mrs. Mostyn said, cheerfully:

"I very rarely bring any young people into this room. Look around, and I am sure you will see that everything in it must belong just to me alone. That old table over there I have often laid my head down upon, crying over French exercises and sums that would not come out right, and the desk you see over there was my father's when he was a hard-worked young man in an office. Whenever I want to bring myself, girls, to a proper frame of mind over anything, I come and sit down in this room. You see, it shows me that I was once poor, and bothered, and tired out, and rebellious, too, no doubt; it shows me that my father's money came to him not only by inheritance, but by hard and honorable labor; and then"—Mrs. Mostyn glanced around at the portion of the old room in which they were seated, the generous wood fire, the soft easy-chairs, the pictures, warm hangings, and the portrait of Guy Mostyn's father hanging just above them—"it shows me also the blessings and comforts I have now. Don't you think, on the whole, it is a very good room for an old lady like myself to meditate in?"

The girls laughed brightly. Fanny felt a thrill of delight, and wished that Mrs. Mostyn would talk for half an hour to come. But the old lady was busy searching the drawer of a little cabinet on the wall. From this she took out two or three miniatures. The first which she showed the girls represented a young man with a fine, delicate, sensitive face, at which both girls exclaimed with admiration.

Mrs. Mostyn was silent for a moment, and then said:

"I want to tell you something of which I rarely speak. I showed you that miniature, because it is about the young man who sat for it that I have to tell you. Long ago, Fanny, when I was about your age, and perhaps just as bright and merry a girl as you are, we lived in a small country village, where there was very little to really amuse me, and too little that was useful for me to do. However, I used to be fond of turning all sorts of things into ridicule for the benefit of my companions. They laughed with and at me, of course, and I thought it a very fine thing to be so witty and amusing. Among other people who excited my powers of imitation and sense of the ludicrous was this young man. He was a student in the Morris Academy. His dress, his walk, his reserved ways, all became objects for my satire, and—I need hardly go into further details; but before I realized in the least what I had done, I had influenced the whole town against him. Like Agnes Leigh, he suspected nothing of all this, but met the cold glances, the ill-suppressed contempt, of people about him, at first without thinking of them, and then in a pained and wondering silence. Soon after I was taken ill. When I recovered it was to learn that the ball I had so sinfully, although I must say thoughtlessly, set rolling had gone on until poor Mr. B— had actually left town, and, worse than that, lost the prospect of advancement which he would have had but for my folly.

"When it was shown me what I had done, it seemed to me that a lifetime could not repair the evil that I had brought about. I felt nearly frantic, I assure you, and, acknowledging my error freely to my father, I begged of him to try and do something to bring Mr. B— back again; but all our search for him proved useless. He had accepted an offer to go to Africa as a missionary, and there, as I only learned when I was a middle-aged woman, he had died within a year. He had confided his sorrows to a friend, who came back to my native place during the absence of our family. The friend brought his last message to a worthy girl whom he had hoped to marry, but it came too late. She has never married, but being a brave, true woman, she has done her life's work nobly and bravely; but, girls, I never see her even now without a terrible feeling of self-abasement. But for my idle folly she and he might be useful members of society; he might be using his gifts as a preacher and a curer of souls where such as he are so needed, and I could feel that I had never ruined any human being's life.

"But can you not see what this fearful lesson taught me?—that I must never listen to any idle tale of gossip, never see any injustice done if I can help it, and, above all, that I must try to believe and make others believe the very best of my fellow-beings? And so, my dear," added Mrs. Mostyn, more cheerfully, and laying one of her hands upon Fanny's arm—"so, you see, I believe the best of you, which is that you will cheerfully retract anything you have carelessly said, and work with me to stop this tide of foolish feeling which has been raised against poor Agnes. Don't go on until you come to be an old woman like myself, and looking back at this time have it to say that you did not at once set right any wrong you had done. That, let me tell you, would be terrible indeed."

Fanny, as the old lady's silvery tones ceased, regarded her with wide-eyed, intense earnestness. That Mrs. Mostyn should have voluntarily owned to any weakness, even for a moment in her life, served to absorb Fanny's every thought. Mrs. Mostyn, the revered, honored, valued, "great lady" of Hadeom—could it be that at any time she had been a giddy, rattling girl like Fanny herself, at any time had erred? "I thought it a very fine thing to be so witty and amusing." These words came back to Fanny after the first moment, and they made her cheeks tingle with shame at the thought that they applied to herself. She wanted to speak, but could hardly tell what to do. Before any one had moved, Louise's voice broke the silence. She stood up, with a flush on her usually pale cheeks, her eyes lighted so that the plain, old-fashioned face had a glow that was actually beautiful about it.

"Mrs. Mostyn," she said, in a quick, nervous, though resolute tone, "I have been thinking this over and over. We have been to blame—I know it; it was only Fanny's seeing an address on a letter; but—but, Fanny, you remember how it all began that day you made your red velvet toque. You know before that we had only just wondered a little, but what did we really know? It was all a sort of guess-work until Fanny saw that address."

"What address?" Mrs. Mostyn looked up with kindness at the young face turned toward her.

"The address on a letter which Agnes Leigh was posting, as we thought, to her father in a prison."

"Oh!" Mrs. Mostyn gave a little gasp of relief. Fanny began to cry again.

"But she looked so queer!" she said between her sobs. "And living all alone, and playing the violin, not like any girl I ever heard of."

Louise flashed a contemptuous glance upon her sister. "How many things have we seen or heard, I'd like to know," she said, quickly. "Fanny, don't be foolish, and hold out against Mrs. Mostyn any longer. If you do not do as she wishes, I will."

"Well, well," faltered Fanny, "I don't want to set myself up against Mrs. Mostyn, I'm sure; but still I do not think anything I ever did could be as bad as the story about the young man that went out to Africa."

Mrs. Mostyn regarded the girl with a half-smile; the pretty, flushed, tearful face had in it only the least touch of contrition; but Mrs. Mostyn was wise enough to ask for a small beginning.

"That certainly was very bad, my dear," she said, quietly, "but your case might be much worse. Thank you, Louise," she added, "for your candor. And now I will leave you young people here a few moments. You must stay to luncheon with me, and afterward we will drive about and see a few people together."

Before Mrs. Mostyn left the room she selected another miniature and handed it to the girls, saying: "That was Agnes Leigh's mother, my dear. See how sweet and innocent and gentle her face is. Think how it would hurt her to have her only little daughter's life hurt by mere slander. I do not think it was wise or sensible of Agnes to start out for herself at fifteen years of age all alone in a strange town, but you forget that she expected to find me here, and— Well, perhaps, if we are only fortunate enough to find her again, I can tell you something more of her story."

BIRDS' EGGS AND NESTS.

BY SARAH COOPER.

WHAT a mystery is connected with the egg! A little world of itself! Shut apart from the outside world, it seems a lifeless thing, yet within that little sphere mighty forces are at work which, under favorable circumstances, will produce a perfect animal, gifted with life, and soon showing the habits and peculiarities of its ancestors.

On opening an egg we see merely the "white," in the middle of which floats the "yolk," with the whitish "germ cell" clinging to it. This germ cell occupies but little space, yet it is the important part of the egg—the part for which all the rest of the egg was made, because it is just at this spot that the young bird begins to grow. We cannot see, without a microscope, the twisted cords of albumen at both ends of the egg which hold the yolk pretty nearly in the centre, but we can see them represented in Fig. 1. Those twisted cords allow the yolk to roll over from one side to another when the egg is turned, and so the germ cell, which is at the lightest part of the yolk, keeps always uppermost, as in the picture. Here we have a beautiful contrivance by which the germ cell is sure to be nearest the body of the bird as she sits upon her eggs, no matter how often the eggs are turned over.

Of course that part of the egg nearest the bird gets the most heat from her warm little body and her soft, downy feathers, and a certain amount of heat is necessary to develop the new life within the egg. This, we know, is the reason that birds sit upon their eggs, and that they are so careful not to leave the nest long enough for them to become chilled.

As we have just said, the young bird begins to grow from the germ cell. The albuminous white of the egg furnishes the building material for its growth, and the rich, oily yolk nourishes the newly formed bird as long as it continues in the shell. The more there is of this nourishment stored up in the egg, the stronger and better developed will the bird be on leaving it, as is clearly shown in the case of those birds whose eggs contain a large yolk. The young of such birds are able to run about and help themselves as soon as they are hatched; whereas the young of those having small yolks, not being so fully developed, are hatched in a blind and naked condition, and need to be fed and brooded over by their parents.

No doubt you have often noticed in hard-boiled eggs a little hollow place at the larger end like the one shown at f, in Fig. 1. There is a little bubble of air here, between the two delicate tissues lining the shell, for the use of the baby bird, and the shell is so full of very small pores that fresh supplies of air can easily pass through it.

When the tiny creature, shut up in the shell, is fitted to live in the great world outside, it pierces this hard case and chips its way out by the help of a hard knob on top of its beak. This knob seems to be only a tool to help the bird escape from the shell, and as it is of no use afterward, it soon disappears.

The bird is now fully equipped with bones, muscles, bill, claws, and internal organs. These parts have all been formed and nourished from the contents of that little egg-shell. Moreover, we find the contents of the shell have been entirely absorbed, showing that though the egg furnishes all that is needed for the formation of the young animal, there is nothing in it which is unnecessary.

These same birds' eggs, which we have found so full of wonderful design, are very precious to the heart of the mother bird, and she never seems happier than when hard at work getting her nest ready to receive them. The nest is also intended for the early home of her little ones, and she displays much skill and industry in building it. As a general rule the small birds with delicate feet and slender bills are most successful in weaving a fine and elegant nest.

All birds of the same species build their nests alike from one generation to another, and seldom depart from the long-established plan. They not only use the same building material, but they select similar locations, so that those of you who are familiar with the habits of birds know pretty well in what kind of places to look for any particular nests you may be in search of.

Birds' tastes certainly differ in the choice of a home, and high tree-tops, way-side hedges, low bushes, hollow tree trunks, and grassy pastures all have advantages of their own in the estimation of the birds that occupy them. I hope each one of you has had the keen pleasure of finding for himself or herself these charming nests hidden away among the leaves and grass, and that you noticed the material of which the nests were made.

Some birds, you may remember, use nothing for building materials but small sticks, dried grass, and hair; some weave pieces of string and strips of birch bark in among the grass; others, again, plaster their nests with mud to make them strong. The great-crested fly-catcher has a singular fancy for the cast-off skins of snakes, and always hunts up one or two of these skins to weave into her nest. She then lines it with soft brown feathers of the same general color as the eggs that are to lie within it. The tailor-bird also makes an odd nest by sewing together the leaves of trees, and in doing so she must use her beak and slender claws in the place of a needle (Fig. 2). In arranging their nests most birds have a thought for comfort, and put in some soft lining, using for this purpose feathers, fine grass, delicate thistle-down, or the yellow woolly covering of young ferns.

Imagine, now, these dainty homes after the tiny eggs have been placed within, or a little later, when they are filled to overflowing with tender young birds, and you may know how attractive they would be to hawks and owls and snakes and other animals that are prowling about, seeking what they may devour. In fact, these little tidbits are so eagerly sought both day and night as to make the parent birds very anxious for the safety of their little ones, and in consequence of the dangers to which they are exposed most birds conceal their nests as much as possible from sight. In the tropics they often hang them on the outer twigs of trees, away from the reach of monkeys and reptiles. The illustration on page 616 shows the nest of the African weaver-bird, curiously fashioned, and hanging from the branch of a tree.

It has been noticed that those female birds which have bright and conspicuous colors, like their mates, build in hollow trees, or else make covered nests, that they may not be so easily seen while sitting upon them. On the other hand, when the female is of a dull color, and there is not the same need of concealment, the nest is made open. It will at once be evident that a bird which harmonizes in color with the general line of her nest might sit upon it unnoticed, whereas a bright-colored bird in such an exposed position would attract the attention of her enemies, and thus inform them where her treasures were stored.

This fascinating subject of the coloring of birds may be extended to the eggs as well, and you will find it a pleasing study to notice the various tints by which birds' eggs are made to blend with their surroundings. The curious blotches and specks and the indescribable lines and markings with which many eggs are ornamented serve as an additional concealment. Perhaps you will discover that eggs which are placed in open nests are generally shielded from observation in this way, while those eggs that are laid in holes and in concealed places are often purely white. This wise provision of nature for the protection of life may be noticed in other animals besides birds. In northern countries many of the fur-bearing animals, including the wolf, the fox, and the hare, become white in winter, so that they can hardly be distinguished at a distance from the snow which covers the ground.

ARCHERY FOR GIRLS AND BOYS.

BY MAURICE THOMPSON,
AUTHOR OF "THE WITCROWDY OF ARCHERY," ETC.

II.

WE have learned already that in taking aim over the point or pile of the arrow both the shooter's eyes are kept open, and the whole length of the shaft is ranged in a line directly under his right eye. This is really taking aim with the right eye, just as if the left were shut. The first thing to learn, after you know how to take aim, is to be quick and sure in every motion of the act, for it is very injurious to the bow to hold it long at the draw; besides, the strain is very trying to the archer's nerves. The best archers take aim in about a half-second of time. As this is the most important part of target shooting, I will now endeavor to set before you in the simplest language the English rule for aiming, as established by Mr. Horace A. Ford, the greatest target archer that ever lived.

We will suppose that your target is sixty yards distant, and that you are using a thirty-pound bow. You have taken the "position of an archer," with your left side toward the target, and your face turned so that you look over your left shoulder. You have an arrow on the string ready to shoot. You draw the arrow three-fourths of its length up in the bow, and pause to take aim. Now, since the arrow's line of flight will be a "vertical curve," called a trajectory, your point of aim will necessarily be higher than the point you wish to hit; therefore you will fix your eyes not on the gold of the target, but on a point far enough above it to allow for the curve of flight. This done, steady your arrow so that the pile (point of the arrow) covers the point of aim thus chosen, then swiftly and steadily complete the draw, and let fly smoothly and evenly. This should be done over and over, until you have mastered yourself and your weapons.

Remember that the final draw must always bring your right hand to the same point, just below and to the right of your chin, and in a line with your right eye. Be sure that while you see your arrow-pile and your point of aim in the direct line of your vision, you also see by indirect vision the entire length of your shaft lying straight below your line of sight. This will cause the flight of the arrow to be exactly in the "vertical plane of your vision;" that is, its trajectory, or curve, will be directly under your sight, and if your point of aim has been exactly high enough, your arrow will strike the gold. But suppose the arrow is seen to strike a foot below the gold, this will notify you that your point of aim was a foot too low, and that next time you must raise it just that much. If, however, your arrow fly to the left or to the right of the gold, you will know that you have failed to draw in the line of your sight, and if your shots vary greatly in a vertical line, with the same point of aim, you may be sure that you are varying the length of your draw, or drawing to different points below your chin, or that you are loosing irregularly. When the flight of the arrow is exactly in the line of vision at each shot, archers call it "keeping the line," and when the arrow strikes at the same height on the target at each shot, they call it "keeping the length." So you will see that the whole of archery is crowded into the sentence, "Keep the line and keep the length," or, in other words, shoot just high enough and in the right vertical plane.

THE GAME OF ARCHERY

The rules of the target game of archery are very simple. In England two targets are used, one at each end of the range, and three arrows (called an "end") are shot by each archer in turn from one target at the other, after which they all walk to the target shot at, and shoot back at the first, and so on, thus combining brisk walks with the exercise of archery. The best game for girls and boys is twenty-four shots (that is, eight "ends") each at forty yards, or, if your lawn space will not give so long a range, twenty yards will do.

The score of the game is kept as follows:

Name of Archer—Mary Field.

| | Gold. | Red. | Blue. | Black. | White. |
|----------------------|-------|------|-------|--------|--------|
| First end | 1 | — | 1 | — | 1 |
| Second end | 1 | 1 | — | — | — |
| Third end | — | — | — | 1 | — |

The above record would show that three "ends" had been shot by Mary Field; that is, that she had shot nine arrows, and had hit the target six times—once in the gold, once in the blue, once in the black, once in the white, and twice in the red—which would make her score count in numbers as follows: 1 gold = 9 points; 2 reds = 14 points; 1 blue = 5 points; 1 black = 3 points; 1 white = 1 point; total, 6 hits = 32 points.

If eight ends are to be shot, rule your page for that number, and the game is easily kept. Archers sometimes keep the score simply by the numbers represented by the hits, which is the simpler, and for girls and boys perhaps the better, way, excepting when a match is to be shot between clubs.

THE ARCHERY CLUB.

Since the revival of archery as a sport in England, about forty-two years ago, many clubs have been formed in that country, and recently some have been organized in the United States. Girls and boys may form archery clubs, and thus add a great deal to the interest in the sport. To do this a meeting should be held at which a simple constitution and by-laws may be agreed upon, and officers elected for a fixed period of time. A president or captain, a secretary, a treasurer, and a score-keeper, are officers enough. The membership may be fixed at a certain number, say fifteen, or twenty-five, as may seem best, and a suitable ground should be selected for the practice meetings. The captain of the club should have an alphabetical list of the members, so that each can be called to shoot in turn.

One of the most delightful features of archery is the match game between neighboring clubs. This is usually arranged by one club sending a challenge to another, after which committees from both come together and agree upon time, place, and the order of the game. Where there are from fifteen to twenty members in each club, the game must be limited to from thirty-six to forty-eight shots for each archer.

In the great public matches in England the gentlemen shoot what is called the York Round, and the ladies shoot the National Round. The former round consists of twenty-four arrows at sixty yards, forty-eight arrows at eighty yards, and seventy-two arrows at one hundred yards; the National Round is shot with twenty-four arrows at fifty yards, and forty-eight arrows at sixty yards. But the bows used by boys and girls are not strong enough for such long ranges, and, besides, the shorter distances will give more shooting and more pleasure. If but one range be used, I should advise the choice of forty yards, at least until the archers have become quite proficient.

In order that girls and boys may form a fair idea of what good archery is, I will now give some scores made at different ranges by some of the best shooters in England.

ARCHERY SCORES MADE BY ENGLISH WOMEN.

| Name | Distance. | Arrows shot. | Score. |
|------------------------|-----------|--------------|--------|
| Mrs. Hornblow | 50 yards. | 48 | 226 |
| Mrs. Piers Leigh . . . | 50 yards. | 48 | 244 |
| Mrs. Butt | 50 yards. | 48 | 299 |

ARCHERY SCORES MADE BY ENGLISHMEN.

| Name. | Distance. | Arrows shot. | Score. |
|------------------------|----------------|--------------|--------|
| H. A. Ford | 2 York rounds. | 288 | 1252 |
| C. H. Fisher | 2 York rounds. | 288 | 1060 |
| H. H. Palairat | 2 York rounds. | 288 | 932 |

At forty yards, shooting twenty-four arrows, a fair archer should score 120 points, a good archer 180 points, and an excellent archer 200 points. Shooting twenty-four arrows at sixty yards, Mr. H. A. Ford scored 188 points, the best score ever made at that distance; the next best, so far as I know, was my own of 176 points, though several English and American men and women have scored nearly as high.

It is very important to know how to take care of archery implements (or tackle, as archers say), for they are not only expensive, but easily injured by neglect or improper usage. Keep bows and arrows dry; the least dampness may ruin them. Never put the bow away without unbending it. Keep arrows straight by laying them flat in a box when not in use; this box should be furnished with cleats, or rests, to prevent the arrow-fathoms from being injured by pressure. The point on the bowstring where the nock of the arrow is placed in shooting must be kept carefully wrapped with soft silk floss. This serves two purposes: it prevents the string from fraying, and marks the true nocking point. Whenever an arrow strikes the earth it may become soiled with clay or loam, wherefore each archer should wear a heavy, soft woollen tassel at his belt, with which to rub the shaft clean; a bit of flannel will serve in the place of a tassel.

The limits of my space and time will not permit me to go into the minute details of archery practice. Whole volumes have been written on the subject, and a great deal of discussion has been indulged in by expert bowmen as to the best system of drawing, aiming, and loosing; but my own experience and the opinions of a majority of the best English archers coincide, and I have set before you as strong an outline as I could make of what appears to me to be the safest methods. After all, intelligent girls and boys will be pretty sure to fall into a graceful and correct habit of shooting. It is worth while to persevere in trying to excel in this beautiful sport, for, aside from the charm of its exercise, it is the best possible of all the means of physical training. It has been well said that it combines all the chief excellences of fencing, rowing, walking, and lifting, without any of the objectionable elements of either. I have never known of a persistent archer who was troubled with indigestion, sleeplessness, or any pulmonary disease. Furthermore, there is a fascination of antiquity, a long perspective, a fine, soft atmosphere, so to say, going along with our knowledge of a pastime which has existed ever since the days of King David, and our imagination helps us to fill in every space with suggestions of romance and of glory from the early history of England, France, and Spain; but, best of all, it takes us into the open air, and makes us as happy, as gay, and as healthy as the birds themselves.

A NAUTICAL EXPERIMENT; OR, WHO KNOWS BEST?

BY KIRK MUNROE,
AUTHOR OF "WAKULLA," ETC.

PART XXX.

THE boys ran aft to the very stern of the canal-boat in order that they might see the last of their beloved Nelly Bly; and as she was left farther and farther behind, the tears rolled down Harry's cheeks, big boy as he was; for the little boat had been a birthday present from his mother, and given to him only a month before. As they looked after her, a steam-launch, which they had not noticed before, left the opposite side of the tow and went rapidly up the river.

"Why, it's the launch from the bumboat," cried Harry. "Yes," said Nelson, "and, sure as you live, they're going to pick up the Nelly Bly."

They saw the launch stop for a minute, and then direct her course toward the now distant bumboat; but as the Nelly Bly was sunk too low to be distinguished above the surface of the water, they could not tell whether she had been picked up or not.

The captain of the canal-boat, who was a kind-hearted though rough-looking man, and who pitied the boys in their loss, now spoke to them for the first time.

"Don't ye cry, my little fellow; ye'll find her aboard the bumboat when ye go back, and I'll set ye ashore as soon as I have a chance."

"But we are not going back," said Nelson, boldly. "We are on our way to New York, and we came on board here to ask if you would take us there for a dollar."

"Sho!" said the captain. "Going to New York be ye? What may ye be going to do there?"

"Going to enlist in the navy," answered Nelson. "Going to enlist in the navy!" repeated the captain, slowly. "Wal, ef that ain't good! Wife, do you hear that?" he called down the companion-way.

At the call a rather good-looking but very fat woman, who seemed wider than the narrow stairway up which she came, made her way to the deck.

"What's that you say, Simon?" asked the woman, looking at the boys as she spoke.

"I said here's two young gentlemen as has been cast away aboard the Saucy Polly, and who says they is on their way to New York to enlist in the navy. What be your honors going to 'list as? Nothing less than commodores, I'll be bound"; and the captain turned toward the boys with a comical expression.

"For shame, Simon!" said the good-natured woman, who noticed the hot flush in Nelson's cheek, and the yet undried tears in Harry's eyes. "You ought to know better than to tease the poor boys so. Come with me, young gentlemen, and don't mind what he says; it's only his way." So saying, she led the way to the little cabin.

The cabin in which they now found themselves was no larger than that of the bumboat in which they had breakfasted that morning; but its neatness was in such striking contrast to the dirt and disorder of the other, that the boys thought they had never seen a prettier nor more cosy place. Red curtains hung before the tiny windows, and white ones were draped in front of the double bunks that occupied one side of the room. A little shelf of books and some bright pictures hung on the walls, and a round faced clock ticked merrily between the windows. An abundant and well-cooked dinner smoked on the scoured table, and to this the woman invited the boys to sit down, saying she knew "boys was allers hungry," and calling her own boy, whose name was Matthew, and who was the same who had first caught and then let go the painter of the Nelly Bly, to come and keep them company.

After dinner the boys went on deck with Matthew; but while he went forward to feed the two horses, whose heads were stuck out of the windows of their little forecastle-like stable, they lay down on some sacks of oats that were stowed in the after-hold, and began talking over their prospects. Although the subject was a most interesting one to them, tired Nature asserted her sway, and within two minutes both boys were fast asleep.

An hour later, Mrs. Tugby, coming on deck, found them there, lying close together, with Nelson's arm thrown protectively over Harry's neck.

"Poor little souls!" she said, half aloud; "how tired they be!" And going below, she procured from a locker beneath the lower bunk a thick robe, which she carried up and carefully spread over the sleeping boys.

All that afternoon and all the following night the boys slept, while the tow moved slowly but steadily on down the great river, past Haverstraw and Sing Sing, Tarrytown, Nyack, and Yonkers; past the grim old Pali-sades, and through the gray morning mists, down past the entire length of the sleeping city nearly to the Battery.

The sudden boom of a cannon, apparently close beside them, caused them to spring to their feet and look about them. Captain Tugby was talking in a very loud tone of voice to the captain of a little snorting steam-tug that lay alongside the canal-boat, and was too busy to be spoken to; but Matthew, whom they soon discovered holding on to the end of the tug's line, as he had held on to the painter of the Nelly Bly, was willing and glad to impart information. He told them that they were in New York, that the gun which had so startled them was the sunrise gun from Castle William on Governor's Island, and that the tug was about to take them from the rest of the tow, and put them in the dock for which they were bound.

In all this Matthew was right, and before breakfast-time the Saucy Polly was quietly moored in a West Street dock, beside a tall floating elevator, which was rapidly scooping up her load of grain and transferring it to the hold of the huge ocean steam-ship on the opposite side.

As soon as they had again complimented Mrs. Tugby by doing ample justice to her capital breakfast, the boys were anxious to go to the Minotaur, on board which they hoped to enlist as sailors, and Captain Simon, looking up from the morning paper, in which he had been reading something that seemed to afford him much satisfaction, said they might go as soon as ever they had a mind to, and that Matthew, who was well acquainted with the city, might go with them. "But mind you come back here and tell me and the missis how you get along; that is, if you don't have to go to sea in command of the ship this very day," he added, with a chuckle.

In the crowd of teams and people about Washington Market on West Street they would have surely become bewildered and lost if it had not been for Matthew, who pushed his way along with a sturdy independence, until he landed his charges safely in a horse-car going uptown.

So crowded was the street that the car was an hour in getting to Twenty-third Street, where the boys got out and walked to the river. Here they waited another hour, until 10 o'clock, when a steam-launch, manned by United States sailors, having the name Minotaur in gold letters on the front of their caps, came putting into the dock, and the boys stepped aboard.

A few minutes later they had climbed the high sides of the great ship, and found themselves standing, with their hats in their hands, before a fine-looking naval officer, in full uniform, in the captain's cabin of the Minotaur. This captain was also reading a morning paper, and as they entered he glanced from it to them, and back again to it several times before he spoke.

At last he said, "Are your names Nelson Bryce and Harry Teller?"

"Yes, sir," answered Nelson, much amazed that the Captain should know their names.

"YOU WANT TO ENLIST AND BECOME SAILORS, DO YOU?" ASKED CAPTAIN WILLIS.

"And you want to enlist and become sailors, do you?" asked Captain Willis.

"Yes, sir," answered Nelson and Harry together.

"Do your parents consent that you should do so?"

Nelson hesitated, and looked first at Harry and then at his hat, which he twisted nervously in his hands, before answering, in a low voice, "I don't think they do, sir."

"And do you think," said the Captain, rather sternly, "that we enlist boys in the United States navy who have run away from home and come to us without their parents' consent? And do you know," he continued, "what enlisting here means?—that it means hard work, and harder studying than you have ever done at school, and very little play-time, and plain fare, and keeping regular hours, and that, once enlisted, you would be bound to serve on board this or some other ship until you were twenty-one years of age, whether you liked it or not?"

"Would we have to study anything besides seamanship?" asked Harry, in rather a faint voice.

"Yes, my boy," answered the Captain, kindly; "you would have to study the very same books that you use in school at home, and you would be made to learn your lessons, too; and if you were lazy or idle you would be punished in a very disagreeable way."

Just then an officer, who had been talking with Matthew on deck, entered the cabin, and held a short conversation with the Captain in so low a tone that the boys could not overhear what he said. After he had gone, the Captain again turned to the boys and said: "Now, my boys, my advice to you is that you return to your homes as soon as possible. In course of time, if you are faithful and diligent in your studies, and still desire to go to sea, you may, with your fathers' consent, gain admission to the Naval Academy at Annapolis, where you will be taught to become officers; whereas, if you enlisted here, and served in the navy all your lives, you would probably never rise above the rank of seamen. Now you may go."

With their hearts in their mouths the boys made their way on deck, rejoined Matthew, and were conducted to the steam-launch, which quickly set them ashore.

"I should hate to be an ordinary sailor all my life, anyway," said Nelson.

"And I didn't know sailors had to study books," said Harry.

It was twelve o'clock when they once more reached the Saucy Polly, and here a great surprise awaited them. As they stepped on board, whom should they see but their fathers, standing on deck talking with Captain Tugby.

To say that the boys were overjoyed would be but a mild way of expressing their feelings. Harry threw himself into his father's arms, and even Nelson was not a bit ashamed to be kissed on both cheeks by his father, who said: "My dear boy, how could you cause your mother and myself so much suffering? She had made herself so ill with anxiety that when Captain Tugby's telegram came this morning, in answer to our advertisements in the daily papers, she was confined to her bed."

It was a happy quartette that reached the pleasant homes, far up on the Hudson, that night, and two of them were very penitent and grateful boys. Rover was there to welcome them, having found his way home in some mysterious way known only to dogs and other intelligent animals, and a few days later the Nelly Bly was recovered from Ben Stubbs, the bumboat man, upon the payment of a handsome reward, and was once more safely moored in the little boat-house at the foot of the lawn.

As Nelson bade his father good-night at bed-time, he whispered in his ear: "I think, after all, that fathers and mothers know what is best for boys."

WITCH-HAZEL.

BY MARGARET E. SANGSTER.

"PLEASE lay your tiresome work aside,
And don't be always reading."
With coaxing voice and kissing lips
My little love came pleading.
"I want you, please, to talk to me"—
The eyes were grave and steady;
So in my lap I took the lad,
And told him I was ready.

"Now if to-day a fairy came,
Her pocket full of wishes,
And offered you the singing leaves,
The talking birds or fishes,
Now, honestly, what would you choose?"
The baby frowned severely.
Then laughed, and lisped, "Oh, hurry, please,
Because I love you dearly."

"I think," I said, "if I might choose,
And fairy lord or lady
Should meet me in a summer wood,
Where all was green and shady,
I'd pass the pools with fishes by,
I'd pass the flowers blowing,
And pass the birds, to find the place
Where fairy trees were growing.

"I'd ask a light witch-hazel wand,
And, bearing it, I'd travel
All up and down this queer old world,
Strange secrets to unravel.
Quite brave and bright I'd wander on,
And never know repining,
The presence of an enemy
By my witch wand divining."

With puzzled eyes that suddenly
Grew wide with sunny vision,
My little man regarded me,
And spoke with quick decision:
"I think 'twould be a stupid wish,"
He answered, most sincerely;
"A horse to ride would be more fun."
'Twas his opinion clearly.

All day he scampered here and there,
With gleeful shouts outringing;
And as I heard his joyous laugh,
His sudden bits of singing,
I thought to childhood's eager heart
Witch-hazel's gift is present
To choose the good, to leave the bad,
To find all seasons pleasant.

BOYS WHO BECAME FAMOUS.

BY DAVID KER.

THE QUIET STUDENT OF BRIENNE.

THE sun was shining brightly on the old French town of Brienne one fine spring morning more than a hundred years ago, and the play-ground of the military school was all alive with the shouts and laughter of the boys who had just come scampering out pell-mell, while the young teacher whose turn it was to look after them stood in the quaint old carved doorway eying their antics with a smile of quiet amusement.

A simple, good-hearted fellow was young M. Pichegru, and a great favorite with his pupils, who always got through their lessons much better with him than with any of the other teachers. Little did he dream, as he watched the boys at their play, or drew mathematical figures for them in chalk upon his blackboard, that he was one day to change his threadbare brown coat for a general's uniform, to lead thirty thousand men to the conquest of Holland, and to end by being put to death by one of the very lads whom he was now teaching.

But Pichegru's smile vanished, and a very grave look came in its place, as his eye turned to a kind of arbor of trellis-work covered with twining creepers, in which, away in the farthest corner of the play-ground, a boy sat alone.

It was strange to see him there by himself, so silent and lonely, while all the rest were at play; but it was stranger still to observe what the occupation was which absorbed him so completely that he never heard the teacher's approaching footsteps, and never saw the tall figure standing beside him.

In one hand the boy held a book, in the other a sharp-pointed stick, with which he was drawing in the sand various strange figures that he seemed to be copying from the pages of the book before him, which was called Military Tactics. And as he drew them, his sallow face flushed, his deep gray eyes glistened with a strange light, and his thin lips—already curiously firm and hard for a boy not twelve years old—set themselves together like bands of iron.

The young teacher stole softly away again, with something very like a sigh. "A strange boy!" he muttered. "It's always the same thing, and he seems to find more pleasure in it than in any kind of amusement. Can he too, like me, have a longing to become a soldier? It would be strange if—"

But whatever his thoughts may have been, his words went no farther.

"See! there's 'the Spartan' at his work again," said one of the boys, pointing to the solitary figure in the arbor, whose haughty and unsociable ways had long since earned him the nickname which some of those who gave it to him afterward had terrible reason to remember. "What say you, comrades? shall we go and stir him up a bit?"

"No, thank you," cried another, pointing significantly to an ugly bruise on his own forehead; "I've had quite enough of stirring him up. He gave me that the other day just for disordering his papers, and I don't want another like it. When he's angered he's worse than a mad dog."

"Let's touch off our fire-work," suggested a third. "There's plenty of room here, and M. Pichegru won't mind."

This idea was voted a good one, and two of the older boys ran to fetch the huge fire-cracker which they had been manufacturing for several days past.

By some unlucky accident, however, the cracker took fire sooner than they intended, and exploded right in the middle of them, in a succession of bangs and flashes like the firing of a revolver. Some of the boys, in their flight, rushed headlong into the arbor, almost knocking down the studious boy inside, who sprang to his feet like a roused lion, and roared, in a voice worthy of a Russian emperor disturbed by a gang of peasants, "Wretches! how dare you?"

And down came his stick upon the heads and shoulders of the intruders in a shower of merciless blows, sending them howling back into the midst of the explosion from which they were flying, while M. Pichegru, drawn to the spot by the uproar, looked with a melancholy smile at the flashing eyes and inflamed features of his cleverest pupil.

"This boy will rise high," said he to himself, "but he will some day have a terrible fall."

He spoke truly, for that angry boy (in one of whose prisons Pichegru himself was to die a cruel death years later) was no other than Napoleon Bonaparte.

BY HOWARD PYLE,
AUTHOR OF "PEPPER AND SALT," ETC.

THERE were three nice, fat little pigs. The first was small, the second was smaller, and the third was the smallest of all three. And these three little pigs thought of going out into the woods to gather the acorns, for there were better acorns there than here.

"There's a great ogre who lives over yonder in the woods," says the barn-yard cock.

"And he will eat you up, body and bones," says the speckled hen.

"And there will be an end of you," says the black drake.

"If folks only knew what was good for them, they would stay at home and make the best of what they had there," said the old gray goose who laid eggs under the barn, and who had never gone out into the world or had had a peep of it beyond the garden gate.

But, no; the little pigs would go out into the world whether or no, "for," said they, "if we stay at home because folks shake their heads, we shall never get the best acorns that are to be had." And there was more than one barleycorn of truth in that chaff, I can tell you.

Well, they hunted for acorns here, and they hunted for acorns there, and by-and-by whom should the smallest of all the little pigs meet but the great, wicked Ogre himself.

"Aha!" says the great, wicked Ogre, "it is a nice, plump little pig that I have been wanting for my supper this many a day past. So you may just come along with me now."

"Oh, Master Ogre!" squeaked the smallest of the little pigs in the smallest of voices—"oh, Master Ogre, don't eat me! there's a bigger pig back of me, and he will be along presently."

So the great, wicked Ogre let the smallest of the little pigs go, for he would rather have a larger pig if he could get it.

Yes; and-by came the second little pig, sure enough.

"Aha!" says the great, wicked Ogre, "I have been wanting just such a little pig as you for my supper for this many a day past; so you may just come along with me now."

"Oh, Master Ogre!" said the middle-sized pig, in his middle-sized voice, "don't take me for your supper; there's a bigger pig than I am coming along presently; just wait for him."

Well, the Ogre was satisfied to do that; so he waited, and by-and-by, sure enough, came the largest of the little pigs.

"And now," says the great, wicked Ogre, "I will wait no longer, for you are just the pig I want for my supper, and so you may just march along with me."

But the largest of the little pigs had his wits about him, I can tell you. "Oh, very well," says he; "if the shoe fits, there is no use in hunting for another. Only have you a roasted apple to put in my mouth when I am cooked? For no one ever heard of a little pig brought on the table without a roasted apple in its mouth."

No; the Ogre had no roasted apple.

Dear! dear! that was a great pity. Now if the Ogre would only wait for a little while, the largest of the little pigs would run home and fetch one, and then things would be as they should.

Oh! the Ogre was satisfied with that; only let the little pig make haste. So off ran the little pig, and the Ogre sat down on a stone and waited for him.

Well, he waited, and he waited, and he waited, and he waited, but not a tip or a hair of the little pig did he see that day, as you can guess without my telling you.

"And now," says the cock and the speckled hen and the black drake and the old gray goose, "perhaps you will run out into the world and amongst ogres no more! Are there not good enough acorns at home for any three little pigs to eat?"

But, no; they were not satisfied to stay at home yet, for one day the smallest of the three little pigs said: "See, now, if one is afraid of the water, one will never catch any fish. I, for one, am going out into the woods to get a few acorns to-day."

Very well; the other little pigs were satisfied for him to go. And if he should meet the Ogre, just let him say this and that, and do this and so, and the chances would be that he would come off without harm to hide or hair.

So the smallest of the three little pigs went out into the woods, and there he found all the acorns he wanted. But on his way home whom should he meet but the great, wicked Ogre.

"Aha!" says the Ogre, "and is that you?"

Oh yes; it was nobody else. But had the Ogre come across three fellows tramping about in the woods down yonder?

"HAVE YOU A ROASTED APPLE TO PUT IN MY MOUTH?"

No; the Ogre had met nobody in the woods that day. Dear! dear! but that was a pity, for those three fellows were three wicked robbers, and had just hidden a meal-bag full of money in the hole up yonder in the tree. The Ogre might see the hole for himself if he would only look.

You can guess how the Ogre pricked up his ears at this, and how he stared till his eyes were as big as saucers. He was for climbing the tree without waiting for the butter to come, as we say in our town, for he wanted that money, and he had use for it. Only let the little pig wait for a minute or two till he climbed the tree, and he would be down again without longer stay than he could help.

So the Ogre laid his jacket to one side, and up the tree he climbed.

"Do you find the hole?" said the smallest of the little pigs.

Yes; the Ogre had found the hole.

"And do you find the money?" said the smallest of the little pigs.

No; the Ogre could find no money.

"Then good-by," said the smallest of the little pigs, and off he trotted home, leaving the Ogre to climb down the tree again as he chose.

One day it was the middle-sized pig who would go out into the woods, for he also had a mind to taste the acorns there. Well, there was no reason in the world why he shouldn't go; only if he met the Ogre, let him say and do this and that; that was all that was needed.

So out into the woods the middle-sized pig went, and there he had all the acorns that he wanted.

But by-and-by the Ogre came along. "Aha!" says he; "now I have you for sure and certain."

But the middle-sized pig just stood and looked at a great rock in front of him with all his might and main. "Sh-h-h-h-h!" says he; "I am not to be talked to or bothered now."

Hoity-toity! Here was a pretty song, to be sure! And why was the middle-sized pig not to be talked to?

Oh! the middle-sized pig was looking at what was going on under the great rock yonder, for he could see the little folk brewing more beer than thirty-seven men could drink.

So! Why, the Ogre would like to see that for himself.

Prut! There was nothing easier than to learn that trick! All that he had to do was to take a handful of leaves from that bush yonder and rub them over his eyes, and then to shut his eyes while he could count fifty, and he would see what he would see.

Well, that was little or nothing to do, and the Ogre would have a try at it. So he gathered a handful of the leaves and rubbed them over his eyes, just as the middle-sized pig had said.

"And now are you ready?" said the middle-sized pig.

Yes; the Ogre was ready.

Then all that he had to do was to shut his eyes and count. So the Ogre shut them as tightly as he could, and then began to count, "One, two, three, four, five," and so on; and whilst he was counting, why, the little pig was running away home again.

By-and-by the Ogre bawled out "Fifty!" and opened his eyes. Then he saw not more, but less, than he had seen before, for the little pig was not there.

And now it was the largest of the three little pigs who began to talk about going out into the woods for acorns.

"You had better stay at home and take things as they come. The crock that goes often to the well gets broken at last."

That was what the cock, the speckled hen, the black drake, and the gray goose said, and they thought themselves very wise to talk as they did. But, no; the little pig wanted to go out into the woods, and into the woods the little pig would go, Ogre or no Ogre.

After he had all of the acorns that he wanted, he began to think of going home again; but just then the Ogre came stumping along. "Aha!" says he; "we have met again, have we?"

"Yes," says the largest of the three little pigs, "we have. And I want to say that I could find no roast apple at home, and so I did not come back again."

"DO YOU FIND THE HOLE?" ASKED THE LITTLE PIG."

"THE OGRE SHUT HIS EYES, AND BEGAN TO COUNT."

Yes, yes, that was all very fine, but they should have a settling of old scores now. The largest of the three little pigs might just come along home with the Ogre, and to-morrow he should be made into sausages; for there was to be no trickery this time.

Come! come! the Ogre must not be too testy. There was such a thing as having too much pepper in the pudding. If it was sausages that he was after, maybe the pig could help him. Over home at the farm yonder was a storehouse filled with sausages and good things, more than two men could count. If the Ogre would talk no more about chopping him into sausages, the largest of the three little pigs would show him where this store-house was, and also a window where he could just squeeze through. Only the Ogre must promise to eat what he wanted, and to carry nothing away with him.

Well, the Ogre was ready to promise that, only there must be no more fooling this time. Now was the little pig sure that there was no trick in the matter?

Oh yes; the little pig was quite sure of that. So off they went together, the Ogre and the largest of the three little pigs. By-and-by they came to the storehouse at the farm, and there, sure enough, was a window, and it was just large enough for the Ogre to squeeze through without a button to spare in the size.

Dear! dear! how the Ogre did stuff himself with the sausages and puddings and other good things in the storehouse!

By-and-by the little pig bawled out as loud as he could, "Have you had enough yet?"

"Hush-sh-sh-sh-sh!" says the Ogre; "don't talk so loud, or you'll be rousing the folks and having them about our ears like a hive of bees."

"No!" bawled the little pig, louder than before; "but tell me: have you had enough yet?"

"Yes, yes," said the Ogre, "I have had almost enough; only be still about it."

"Very well!" bawled the little pig as loud as he could. "If you have had enough, and if you have eaten all of the sausages and all of the pudding you could stuff, it is about time that you were going, for here come the farmer and two of his men to see what all the stir is about."

But when the Ogre heard them coming he felt sure that it was time that he was getting away home again, and so he tried to get out of the same window that he had gotten in by a little while before. But he had stuffed himself with so much of the good things that he had swelled like everything, and there he stuck in the storehouse window like a cork in a bottle.

"Oho!" said the farmer; "you were 'Oho!' said the farmer; "you were after my sausage and my puddings, were you? Then you will come no more." And that was so; for when the farmer and his men were done with the Ogre he never went into the woods again, for he could not.

As for the three little pigs, they trotted across to the Ogre's house, and brought away all that they could carry; and that was a great deal, for there were stacks and stacks of money in the cellar.

Now don't you believe folks when they tell you that this is all stuff and nonsense that I have been telling you; for if you turn it upside down and look in the bottom of it, you will find that there is more than one grain of truth there—that is, if you care to scratch amongst the chaff for it. Besides, it doesn't always follow that a man is a simpleton because he winks with one eye and says "Boo!" And that is the end of this story.

"HERE COME THE FARMER AND HIS MEN TO SEE WHAT ALL THE STIR IS ABOUT."

A STYLISH TURNOUT.

OUR POST-OFFICE BOX.

ROSELIA HALL, NEW JERSEY, July 10, 1886.

DEAR POSTMISTRESS,—I have said that a good many pleasant acquaintances are made through the Post-office Box and the Exchange pages, but I thought some of the young people might be interested in the story of how I made one, and so I drop you a line to tell it. I wrote a little of this three years ago, when I was writing more or less for HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE. I was a good deal taken one day by a wonderfully frank, bright letter from an English lad. He wrote a little of his school life and of himself, and signed his note "Percy William S." After some considering, I decided that I should greatly like to include Percy among my correspondents, although I really do not dare to cipher out the alarming difference between our ages. Do you recollect my writing and asking you for the full name and address of your young letter-writer? Armed with this, I sent Percy William S. quite an epistle, in which I told him of my interest in English school life and the like, and that I should be glad to know more of his, and more about himself. I received a capital answer in three or four weeks. After a couple more letters, we were exchanged, and Percy and I began to feel quite familiar with one another's essential history, though we had only exchanged it within two or three months, and through three thousand miles of blue water would prevent our playing tennis together. Well, such was the starting of my friendship with Percy William S. Now letters go back and forth regularly. We are quite well posted on each other's affairs. I am tempted to think that I could pick Percy out at Exton's Square, or Flaring Cross, when the train brought me in, although the nearest we have come to seeing one another's faces is by photographs, which each party stoutly declares to be good. And in spite of my cathedrals and castles and noble paintings on the other side of the sea, I think that when, before long, I run over for a little while, one of the very dearest sights will be that of my English boy friend. Sincerely yours,
EDWARD DREXLER STEVENSON.

The plan of which Miss Georgie tells us is so very good that I hope it may be adopted by others. Will she not sometime send a budget of letters from the "Circular" to the Post-office Box?

BROOKLYN, N. Y.

DEAR POSTMISTRESS,—OUR SUMMER VACATION has commenced, and I fancy very few of us are sorry. Our school reception took place Thursday, July 1, and as I had been promised, and am now practising four hours a day in order to become an accomplished piano player. My correspondence has increased since I last wrote you, but my first and dearest has left us for her last home. My different correspondents seemed interested in each other, so we started what we call "the Circular." That is, I write a short letter and send it to one of my correspondents, who reads it, writes one, and sends the two to some one else, and so on. Then finally all comes back to me, and I take my old letter out, write another one, and send it in the same way as before. Our Circular is on its second year now. When I have written a letter, I sometimes have letters waiting to be read. "Our Circular" is trying to be a helper to the poor ones. We are now raising some money for the Fresh-air Fund, and are doing it in this way: Each member of your readers would like to raise societies for the benefit of this delightful Fresh-air Fund, which does so much good here. If any do false societies, will they be kind enough to report their progress in the Post-office Box of HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE, so that members of "our Circular" may see? We send "Our Circular" to any invalid girls who wish it, in hopes it may make them happy for some little time. Love to all. I remain your fond reader, GEORGE W. R.

NEW BRIDGEPORT,

NEW BRIDGEPORT,

DEAR POSTMISTRESS,—Dave and I have had lots of fun during our vacation. We had a protection. The boys of New Middleton have a debating society, and the ladies of the club debate semi-occasionally. The last one they had was on the subject of intemperance and usury. "Resolve which has produced the more good of far out of it too. I went blackberrying last week. Three girls besides myself went. We got a good many berries, and had a splendid time. We washed our faces, saw a watermelon, and sang some tired but happy. I practice from two to three hours every day, and have learned lots of pretty songs. I think "Kathleen Mavourneen" is just lovely. I love to read and write, and am interested in a book I can't rest till I've finished it. I'm reading A Knight of the XVth Century. I think it is splendid. I've read David Copperfield. I like his works too, but nobody can equal my dear Miss Louisa. Dave is so interested in the wheat harvest that he does not get in the house a bit, and I'm a little lonesome. Mamma embroidered a saddle-blanket for Dave, and it is very pretty. I don't care for anything but reading or painting or anything except books and music.

I Mildred Harcourt can find time for a European correspondence, and I'm the only one so delighted to hear from her. DAISIANS JUD.

MORRISTOWN, N. J.

DEAR POSTMISTRESS,—We are two sisters, fifteen and twelve, and have taken a name in the People since we have two cousins, and a black-and-tan dog called Topsy. We belong to a society of young people called "The Merry Workers," which lately held a fair for the benefit of the Children's Home, near Morristown; we cleared $20.50. Morristown is a very beautiful place; many people visit it in the summer. We spent a very pleasant Fourth of July. We would like to join the Little House-keepers. We think that "False Wives" are, and are anxiously waiting for the next number.

—ADDIE AND MAMIE J.

NEW YORK.

As I saw a letter from a friend, I wrote you the Post-office Box. I thought that I would write you the little girl signed herself Florence J. A number of letters have since been written, and she told me that she was a subscriber to the same paper. I did have ten canary-birds, but only four are now left, as one died, I sold one, and the others I gave away. The rest are "Cuddie, Dick, Baby, and Beauty." Floste, the mother, died. Beauty and Baby have laid lots of eggs, and I have sixteen in a row. Every Tuesday I look for my dear paper, anxiously.
MAMIE R.

ST. LOUIS, MISSOURI.

I am a little girl nine years old. I used to go to school every day, but it is vacation now. At school I had a domestic class, and I was reading and writing. I am in the Third Reader. I like HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE very much. I enjoyed reading "Miss Opportunity" very much. I like the letters the children write. I have a little black dog named Dandy, and an old cat that has four little kittens.
ALICE D.

MCGREGOR, IOWA.

Would you like to hear from one of your readers who thinks a great deal of HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE? I am twelve years old, and go to school here. I board with some friends, and live twelve miles from the country, and go to school at Edith, the little girl where I board, calls me her adopted sister. She goes home with me sometimes. I take music lessons of her sister. I have a cousin six years old, who stays at our house a great deal; she is very cute. I like to watch the birds, in which there are a great many about here. One morning we found a blue-jay caught in a steel trap set for rats. Edith and I always read the letters in the Post-office Box, and we would like to see our letters there.

—LILLIETTE C. A.

MCGREGOR, IOWA.

I thought I would tell you of a May party to which I went last May. One of my friends was there, and we had a grand party at our house. The party began at four, and lasted till six. There was a fine yard to play in. The drum corps was hidden behind the trees, and they played on their drums and lifes while we had a May-pole dance. The supper was very nice. We marched in to supper, a boy and a girl together. After supper we had a few games, and then we went home. Will you tell me what has become of Jimmy Brown?

EDITH F. D. (nine years old).

I have had no information concerning that interesting youth for some time, but as I told another little correspondent, I am always inclined to hear that he has mended his ways, and learned how to behave well.

My father is a florist. We have nine green-houses. I know many little girls who take HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE, but none who has ever written to you, or at least I have not seen any of their letters. I am very much interested in "Silent Pete," and think the new serial story will be very good. I began taking HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE last Christmas.

—GRACE S. (ten years old).

Where do you live, dear? You forgot to tell me.

MONTCLAIR, N. J.

Many times I have thought I should like to write to you, but never had enough courage till to-day, when I had a letter from you, and so to print it. Montclair is a picturesque little town, about ten miles from New York, and many people come here to see the view. I would like to have some girls of my own age correspond with me.
Your loving friend,

—BLANCHE H. CHANE.

GRAND GROVE, METACALFE COUNTY, TEXAS.

This is the third month I have been taking HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE. I live on the bank of Caney, six miles from the Gulf of Mexico. I have a mother, father, three sisters, but two others have had blue eyes and rosy cheeks. My father is a farmer; the crop looks very well, only we need rain. Papa does not know I write this.
LEZZIE F.

COLUMBIA, SOUTH CAROLINA.

My brother takes HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE, and it is the best paper I have ever read. I think "Silent Pete" is a nice story. For pets we have two dogs, a cat, two cats, and a darling little cat named Nellie. We have a doll-house in our yard large enough for people to go in, and there are forty-six dolls in it. We have it divided into little rooms, as follows: a parlor, a bedroom, kitchen, sitting-room, and an upstairs bedroom. I have a doll named Nellie, but two others, everything just like a real house. It is in a nice shady place, with a plum-tree near it, and is a very snug little place when it rains. I go to school to my first and second readers, and study grammar, reading, spelling, writing, and arithmetic. Papa gives me lessons on the piano. I am eleven years old.
MAMIE L. B.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.

DEAR POSTMISTRESS,—I am a little boy ten years old. I composed this little story, and would like to see it published, if you think it worth while. I have taken HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE constantly. I have no pets. This summer I expect to spend part of my vacation in Virginia.
RALPH H. F.

Here is the story, and a very good one it is:

THE NEW NOAH'S ARK.

Ding-a-ling-ding, and the basement bell sounded as if it would break off. Aunt Fanny opened the door.
"Does Master Bertie live here?"
"Yes, he does," said the maid.
"Well, give him this package."
Aunt Fanny took it, and went upstairs to Bertie's room. Bertie, called Aunt Fanny.
"Mr. M.," Bertie replied.
Aunt Fanny said, "Here is a package for you."

Bertie opened the door, and Aunt Fanny handed him the package. He opened it, and there stood a grand Noah's ark. Bertie's eyes sparkled with delight, and he began to stand up the contents of the ark: first Mr. Noah and his wife, next the dog and cat and lion, and all the animals except the duck, when pussy bounded from behind the door and swept everything up, saying, "May I play with Mr. Noah?" But Bertie said: "Stop! stop! Here, you can have my nice rubber ball and—"
 But after all, it was only a dream, and Bertie sat up in bed and rubbed his eyes, and said, "Well, I declare, that was very funny, I think; don't you?"
 R. H. H.

SYRAC, NEW YORK.
 I have taken HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE since 1882, but I have never written before. I live in Brooklyn, but I am spending the summer in my country with my aunt. Syrac is situated on the Hudson River, and is a very pretty place. Aunt Annie's house is a Queen Anne, and it has six acres of lawn, so you can see the river very well. There are a spring, a brook, a barn, a wood-house, and a great many trees. There are twenty-two chickens, four hens, and a rooster. My cousin Annie is writing to you, and she eleven in August.
 IDA C. T.

ALBERT PARK, MELBOURNE, AUSTRALIA.
DEAR POSTMISTRESS.—I am a girl eight years old. I have had four numbers of HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE. Like them very much. The stories I think best are those of Howard Pyle. I have for pets two par-dogs, and a third one died this May. I have a dog named Bessie, and she is dear little class. I go to school, and am in the third class. On my birthday we had a picnic at a place called Lyndale, at an old mill. It rained for the part of the day, but we had a good shelter, and enjoyed ourselves very much.
 RUBY L.

SYRAC, NEW YORK.
 I have never written to you before, but today I made up my mind to do so, and tell you how much I like your paper. We like the country much better than the city, but we have only lived there two months. We have three acres of land. We have two old hens that have baby chickens, and they are just as cunning as they can be. The little chickens are so fat, and so fat the old hen's back and steal a ride. My cousin Ida is writing to you. Ida and her little sister are staying at our house, and expect to stay all summer. My father is called Edith, and my mother Edith; she is six years old, and says very funny things. I am eleven years old, and I hope you will publish cousin's and my letter.
 Good-bye, with love.

NEWARK, NEW JERSEY.
 I live in Newark, a city ten miles from New York, which I have just visited. I crossed three times the Passaic, second the Hudson, and the third the Hudson, which is sometimes called the North River. I next went through a tunnel, which is over a mile long. I crossed the Passaic in a ferry-boat, and saw many steamers bound for Europe. Then I went up to the great Washington Market, which is the biggest in the city of New York. Next I went up Broadway, where I saw tall policemen and men with hand-carts, and miles of telegraph wires were over our heads. Next I went to Trinity Church, which I saw since the oldest town, which was founded in 1624, also the tomb of Captain Lawrence, whose last words were, "Don't give up the ship." Talked to some of the Exchange, who are men who were before you, would think the men were fighting. When I was in the Cotton Exchange, I walked to the roof, where I had fine views of the city, also of the Hudson, the Passaic Rivers, New Jersey, Staten Island, Brooklyn, and the great Bridge. Down the bay I could see the pedestal of the Statue of Liberty, and the great island there. General Hancock lived in Wall Street there is a statue of George Washington, who was called the Father of his Country, and who we still stand who is called General. He is President of the United States. Wall Street is full of banks; it is the greatest money street of New York. No messenger boys are seen in all directions, and everybody is in great hurry. In my next letter, I will tell you about Newark.
 ELLIS M.

I am much pleased with this letter, and I wish other boys would write in the same way, describing places and excursions.

PRICANAC, NEW JERSEY.
 My mother wrote to you when I was quite a little girl, and that time I was in the village near New York. I enjoyed my trip here very much, as the scenery was so different from that of my home. I had a very good time with my two cousins; one is a nearly boy of eight, and the other a young girl nearly seventeen. I went out riding to the telegraph station a few days ago, and when nearly there, the horse suddenly backed us into a ditch about six feet deep, nearly upsetting us by his plunging about. Cousin Nell called to a man near by to assist us, and to drive into the horse was quieter. As he got in the horse backed us into the ditch again, and while the man sprang to the horse's head my cousin and I jumped out, and walked the rest of the way; then we got in the buggy and rode away. The buggy was very nice, but every one said we were very brave not to scream. That evening we both decided not to go out driving unless my uncle were with us.

 BELLE C.

BROOKLYN, NEW YORK.
 I have taken your very interesting magazine for nearly four years, and I like it better every time. I am very fond of reading, and my favorite authors are Charles Dickens, Oliver Goldsmith, Bonham Carter, and Margery. I have solved many of the puzzles in the book. I have a little bird for a pet, and I have had him five years. When I had him first, he was so young that I had to crush his seed, but now he does that himself. He is very tame, and he plays dead bird.
 F. B.

NORWICH, MINNESOTA.
 I can write very much better with a lead-pencil than with a pen, so this is not my best writing. I have not half so many pets since I came down-town to live. I used to live on a farm, and I had a great many pets. We had three cats, two dogs, and three canary-birds. I am trying to tame a little kitten that is very wild; there are four other cats that they are afraid of. I am ten years old, and I go to school and study reading, writing, arithmetic, geography, and spelling. I am in the third room. My birthday was the 28th of April. For a birthday present, I received a croquet-set with four balls and mallets.
 LAURA W.

DORSET.
DEAR POSTMISTRESS.—I have taken HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE since January, and like it very much indeed. I read it through well, then send it to my aunt, who lives in the country. I like "Silent Pete"; or, the Snow-days." We are staying at Dorval for the summer; it is on the bank of the St. Lawrence, three miles from Lachine, and nearly opposite the Island of Dume, and is away down South, but away up North. We have a canoe called Scarlet Runner and a boat, and a cat called Fan. I hope you will send me a card. I hope you will be able to find a corner for this, as it is the first one I have written.
 I remain your loving reader,
 BEBE H.

LANSING, MICHIGAN.
 On June 15 Michigan celebrated its sesquicentennial. The scholars of three rooms in the High School (including our room) sang together. There were about one hundred of us, and we all had lodges. We had the story of the "Star Spangled Banner" and the "Hills and Vales Resound" and "Columbia, the Gem of the Ocean"; in singing the last we waved flags. My grandma made one of the speeches of the day. There were speeches in three places at the same time, and after that the people went to the fair grounds to the barbecue. Good-bye.
 EDITH C.

TOLEDO, OHIO.
 I have been taking HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE ever since it was published, and I like it very much. I have a black and tan dog and a violin for some time, and have just commenced taking them on the piano. My sister plays the piano, and my brother the flute. I would like very much to correspond with you, but I am only thirteen years, and I will answer all letters promptly. My favorite authors are Charles Dickens, Miss Austen, Mrs. Lillie, and Our Mutual Friend is the best book I ever read.
 ADELE WATSON,
 57 Franklin Avenue.

PHILADELPHIA, PENNSYLVANIA.
 I have a big Scotch colly, whose name is Don, and we have a black and tan dog and a violin. Before we got Don I had a cat named Tiger, which greatly disliked dogs, and General was afraid of her, for she would hit him with her paws, and jump out at him whenever he came into the kitchen; but the day before Don came Tiger died. I went to a picnic a few days ago. We got in Schuylkill to Wisconsin, and on one of the steam-boats that run up and down the river, and on the return trip we got off at Belmont, and had a very good time. Two or three weeks ago I went to see the cyclorama of the battle of Gettysburg. It is in a large circular hall, and it is so large that it is like a mountain. We went through a dark winding passage, up some stairs, and came out upon a round platform, which is supposed to be the top of a hill from which the battle is seen. All around us I think the painting is wonderful, for it seems as if you could see miles and miles away, while the canvas is really only forty feet away from you. The canvas is fifty feet high and four hundred feet around. The space between the painting and platform is filled with earth, and cannon balls, rusty swords, and soldiers' coats and hats are lying here and there. When we went out of the building it looked very funny to see only the city streets, when a few minutes before we had been looking far over the open country. Your friend,

A LIVELY CAR-LOAD.

I THINK we all have an idea what a disturbance an exasperated hive of bees can cause; but an occurrence that took place upon a western-bound railroad train the other day will surely make those of us who were so happy as to be at a remote distance from it shout with laughter.

Farmer N—— was frugal and thrifty, and disposed to make the most of everything he had to do with. He was accustomed to packing a single car for market once a week, and great was his pride in filling it with all the appetizing dainties his farm could produce. On this occasion, with the help of good Mrs. N—— and nephews Fred and Jack—for he had no sons—he had packed the car almost full of oats and hay, butter and milk, eggs and vegetables, of the best and freshest kind. But still there was room, and in that room Farmer N—— deposited two hives of bees, with all their accumulated store of honey.

Now these particular bees were entirely unaccustomed to anything else that could contribute, that the train could finally go on.

What the freight agent and conductor reported to Farmer N—— on their return trip I leave you to imagine, but since then you may be sure that that worthy man has sent no more bees by rail.

A DIFFERENCE OF OPINION.

"CHERRY ripe!" cries Robin, singing merrily,
"Round and red and rosy, hanging from the tree.
"Cherry ripe!" cries Baby—"ripened there for me;
For, you see, my Papa owns the cherry-tree."

"No, no!" cries Sir Robin; "that can never be.
Wherefor were my winglets given, then, to me?
Baby's feet are clammy, cannot climb the tree.
The cherries for the birdies must surely, surely be."

CANOEING ON LAKE GEORGE—THE RENDEZVOUS OF THE FLEET.—SEE "CANOE TALK," PAGE 650.

CANOE "TALKS."

BY THE COMMODORE OF THE NEW YORK CANOE CLUB.

I.—THE CHOICE OF A CRAFT.

AFTER many long and animated discussions of various plans for spending their vacation, the Archer boys, Ben, Aleck, and Bob, finally decided that they would rather take a canoe cruise than do anything else.

Although their father was willing they should try it, he could give them but little advice, as he knew even less of canoeing than he knew of any other sport. Mrs. Archer thought it must be the most dreadfully dangerous sport in the world, and wondered why boys could not be contented with safe amusements. They could not go to their uncle Harry for advice this time, for he was far away on the Plains. How should they set to work to become canoeists?

At length Ben exclaimed: "I have it, fellows! Mr. Russell, my Latin master in the High School, is a canoeist, and I'm sure he'll tell us all about it."

"The very ticket!" shouted excited Bob. "Let's go and see him first thing in the morning."

As the next day was Saturday, there was nothing to prevent their making an early call upon Mr. Russell, who was only too glad to give them the benefit of his experience as a canoeist, and encourage them to engage in what he considered the most enjoyable of all out-of-door sports.

"Uncle Harry gave us 'talks' about camping out," remarked Aleck, "and we took notes of what he told us."

"That was a capital idea," said Mr. Russell, "and if you will go down to the canoe club-house with me, and take along your note-books, I will give you some 'talks' on canoeing."

"We've brought them with us," said Bob, "so as not to lose any time."

When they reached the club-house the boys gazed with amazement and delight at the rows of dainty canoes with which it was filled. Above each were neatly stowed its paddles and sails.

"Why," exclaimed Ben, "I always thought canoes were all alike, and all made of bark; but now I don't see that they are made of bark at all, and they all seem different."

"Yes," assented Mr. Russell, smiling; "they are quite different from each other; in fact, you will seldom find two exactly alike in model or rig. Originally canoes were of three kinds, the decked kayak made of bone and skins, the birch-bark, and the dug-out, but in the construction of civilized canoes the very best boat-builders and the finest material are employed, and as a result they are the lightest, strongest, and most seaworthy of all small craft. Improvements and changes are being made so rapidly in their model and rig that now, instead of the original three, we have nearly fifty styles of canoe to choose from."

"I don't see how on earth we are to choose the best from among so many," sighed Bob, as he gazed with a perplexed air at the beauties surrounding him.

"In the first place," said Mr. Russell, "you must decide whether you want a canoe for paddling or sailing, cruising or racing, or for open or inland waters."

"For paddling," said Bob, who was fond of muscular exercise.

"For sailing," said Aleck, who had recently made a voyage to China with his parents, and considered himself a very salt and tarry sailor man.

"For both," said Ben, who, older and wiser than the others, foresaw situations in which both methods of propulsion would be useful.

"For cruising on inland waters," said all three.

"Good!" exclaimed Mr. Russell. "I see you have already made up your minds upon several of the most important points we have to consider. Now for the note-books."

When they were all ready he continued:

"The fifty varieties of canoes of which I spoke may all be found in four families or classes:

"1. The open paddling canoe, of which the 'Peterboro' is the best example.

"2. The decked paddling canoe, such as the 'Rob Roy.'

"3. The light sailing canoe, under which class comes the 'Nautilus' and its numerous modifications.

"4. The heavy sailing canoe, of which the 'Pearl' is a good type.

"The last-named we need not consider, as it is too heavy to be easily paddled, and is only suited to rough, open waters.

"The first or 'Peterboro' class is a smooth-bottomed, keelless canoe similar in shape to the birch-bark, but much lighter, tighter, and stronger. It will hold more passengers and 'duffle' than any other canoe, and can be easily carried over land. It is easy to paddle, sails fast before the wind, and is the best craft in the world in which to shoot rapids.

"The 'Rob Roy' is a light, decked, paddling canoe, which will hold only one person and a very limited cargo. Everything in her can be kept perfectly dry, and with an inch of keel and a small sail she develops very fair sailing qualities in smooth water.

"A canoe of the 'Nautilus' type, twenty-eight to thirty inches wide and fourteen to fifteen feet long, with a flat floor, and provided with a folding centre-board, is the very best all-around cruising canoe that is built. She will carry one person comfortably, and two upon a pinch. Her air-tight compartments make of her a life-boat which cannot sink. She paddles easily, and is a good sailer, though her speed is somewhat retarded by the folding centre-board, and beneath her decks and hatches is ample dry storage-room for everything that a canoeist ought to carry on a cruise.

"At night the owner of a 'Peterboro' can draw it up on the beach, turn it upside down, and thus make for himself a dry, comfortable shelter from the heaviest rain-storm.

"The 'Rob Roy' man must pitch a little tent on shore, as his canoe will neither hold nor cover him.

"The owner of a 'Nautilus' either hauls her ashore or anchors in deep water, hoists a canoe tent above his head, and unfolds his mattress in the roomy cockpit. In this tiny floating palace he can cook, eat, read, and sleep, bidding defiance to cold or wet. If any man or boy desires more luxury than this, he is not intended by nature to be a canoeist.

"Here ends 'talk' number one. Now think over what I have told you, and make up your minds what canoes you will choose for your summer's cruise. If you will meet me here at four o'clock next Monday afternoon, I will tell you something about 'Paddles and Upsets.'"

"SANTA CLAUS'S SUMMER OUTING."

BY KATHERINE D. McILVAINE.

"MAMMA," said Jack, "when's my birthday?"
 "On the 23d of July," said mamma, who was tying on her bonnet, "and to-day is the 21st. Now how long shall you have to wait before you are eight years old?"

"Only two days!" cried Jack, with a warwhoop of delight. "It will be on Wednesday. Oh goody!"

"Is it my birthday too?" asked little Elsie.

"No, dear; yours doesn't come until next winter. Don't you remember your last one, when you had a cake with four candles, because you were four years old?"

"I want plums in my cake," said Jack. "Elsie's was just that old white kind that we have all the time, made big. I want plums in mine. Say, mamma, what are you going to give me for my birthday. I want something awful nice."

"Well, what, for instance?" asked mamma.

"Oh, a velocipede, a pony, skates, and lots of things."

"Do you hang up your stockings for birthdays?" inquired Elsie.

"Oh no, indeed; Santa Claus only comes on the night before Christmas. Good-by, duckies," said mamma, going down stairs.

"I s'pose Uncle John 'll give me something for my birthday. He ought to, 'cause I'm named for him, and I just need lots of things," said Jack. "Say, Elsie, I'm a-going to do something. I'm going to write to Santa Claus, just as we do at Christmas, and tell him what I want, and that I think he ought to come now if I hang up my stocking. You get me that blue pencil out of mamma's basket while I get some paper."

Obedient Elsie proceeded to upset mamma's work-basket on the floor, while Jack opened all the drawers in her writing-desk in search of paper.

"I guess she won't care when she knows what I want it for," said her son, as, successful at last, he spread out a sheet of Irish linen note-paper on the floor for convenience. Then he stretched himself out, and began to write in large sprawling letters. Elsie, on her hands and knees, watched him with deepest interest.

"There, now, it's done," he said at last, feeling very warm and tired. "I don't think I've forgotten a thing." He sat up on the floor and read it aloud to Elsie. "There, Elsie, I think that's all."

"Yes, that's all," echoed little Elsie; but her voice sounded very queer, and there was a big break in it. Jack looked up and saw her digging her little fat white fists into her blue eyes, and two big tears rolling down her cheeks.

"What's the matter, Elsie?" he exclaimed. "What you crying for, honey? You're just the sweetest baby in the whole world. Don't you cry," and Jack pulled her down into his lap.

"Oh, Jack," sobbed Elsie, "you've got a birthday, and a Kismas, and a stockin', and I haven't got a single fmg.," and little Elsie cried forlornly.

"Never mind, Elsie," Jack was beginning at the same time, wiping her eyes with the skirt of her dress, when in hurried Mammy Phoebe.

"You, Mars Jack," she exclaimed, catching Elsie to her broad bosom, "what you doin' ter dis yer chile? You better min' what you's up ter, sah! I's gwinter tell mamma er you, sah, ef I ketches you up ter any er yo' monkey shines, teasin' ob sister. Come on, honey, don't you pay no sorter 'tention ter him; jes you stay in de nu'sery wid yo' own of mammy. She ain't gwinter let no boys fool wid her honey-bird."

"Fshaw, mammy! I wasn't a-bothering her. She's just a-crying 'cause I've got a birthday 'stead of her. I wasn't a-doing nothing: was I, Elsie?"

"N—o," said Elsie. "But you are going to have a birthday."

"Jes you wait a thousand minutes, honey, you get some er his party," said mammy, consolingly, as she bore off her charge.

Jack sat still on the floor thinking. He felt very sorry for Elsie. "I can't make it her birthday if it ain't," he said to himself.

Then a brilliant idea occurred to him. He opened his letter, seized the pen, and wrote. "It's a first-rate thing to know how to write," he said, proudly. "I can write anything I want to. There ain't nuch good going to school, but there's some."

He was searching in the desk for a stamp when his mother returned from her drive.

"Why, Jack," she said, "what are you doing in my desk? I am afraid you are a naughty boy to get into mamma's things that way!"

"Please, mamma, don't scold me; I'm looking for a stamp. I've been writing a letter to Santa Claus to come on my birthday like he does on Christmas. Don't you believe he will, mamma?"

Mamma couldn't resist the eager little face. "I don't know," she said; "perhaps he will. Give me the letter, dearie, and I'll give it to papa to post for you after dinner." "I'll give it to him myself," said Jack.

That night Santa Claus sat in his cool ice palace. Evidently the postman had just been there, for he held Jack's letter in his hand. He laid down his pipe on the table beside him, and began to break carefully the many seals with which Jack had fastened it. Mrs. Santa Claus looked on and fanned herself with a great flowered fan, for even in an ice palace one feels July weather. Just then the door opened, and Santa Claus's brother-in-law John came in.

"How are you, old fellow?" said Santa, genially. "Is it warm enough for you?"

"Plenty, thank you," returned the brother-in-law.

"What's up now?"

In answer Santa Claus read as follows:

"Now I call that a modest and sensible letter," said Santa Claus. "What do you two think?"

"I rather think you'll have to go, Santa Claus," said his wife, waving the big fan.

"I'm afraid to," said the old gentleman, stroking his beard. "I might melt."

"Every one expects to melt in July," said Mrs. Santa Claus.

"The reindeer have never been out in summer before. I'm afraid they'd be utterly unmanageable, and the idea of a sleigh in this dust!"

"Take the village cart," suggested Madame.

"Those reindeer are just eating their horns off for want of exercise," added the brother-in-law.

"I'm afraid my health won't stand the trip with all that load to carry down the chimney. A pony and a pup, a knife with a corkscrew, and a velocipede."

JACK WRITES HIS LETTER.

"Oh, I'd trust the velocipede to Uncle John. He ought to be good for that or he's good for nothing," said the brother-in-law.

"I never heard that he was good for much," said Mrs. Santa Claus, with a laugh.

"Don't you think, dear," she continued, "that a knife would be rather dangerous for a boy as young as our friend Jack W. Clinton?"

"Well, no," returned Santa Claus. "I don't think so. He has had a good many knives before now; the first thing he does is to cut his fingers, the second is to lose the knife. His risk is soon over."

"That is true," said Mrs. Santa Claus; "but you must not forget the 'girls things' for little Elsie."

"I'll see what I can do," said the old gentleman, lighting his pipe.

It was very early on the morning of Jack's birthday, and Jack lay awake in his little room, which opened off his mother's. The gray dawn was creeping in through the closed shutters. He could see through the open door the foot of Elsie's crib and the bureau on the opposite side of the room, and the corner of the mantel piece. Yes, he could see his stocking, too, hanging on the brass hook by the fire place. He was quite sure it looked full, so he sat up in bed and strained his eyes. There were surely some big things standing on the hearth underneath it.

"He's been here!—he's been here!" shouted Jack, tumbling out of bed, and rushing to his stocking.

"Oh, Elsie, look here! it's just stuffed! Say, Elsie, wake up; here's something for you; here's a doll in my stockin' right on top."

"Why?" said little Elsie, scrambling down to the foot of the crib and looking over. "I haven't got any birthday, Jack."

"Yes, you have, or, anyway, Santa Claus brought you a doll, and these dishes must be for you too," pouring them in on top of her. "And, oh, papa! please open the shutters, or light the lamp, or something; I can't see my things half. What's this? Here's something. Oh, it's alive! It ticked my hand. It must be my pony, or my goat, or my monkey. I can't find it. Oh! do look here, mamma! If it isn't a pup! The loveliest pup! Look at his tail, Elsie! He's got the cutest tail!"

"Will he bite?" asked little Elsie, timidly.

"Bite!—no; he's just too tame! See him lick my hand! See his little red tongue! The roof of his mouth is black. That's a good sign," said Jack, examining.

"Did you ask Santa Claus to bring me a new doll and some dishes?" asked Elsie.

"Yes; I thought he wouldn't want to come and not bring a thing for you. Oh, here, I've got a velocipede too. I just wanted one!"

"Uncle John sent you that," said his mother.

"Oh, did he? Won't I have fun with it! I thought he'd give me something!"

As the day wore on the slight fear that Elsie had at first shown for the black-and-tan puppy, whom they called Snip, wore off, and she seemed to have developed a taste for teasing heretofore quite foreign to her gentle nature.

"I think," said Elsie's papa, "that we will tell Jack that Snip is to live in the yard entirely, and the children can play with him there."

And so it was settled. Jack placed the box in which Snip came under a maple-tree in the yard; then he got a large rope from the barn, and tied Snip to the tree.

"You see, mamma, he might get away," he explained.

"He never will from that rope," she thought, despairingly, and then reproached herself for grudging her children their pet.

When Snip was exercised he grew perfectly frantic. He tore around the garden like a mad dog, over the flower beds and under the shrubbery, dragging Jack after him, Elsie trotting on behind trying vainly to keep up. Finally they would all stop from sheer exhaustion, Snip panting violently, and with his red tongue lolling out of one side of his mouth, to the intense horror of Mrs. Clinton, who always felt sure that he must have hydrophobia.

There was a young man who lived across the street who used to insult Jack by asking him ancient and hoary conundrums, such as, "Why does your dog wag his tail?" and "Why is a dog's tail like the heart of a tree?" and Jack felt that this young man was a serious drawback to his happiness. One day the young man made a new one: "Why is your dog like the sea?" he asked.

"I don't know, and I don't want to," said Jack, impolitely.

"Why, because he's tide [tid]!" See?" said the young man, and after this Jack hated him worse than before.

But one sad day Snip gnawed his rope in two, and ran away. Many and bitter were the tears shed by Jack and Elsie. They felt that even the conundrum young man would be supportable if only they had Snip back again.

He was gone three days, and then was brought home, looking rather thin, by a stout butcher boy, who demanded five dollars reward. Mamma paid it, and that very afternoon Jack went out and bought a long chain, with a padlock, so that in future if Snip wanted to get away, he would have to gnaw down the maple-tree.

That night little Elsie raced so with Snip that she fell asleep in the hammock long before her bed-time.

"Mamma," she whispered, as her mother lifted her out for mammy to carry off to bed, "aren't you glad dear old Snippy's found? He's so sweet!"

AGNES'S NEW FRIENDS.

"ARE you ready, my dear? We are a trifle late, I'm afraid."

The speaker was a tall, plainly dressed girl who held a roll of music in her hands, and was standing at the open door of a little room in Cream Street, Boston.

The room was furnished as meagrely as possible, was without fire or the means of making one, and the only intimation of life about it was the figure of Agnes Leigh standing disconsolately in one of the windows.

Thin and pale, and in a black dress and bonnet, with no touch of color about her, the young girl looked very different from the little would-be music teacher of Hildcom. All look of hopefulness seemed to have departed. There were signs of actual want about the lines of her face and in the languor of her movements, but as the girl in the doorway spoke, something like a smile touched her face, brightened it for just a moment, as she answered, "Oh, thank you, I am quite ready." And taking a book of music, she followed the other down the stairs. How Agnes came to be lodging in this uptown street in Boston, how she had a day or two before obtained the position of accompanist at the rehearsals of a theatrical company, is a story quickly told.

* Begun in No. 347, HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE.

"AGNES LOOKED IN DISMAY AT THE MANAGER'S FLUSHED FACE."

Finding herself utterly friendless in Halcom, and hearing of her father's sudden death, she had returned to Boston to seek her only brother and acquaint him with the failure of their cherished plans, with the gloomy fact that her letter to Mrs. Mostyn never had been answered.

Rob Leigh was employed in a large store down-town at a very low salary, and he listened to his sister's story with genuine distress.

"You see, Agnes," he said, despondingly, "it was foolish for you to have tried, and poor father did not live, after all. Still, we must see what we can do," added the young fellow, unconsciously of the selfish ring in his voice; but Agnes had deliberately opposed his wishes in going to Halcom instead of taking a place which he could have procured for her in a store. The child had felt so sure of "getting along." She sat in the room Rob shared with three or four young people employed as assistant book-keepers in the establishment, discussing in low tones what could be done, finally deciding that she had better have a room in the same house with her brother, where the Hamiltons, honest-minded people, who were connected with a theatre, would, as the boy thought, look after her in a friendly way.

It was Rob's hour for lunch, but he suggested their going at once to the Hamiltons' house. "You see, Agnes," he said, as they threaded their way through innumerable and crowded streets, "Mr. Hamilton is a dancing-master. He trains children for the spectacular dramas, and that sort of thing, and it might be he would find something for you to do. I do not mean to dance, of course," the lad added, seeing Agnes's look of horror, "but something in the playing line. We'll see what can be done."

The walk had seemed long to Agnes when Rob stopped before a small house with a sloping roof, and in one of the lower windows a card with the following inscription:

J. J. HAMILTON,

Professor of Dancing.

Maitre de Ballet.

The door was opened to the young people by a tall, brisk, dark-eyed girl of about sixteen, to whom Rob introduced his sister, and who led the way upstairs to a large, bare front room, where an elderly lady and two young girls were busy over some theatrical-looking costumes. Mrs. Hamilton welcomed Agnes cordially, and assented to Rob's suggestion that she should have a little back room upstairs, Rob agreeing to pay for it for at least a fortnight; so Agnes's new life began.

The Hamiltons were busy people: three of the children danced at the Strand Theatre in a sort of pantomime and burlesque extravaganza which was drawing crowded houses, but which, it seemed from all accounts to Agnes, afforded but little fun to the performers. Mr. Hamilton going and coming with the children, who returned after midnight worn out, cross enough, and hungry. The eldest daughter sang in the chorus, and earned her six dollars a week by very hard labor, made harder still by the fact that most of the house-work at home devolved upon her. Twice a week scholars filled the front room, and the scraping of Mr. Hamilton's violin was heard while he instructed two classes in the art of dancing. With all of this hard work, however, with the constant self-denials which Agnes observed in the little household, it was difficult to make both ends meet, and many times when she shared their simple meals the girl wondered how they contrived to live at all.

Suddenly Robert had an offer to go out West, and, with characteristic disregard of his sister, he had started off, assuring her, it is true, that in a short time he would make his fortune and return; but a terrible sense of loneliness and dismay had filled poor Agnes's heart when she found herself so entirely alone in the great city. The Hofmeisters were with friends in Connecticut, and Agnes knew that in their run-down condition of health and purse it would be cruel to let them know of her position, and so she had struggled on, not even allowing the Hamiltons to guess how entirely her courage was failing her.

Two weeks before this, Mrs. Hamilton had come home from the theatre in radiant spirits, and had sent for Agnes to share the family supper in the little back parlor, where the working and resting hours of the family were spent. An appetizing odor of chops and coffee greeted Agnes as she entered the room, and Mrs. Hamilton announced to her at once that she had secured her a place.

Rehearsals for the play to be brought out in Christmas week were coming on. A young lady had been playing the piano accompaniment for the time, but that afternoon she had been obliged to leave Boston, so the place was vacant.

"Fifty cents a day, my dear," announced Mrs. Hamilton: "and here's the music for you to look over. You can go over it with Sarah, and you ought to jump at the chance."

To poor little Agnes it did seem a great "chance," although the first morning spent at the theatre had confused and bewildered her, and now, as she accompanied Sarah, she began to wonder if she could ever accustom herself to her surroundings. They had to go in, of course, by the side entrance; thence they passed across the auditorium of the theatre, where in the dim light two or three interested spectators, friends of the manager, were seated. As the two girls made their way behind the scenes, Agnes could not help wondering what those who saw only the splendors and illusions of evening would think were they to come upon the scene as she saw it then.

CHAPTER XI.

BEHIND THE SCENES.

THE passageway led back of two private boxes, thence by three rather rickety steps down into a narrow, high-roofed place where scenery was piled up, daylight coming in in pale rays and lighting up a gaudily painted tree, a bank of flowers, and a flight of what was intended to represent in the evening a gorgeous marble staircase. Twenty or thirty people were upon the stage, laughing and talking in groups as they waited for the manager; some of them cast half-contemptuous glances at the sombre little figure in shabby dress, as Agnes nervously crossed the stage with Sarah Hamilton and took her place at the piano. The instrument was placed just at one side, behind the scenes, and the fact that it was in a strong draught made no difference at all to the manager, whose whole thought was of his own convenience. That morning it seemed to Agnes as though she could not control the movements of her fingers. Seated before the piano, she looked out listlessly across the stage, where some of the chorus girls were waltzing about, others in an undertone humming over their parts, while two or three of the "principals" were engaged in discussing the play, and questioning certain directions recently given by the manager.

It was tiresome business. Mr. Gordon, the manager, took his place in the centre of the stage, Mr. Hamilton, as superintendent of the little dancers, being ready for his call. The chorus took their places; the principals, for the most part holding their books in their hands, came forward, and the rehearsal of the first act began. It was a fair spectacle, and fifty young people, of various degrees in years as well as poverty of appearance, rushed forward with the first steps of the dance—a really pretty chorus, which would be their part nightly to perform. But over and again were they interrupted by the manager shouting, "Go back, go back; begin again; what do you mean by such gibberish?" or, "Will you learn, you three girls at the end, to come forward at the right time?" or, "I never saw anything so idiotic; I will turn you all out before I will stand this sort of thing."

As these and other remarks intended for correction were hurled at them, Agnes wondered how they could bear it. Her own turn would come now and then, when Gordon would say, sarcastically, "Be kind enough occasionally to look at your music," or, "Some of these young people seem so deaf, you had better play louder."

The moment any part was over, those who had been performing would fall back with a tired, worn-out look, little groups forming, while for the most part the conversation going on was of things connected with the theatre.

"Christmas indeed!" one tired-looking girl of about fourteen was saying. "I'd like to know what kind of a Christmas we're going to have. Gordon says he wants a rehearsal before the first performance."

"Have you seen any of the costumes?" inquired another girl of the same speaker. "I understand we are not to have them until Christmas Eve. Like as not they'll all have to be gone over even then, so I don't think we need look forward to much of a holiday."

And then Agnes heard some one else saying, "What are they going to do about little Jennie Alger?"

"I am sure I don't know who there is to take her part. And so sudden, too!"

A moment later Agnes saw the manager in conversation with a tall, pale girl of about fourteen, who was half crying as she talked.

"I can't, sir; it's no use; you will have to get a substitute for a night or two anyway, Mr. Gordon," she was saying. "My cough is so bad I should not be here now."

Sarah Hamilton joined them, and in a moment the manager approached Agnes.

"See here, my good child," he said, somewhat more politely. "You know the music by this time, and we are in a fix about little Jennie Alger's part. It is nothing much—just the chorus and one or two verses and a few lines. Sarah Hamilton says she will help you, and I would like you to go on in it to-morrow night."

Agnes looked in dismay at the manager's flushed face, stern with annoyance, and Sarah Hamilton's whisper of "You must not refuse" kept her tongue tied for a moment; but her senses returned, and she tried to falter that it would be impossible, she would not know what to do.

"Good gracious!" Mr. Gordon exclaimed, angrily. "A little girl like you ought to be thankful for the chance. I only gave it to you because Sarah said you wanted it. I assure you a dozen children here would jump at it."

"That's all right, Mr. Gordon," said Sarah Hamilton. "She will do it splendidly, I know." And as he moved away, she continued, in a kind tone to Agnes: "My dear, don't think of saying you can't do it. Papa will teach you—it will only be for a night or two. You really must not think of saying no. You have seen Jennie Alger often enough as the first fairy, and she'll come around to our house and help you with the part."

"But," pleaded poor Agnes, "how can I? Why, Sarah, I've never even been to the theatre three times in my life."

Sarah laughed. "That's no matter; I'm sure you will do it all right enough. Come, now, at last we can get home and have a bite of something to eat."

Poor Agnes! Already whatever illusion there had existed about the delights of the theatre for those taking part in the performance had vanished; but now a new hardship was confronting her. What would have been her sensations, we can wonder, had she looked in upon certain Halcom households that evening. It was the day, so eventful in Fanny Pierson's life, when she and Louise had lunched with Mrs. Mostyn, and driven with the kind-hearted though determined old lady from one house to another where Agnes had been dismissed.

HINTS FROM A CHAMPION SWIMMER.

WHEN a duckling waddles out of the egg into a puddle, it knows how to swim about as well as its mother, and a young frog just freed from his pollywog tail can sit on the bottom of the pond with his eyes open, and be as much at home as the oldest croaker in the swamp. But a boy is not so lucky. When he first gets into deep water, his instinct is to splutter and cough and yell, to scramble out if he can, and if not, to go to the bottom.

Probably most of the boys who read this have long since overcome the habit of sinking to the bottom, and a good many, no doubt, are able to make even the most expert frogs green with envy. But all will be glad to listen to a little good advice from Gus Sundstrom, the champion long-distance swimmer of America, and the man chosen to teach the muscular members of the New York Athletic Club to swim as they ought to swim. Mr. Sundstrom gives his lessons in the big bathing-tank at the club-house, and spends most of his time in a bathing suit.

In nine cases out of ten, Mr. Sundstrom says, a boy who wants to make a first-class and scientific swimmer should begin by forgetting what he already knows, so as to learn over again in the right way. The first thing to master is the BREAST STROKE.

That is the stroke which frogs use, and always have used, and it seems to be the natural way of swimming. Imitate a frog as closely as you can, and you will need no better teacher. But a frog's legs and feet form one straight line, and his fingers are fastened together so as to form a very fine paddle. Hold your fingers close together when you strike out, so as to imitate the webbed feet of a duck; and when you draw up your legs for a fresh kick, be careful to straighten out your feet, so as to avoid the resistance of the water against your insteps. In kicking out, strike the soles of your feet against the water, as though you were pushing yourself up in bed. Spread your legs far apart as you kick, and then, when they are fully extended, comes an important point in swimming. Do not jerk them up for another kick, as ignorant swimmers do, but draw them tight together, as though your legs were a pair of shears with which you wanted to cut the water. By thus closing your legs on the water you will add almost as much to your speed as by the first kick.

Kick out as your arms are being extended for a stroke, and draw up your legs while making the stroke. That is the moment at which to get your breath, as the water is then smooth in front of you, and less apt to get into your mouth. It is well to accustom yourself to breathe only at every third stroke, as it will help you very much in rough water. It is important to draw the breath in quickly, and so breathing through the mouth, which ought not to be practised in other exercises, is good in swimming.

FLOATING.

When you have learned to swim on the breast correctly and strongly, learn to float. Begin by taking in a deep breath, and then draw up your knees and place your hands upon them, squatting in the water. At first you will sink, but by-and-by you will float in that position, with the eyes just above the level of the water. That will accustom you to holding the breath. Then swim ahead with the ordinary breast stroke, and while well under way, suddenly give a reverse stroke with the hands. This will throw you upon your back, and by working the hands with a corkscrew motion you will keep afloat. If you are alone, you may swallow a good deal of water in learning unless you keep your mouth shut; if you have any one to support you, it is very simple. Do not try to raise the head and keep the ears out of the water, as you cannot float in that position. Lie perfectly flat and straight, and in a natural position, as though stretched upon your back in bed. In swimming upon the back the legs do most of the work. Kick out with them as in the breast stroke, and paddle with your hands at the same time to keep afloat. When you become expert you can learn to swim very rapidly on the back by stretching your hands straight out above the head, lifting your arms from the water to do so, and then bringing them down to your sides with a long, powerful sweep through the water.

DIVING.

You will perhaps learn more about diving by watching a good diver than by many lines of printed instruction. Do not try to dive from a height at once, but begin about a foot from the surface of the water. Keep the feet together, and stretch the arms straight out before you, with the hands together and the palms downward. The hands should always strike the water first, to save the face from striking against any dangerous object in the water. When you first start, have some one hold your ankles. Then fall simply forward, without any jump, and let the friend who holds your ankles give them a slight toss, so as to send you down head-first and prevent you from striking upon the stomach. Draw a big breath while you are in the air. Close the eyes as you dive, but open them as soon as your head is under water. Accustom yourself early to being under water with your eyes open. It is very necessary, and will not hurt the eyes. You will soon learn the knack of diving, and accustom yourself gradually to different heights. Use your outstretched hands as a rudder. Keep them pointed downward as long as you wish to go down, and let them start upward when you want to rise.

SIDE STROKE.

First, for the side stroke underhand. You lie in the water upon the left side, half of your head being under water, and your face turned round toward the right shoulder. The left hand shoots out above the head, under water all the time, while the right arm is extended along the body. For the first stroke bring the left hand down with a powerful sweep until the fingers are just above the left knee; at the same time shoot out the right hand, and bring it back to the original position with a shorter sweep. The arms are thus made to work alternately, and while the right arm is being pushed ahead, the legs kick out, catching the water on the insteps. This stroke, which permits of very fast swimming, should be practised on either side.

The best stroke known for long and rapid swimming is the overhand side stroke. The position is the same as in the underhand, and the principle is the same, with one exception. While swimming on the left side, instead of pushing the right hand ahead under water, and making but a short stroke with it, it is lifted out of the water and thrown far ahead, not touching the water again until it is fully stretched out. It is then brought down to the body with a long and very powerful sweep. There is a stroke, known as the "porpoise stroke," in which the swimmer reaches around with his right arm as far as possible back of his head so as to get a longer sweep. The power of the stroke may be increased, but the swimmer is fully half of the time under water, and that way of swimming is very exhausting.

FANCY SWIMMING.

Any one who has mastered the strokes already spoken of is a thorough swimmer, and for practical purposes needs nothing more. With the ability to dive from a height, float, and swim strongly, he can always take care of himself. But there are endless feats in fancy swimming that all boys long to master. In diving alone there are innumerable variations. There is the farmer's dive, in which you jump with the legs doubled up, and strike the water with the shins. The efforts to keep from turning a somersault are very comical; and there are all the amusing dives that can be made from a spring board. Practise a little until you learn to take advantage of the springiness of the board, and then watch good divers. You will soon learn all that they know if you are not afraid to try—somersaults in the air, long and high diving, and all. The backward somersault is easiest to learn, but in practising never fail to hold the hands so that they will strike the water before the head does.

But "fetching," that is, going a long distance under water, is good practice, and a few words about it may be of interest. Take a regular dive, without any upward jump, but sharp into the water head-first, and with a good start forward. Allow your body to go down about three feet under water, and then swim straight ahead with the breast stroke. Do not make the movements too quickly, because, instead of making you go farther, it will cause you to lose breath much more rapidly, and diminish the length of your "fetch." Keep your eyes open, and use your hands as a rudder to keep you from rising or from sinking too far. After a few trials you will know instinctively how to keep at the right depth, and then your expertness will depend upon your ability to hold your breath.

A 'SCURSION.

BY MARY GAY HUMPHREYS.

THE thermometer had stood among the nineties all day, and the sun had gone down a red ball of fire. The seventy children that lived in the tenement-house swarmed on the pavement and in the little court in the rear, and the mothers held their sick babies on pillows in the windows, that if a chance breeze from the river came wandering up the street it might rest on their pallid faces.

Selina and her six brothers and sisters lived with their father and mother in three rear rooms on the top floor. There all the stifling odors from below rose, and all day long the tarry roof above soaked in the sun's rays. Although the little black room in which the children slept steamed like an oven, Selina had coaxed them to come to bed.

"It's early to bed and early to rise," she sang, as she learned it at the industrial school, and the children tumbled in, feeling that in some way they would wake in the morning with a penny in each hand. Poor little things, they tried so hard to sleep, and Selina to amuse them with songs and stories she learned at school! But even she, the stout-hearted motherly little sister, grew faint and sick with the fierce heat.

The sound of the children's voices from the street made the little ones restless, and while Selina tried to reconcile their misery and discomfort from the virtue of going to bed at eight o'clock, John had slyly slipped out. Now he came dancing in, his torn slip dripping with water: "I's feelin' dood; I's feelin' dood."

"Oh, it's water, Selina," said Janey, with awe. "John, where did you get water?"

"I climbed the sink and let her go, I did."

Janey and Teddy both ran, and before Selina could catch them they had climbed up into the iron sink in the hall and drenched themselves.

The janitor's wife saw them, and chased them with a broom, for water is the greatest luxury of a tenement-house.

"A-wastin' it on their little hides!" she exclaimed.

The Guild agent for District 19 had a telegram that evening: "The Staubam can't go. Collect a lot, unclassified, for to-morrow."

"There's seventy at Old Brimstone, and fifty-five at Tom Dickey's," he said, counting up on his fingers. "I'll go to Old Brimstone first."

As Selina, escaping from the clutch of the janitor's angry wife, ran crying down the stairs, the agent came into the hall.

"What are you crying for, sis?"

"The childer got into the sink to get cool, and wasted the water on 'em."

"Tell them to-morrow they can have the ocean for a bath-tub."

Selina ran to the court, picking her way among the prostrate children. "Teddy, Janey, we're goin' on a Guild 'scurSION to-morrow."

John sprang up in his clinging wet slip. "I'm a doin' a-swimmin'!" his desires increasing with his prospects.

There was not an Italian or Bohemian on the ground but had heard of the Guild. What it was they did not know, but they did know it was liable to appear when least expected, and could command at least one day of brightness and pleasure for every child, however poor and distressed—a day in which sandwiches never failed, and cups of milk were unnumbered.

Oh, the joy of it! The great barge spread her flags. The little Italian, Pole, Bohemian, German, Irish, for the time sailed under his own banner. The little tug snorted and tore through the water. In her wake came the barge. It was like going to sea in a great two-storied portico. The mothers watched the purple fade out of the babies' faces fanned by the fresh breezes. The children screamed with delight, and ran from side to side. Among them all who so happy as Teddy, Janey, and John? Teddy, with a string tied to a stick, fished with zeal. "I'm a-doin' a-swimmin'," said John, and laid himself on the deck, and swam as well and fast as any boy can do out of the water. "Selina, is that Ireland?" asked Janey. "Daddy said it was over the water, and green as green"—pointing to Staten Island.

Oh, it was a new world of great steamers, ships with sails all spread, yachts with spotless sails, and spiteful, noisy little tugs darting to and fro. Living their little lives within a dozen blocks of the water, they now journeyed to unknown countries over unknown seas. To them the great hotels of Coney Island and Sandy Hook Light-house were more than the castles of the Rhine and the wonders of Switzerland to the readers of the YOUNG PEOPLE. The children ran to see the great Coney Island Elephant, but Selina looked away out to sea. She had seen the sky with clouds floating above her between the straight rows of bricks, but for the first time looking over the pathless water, away, away until the skies came down to meet it, she realized something of the greatness and majesty of the world in which she lived.

The sea was quiet. Still the water-tank had been carefully kept shut during the sail, and however thirsty the little mouths might be, no drop of water was allowed to disturb the serenity of little stomachs unused to life afloat.

"Oh," cried Janey, "what clean dirt!" spying the shining beach. "Will they let us walk on it?" thinking of the clipped lawns in the Central Park.

It would have required a platoon of policemen to prevent it. The announcement of present and immediate buns and drinks caused them to pause a moment. Then they spread over the beach like sand-flies. Those who had on shoes and stockings took them off. The boys rolled up their trousers, and the girls pinned up their skirts. In half an hour the beach looked as if it had been burrowed by myriads of little animals.

"I'm a-doin' a-swimmin'," said John, and walked into the water. The bathing-master brought him out.

"Not yet, little man," then John was laid out on the beach to dry. Selina threw herself by his side, and Teddy and Janey, with spade and shovel, working like ditchers, buried her under the soft, warm white sand. How delicious it was to lie there, to see the smiling sky, to watch the tireless waves chase one another up the beach, and to hear only the sound of happy children's voices! How unlike the sounds and scenes of Old Brimstone!

The tide was now slowly creeping up the beach. Not even the feast that was to follow, with its unaccustomed goodies, exceeded the delights of the bath. Oh, if the janitor's wife could now see the children of Old Brimstone rolling, ducking, splashing in the water! The mothers dipped the little ones, and held their little bodies out as breakwaters for the waves to dash against.

"I am a doin' swimmin'," said John, striding in, and the bathing-master held him on his open palm, while John struck out like a sea-urchin, and felt himself moving through the buoyant water.

"Time!" shouted the attendant. "Now, children, play, play, run, jump, until you drip with perspiration instead of water. Then you shall have your dinner."

Thus one happy moment succeeded another all day long, and until the little ones for once in their lives began to weary from sheer happiness. Then the little tug shrieked like a bad child. The mothers gathered up their babies, the children were marshalled by kind, thoughtful hands, and the barge darted away. There was less noise, less laughter and chatter, but none the less happiness. Before the sun set, the children were again home at Old Brimstone and Tom Dickey's; but they had brought with them the sea, the sky, and a host of memories such as sweeten afterward even the hardest lives. Does not John say to every one he meets, "I've been a-swimmin'?"

RIGHT ANGLES AND BEAUTY.

A TALE OF THIBET.

BY JULIAN MAGNUS.

GRAND LLAMA, who was one of the immediate ancestors of the now reigning monarch, ascended his jewelled ivory throne when he was very little more than sixteen years old. The young Llama was not at first invested with the full powers of government. He was assisted by his late father's chief councillor, Raet-Thang, a very wily old gentleman who combined in his sage cranium most of the knowledge of the Indian and Chinese schools.

The superintendence of the finishing of the education of the young Llama was a great anxiety to Raet-Thang, although the actual details of the work devolved on two accomplished masters. In most of his studies the young Llama made satisfactory progress, but he seemed to be entirely unable to conquer even the simplest problems in geometry. When the day in each week appointed for that lesson arrived, the Hereditary Great Lord of the Goats was often missing. He was not too proud or dignified to play truant. But even in Thibet there are truant-officers, and an exploration of the capital, Lhasa, in which is the chief palace, would generally result in his discovery.

Thus matters went on until the time when the Llama became of legal age, and still even the rudiments of geometry were unlearned. Raet-Thang was in despair. He had put to death two professors who had failed to impart their knowledge to their sovereign, and, strange to say, a satisfactory successor could not be prevailed upon to accept the position. On the day succeeding the ceremonies incident to the Llama's attaining his majority, Raet-Thang approached his sovereign, and suggested that he himself, the wise chief councillor, should try to explain the difficulties of the hated study.

"Go on; I will listen," answered the Light of the Sun, with a calm indifference, which rather surprised the aged noble. Still he endeavored to appear calm, and, taking up the last lesson, set forth in his most persuasive tones and clearest phrases the qualities of a right angle, and the constitution of its equivalents.

"Stop!" presently thundered the irate monarch. "I'll have no more of it. For years the right angle has been to me a trial and an abomination. I am now a real Llama. I will hear no more of right angles. There shall be no more right angles."

Raet-Thang listened with wonder and dread. He felt that his sovereign was making himself ridiculous, but he did not dare to give vent to so early expressed a thought.

"But, Gracious Ruler of the Stars," he at last ventured to say, "it is impossible to do away with right angles; they are a fixed fact in nature."

"What do I care about nature? For what am I Grand Llama if my will is not absolute? I have said it; there shall be no more right angles. Why shall I not be obeyed?"

"Tamer of the Wild Elephants," faltered Raet-Thang, "each man's house has right angles, so have his rooms, his boxes, his shelves, his papers, his chairs."

"Let the corners be rounded off, like unto the playing-cards of the far Western barbarians."

"THERE SHALL BE NO MORE RIGHT ANGLES."

"But, Silver Radiance of the Moon, the people's noses are, or should be, at right angles with their eyes, and their mouths at right angles to their noses."

"Let them twist them to one side. The right angle is an abomination, and is condemned. Issue my royal mandate ordering its disuse under penalty of five goats of the second year for the first offence, and death for a repetition."

Then, waving his hand to command silence, the Grand Llama strode off toward his private apartments, where none dared follow him, and as the door closed on him, Raet-Thang caught faintly the fatal words, "There shall be no more right angles."

The next morning the citizens of Lhasa were startled at finding proclamations fastened up in all prominent places. They who could read perused the documents with fear and grief, while others, less educated, waited till some one would read aloud. Then there came groans and cries, rending of garments, and throwing of dirt and ashes—those ancient but still preserved signs of sorrow. Yet no one dreamed of resistance. The power of the Llama was unlimited, and his ability to enforce it unquestionable.

The proclamation, as nearly as its flowery Oriental phrases can be translated into English, read as follows:

To the faithful and well-beloved subjects of the Grand Llama,
Light of the Sun, Silver Radiance of the Moon, Gracious Ruler of the Stars, Tamer of Wild Elephants,
Father of all Fishes,
And Hereditary Great Lord of the Goats.

Unto me, your sovereign and master, is the form known as a right angle an abomination. It shall be no longer. Its existence is an evil. There is to be no more of it; for it distracts my royal eyes and offends my imperial nostrils. To the ignorant be it known that a right angle is the corner of a square. In one month of the moon, or twenty-eight days from this day, no house, room, case, shelf, box, street, or any other thing whatever, shall have square corners; but instead the extremities thereof shall be rounded off. And each and every one of you is commanded so to alter his belongings as to be agreeable to your loving ruler, under a penalty of five goats for a first neglect, and death by the sword for a repetition.

Moreover,

As each person's nose and mouth may be at right angles, he or she must henceforth twist them to one side. The Grand Llama, in his great wisdom and mercy, permits to each a choice of sides.

The proclamation in due time reached every portion of the kingdom, and bitter was the suffering caused thereby. The expense of altering houses and rooms was great, and those persons who were poorest in worldly possessions seemed for once to be happier than their rich neighbors. A few who were careless or obstinate were fined and beheaded, but the Llama showed no signs of relenting.

The people were crushed beneath their heavy burden, and the strange expression of their twisted faces seemed to add to their woes. Even the babies' faces were noticeably crooked. No man dared to go directly across a street, but bore to one hand or the other, and if he carried an umbrella, slanted it over his shoulder.

Raet-Thang watched the temper of the people closely, for he feared an outbreak. At any moment he felt that some unexpected occurrence might cause a riot. While he was watching and fearing, the climax came from an unexpected quarter. Despatches reached him stating that a Russian traveller, accompanied by his daughter, had penetrated to Ateaze, and that they refused to twist their faces or to pay the fine of ten goats.

THE EFFECT OF THE PROCLAMATION.

"THEN TWIST" THUNDERED THE LLAMA."

Raet-Thang was afraid of Russia, and knew not what to do. He felt this was a national crisis, and that the Llama must not be kept in ignorance. The tyrant proved to be stern and fixed as he gave his decision: "They must twist or die."

"But, Light of the Sun, Russia is getting closer and closer to us. She defends her sons, and her warriors are many and fierce."

The Llama took time to think. "Let them be brought before me," he exclaimed at length. "When they behold me they will tremble and obey."

Raet-Thang despatched fleet couriers to bring the prisoners to Lhasa. On their arrival he saw them, and through an interpreter urged their obedience to the law. The man was disposed to yield, but the girl refused to distort her beautiful features, which were of a type never before seen in Thibet.

The next day they were brought before the Llama. "Barbarians," he said, "death is the penalty for entering upon the sacred soil of Thibet. But in my great mercy I will forgive you and afford you safe escort if you obey my laws, and cease to offend me with your straight faces."

The male traveller, who had passed through many strange experiences, stated his willingness to obey.

"Then twist!" thundered the Llama.

The traveller screwed up his face, and begged his daughter to do the same.

"No, papa," she answered; "not for a horrid old chief of goatberds."

"What does the maiden say?" asked the Llama.

"Mightiness, she is obstinate," replied the interpreter.

"Maiden," urged the Llama, "death will follow refusal. You are young to die. I give you till to-morrow to repent."

At a sign from the throne the prisoners were led away.

On the following morning, when Raet-Thang found that the girl was likely to remain obstinate, he again ventured to impress upon his sovereign the danger of irritating Russia.

"I care not for Russia," he cried. "She can never reach me here."

Then the old councillor felt that only the girl's submission could save her life.

The prisoners were brought in.

"Maiden, have you reflected and repented?"

The court stood in breathless silence till her answer came: "I will not distort my face."

The Llama looked at her attentively, attracted by her courageous bearing, and even pitying her youth.

"Maiden," he exclaimed, "have you thought of the death that awaits you?"

"I have," she answered, boldly. "I would rather die pretty than live ugly."

Her father gave a groan of agony.

All present waited in horror for the signal that was to condemn her to instant execution. It did not come.

The Llama's eyes seemed to devour her face. For some minutes he did not speak. Then he sighed and said: "Maiden, you are right. You are indeed beautiful. All right angles are not objectionable. I forgive you, and invite you and your father to be my guests. Raet-Thang, you may rescind my proclamation. Right angles are no longer an abomination."

Raet-Thang sighed a sigh of relief, and whispered to his secretary, "The laws of nature are stronger than the laws of tyrants."

"Yes," he answered, "and the power of beauty is great."

ONE OF THE PENALTIES OF A HIGH POSITION.

OUR POST-OFFICE BOX.

THIS is the gala time for trips and excursions, as our correspondents prove:

NEW BRIDGETON, PENNSYLVANIA.

I have just been on a camping expedition down the Ohio River, and I thought I would write and tell you all about it. A pleasant party started on the 30th of June, about five o'clock, and reached the mouth of the Beaver at 5:30, after having covered the boats over the dam. We ate dinner at Phillips's Island, and camped that night at East Liverpool, Ohio. We slept that night on boards with knots on them, and it made our backs very sore. A wisp of three o'clock fog, and it was still up until morning. We put up our sail and started off again, and that evening we reached Port Homer, about forty miles from New Brighton, and we staid there until Tuesday, when we started up against a strong current near the Towhead Islands. We ate dinner at Yellow Creek at three o'clock, and camped that night a little below Wellsboro. The next morning, as Winfield was chopping some wood, he cut his foot in to the ankle bone, and he had to wear his father's boots. That night we camped on a farm above Industry, and got home on Friday evening at eight o'clock, as tired and sunburned as we could get to out of the trip. The friends we went to visit through the locks, the water being too low, and we rode home in the doctor's buggy. Among the incidents of our trip, I would like to mention that I had a cup of milk in one hand and a piece of bread in the other, and the hammock was behind him, and he tripped and fell backward, and threw the milk into the water bucket. After his feet were shooting down by the river, and came back with a serious face, and said there was a sand-snipe for dinner, but it was a little sparrow. Mr. H. came home on the train.

I am going to Chautauque Lake soon, and will write and tell you about it as soon as I come back.

FRANK B. W.

You must certainly fulfil this promise, Frank—ways enjoyed, and even the mishaps will be subjects for merriment as you talk over your good times.

OAKLAND, CALIFORNIA.

DEAR POSTMISTRESS,—I have been away in the country, and now am going to tell you all about my delightful trip. The friends we went to visit live about sixteen miles from Oakland, in Maroga Valley. My mother, brother, and myself started on Friday, June 21st, and took the train for Oakland. When we were all seated in the wagon, the gentleman took the reins, and off we started, the horses going at a brisk trot, knowing that what they were going home. After riding four miles or so, we pass through Hay's Cañon. This cañon is very pretty, high hills rise on both sides, and in smaller hills, and the mountains are still smaller hills of lay ready to be brought into a barn to be stored away for winter use. Here and there you can see a farm-house, with a barn, out-houses, and an orchard. Attached to the kitchen of one of the farm-houses I passed, what do you think I saw? I don't suppose you can guess, so I'll tell you. I saw a box of letters. I saw a number of boxes nailed on the outside of the kitchen, and in a box or two I saw a hen; these boxes were used for the hens to lay in, just think of it!—I almost makes one's heart stand still to gaze out the side of the mountain, because in some places it is nearly perpendicular. It takes an experienced driver to drive down the mountain, because of the many curves and sharp turns.

Leaving the mountain, we pass through Redwood Cañon; this cañon is filled with campers every summer, and much prettier than Hay's Cañon. At or near the mountain one of the horses hurt its leg, and so fast driving was out of the question; therefore we were late, and it was already dusk, and the gimmer of the camp fires looked like leopards lights guiding us home. But the white tents looked somewhat ghostly, with the wind softly moving the thick foliage of many trees backward and forward like many beckoning hands. Many of the camps had names, one being "Nob Hill." It was a small tent, situated on a gently rising knoll. They had cut red-wood logs, and made a fence, and this United States flag fluttered in the evening wind.

We next passed through Maroga Valley. We heard the sharp barking of some sneaking coyote, the howling of an owl, and the sad cooing of a mourning dove. In a few minutes we drove up to the door, alighted, and were received by the dogs with much welcome and growls of suspicion, until our friends stopped the noise, and we were taken to our rooms. After dinner we were weary, and retired early. I woke up at three in the morning, and I could not go to sleep again. Four o'clock struck, I could stand it no longer; I hastily awoke my friend, and told her I was going to get up. She did the same, and few minutes after we sailed forth. The sun was just peeping over the mountain-tops. We saddled two horses, and went for a long ride. We came back at six, and went for the horses, we rode all over the hills, and at last drove them all into the corral. We then went into the house, just in time to get ready for breakfast. They had cut the sled out to go to take the hay in. It was delightful to climb on top of the hay and sink away down. At four in the afternoon we again went for the cows, and then for a five-mile ride down the road.

I had a glorious time, and only wish all who read this letter could have as pleasant a trip and visit.

CALVIN C. KILPATRICK.

PEER ABNOY, NEW JERSEY.

DEAR POSTMISTRESS, We began talking HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE in 1883, and we like it very much. We have a dog, an English setter, Rex is his name. He is a very fine dog, and he is very white I am writing. He is a lovely dog. We give him a bath almost every day in the sound back of the house. When we throw a stick for him, he jumps in after it and brings it back to the person who threw it for him. He can jump over a stick from three to four feet high. Almost every day he goes to the hands-on his head. He is a very intelligent animal; if you tell him to find his master, he is off in a second to do so, and always finds him. You would have laughed to see him run on the Fourth of July. We could get him no farther than the door, and the minute a cracker went off he would rush upstairs and go under the first door he came to, stay there an hour or so, and then would venture out again.

MABEL.

WASHINGTON, D. C.

DEAR POSTMISTRESS,—As I am in the national capital on a visit, I will try to describe to the readers of the YOUNG PEOPLE the beauties of this interesting place. From Alexandria, about eight miles distant, you can see the Washington Monument, and the big wheel. The monument is the highest edifice in the world, being 555 feet high. They will not allow you to ascend it without a permit from the superintendent, Colonel Casey. The capital is free to all. It requires patience to climb to the dome, but if you do reach it, you feel repaid for all the weariness it has caused you to feel on the way. In this town there are also two pillars. It looks like an immense panorama spread out. Looking one way you can see the beautiful Potomac and the Capital. The monument is the which is the principal street. Descending, you enter a town in the door of which is a stone; if you stand on this stone and talk, you can hear the bells of all the churches in this town there are also two pillars. You can place your ear on one and hear what a person says on the other end of the room, and can converse on the same as if by a telephone. From the Capitol to the Botanical Gardens is but a short distance. In the gardens is almost every tropical plant that can be raised. I have been twice to the Smithsonian Institution and National Museum. An Englishman named Smithson founded the Institution. The Museum has been newly furnished and rebuilt. It contains many interesting curiosities, and I think that the curiosity collectors who take the YOUNG PEOPLE would nearly go wild if they could only see the things they seen the Art gallery yet, but I intend to go there.

MARK P.

MILWAUKEE, WISCONSIN.

I am a girl fifteen years old, and have no sisters or brothers. I have written two letters to you before, but none of them were published. I have taken HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE almost five years, and like it very much. I have been to the "Fete," or the "Stowaways," but was very sorry poor little Pete had to die without seeing his aunt Nannette. I like Mrs. Lillie's stories and what she would only see them when seen the Art gallery yet, but I intend to go there.

"Mr. Timothy Tenynson Tupper Von Burns Was no poet, as every one knew, But that he had his poetical turns, Was well understood by all."

I live near Lake Michigan, in a very pretty part of the State. I have been to the city, and I had one of the nicest lake cats that ever was. She could sit up and beg like a dog, and do a great many things, but we had to part with her when we moved here, so we gave her away. I went to a picnic on the 5th of July, and had a lovely time.

STELLA.

ISLAND PARK, OPPOSITE TORONTO, CANADA.

I live on the Island opposite Toronto. During the summer months it is very nice, and so cool. I go in for a bath every day, and go boating in the evening. I have many friends, and I play a little piano, learn to read, drawing, music, and English. I like reading the letters in the Post-office Box very much, and would like very much to see some of the little girls would write to me. If they will, my address is 93 Brock Street, Toronto. I am thirteen years old. GERTIE M.

GOHSEN, NEW YORK.

My mamma is writing for me, because all my letters are not made perfectly, although I am seven and a half years old. I have written this paper at Christmas, and I thought it was almost as good as a little sister, for I haven't any sister. I have a little sister, but she is very old, and the oldest one is the dearest one. Her name is Mammie, and the names of some of the others are Gracie, Elsie, Bessie, Kitty, Alma, Mabel, Ruth, Annie, Helen, Lizzie, and Tony, and a dark rag doll; she is my white doll's nurse. The other day our mother kitty brought us five cunning little black and white kitties. She found a piece of money for them on the shavings around the cistern. Now they are living in a basket, but they will soon be over the side of that and out into the big world. Hussy you got my letters? Do you ever have letters from Goshen? I would like to send one to you now and then, if I can get it.

ETHEL E.

Of course you can get in, and I have more little girls than I can count on my fingers. You are one of them, dear, though I have never seen you.

St. LOUIS, MISSOURI.

I am a little girl twelve years old. Last Tuesday was my birthday. I received five letters, and I had a very nice party. My mother and grandma has a very pretty place in the country, where I go very often and spend a few weeks, and has a dog named John. My sister is called Daisy. I always follow me around wherever I go, so of course she is my favorite, and Shep is my brother's. May I belong to the Little House-keepers? Here is a receipt for HONEY CANDY.—One pint of white sugar, water enough to cover it, and a tablespoonful of honey. Boil until it becomes brittle on being dropped into cold water. Pull when cooling.

EMILY T. J.

BERKELEY, MISSOURI.

DEAR POSTMISTRESS,—Under my mother's instructions, I will try to answer Kate M. C. of Gravesend, Kent, England, who desires to know how to make Johnny-sake. My mother has an old Virginia cookery book containing a receipt for cooking a hare, and the first instruction is to catch the hare. Now we should think in England, the first thing necessary to do would be to get the corn meal, and I don't know whether that is possible at Gravesend, Kent, in the month of June. I think that the corn meal is essential to the making of good corn meal, the main ingredient of Johnny-sake. But having the meal, procure a sunny day, and get a long six inches wide, three-quarters of an inch

A QUEER COUPLE.

WHO would ever imagine that a devoted friendship could exist between a goose and a cow? Yet there was such a one once, for I have it on good authority. Moreover, that goose behaved just as I have seen some little human geese do; it thought itself the most powerful and important thing in the world, and ruled poor old obedient, down-trodden Mooly just as I have seen you order about Tim, or Bridget, or big brother John, and even grandpa and grandma, as if they were not three or four times as big as yourselves, and could not double you up and put you in their pockets any time they liked—that is to say, if their pockets were big enough.

Well, Mooly really did not dare say that her soul was her own. Gosie took full charge of her. Every morning she led the way to pasture, and Mooly followed. At night she simply reversed the operation, marching in advance like a leader of cavalry. If Mooly dared to linger on the way, she admonished her with furious pecks and much hissing and scolding. When, in good time, a little calf appeared, the poor thing suffered much, as the goose could scarcely restrain her jealousy long enough to let the new-comer get its food. As to milking-time, there was only one particular maid that was allowed to come near Mooly at all.

It was quite dreadful to be the object of so much affection so ardently expressed, and poor Mooly might have suffered greatly in the end had not the poor goose met with a most untimely fate. No one of us could ever find out how it happened, but one day the goose was found in the barn-yard with a broken neck. How had it happened? Who had done it?

Perhaps the milkmaid wanted to go away to get married, and so she put an end to the bird, that she might take a holiday. Or perhaps the poor goose killed herself because Mooly was indifferent to her? or did the cow, finding such constraint unendurable, give way to a fit of indignation, and kill her feathered adorer? We can never know.

 Tired out and sleepy too,
 'Twas such a scorching day.

 I think this must be cooked."

THE NONANTICOOK BOAT CLUB VERSUS JOHNNY MAXWELL.

BY SOPHIE SWETT

"I've always thought as much as any of you that Johnny Maxwell was a square fellow, but I must say this looks queer." Dave Prescott emphasized this remark by significant head-shakings. "If he was going to hurt his arm, why couldn't he do it a week ago, when there would have been time to get somebody into training to take his place as stroke oar?"

There was a general murmur of assent to this as a telling proposition, although Lanse Trevor did protest somewhat faintly. "A fellow can't hurt himself just when he wants to, you know."

doesn't say what has happened to it, only that he can't row, and can't Ben Burbeck take his place?"

"Of course you're a particular friend of his," said Dave, as if that accounted for Lanse's lack of logic.

"I shouldn't be if I thought he had done anything crooked about this." And Lanse's very freckles seemed to radiate indignation at the thought. What was friendship to him compared to the honor of the club?

"He comes down here this morning, the very day before the race," continued Dave, "with his arm all bandaged up and in a sling, and he Anybody knows that would be giving the race to the Rob Roys."

"Excited assent was expressed all around the group. "Why wasn't he elected president again?" Dave went on, impressively. "Because he was known to be too intimate with Gus Freeland, the president of the Rob Roys. His sister is a friend of the Freeland girls, and his cousin, Tassie Schuyler, from New York, an awfully stylish girl, with bangs and bangles and things, is visiting there. And that isn't all" (Dave, like a skilful lawyer, led gradually up to his strongest argument): "I heard this morning that he was going on a cruise in the Philopœna!"

The Philopœna was a famous yacht owned by Gus Freeland's father. There wasn't a boy in Nonanticook who didn't regard a sail on board her as a privilege almost beyond price.

"He has sold the race!" said Dolly Treat, thrusting his hands into his pockets with gloomy conviction.

A silence "as deep as a groan" followed these awful words of Dolly's. It was broken at length by Lanse Trevor, who said, "I don't believe Johnny Maxwell would do such a thing."

But Lanse didn't say it as he could say things when he was really aroused. Johnny wouldn't tell even him (Lanse), his great friend, what had happened to his arm, and he did seem to treat very lightly the appalling prospect of the Nonanticooks being beaten by the Rob Roys. He knew Ben Burbeck was the only boy in the club who was used to rowing stroke, and Ben—well, he could row, but he was the kind of boy who never seems to succeed; if they ever tried to show off a bit, he went to catching crabs, and he would run upon rocks where rocks had never been known before; he would be sure to "foul," or do something to lose the race. It would have been bad enough for Johnny to be so careless as to hurt his arm at such a time, but to refuse all explanation of the cause—Lanse felt that he could not conscientiously stand up for his dearest friend under such circumstances.

Lanse's opinion had great weight in the club, not only because he was the son of Judge Trevor, the wealthiest and most influential man in the town, but because he was known to be "square," which meant honorable and truthful, and indeed embraced almost all the virtues in Nonanticook vernacular. Lanse had a brother who was just the opposite of "square." Dick Trevor was a sore trial and disgrace to his parents; he would associate with the East End boys, "rougls" who were the terror of the town, and his father was constantly threatening to send him to the reform school. Dick had tried in vain to become a member of the boat club; that organization was very particular about the morals of its members. Perhaps the contrast between Dick and himself made Lanse more conscious of his virtues than he would otherwise have been, and this consciousness made him somewhat lacking in charity toward evil-doers. He was "too hard on Dick," some of the boys thought, and now it was evident that he was not going to manifest much charity toward his best friend, Johnny Maxwell. Most of the boys had already decided that Johnny was a traitor; but there were a few weaker spirits ready to follow wherever President Lanse Trevor led, and a few more generous ones who wanted simply to believe that Johnny had done nothing dishonorable.

"I don't believe that he would do such a thing," repeated Lanse. "But if he did, he must be expelled."

There was a gasp of astonishment. Nobody had been prepared for such a summary measure, not even Dave Prescott. And yet treason deserved nothing less.

The Nonanticook had had a hard struggle for existence; its members were younger than those of any other club on the North Shore, and some of them had not a large supply of pocket money; they had been forced to turn their backs on the charms of base-ball and bicycling, upon the tempting displays in Lollipop's shop windows in the village, and to hear themselves called "mean" at Christmas-time and holiday spreads. Now they owned some well-built boats and a trim and tasteful little boat-house, and they could beat "anything of their size"; and they had only once been beaten by the Rob Roys of Flingham—boys who were two or three years older than they on an average.

"I move we call a meeting at once," said Lanse, "to decide what we shall do for a stroke oar in to-morrow's race, and to give Johnny a chance to defend himself."

This was agreed upon, and Phonsy Chubbis, the secretary, was deputed to write a note to Johnny Maxwell asking him to "present himself before a meeting of the club in the boat-house at 1 P.M., and further explain the cause which had led to his failing the club in its emergency." The tone of the communication had originally been much loftier, for Secretary Chubbis was possessed of rhetorical abilities which he liked to display, but it had been sharpened down by the frank criticism of the other members to its present business-like form.

Only one member objected to it now, and that was little Tom Wingate, famous only as a champion "leap-frogger," and of no particular consequence otherwise. "I say, let's just go and ask him what's the matter, without such a fuss. That letter is enough to make a fellow mad."

But no notice was taken of little Tom, the note was sent, and at five minutes past one, just as the meeting was proceeding to business, Johnny Maxwell appeared in the doorway, looking somewhat pale, and with his arm in a sling.

"I don't know what you mean by further explanation," he said, in an informal manner which was not thought to be altogether respectful to the club. "I told you that I had hurt my arm so I couldn't row, and that I didn't care to tell anybody how it happened. And I haven't anything more to say about it." There was a slight quiver in Johnny's voice, although he looked very firm; his mouth seemed little more than a straight line when he closed it, and his eyes wandered around the group as if in search of some sympathetic face.

"You know, Maxwell, we can't help thinking it looks rather queer," said Dave Prescott, who was nothing if not a ready spokesman.

"You're at liberty to think just what you please," said Johnny, and turned and walked away.

There was dead silence for a moment. Then, "I move that John Q. Maxwell be expelled from this club," said President Lanse, in an awful voice.

"I think, you know, that we'd better attend to the race first," piped up little Tom Wingate. "We can expel a fellow any day, but we haven't much time to keep the Rob Roys from beating us."

This was recognized by the club as sound sense, although it was only little Tom Wingate who uttered it, and the meeting immediately proceeded to the business of providing a stroke oar for the next day's race.

Ben Burbeck being present, some hesitation was at first shown in discussing his fitness for the place, but it was not long before the meeting lost both its formality and its politeness, and Ben Burbeck's ears were assailed by noisy and confused demands as to whether he thought he could keep from starting before the word "Go," and discovering rocks, etc., all of which did not tend to allay Ben's nervousness, the real cause of his "unluckiness." Phonsy Chubbis manifested some ambition to try his hand at the stroke, but Ben's experience and superior muscle carried the day.

Every member of the club looked forward to the race with a terrible doubt and fear, very different from the calm assurance they had felt when Johnny was to be the stroke; for the Rob Roys had not a "man" who was a match for Johnny.

"We'll have to attend to Maxwell's case as soon as the race is over," said the president, as the meeting adjourned.

Lon Herrick was examining one of the boats, and taking down from the wall a flag which his sister was going to mend, when he suddenly uttered a cry that hushed all the other boys. The moving of the boat and the drawing aside of the flag had exposed smoke-stained walls and burnt and crumbling planks drenched with water. "This boat-house has been set on fire!" cried Lon.

There was a Babel of wrath and dismay. Lanse for a moment was silent, then his voice rang out above all the others. "Johnny Maxwell's hurt is a burn," he said.

"He might have got it putting out the fire, if it is," piped little Tom Wingate's voice, breaking an impressive silence that followed Lanse's speech.

The boys were eagerly examining the extent of the disaster.

"Here's where the fire caught, and the floor was saturated with oil," said Lon Herrick. "Somebody must have worked to put it out."

"Perhaps that was Johnny Maxwell," said Tom Wingate. "If he did, and won't tell of it, then he is trying to screen some of those Rob Roys," said Lanse.

"Do you suppose any of them would be bad enough to do it?" said Lon Herrick.

"I don't know who else would want to do it. Anyway, we have a right to know all that Johnny Maxwell knows about it; and if he refuses to tell, he is a traitor, and I move that we expel him without delay."

And in the excitement of the moment Secretary Chubb was deputed to write a communication which informed Johnny, with great pomposity of diction, that he was no longer a member of the club. There was but one dissenting voice, and that was the voice of little Tom Wingate.

As the boys left the boat-house and walked along the village street, Johnny Maxwell came hurrying toward them.

"I've seen Gus Freeland," he said, eagerly, although not without some embarrassment, "and he says he thinks the Rob Roys will be willing to postpone the race for two weeks, and the doctor says I can row by that time."

"We want to know first who set fire to the boat-house," said Lanse, severely.

"If I know anything about it, I sha'n't tell," said Johnny, firmly, but growing very red in the face, "except that I think the damage will be paid for."

"We don't care so much about the damage, but we don't want to harbor traitors," said Lanse, losing his temper.

"You'd better give him the paper," said Dave Prescott to Phony Chubb.

Johnny opened the sealed envelop which Secretary Chubb gave him, and turned quickly away so the boys could not see his face; but they saw a little whirlwind of white scraps, and knew that he had scornfully torn up the carefully prepared notice of his expulsion.

"I almost think we'd better have made it up with him," said Lon Herrick. "It's awful to think of that race!"

It was truly awful when the race came off, for poor Ben Burbeck lost his head at a critical moment, and "fouled" so dreadfully that the race was declared "off."

"I don't suppose we shall ever have a stroke to fill Johnny Maxwell's place," said Lon Herrick, disconsolately, at the regular Wednesday evening meeting of the club. The general tone of the meeting was somewhat despondent; there was beginning to be a reaction in Johnny's favor, and the leaders in his expulsion were blamed more or less openly.

"You'd be glad you didn't have him if you had heard what I have," said Dave Prescott, coming in almost breathless. Dave had a way of picking up news; he had always "heard something." "You know old Whittaker's cigar and candy shop at Flingham Point was broken into last Thursday night—Thursday night, mind you! Well, the old man came near catching the burglars as they were getting out of a window. He says he knows they were Nonanticook boys, and boys that nobody would think such a thing of. And he hit one of them an awful whack with his cane on the arm, and he is looking for a Nonanticook boy who has been carrying his arm in a sling since last Thursday night!"

"Oh, now, that's getting too far! Johnny Maxwell wasn't the boy," cried several voices.

"Harry Gooding slept with Johnny that night, and he woke about four o'clock, and found Johnny gone. He didn't come back till almost eight o'clock. Harry says, and then he could hardly stand, and was as white as a sheet, and had his arm bandaged, and he wouldn't tell Harry where he had been."

"I don't really think Johnny Maxwell ever did such a thing as that," said Lanse, slowly; "but this club has always been very particular; we couldn't consider a boy a member who had laid himself liable to such suspicions, and refused all explanation."

The meeting was interrupted by the appearance of another breathless belated member. It was little Tom Wingate, and he drew after him a tall, slouching, somewhat reluctant boy, as a little pulling tug draws a steamer.

"Mr. President and gentlemen, you'll please listen to a few remarks from Mr. Richard Trevor," panted Tom.

"Dick!" exclaimed Lanse, flushing to the roots of his hair (Lanse was terribly ashamed of his brother Dick).

Dick surveyed the toes of his shoes with intense interest, then, being vigorously nudged by Tom Wingate, he began: "Mr. President and—all you other fellows, it wasn't Johnny Maxwell that old Whittaker caught stealing his candy and cigars, 'cause 'twas me. And it wasn't Johnny Maxwell that set this boat-house on fire, 'cause that was me. He put it out, and put me out, or I shouldn't be alive now. I came in here after I'd been down to Flingham Point; got in through the window, because I didn't dare to go home; and I knocked over my lantern and spilled the oil, and then I suppose I threw a burning match down that I'd lighted to find a soft place to sleep. I woke almost suffocated with smoke, and with my clothes on fire. Johnny Maxwell was pulling me out into the air. He was so anxious about the race that he had come down as soon as 'twas light to look after things. He worked like a major putting that fire out. I couldn't do much, 'cause old Whittaker had given my right arm a whack. I knew that if it came out that I wasn't at home that night, I should be arrested for the robbery, and 'twould kill my mother, and I begged Johnny not to tell, and I promised him I'd never go with those East End fellows again, nor drink nor smoke till I was twenty-one. He made me sign a paper, and I'm going to keep it."

Dick held up his head as not one of them had ever seen him. "I've been threatened and coaxed and everything, but nothing ever seemed to come across my feelings like Johnny Maxwell's bearing all that blame for me. But I don't know as I should have had the courage to come here and tell of it if Tom Wingate hadn't made me. And I've got one thing more to say: I used to want to belong to this club, but—well, I've been a pretty mean fellow myself—but I don't want to now."

The Nonanticook Boat Club as a whole seemed ashamed of itself. Its dignified president looked abject and its spokesman was dumb. The meeting seemed about to break up in a kind of confused dismay, when Johnny Maxwell appeared, having been previously told by Tom Wingate that his presence would be desired.

"We don't know what to say, Johnny, we feel so awfully—cheap," said the president, buskily.

"Oh, don't say anything about that," said Johnny, lightly, although there was a quiver in his voice. "I suppose it was provoking for me not to tell. What we've got to attend to is beating the Rob Roys next week—handsomely."

"SQUEAK! SQUEAK! SQUEAK! OIL POLLY, I WISH YOU'D LEARN TO TALK!"

CHAPTER XII.

FANNY'S CONFESSION.

FANNY and Louise had thoroughly enjoyed lunching in the beautiful dining-room with Mrs. Mostyn. The dainty luxuries of the table, the perfect attendance of old Parker, the whole air of hospitality, good-breeding, and home comfort impressed Fanny in a way she could scarcely define. Louise accepted everything more quietly, and from—in some ways—a different point of view. To her it seemed almost enough to encounter Mrs. Mostyn's gentle, compassionate gaze; to be conscious that the old lady's voice was very tender when she spoke to her, and to feel the pressure of the kind hand in hers, when, after luncheon, they were waiting for the carriage. All the rest seemed only a luxurious setting for these pleasures, something which kindled the warmth they produced in Louise's often lonely little heart; but Fanny mingled everything in a more confused and rapturous manner. She was almost too excited by her delight in being Mrs. Mostyn's guest to mind what was before her, and as they drove first to Dr. Clinton's, she could scarcely realize that she had anything to "retract" or to apologize for. Guy accompanied them, and while Mrs. Mostyn made the young people understand the importance of their errand, she also managed her words of counsel and reproof so they should not feel too deeply a sense of humiliation. The main point was to set the gossip at rest, and on entering Mrs. Clinton's pretty drawing-room and being warmly received, the old lady rushed at once into the reason of her visit.

"Mrs. Clinton," she said, quickly, holding the hand of the Doctor's wife in hers, while Guy and the two girls hung back a little, "we have come here on what you may think a strange errand. It appears that a young friend of mine named Agnes Leigh came to Halcom this past summer hoping to find me at home, and to seek some employment suited to her years. If I had been in America, she would have had all the care and protection my home and my love could give, and if I find her now, as I hope I will, they shall be hers. It appears that some foolish talk was started about her, beginning, as I understand it, here in your parlor."

Guy moved forward and said, hurriedly: "The night of the party, when Agnes Leigh played the violin. Don't you remember, Mrs. Clinton? Please, aunt, let me say that I was mean enough to wonder about her, and laugh at her being here all alone, and at her playing."

"You laughed because I made you," said Fanny, roused to a spirit of actual remorse as the evening in question came back to her, and with her eyes on the piano at the distant end of the room, she could see Agnes's slim little figure in the shabby green dress, and hear once again the strains of the delicious cavatina which she had played so well. "Mrs. Clinton," she added, moving nearer to the two older ladies, and speaking very eagerly, "I think I was the one who started the talk about Agnes that evening, and really and truly, when I come to think of it, I did not know anything about her. It all seemed sort of queer, you know, that a mere child like that should be here all by herself, and playing the fiddle too, and that there must be a mystery. I don't remember what I said, but I am quite sure I was the first."

Fanny's face flushed, half with mortification, half embarrassment, and with perhaps just a touch of satisfaction in the sense that she had acquitted herself well.

She knew that Mrs. Mostyn was pleased, and it touched the girl's heart. Mrs. Clinton had not been a physician's wife for twenty years without learning to be ready with her sympathy, and to be tolerant of mistaken judgment. She held her hand out to Guy and Fanny.

"And we were to blame too," she said, warmly. "How easily we allowed ourselves to become prejudiced is shown by the fact"—she laughed a little—"that little Fanny Pierson here was able to start such a ball rolling. Not that I want to disparage your youth, my dear; but when you come to think of it, it was very absurd."

Mrs. Clinton seemed to regard it in the light of a joke, and Mrs. Mostyn quickly interposed: "Fortunately it may turn out to be only amusing. But, Mrs. Clinton, I have lost sight of poor Agnes—I can find no clue to her whereabouts, just owing to this—amusing—mistake about her, and now I do want every one to remember whatever they can about the last seen of her, and help me to trace the child of the whole who might have been my own daughter."

The child Clinton household, Dick foremost in his readiness to serve Mrs. Mostyn, was roused to sympathetic effort. From the Clintons' Mrs. Mostyn and her young friends drove to the Blands', the Maey's, and the Lewises', where discussions somewhat similar to the first were repeated, and before night had fallen the tide in Agnes's favor was turned far more decidedly than it had ever been against her, and Mrs. Lewis, comparing notes with the Doctor's wife, declared that henceforward, whenever she wanted to get to the bottom of anything, she would follow Mrs. Mostyn's example.

"Nothing like finding out the beginning of any such mischief-making," said Kate's mother, apologetically. "When we came to talk it over, Fanny Pierson reminded me that she had spoken to my Kitty first, and that it was my overhearing part of the conversation which prejudiced me. There really is nothing like going straight to the bottom of gossip to find out what it is really worth."

And Mrs. Bland in her husband's study cried softly, thinking how easily she had been made to think hardly of the poor child, who, for all they knew, might now be starving and alone in some great city.

Mr. Bland's sermon on the text, "Comfort ye one another," was, I think, due in part to this afternoon's experience, and some of the things he had heard Mrs. Mostyn say. At least many of his hearers believed that it was so, and he himself went home wishing that he and his wife could be among the first to welcome Agnes back again.

But Mrs. Mostyn and Guy, sitting in the library at Brier Lawn, were not as sure as they had been that the day would come when they would welcome the poor little stranger so inhospitably and cruelly driven from their gates.

Mrs. Mostyn had telegraphed to the superintendent of the Dorefield prison, and learned that Herman Leigh was dead.

"All that we can do now, Guy, is to go to Boston and see Mrs. Robertson, and perhaps find some clue to the poor child's whereabouts." Guy turned from the window, where he had been watching the hurrying snow-flakes as they whitened the lawn under the old elm-trees.

"But, Aunt Eunice," the boy exclaimed, "perhaps she is cold and hungry now somewhere, and what if we should never find her?"

"The widow and the fatherless!" quoted Mrs. Mostyn.

"AGNES WAS ALONE IN HER LITTLE ATTIC ROOM.

"Let us be hopeful, Gay: remember that it is for such as these He has promised us His successor. The poor little shorn lamb! We can only pray that somewhere on this night He is tempering the wind for her."

But at that moment Agnes was alone in her little attic room, looking out on the same snow-storm, and wondering whether it would be possible for her to take Jennie Alger's part the following night. Could she stand about in those draughty passages behind the scenes? Could she rush out with the troupe of fairies, and sing the two verses which Sarah had been going over and over again with her? Her head ached feverishly, and there was a queer, tightening sort of pain all the time in her side.

CANOE "TALKS."

BY THE COMMODORE OF THE NEW YORK CANOE CLUB.

II.—PADDLES AND UPSETS.

BETWEEN the date of the first "canoe talk" and the time appointed for the second, the Archer boys thought of little else. They carefully studied their note-books, and explained all that Mr. Russell had told them to their father and mother. As a result, it was decided that Ben, being the eldest, should have a "Nautilus" canoe all to himself, and that, for this summer at least, Aleck and Bob should have a "Peterboro'" between them.

Promptly at four o'clock on Monday afternoon they presented themselves at the club-house, where they found Mr. Russell, clad in bathing costume, awaiting them. He fully approved of the family decision regarding the style of canoes they should get, and said that their present "talk" should be illustrated by the practical workings of two canoes exactly similar to those they proposed to have.

"To begin with," said he, "can you all swim?"

"Of course we can," answered all three, a little scornfully.

"Well, I've seen boys who couldn't," said Mr. Russell, "and am very glad that you can, for the first step toward becoming a canoeist is to know how to swim. Now get into these bathing suits as quickly as you can, while I lift the canoes out."

When the boys came out from the dressing-room, they found lying on the float in front of the canoe-house three canoes—a "Nautilus," a "Peterboro'," and a "Rob Roy." In the first was a double-bladed paddle, but everything else movable, including the cockpit hatches, had been removed.

"She is for your use, Ben," said Mr. Russell, "and I want you to put her in the water, get into her, and paddle off. Lift her by the stem, slide her into the water on an even keel, stern first, and bring her alongside. There! Now step exactly in the middle, bend forward, and hold your body as low as possible. Above all, remember to take hold of the two sides of the boat, and not rest one hand on the float and the other on your canoe. You will almost certainly capsize if you do. Sit flat on the bottom, brace your feet against that stretcher, and lean back against this little board. Now put your paddle together. You see it is jointed, like two sections of a fishing-rod, for convenience in stowing in the canoe, and so that one blade may be turned at right angles with the other, in order to feather when paddling against the wind. Paddle first on one side, then on the other, and, to avoid a wetting from the drippings of the blades, hold the paddle as nearly horizontal as possible, barely dipping the blades beneath the surface of the water."

Then Mr. Russell launched the "Peterboro'," which was provided with metallic air-tight compartments at either end, and contained two single paddles and two little cushions covered with sheep's-wool.

"Get into the stern, Aleck, placing both hands on the sides of the canoe and stepping exactly in the middle. Carefully! So! Now kneel on that cushion, and partially sit against that stretcher that looks like a very narrow thwart. Bob, you get into the bow in the same manner. Take up your paddles, and hold them out over opposite sides of the canoe. Place the inner hand on the very top of the paddle, and the outer well down toward the blade. There! Steady! and off you go."

Then Mr. Russell launched his "Rob Roy," and stepping lightly into her, started after his pupils.

After the boys had paddled about for some time, and were beginning to feel quite at home in their canoes, Mr. Russell suddenly called out, "Now for upsets," and sprang from his little "Rob Roy" into the water.

Coming to the surface, and bidding the boys watch his every movement closely, as this was part of the "talk," he first caught his paddle, and unjointing it laid it carefully in the bottom of the canoe. Then resting his left hand on the side nearest him, and reaching far across the cockpit to the opposite gunwale with the right, he extended his body horizontally on the water by beating with his feet, and then quickly drew himself directly across the cockpit of his canoe, from which position he had no trouble in regaining his seat.

After this he upset his canoe, turned it completely over, righted it, got in, and took his seat as before, bailed out the water, and was ready to resume paddling.

The boys were delighted with these performances, and having observed every motion carefully, were themselves able, after half an hour's practice, to upset their canoes, right them, and get into them again. To be sure, they nearly filled them with water each time that they did so, whereas Mr. Russell had only taken a few gallons into his.

While they were dressing, after returning their canoes to the club-house, Mr. Russell gave the boys a few more points on paddles, saying:

"It is well to have your paddle made fast to the canoe by a light line long enough to allow you to use it freely, so that in case of a sudden upset it will not be lost.

"Always have the tips of your paddles bound with brass, as you will have frequent occasion to use them as push poles.

"The best length for a double paddle is nine feet, and for a single five feet.

"Do not try to paddle directly against a strong head-wind; it is much easier, and shorter in the end, to take a zigzag course.

"That is all for to-day. Come down here again Wednesday afternoon, and I will tell you something about 'Sails and Sailing.'"

CROQUET.

AN OLD GAME MADE NEW.

BY CHARLES HULL BOTSFOORD.

IF you are inclined to pursue the science of croquet as it is practised by members of the American Croquet Association, I would have you lay aside hard-won but useless knowledge of the old-fashioned game which once had its wickets on every well-kept lawn. Scientific croquet has lost the picturesque of its earlier model, but it has gained by degrees every important particular of an absorbing pastime, demanding on the part of the player the highest qualities of nerve, judgment, patience, and skill.

I am a votary of both games, but compared with tennis, I unhesitatingly give the palm to croquet. A fine field is like a chess-board. To the skilled player each piece has its value, each position its advantage. The variations are endless, and from opening to finish the marplot chance has not a leg nor a place to stand on. Well do I remember the first time I essayed the modern game. It was on the grounds of James W. Tufts, in Martha's Vineyard. Skilled on a velvet lawn to carry a wooden ball around a field of six-inch wickets, I took up a mallet made of hard rubber with a foot-long handle, and measured the sandy parallelogram with my eye, confident of easy triumph. The wickets looked stanch; the rubber balls glistened in new paint. In imagination I saw myself making the tour of the field in a succession of brilliant plays. My part in that game was played wholly in imagination. I found by repeated experiments that a ball three and a quarter inches in diameter would invariably swell on approaching a wicket only a trifle wider than itself.

When it came to the rules and government of the game, I found the old traditions set at naught at every turn. The necessity of boundaries brought in a new element. The nature of the ground abolished the service of the foot in "tight" croquet. The difficulty of making the long and narrow cage suggested different means of approach to it. The certainty that a ball would go straight to its objective if the stroke was right taught the use of the wire in placing your adversary at a disadvantage in making his succeeding play, while the development and progress of the game often made that means of "tying up" of no avail after he had mastered the mysteries of the "jump shot."

For several years New England kept the scientific game to herself. Meetings of the leading players were held in 1880 and 1881 in New Ipswich, New Hampshire, where two fine courts were built by the home club. In 1882 the American Croquet Association was formed, and held its first meeting in New York. Since then the Association has built fine grounds in Norwich, Connecticut, and holds annual tournaments there, beginning the third Tuesday in August, and continuing for a week.

The Association's book of rules contains full directions for building the courts, and a description of the implements of the game; but a few general directions on this head may be of interest to the reader.

To build a croquet court let him select a well-shaded spot which will afford a space eighty by forty-five feet. Avoid the shelter of fruit trees like the mulberry, which sheds its fruit over the ground during the entire croquet season. One mulberry has been known to break up a whole game. The subsoil may be of clay or loam, and the first endeavor should be to make it perfectly level. The top-dressing of loam should be well mixed with fine dark sand and sifted. The boundary boards, about three inches high, should have corner pieces eighteen inches in length, and the boundary line is drawn about three feet inside of these boards. Balls are returned to a place on the line opposite where they stop.

To keep the ground free from grass and weeds salt may be used. Rock-salt well rolled in will also help to maintain a damp surface. It is, however, desirable to build the courts accessible to water, which may be applied with a hose or sprinkler. In addition you will want a heavy roller, and a drag made of light carpet or matting, to give the surface a proper consistency and regularity. After a ground has been played on for a year it will need but little attention. The player soon discovers that there is very little pleasure in playing on a poor ground.

The wickets should be made of steel set in hollow iron supports, so that they can be withdrawn in rolling the ground. They should be not more than four inches in width and eight inches above-ground. Tournament games are played on three and one-half inch wickets. The centre or "cage" wicket is made of two ordinary wickets set eighteen inches apart, and at right angles with the other wickets. These centre wickets are only three and one-half inches wide.

When the ground will admit of it, the stakes should be placed seventy feet apart. The first seven feet in front of the stake; the second, seven feet from the first; the third, fourteen feet to the right and one foot in advance of the second; the fourth, at right angles to and twenty-two feet in advance of the second; the remaining five at the same relative distances. Thus there will be five in line between the stakes and four wing wickets.

The mallets should be of hard wood, amaranth or box-wood preferred, or of hard rubber, or, according to the latest idea invented by Colburn, of Norwich, of amaranth with rubber ends screwed on to avoid the danger of splitting. The head is also secured by nickel or brass bands. The handle, which is screwed into the head, may be of any length from eight to fifteen inches. The long-handled mallet has been almost discarded of late years by Association players.

The order of colors is red, white, blue, and black. To make these colors, use a preparation of shell-lac dissolved in alcohol, mixing with Chinese vermilion for red, Prussian blue and zinc or flake white for blue, and zinc or flake-white for white. Add four "clips," the colors of the balls, to indicate their changing position in the game, and the outfit is complete.

In the revised game there are always four balls, and usually but two players, although in social games four persons may be engaged, each with his own ball, though playing double, that is, two against two. The game is opened for choice of balls and order of play by scoring from the upper border for an imaginary line drawn through the middle wicket. A ball is in play as soon as it is in position on a line half-way between the stake and the first wicket.

The most approved opening for the red ball is into one of the lower corners of the ground. The white then follows into the other corner; blue plays to red, and black to get to partner or opponent by a carom through the first wicket. This wire carom is made by some players with such uniform success that their opponents prefer to bunch the balls on the border in the middle rather than in the lower corners. Sometimes, though rarely, the field is run and the points all made in one play by the third ball, in which case the only absolutely safe place on the ground is secured by hiding the three balls in play against the fourth player, on a line directly behind the starting stake. Any one who tries this feat will get an inkling of the science involved in the apparently simple game of croquet. Running the field with the second ball has never been done to my knowledge in a match game. In practice games two Association players have succeeded in the attempt. Supposing that black has picked up the balls on the fourth play, unless he has one ball in the field, that is, inside the border, his play is to set the game up for his partner, white. To do this he must put a wire, or as many as possible, between red and the other balls. And here comes the opportunity for the practice of the jump shot. I have seen the next player strike his ball in such a manner as to make it leap two feet in the air, and after surmounting the stake and two wickets shoot swiftly the length of the ground, and go crashing into the enemies' "set up," spoiling a prospective long run in the twinkling of an eye.

If this shot misses—and it may be said for the benefit of the beginner that it demands more practice than any fancy play in tennis or lacrosse—white has the field before him, and may make the tour of it by careful "nursing" and manipulation.

The most approved method of play introduced by Jacobus, of New Brunswick, leaves the next playing ball behind the third wicket when running it, continuing with two balls.

To make the centre, a ball must be left close by to play from, else the run is broken. Having passed the Rubicon, the way is clear to the careful player until he reaches it on the return trip.

If he does not succeed in putting blue behind the third wicket, he should bring it in as soon as he has reached the turning stake, and either leave it behind that obstacle or carry it to the lower side and drop it behind the wire, pro ceeding thence to make the middle, and, if possible, complete the run.

In the description this seems easy; in practice it is surprising how many obstacles interrupt the play. A position is not squarely obtained, and the ball sticks in the wicket; a ball rolls an inch too far, and lodges behind a wire; a "freeze" occurs, and the play must cease; in taking a loose croquet the player fails to move the other ball, or in making a wicket, to move his clip—and when he has overcome all these difficulties, he may fail in the last event in putting the balls against the home stake in succession, in which case both are still in the game, and he may lose the victory just as it seemed in his grasp.

In a game with Jacobus this season the writer was stopped by a ball on which he had played rolling between his ball and the stake. The play was a careless one, and was only redeemed by a jump shot, by which the stake was hit and the play continued. In the tournament game between the same players last season, at Norwich, Jacobus won by a wire carom from the side wicket to the cage. The shot was declared an impossible one before it was done. It may be added, however, that the narrowing of the wickets to three and one-half inches will prevent the repetition of such a shot in future tournament games.

The Association players, as a rule, use but one hand, grasping the mallet very near the head. Some, however, take hold with both hands, even swinging the mallet between the feet—an awkward position, but one that brings down a ball at long range.

In the new clubs, however, a number of young men are becoming quite expert with the mallet. Among the boys still in their teens who sometimes beat their fathers and those who taught them, are George Jacobus, of New Brunswick, New Jersey, John Jenks, of Norwich, Connecticut, and Robert Germond, of Tremont, New York. A game between these boys at Norwich last year attracted considerable attention. Any reader of HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE who wants "points" on the game will do well to address these juniors on the subject.

There is one cardinal rule in the game which is generally violated by the beginner. Never play for position unless you have another shot in which to attempt the wicket, and play for the ball instead of the wicket unless you are so near the latter that you cannot well miss it. Even in this case, if by making the point you are carried further from the balls, it is better to play for them and let the point go. In making runs the balls should be kept as close together as possible. Long shots and "drives" must be practised some time before the beginner becomes proficient. In making the jump shot the ball must be struck nearly on top with a quick, hard blow. In the "loose" croquet the playing ball must be pushed with the face of the mallet or it cannot be carried the length of a modern ground, but it must not be struck twice, nor can the "push" shot be allowed in a direct play from behind a wire. Above all rules the player should hold the obligation of keeping temper and patience. In the modern game there is no necessity for a word to be spoken between the players. Disputed points should be referred to an umpire, and his decision considered final.

THE DRAWING CLUB.*

BY ALICE DOXLEVY

V.

FOR several Saturdays the club found the centre table bright with large flowers. After dogwood blossoms were drawn, tulips had their "likenesses taken." Pansies followed plentifully; the pencil drawings were prettier than the black-board attempts. As two of the five petal parts of the pansy are nearly black, it is just as difficult to represent this flower on a black ground as it is to show white daisies on a white ground. Drawing the pansy larger than life made it look coarse. So Clarita and others of the club stopped using the black-board, and drew on paper.

Then came the difficulty of representing small flowers. It was hard for those who had not gone through the drill of drawing round objects with a teacher. Few flowers are flat-faced like the pansy. Most blossoms need the knowledge gained by drawing the outside of a vase and the inside view of a bowl. So more than half the club complained that their drawings did not "look like anything."

Leonard consulted the "landlord" one Saturday night. The "tenants" would leave, he said, if something new was not thought out soon, for two-thirds of the club were discouraged.

"Father," suggested Leonard, "I would like to treat the club. I have this year saved up five dollars; will you ask some artist to come here just once, and show us what to do next? I will pay for it out of my own money."

Dr. Lee listened patiently to his son's hopes and fears for the Drawing Club.

"Doctor," suggested Aunt Ida, "why not take Leonard to consult some artist? You see he is willing to pay his own consultation fee."

Dr. Lee promised to think it over, and advised Leonard to collect the best of the club drawings in a portfolio, adding that it was wiser to appeal to an artist's eyes than his ears.

Early Wednesday morning Leonard reported to his father that he had pasted nine drawings on printer's cardboard, and all were tied up in a stiff portfolio.

Dr. Lee smiled and said: "I have received an answer to my letter from Mr. Indianred. He is teaching a class of ladies in Pleasantville. We will take the express train, and the sun'll reach his sketching cabin before noon to-day."

The sun had shrunk the shadows very small as Leonard and Dr. Lee arrived in sight of Mr. Indianred's sketching cabin. As it was half-way between the village and the railway station, there was no noise to prevent Mr. Indianred's voice being heard. He was bending over a lady's drawing, saying quickly to her, "You cannot draw all you see. You tried to put in too much, so you lost your place. When you are drawing from nature, half shut your eyes from time to time, so that the most important points only may arrest your attention. The trunk of a tree is more important to you to-day than two hundred blades of grass. Do not spend all your time on the grass. A few curved lines springing up from the ground will suggest the grassy foreground. Remember, each blade of grass is trying to reach up to its own share of sunlight."

The two of the class who sat by easels were painting with oil-colors; two were working with moist water-colors on a pad of water-color paper.

Dr. Lee told the hack driver to stop, because he did not wish to be so impolite as to interrupt the lesson by driving up to the house until the teaching was over, and the ladies began to fold up their camp stools.

Then he spoke to Leonard: "Be sure and have a back to your campstool whenever you go out-of-doors to study from nature."

"Study!" exclaimed Leonard. "I think this must be more fun than a garden party."

"Would you rather have a sketching trip for yourself and the club than your usual garden party on your birthday?" inquired his father.

"Decidedly," said Leonard. "I am sure, father, seeing this class at work shows me what our club had better do next. Why, we can ride every Saturday somewhere, and draw out-of-doors."

Leonard was delighted with all he saw. He thought an umbrella in the sunshine looked much easier than an umbrella folded up in a room ready for a rainy day. He told his father that the painting easels were hard to draw, but he could fold them up in no time. "If Norman were here, he could draw that young lady's hat with pen and ink, it is so distinct; only sunshine and black velvet. I know I could not stand as straight and still as the boy who is having his likeness taken."

Just then the little girl who had silently been watching the young lady paint her brother said, "There's our dinner horn, and mother sent me to say that brother must not be late to dinner."

The boy, who had been standing with his hands in his pockets, walked home with his sister. The ladies folded their easels and shut up their color boxes. Then Dr. Lee told the driver to drive around to the front piazza. There Mrs. Indianred was waiting to welcome Dr. Lee and his son.

After dinner the artist asked to see the club drawings, and in answer to Leonard's questions as to "how to begin to draw from nature," proposed that they should walk to the spot where Leonard first caught sight of the sketching class at work.

"Keep your head still. Tell me what you see," said Mr. Indianred.

"Your sketching cabin with one window, and your dwelling-house, a large tree, a little tree, and a distant wood; the fence, the grass, and the path leading to this main road," answered Leonard.

"Suppose, then, you make an oblong to enclose this. This is to represent the limit of what you see without turning your head," said Mr. Indianred. "An empty frame through which, one by one, your club could look at your landscape view, would be a help on a sketching trip."

"Would a crabbing net, with the old net torn away, help?" asked Dr. Lee.

"Certainly," answered the artist, "any visible limit is of use. Look, Leonard, and tell me the most striking points in what you see."

"The roof of the house and the roof of the sketching cabin," answered Leonard.

"Very good," said the painter. "Is anything else more wedge-shaped?"

"Yes, the roofs of the addition to both house and sketching cabin are more pointed."

"You do see," said the artist. "It is important in a picture to draw the pyramid shape like the pointed roof of the house, or the wedge shape like the roof of the addition. Mountains are either pyramid or wedge shaped. If your club could go where you could see a mountain in the distance, they would see the important lines to be shown in their drawings. Never rule a line for a mountain. Ruled lines would give a cast-iron look to your drawing. They are more suitable for manufactured articles. Use a soft pencil in drawing from nature. Do not be too liberal with your black touches. Remember there should be only one blackest. Have you forgotten where the boy stood when you came?"

"Oh, his hair looked very light against the doorway of the shed," replied Leonard.

"Look again," directed the artist. "Now which is the darkest?"

* See "The Drawing Club," Parts I, II, III, and IV, published in Nos. 332, 336, 342, and 351 of HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE.

"The top of the doorway," answered Leonard.

"Yes, holes and hollows give your blackest pencil a chance for exercise. Draw what you see of the trunk of a tree and its branches. To express the foliage simply put in a mass with a soft pencil, holding it lightly. You cannot show the individual leaves. Try to make slanting lines, with a very slight curve in them, close together, so as to make a shaded mass, to express foliage. When the foliage is to be darker in spots, like the large tree, go over the dark spaces again, but be sure and make the pencil touches so as to cross the first strokes, not going over in the same direction. Do not cross your lines at right angles. Be careful to cross them at acute angles."

"See the shadow on my sketching cabin," continued Mr. Indianred; "that may be expressed by straight lines. Part of the ground between us and the fence can also be shown by straight lines, not so close together as the shadow lines. The land lines should be firmer than the shadow."

"I am glad you see," continued the artist, "that the shadow should not be as strongly drawn in as the tree that casts the shadow. But we must go back to the land question. The straight lines help to define the slope of the land directly before us. The ground before us is called the foreground. Some parts slope to the path. To express a slope, make slanting lines with your pencil. The roof of the shed or addition to my sketching cabin must also be expressed by slanting lines, but they must slant in a different direction. Show the roof of the largest house by making lines in many directions. It is important for you to show that the path or road appears smaller near the house and broader near you; this will help to give the idea of distance."

"I am very sorry to cut short this lesson," said Dr. Lee; "but our distance from home makes me think of train time."

"By the time you have said good-by to my wife at the house we will follow there," replied the artist, who then went on saying to Leonard: "By showing that the palings of the fence appear larger near you and smaller at the farthest point from you, as you see them touch the sketching cabin, you can also express distance. There is more apparent space between the palings near you. In the most distant part of the fence you see no space between the palings."

Here the noise of approaching carriage-wheels made both the artist and Leonard see the coming hackman who was to drive Dr. Lee and Leonard to the railway station.

"One parting piece of advice," said Mr. Indianred: "do not work in the middle of the day. Choose a time when the shadows are longer and growing stronger."

"Our club shall change to Saturday afternoons," said Leonard.

BITS OF ADVICE

BY AUNT MARJORIE PRECEPT.

KEEP COOL.

FANS? Iced water? Lemonade? Darkened rooms? A perch in the apple-tree? A nook in the orchard? A seat under the bridge, with a fishing-rod, and an eye on yonder pool where the trout lies far down under the gently rippling wave?

Yes, I know that my bit of advice to keep cool suggests all these pleasant things to your minds on this hot midsummer day. And you are glad, now that you think of it, that there is a Fresh-air Fund, and that hundreds of little city children are enjoying the pleasures of rolling on the grass, riding on the hay, and driving home the cows.

But keep cool! How can we, Aunt Marjorie, with the thermometer at 90° in the shade, and every breeze off duty? What is there to do but to fret, and to fuss, and to fidget, getting warmer every minute.

Shall I tell you my way? I try, so far as possible, to go on with my work just as though there was no weather to be considered. Dressed loosely, with the sun screened from my window by blinds and curtains, or, better still, seated out on the piazza or under a vine, I read, sew, knit, or write, and think nothing about my feelings. I wish you could all understand that the mind has even more than the body to do with our comfort or discomfort.

Those who have read Don Quixote may remember how that worthy, sitting astride his bony nag Rosinante, went forth in search of adventures. So filled was he with a persuasion that he was a knight-errant, like those of whom he had been reading, that he fancied every inn he came to a grand castle, every peasant girl a beautiful and high-born lady, and every shepherd and carter a foeman whom it was his duty to challenge.

Now, children, when next you are very much tried with the heat of the day play that you are comfortable. Make believe that this temperature is just the one you like best.

Instead of fanning furiously, and drinking quantities of iced water, copy that poem which mamma wants to send to Aunt Amanda, write the letter you are owing Uncle John, read the book which papa brought home last night, mend your fishing tackle, finish the dollies you are embroidering for Cousin Nellie's bridal present, solve the puzzles in the Post-office Box, or cover little Jamie's ball. If baby is fretful, and baby's mother looks in need of a nap, take the darling to your room and amuse him while she gets the rest she requires. Take my word for it, the best way in the world to keep cool is to go on with the day's duties and pleasures, and think nothing about the heat.

BARKER AND PLUTARCH.

BY R. K. MCKNITTRICK.

ONCE upon a time there were two little boys, and their names were Tommy Lee and Johnny Wall. Tommy Lee's special pride was a little dog called Barker—a happy inspiration of Tommy's—as the dog was such an untiring howler. If he saw a stranger on the premises he would bark himself into an ulcerated sore throat. If he saw Tommy coming home from school, he would bark until tonsillitis set in, or rather seemed to. About the only time he was not barking was when, in tugging forward on his chain, his collar became tightened about his neck so vigorously that he could not be heard; but even then he was barking in his heart.

Johnny Wall, who lived just next door to Tommy Lee, had a Maltese cat, upon which he lavished as much affection as such a young Arab usually has to lavish on anything. He would carry it around in his arms, and never fail to secretly supply it at table with pieces of meat when his parents were not looking. He was quite sure that the cat, Plutarch, so called on account of his "Lives," could vanquish Barker in battle, and secretly longed for a chance to bring them face to face.

As much as these boys were together in and out of school, they seldom quarrelled or indulged in fistfights. If Tommy Lee offended Johnny Wall, the latter "took it out" of Barker, and vice versa. One day Tommy Lee got down on his hands and knees behind Johnny Wall, who was looking intently at a game of ball, while a confederate pushed him, and sent him sprawling on the ground. Johnny Wall went straight home, and weighed a couple of caramels in the roof of Barker's mouth. Poor Barker tried in vain to extricate them. They clung with the tenacity of teeth, and the thoroughly exhausted animal rolled on the ground, with his eyes bulged out until they looked like pickled onions.

This exasperated Tommy Lee, who removed the caramels from Barker's mouth—so that he could bark with a proper accent—after great difficulty, and registered a sol-even vow to make matters even with Plutarch as soon as that creature could be secured. He also wished that Barker could once get his teeth on him, for Tommy Lee had perfect confidence in the superior fighting qualities of the dog, because when the cat came and sat down near him it was only when he was chained, and could do nothing more than vent his fury on the wind, and jump in vain in the catless air.

So Tommy Lee set about to secure Plutarch, which he soon accomplished by offering him a piece of meat. When he got him he took him into the house and dressed him up in his sister's doll's clothes. Plutarch was truly a funny sight when, frightened half out of his nine lives, he ascended a locust-tree in a little pink and white bonnet and a yellow dress. Some passers thought he was an organ-grinder's monkey escaped. Tommy Lee beat his knee pans in wild delight at the success of his scheme, and poor Plutarch looked sadder than a dozen ordinary cats, and was too full for miaowing.

When Johnny Wall saw Plutarch he lost no time in climbing to the rescue, and when he reached his pet he commenced husking the clothing off him as he would have husked an ear of corn.

"I'll be even on Barker soon," he muttered, as he slid down the tree with Plutarch. As soon as he had put the cat under the kitchen stove he went out with a pair of shears, and cut the hair off the dog in such a grotesque fashion that when the light struck him he seemed covered with windrows, and Johnny remarked, "If he isn't careful he'll catch cold in spots."

When the owner of Barker saw the condition of his pet, he cried and laughed in turns.

"He ain't all wool now," reflected Johnny, referring to his dog as if that animal were an overcoat in a cheap clothing store; "but I know what I'll do: I'll take them up to the pond, and tie a piece of cord to their collars, and throw in a stick for Barker to fetch."

So he took them to the pond, and tied one end of a piece of stout cord to Barker's collar and the other to Plutarch's. Then he threw out a stick, and Barker jumped in. Plutarch held back with might and main, but finally had to yield to Barker's superior strength and enter the water, which he did with a series of miaows and unpronounceable hisses.

Being less at home in the water than Barker, Plutarch was obliged to follow, and Tommy Lee laughed so loud that Johnny Wall heard him, and appeared just in time to see the anguish of the cat and the good-natured indifference of the dog. He didn't stop to demand an explanation of Barker's owner. He simply ran around the pond to meet them when they landed. But they landed before he got there, and Plutarch, strong in his fright, ran up a chestnut-tree with Barker dangling beneath him. Plutarch got out on a limb that overlooked the pond, and clung for dear nine lives, while Barker did his best to balance on it.

The laugh was now on Johnny's side as he ascended the tree to separate them. When he got sufficiently close he cut the cord with his jackknife, and Plutarch descended to the ground, and never stopped running until he got home and in the heart of the garret. Barker fell back from the tree into the pond more frightened than hurt, swam ashore, and started for home at top speed.

Barker and Plutarch never notice one another now, and the parents of their heartless owners have decided that those two boys shall be sent away to boarding-school, where they may have an opportunity to indulge their taste for teasing and rough treatment on those of their own kind. As all the boys at that school, however, are bigger than they are, there is reason to believe that Tommy and Johnny will learn from their own experience to consider the feelings of others, even of dogs and cats.

descriptions of their homes which the children write about in the Post-office Box so pretty. Good-by, dear Postmistress. VIOLET C. K. S.

BERDREAR, HENRY.

DEAR POSTMISTRESS,—I have written to you already before, but as my letter has not been published, I will write again. I have just passed my annual examination in the first class of my school, and next year, that is, in September, I am to go to a Gymnasium scholar. I passed my examination very successfully, and I have got the best testimonial of all the boys in my class. I am going to the sea-side for a few weeks in August. I hope I will enjoy it very much. When I come back, I will write to you in my own loving friend, BELA S. TEN years old.

I congratulate you on your promotion. Your good examination no doubt proves that you studied very faithfully through the year.

NEW YORK CITY.

DEAR POSTMISTRESS,—I am an American girl, but this is the very first time that I've ever been over this side of the ocean. I was born in Italy, and have always lived there—in Rome till I was eight, one year in Florence, and since then in Venice. In the summer we travel in all the best countries of Europe. I've been in all except Norway. I can't speak English as well as Italian, and and in the winter we travel in the States, better than any other winter for a few weeks, and we may live there next winter again. I saw the Statue of Liberty from Rome, and I liked the Italians so much. I think they are the nicest people except, of course, the Americans. Venice is so different from any other city. There are no squares and horse-cars, and we go about in gondolas. We live in an old palace, which is so big we only occupy about half of it, and so it is nice place to live in. I have many friends and me. I wish you could come and stay with me, and go about in a gondola and see all the beautiful churches and palazzos. I don't think New York a pretty city; it's the ugliest I ever saw except London. L. M. P.

I cannot agree with you in thinking New York ugly; some of its uptown streets and squares are very beautiful. You may write again some time from the other side, and tell us of your travels and occupations.

POTTSVILLE, PENNSYLVANIA.

Since you decided incomprehensibility to be the longest word in our language, I have discovered another, straightforwardness, containing as many letters. FLORENCE.

PATERSON, NEW JERSEY.

I am going away on the 1st of August, if all is well, and I would like to tell you about the place that I am going to. It is Hanover, New Hampshire, and you will not be there, but I missed seeing a very pretty place. My uncle has a farm, and a good-sized house facing a common which in the summer time looks like a carpet of green velvet. Hanover is a college town, and in the fall the students play base-ball on the common. The boys sometimes fight for canes and hats, and accidents have often happened; once a boy was brought from the field unconscious. I suppose they begin in fun, and at last get provoked, and are then in earnest. The boys of the rival party try to get hold of them, they will look for sleeve buttons and neckties that they lose while fighting. Hanover is a very fine—I don't mean the roads, but the scenery. I have a bird whose name is Tit Willow. He hops on my finger and hand for seed. I bet him many times every day in the winter, but it is so warm we want the windows open, and if he were to let loose he would fly away. I am thirteen years old. On my birthday father gave me a piano, and mother a large teacher's Bible. I also received a gold bow chain, a pair of cuff buttons, two fans, a box of sewing-wax, a pin-cushion, and bottles and other pretty things. I send you the receipt for the nicest sponge-cake I ever tasted, and hoping you will have as good luck with it as my mother has had (she made some to-day, and it was very nice), I will say good-by.

SPONGE-CAKE.—One pound of eggs, one pound of strained sugar, and one pound of flour, and one pound of two lemons and juice of one. Beat whites and yolks of eggs separately and very light; grate rind of lemons in sugar; add to this the whites of eggs, then the yolks, then the flour, and lastly the juice of the lemon. Put paper in the pans, and butter them well. NELLIE B.

BROTON, MASSACHUSETTS.

I live in Ottawa, Ontario, but I am not my cousin just now. This is the first time I have ever been in Holyoke, and I like it very much. I want to do a paper all one day, and saw them making it, and I want to know how they do it, and that I belong to. In March, 1885, myself and some others got up a society, and we call it the Busy Bees. We paid five cents every month, and all those whenever we were absent from a meeting, unless kept at home by illness. There were thirteen of us. We held a bazaar on the 15th of October, 1885, and made nearly one hundred dollars. Our badge was a little pale blue ribbon, and at the bazaar we wore our badges and white caps and aprons with blue laces. I forgot to tell you that six of the thirteen were boys—honorary members. We are going to furnish a room in the new building in Holyoke. We had a letter from the thirteen members. Our president is Isa G., our secretary Katie W., and our treasurer Nellie M. We expect to have another bazaar this fall. I like HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE very much. I will see them twelve years old next month. BESSIE M.

BROTON, MASSACHUSETTS.

I am thirteen years old, and am still going to school. I have two pet kittens. Our school had a picnic not long ago, and I went, and had a real nice time. Our school takes this paper, and we all think it very good. Have you ever heard my first name before? LUCINE T.

Never, dear.

NORWAY, IOWA.

We have two canary birds; their names are Dick and Cherry. We also have two dogs and a pony, which is twenty-five years old; her name is Dolly. I like to read the letters in the Post-office Box very much. We have taken this paper ever since it was published. My favorite stories are "Nan," "Roll House," "Left Behind," "Wakulla," and others. I like to read and study arithmetic, geometric, geology, physiology, spelling, grammar, and writing. I take music lessons from my mamma. I am fourteen years old. ENA E.

WESTFIELD, CONNECTICUT.

I have taken HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE for four years, and I think it is the best paper I take. I have two papers besides. I have no pets, but I have two little brothers. I am the eldest, and am nine years old. Our mother is very strict and kind, and my cousin Winnie, were out in the barn, jumping off a low beam backward, and turning round while they were in the air. Charley had not tried it before, but he thought he could do it, so he said, "See me, now!" but the beam was slippery, and he went straight down and struck his head on the beam and fell backward on to the hay. He had his lip between his teeth, and he hit through it and knocked his upper teeth loose. He could not eat at first, but all right now. Mother is very good and kind, and is going to read for me, so I will say good-by. HENRY R. B.

A very dangerous way to play, in my opinion. Please amuse yourselves in some safer way.

I think, dear girls and boys, that you ought to feel complimented, as I do, that a professor in one of our leading universities should sit down to write a story for our Post-office Box. The fact is that everybody, young and old, who peeps into these columns at all is very soon filled with a desire to belong to so gay and merry a set of people as we gather here every week of our lives. Now for the professor's story, for which, many thanks.

TOWSER AND HER PETS.

Towser was a big Newfoundland dog. She had four doggie pets, with little collars round their necks, on which their names were written—Fido, Gray, Topsy and Flip. Towser was very fond of her mother very much. They lived in a little green house with a blue door, down by the river. Once upon a time it began to rain, and it rained hard for two or three days. The river grew deeper and deeper and wider and wider, until the doggies' little house floated off with the doggies in it. Then they began to cry, "Bow-wow! Oh, woe! somebody come and help us!" but nobody came. Poor little doggies! They floated on, until they came boom on the shore. There a big man with a gray hair, watch and a red coat, the flood. He said, "My gracious goodness me! here are five dogs, an old mamma and her pups, and they look so hungry!" He went to take them up to his house and give them something to eat. So he took them up and gave them—here my little three-year-old boy always takes up the story, and says, "and a magnificent large bit of fare"—jelly-cake, and lemon pie, and bubble-cakes, and chops, and strawberries, and grice, and fried potatoes, and oatmeal, and hominy, and graham-fried sugar, and hot pepper and coffee and tea, and drink, and water, and roast beef." (The programme is much varied.) "After that," says my little brother, "they these things they cuddled their noses down by their mamma, and all went 'by-by.'" (And the boy himself then does likewise.)

I live in the town of Alameda, a suburb of San Francisco. Strangers say it is a beautiful town, but I have lived here so long I don't like it, and so cannot see all its beauty. It seems to be quite the fashion now to ask girls who write to you, so I will follow the general example, and request some girls who are interested in home work and such things to write to me.

DEAR POSTMISTRESS,—I have been taking HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE for quite a long while, and think it the best paper I ever heard of. I have always been interested in the Puzzles. I liked "TWO ARROWS" and "INTO UNKNOWN SEAS" very much. I have a printing press and a very nice outfit of type, etc. I would like very much to see this letter printed. I enclose all the answers to last month's puzzles, and four new ones. IRICHARD W. (aged twelve).

Thank you.

LITTLE BERRY-PICKERS—A CHANCE MEETING.

THE BOAT-DWELLERS OF JAPAN.

YOUNG people who live in London or New York may fancy that our cities are crowded, and that many families must live without very much air to breathe or space for the boys and girls to play in. What would they say to the boat-dwellers of Japan? In that crowded country hundreds of families spend their lives and bring up their children upon the water, and know nothing of the land, except as they make an occasional visit to it when obliged to purchase supplies or attend to some unusual business.

In every bay along the coast are found hundreds, if not thousands, of small craft called "junks." These are small, flat-bottomed boats, and are owned and inhabited by a man and his family, just as houses are in other parts of the world. Their business is the transportation of goods and merchandise of all kinds, and their navigation is a sort of family affair. One traveller says:

"I have seen a boat twenty feet long most adroitly managed by three children all under seven years of age. I am told that, notwithstanding their aptness at swimming, many boatmen get drowned, for no boat ever goes to another's aid, nor will any boatman save another from drowning, because, as he says, it is all fate, and he who interferes with fate will be severely punished in some way."

Among these wonderful aquatic families children of three years old will sometimes swim like little fish, and if one is backward in learning, he will be thrown overboard, and teased and tormented until he is obliged to learn the art in self-defence.

Ah! it is in reading and learning about the people of other lands that we find how much we have to love and be thankful for in the broad free life of our own. But even here there are children who would be the better for such frequent baths, and perhaps you would have great difficulty in persuading the little Japs that life in the hot and crowded streets of our great cities was to be preferred to that of the junk-men on the rivers and harbors of their own country.

AMBITION

BY MARGARET E. SANGSTER.

If you tug at the string so, foolish kite,
You'll presently sail far out of sight,
Away, away to the distant blue
Of the sky that is bending down to you,

With pennons of cloud on a boundless sea.
Better, my beauty, remain with me.

Rise, if you will, on your strong white wing,
To the lofty cliffs where the eagles cling;
Float, a speck in the upper air,
The daring flight of the wild fowl share.
But, kite, be sure it is all in vain
At the cord which holds you to fret and strain.
I never will let you quite go free:
By the strength of your tether you're bound to me.

If some day, east from my loosened hand,
You steer like a bird for another land,
You'll waver and falter, an aimless thing,
And drop, poor bird, with a broken wing.
Safe and certain your poise will be
So long as you're held by a clasp to me.

A lesson, my man, from the kite for you.
Turn your eyes from the beckoning blue;
Isn't there something fair and sweet
Lying close to your heedless feet—
Something a brave young heart may give—
A noble fashion in which to live,
Doing the best in a lowly way
Where God has placed you, from day to day?

In the dear old garden bloom the flowers,
Decking with lustre the passing hours;
Grandmother loved them long ago,
Watched and waited their time to blow.
What if they wear a homely name,
Little they reck of praise or blame;

Their ambition, 'twixt you and me,
Is but with honey to lure the bee.
There are few good lessons a boy might not Learn from a fair old garden spot,
Even in days when to fly a kite
Is a rapture of pleasure from morn till night.

THE FAITH OF LITTLE HANS.

BY EDITH MILLER.

A FIERCE wind came sweeping around the corner of Pennsylvania Avenue one morning in the winter of '84; down the deserted street it rushed, whirling the freshly fallen snow into little light heaps, then scattering it madly in every direction. Against this storm a young woman was making what progress she could toward the Post-office. A pair of dark eyes and a very pink nose were all that was visible above her wrappings. "I must hurry," she thought, as she glanced up at the great clock, and in a few minutes she was at her desk in the Dead-letter Office. Her work was to open and read all the letters whose destination could not be found from the envelop, and whose contents often reveal the desired address.

What a motley pile it was that lay before her! Here was one from a broken-hearted father begging a wayward son to come home, and telling him that his voice and smile alone could remove the gentle melancholy that had settled upon the dear old mother.

Here was another from some queer old gentleman full of the small-talk and scandal of his own village, and touching upon political scandal then rife in the city where his letter had found lodgment.

There were letters full of the vivacity of the school-girl, letters full of the burning love of the college boy, letters whose prim upright hand and gossipy nature suggested spinsterhood, letters to convulse you with laughter, and letters that would give you the heartache. Yet, strange to say, not one of these eager correspondents had taken the pains to write the correct address on the envelop that contained so much that seemed to be of the greatest importance. Perhaps they were too much absorbed in what they had said from their hearts to take thought for the formal writing on the outside.

The young clerk had worked her way down through a large heap, and was beginning to think of lunch, when she came upon a peculiar little envelop addressed in German to "Jesus in Heaven"; she tore it open hastily, and found a soiled sheet written all over in a child's cramped hand. Some of the words seemed blurred with tears, and she could scarcely make them out.

Here is the translation:

"DEAR JESUS,—I have prayed so hard to you, but I guess you could not hear me so far off, so I am going to write you a letter. We came over a big ocean when it was summer-time. My mamma has been sick all the time. Can't you send her something to make her well? And, dear Jesus, please send my papa some work to do, so he can buy us some warm clothes and something to eat, and please do it quick, for we are cold and hungry.

"Nobody knows I am writing to you. I thought you might send us something for a surprise.

"HANS BRAHM.

"P.S.—My hands are so cold I can't write very well."

Katrina's eyes were filled with tears as she came to the end. She sat for some time with the letter in her hand; as she folded it she resolved to do something to make the little boy happy. She said, "Whatever his parents may be, this beautiful child faith must not be destroyed." That evening after dinner she told several of her friends about the matter, and they were eager to help her make up a box.

It was ready in a few days. There were some flannels for the mother and little Hans, comfortable clothes for the father, and toys enough to make the boy believe that the Christ Child did not live in Germany only. At the very top lay a crisp ten-dollar bill. As soon as the box left the house Katrina wrote a letter to Hans. She told him his letter had been received, and that Jesus had sent one of his servants on earth to help him, and that a nice box was on its way out West.

Not long after there came a letter of warm thanks from the father. He explained how they had been in the country but a few months, and had not yet found work.

As the weeks went by another and another letter came, telling of fairer prospects and brighter days. One thing they assured Katrina—"that they could never forget her kind letter and generous help in their time of saddest need."

BOYS WHO BECAME FAMOUS.

BY DAVID KER.

CAUGHT IN HIS OWN TRAP.

AFTERNOON was wearing toward evening in the west of England, and darkness was already beginning to creep over the shadowy chambers and long narrow passages of an old English country house, although it was still broad daylight outside. Darkest of all was a deep recess in the wall at the end of the great corridor in the third story, where a boy seemed to be hard at work upon something that appeared to require all his attention.

Had there been light enough to see his face, any one who saw it would have been struck by the fineness of its outline, and the thoughtful depth of expression in the large bright eyes which attracted the notice of all who saw him for the first time, although no one could easily have guessed then what he was one day to be. But just at that moment "Wild Davie," as he was very justly called, was busy with a very mischievous piece of sport, indeed—nothing less than the dressing up of a "ghost" to frighten his playfellows.

In the dark recess at the end of the corridor stood a marble statue of Apollo the Archer, with one arm outstretched as if in the very act of bending his fatal bow. Outlined in its ghostly whiteness against the deep gloom behind it, it was a startling sight at the best of times; but beneath the skilful hands of our hero it was fast growing into a monster that might have scared General Grant himself.

Leaving the long white neck standing out bare and spectral against the darkness, he folded a black cloak around the body, letting the cold dead whiteness of the marble peep out every here and there. Upon the face he fixed a hideous red and black mask with staring eyes, while over the extended arm he hung a white cloth with a crimson handkerchief pinned to it, which at a little distance looked terribly like a broad stain of blood. Around the lower limbs he wrapped a piece of yellow Chinese silk, twisted up so as to look like a coiling snake; and then, by way of a finishing touch, he placed at the monster's feet a small lantern, lighting up all the ghastly details with a weird, unearthly glare.

"Won't it make 'em jump?" chuckled he, as he stepped back to look at the effect of his work.

If any one had told Davie at that moment that he was playing a very cruel and cowardly trick, which had frightened many children to death, and scared many more into hopeless idiots, he would have been greatly surprised and shocked; for, with all his thoughtlessness, he was thoroughly kind-hearted. But all that he thought of was the fun that it would be to himself, little dreaming that he was just about to receive a lesson which would cure him of playing such tricks for the rest of his life.

Just then a loud voice was heard calling out from the foot of the stair:

"Davie! Davie! where are you? Come along, quick; we're going to drive round by the lake, and watch the sun set over the mountains."

And "Wild Davie" went off like a shot.

The drive lasted so long, and there were so many things to be looked at on the way, that by the time they got home again our friend Davie had forgotten all about the frightful sentinel that he had left standing at the end of the upper corridor, and went racing along it at full speed to get to his room.

The next moment a howl of terror startled the whole house, and three or four of the servants, hurrying to the spot in alarm, found Davie lying on the floor, half fainting with fright, in front of the monster which he had himself dressed up.

All that followed may easily be imagined—the rush of the whole household to see what had happened, the wonder, the dismay, the scoldings heaped upon poor Davie, and (hardest of all for him to bear) the loud laugh of the other boys as they realized how neatly he had been caught in his own trap.

But there was one person there who did not join in the laughter, and that was a quiet old gentleman with a long gray beard—at that time one of the most celebrated artists in Britain—who had just come down to the country for a few weeks' holiday.

"This boy has the eye of an artist," said he, looking keenly at the terrible figure. "He will be heard of yet."

And the old man was right. Not many years later "Wild Davie" was famous throughout all England as David Scott, the painter.

THE NATIONAL GAME.

BY N. P. BABCOCK.

I WAS travelling in a railway train the other day, and just behind me sat a middle-aged gentleman and a small boy. I did not discover the relationship between the two, but I became aware at once that the younger traveller was politely endeavoring to hit upon some topic of conversation which would be mutually interesting to himself and his much older companion. It was up-hill work for a time, and the conversation went along, with many halts and jerks, in the form of a widely scattered range of questions from the boy, and monotonous "Noes" and "Yesses" from the other traveller, until suddenly the boy inquired, "Do you think the Detroitis will win?" There was no difficulty after that in maintaining a conversation.

I dare say the middle-aged gentleman, who was very stout, and who didn't look as though he could break into a trot even though a wild bull were at his heels, would never have been able to hit even a "slow twister" pitched by his active-looking little companion, and that a "nine" composed of such persons as he, if put into the field against nine players of his companion's size, would be defeated by a score of about seventy-six to nothing, but theoretically and historically their knowledge of the "national game" of base-ball was about equal, and their interest in the subject equally intense. I think even good Mrs. Tendermother, whose horror of base-ball is born of a knowledge of its evil consequences to youthful hands and youthful limbs, must admit that it is a deeply interesting game, when her boys cheerfully risk the dis-jointing of their fingers to play it, and their father closes his office to go and see it played.

Last year I told the base-ball-playing readers of HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE something about the art of pitching, and endeavored to show the manner in which the several "curves" could be effected. There have been no new discoveries in this "art" since then, although a great many new pitchers have come into prominence in the various professional leagues of the country. At a convention held in this city last winter, it was decided after a great deal of argument to lengthen the limits of the "pitcher's box," that is, the enclosure in which the pitcher must stand when delivering balls, from six feet to seven feet. The intention of this change was to enable the pitchers to increase the speed of their delivery. With this single exception the rules of the National League, which of course govern all base-ball playing, are the same as they were last season. The national interest in the game has steadily increased, and during the summer just passed there have been a greater number of leagues or associations represented on the ball field than ever before. In addition to the National League—in which "nines" from Washington and Kansas City have taken the places of nines from Providence and Buffalo—and the league of the American Association, there have been engaged on the professional "diamond field" during the season a Southern league, an Eastern league, a league consisting of clubs from several cities of this State and points in Canada, and a league made up of nines in the far West.

I take it for granted that the majority of the boys who read this article have carefully followed the progress of the National League clubs during the season, and have their own opinions concerning the respective merits of the several nines, although, of course, my young friend who lives on the banks of the Detroit River will not be apt to agree with either his cousin in Chicago or his friend in New York in their conclusions, nor will they agree either with him or with each other. It may, however, interest a good many amateur ball players to learn what, in the opinion of several base-ball experts and critics, would be the strongest "nine" for batting that could be put together if one were to have a pick from all the clubs belonging to the National League.

If, according to these judges, the object were to form a base-ball nine composed of the best batsmen in the United States, the nine would be as follows: Brothers, of the Detroit, first base; Kelly, of the Chicago, catcher; Hines, of the Washington, centre field; Ryan, of the Chicago, right field; Richardson, of the Detroit, second base; Stemmyer, of the Boston, pitcher; Glascock, of the St. Louis Club, short stop; Esterbrook, of the New York, third base; and Wood, of the Philadelphia, left field.

It would be very difficult for anybody to decide just which nine players of the many in the League to select in attempting to form the strongest fielding nine. I shall certainly not try to do it. Of this fact you may be sure, that whenever you hear any one say, as I have often heard, safe balls, in the unexpected bunching of base hits, and in unavoidable pass balls at times when the bases are occupied) belong to the game, that many professional base-ball players have become almost superstitious in regard to the matter, and several clubs have provided themselves with what they believe to be "mascots," or bringers of good-luck. For several years the famous White Stockings of Chicago have from time to time carried about with them, during their travels, a little Chicago boy named Willie Hahn, whose presence on the ball field is believed to bring them good fortune. The little chap wears a uniform just like the members of the club, and is, in fact, one of the family. John Morrill, the Captain and famous short stop of the Boston nine, recently told of a "luck omen," as he called it, which was possessed by the Boston during the season of 1888. "When we were way behind in the race for the championship," said Captain Morrill, "one of the members of our nine saw a horseshoe in front of the hotel in Detroit. He stepped into the street and picked it up. On it was the mark, 'O. Win.' It was only the name of the Detroit blacksmith who had made the shoe, but as we won the game that day, the members

A BASE-BALL MATCH.—FROM AN INSTANTANEOUS PHOTOGRAPH

"Oh, if such and such a club could only get so and so in the nine" (mentioning the name of some famous player not belonging to that particular club), "it would beat everything," the speaker does not know what he is talking about. The brilliant playing of no one or two or three individuals in a base-ball nine counts for very much, unless the nine is well balanced as a whole. In the formation of amateur clubs my advice to you boys is to take care that there are no particular weak spots in your nine. Never mind about hunting up some especially bright star, and then priding yourself upon his possession; remember that it takes nine players to properly field a game of base-ball, and that uniformity is a very necessary thing.

There is one feature about the game of base-ball which I do not think is generally appreciated, and that is the large element of chance or luck that enters into every contest. It is a source of wonder to many persons that one club which is known to be vastly inferior to another is able at times to give the better nine a severe drubbing, and charges of dishonesty and "selling out" are frequently brought against players who have done their best under adverse circumstances to win. So largely does this element of chance (found partly in the accidental batting of of the nine began to regard the shoe as a good-luck sign, and the first thing we knew we were winning games right along, and ended the season in the lead. Our players attributed our success to the horseshoe, and so did Mr. O. Win, who never fails to call upon us when we are in Detroit."

Of course the explanation of the success which has frequently followed the possession of these good-luck symbols is found mainly in the fact that a belief in them has a tendency to give the players confidence in their own ability, which is a long step toward success in base-ball as well as in the more serious undertakings of life.

The struggle for the college base-ball championship during the past season was extremely close and exciting. Yale and Harvard, after successfully defeating Princeton, Williams, Brown, and Amherst (which last four mentioned colleges finished the race for the championship's pennant in the order named), were themselves tied for first place, and were obliged to play a deciding game, which was won after a hard battle by Yale. It was chiefly through her sharp and superior base-running that Yale secured her triumphs.

The capital picture which accompanies this article, of an alert base-runner ready to avail himself of the first opportunity for reaching second base, is from an instantaneous photograph taken during a recent game. Each season's experience shows more plainly the fact that good base-running is one of the most important essentials of success in the game of base-ball, and is the most difficult work a player has to perform. There is no part in the game in which it is so absolutely necessary that one should have his wits about him, as in base-running. Remember this, that any clumsy, dull-witted player, if he has strength enough, can occasionally hit a ball for a home run, but that it requires intelligence, a ready wit, plenty of courage, and a cool head to make a successful base-runner.

THE STORY OF WILL-O'-THE-WISP.

BY MARY A. LATHBURY.

OVER the turrets of twilight land,
Down through the vanishing sunset light,
Whirling his lantern round and round,
Tumbled an elfin child one night.

"Had he a pair of wings to spread,
And break the tumble? And where did he fall?
Into a bed of greenest moss,
Or into a rose?" Oh, not at all.

He fell in the wide and lonely marsh,
Where low fogs sleep and the rushes grow,
And there he wandered about all night,
Swinging his lantern high and low.

"Oh, didn't you send for him, auntie dear?
Think of a baby in such a plight!"
Yes, we sent for him. Fred and Will Followed his lantern for hours that night.

"And did they find him?" Oh yes; but then
He put out his light, the treacherous elf,
And vanished over a low dark pool.
Twas wicked Will-o'-the-wisp himself.

CANOE "TALKS."

BY THE COMMODORE OF THE NEW YORK CANOE CLUB.

III.—SAILS AND SAILING.

"LET me see," began Mr. Russell, reflectively, the next time he met the Archer boys at the canoe clubhouse, "what was I to talk to you about this time?"

"Sails and Sailing," replied Alrek, the salt, eagerly.

"Right," said Mr. Russell, "and a most important subject it is. To begin with, if you will help me, we will prepare our illustrations."

After a few minutes' busy work four canoes, with masts stepped, and having four different styles of snowy sails, set and fluttering in the fresh breeze, lay side by side on the float.

"You will notice," said Mr. Russell, "that these are all sailing canoes, and that they all carry two sails—a large one forward, which is the mainsail, and a small one aft, which is known as the mizzen, dandy, or jigger. Paddling canoes only carry one moderate-sized sail, for use when the breeze is directly astern.

"This sail"—and here he pointed to the triangular mainsail of the canoe nearest him—"is known as a 'leg-of-mutton.' Although it requires a tall mast, which some canoe sailors regard as a serious objection, the sail runs to such a small point aloft that there is really very little surface exposed to the wind, and very little weight up there. It is the most simple form of sail, can be easily hoisted, lowered, or reefed, and, upon the whole, I am inclined to consider it the safest and most useful of all canoe sails. It is the one I recommend to your use, Ben, on your 'Nautilus' canoe.

LEG-OF-MUTTON.

"The next sail is a standing lug, a sail which is very nearly square, and consequently good for running before the wind. A small sail of this description is what I would advise you two boys to carry in your open 'Peterboro,' as an aid to your paddles, when running free, which means directly before the wind.

STANDING LUG.

"This is a 'balance lug sail,' wrongly called by some a 'batten lug,' on account of those light strips of wood or battens which are run across it from luff to leach to make it sit flat. The portion forward of the mast answers the purpose of a jib, and it is a most useful and easily managed sail, but is better adapted to the requirements of experts than amateur canoe sailors.

"The last of the four examples is a lateen—a sail which has little to recommend it save its picturesque appearance, and the fact that it can be hoisted on a very short mast. It is a good sail in light weather, but is awkward to reef, and is very much in the way of the paddle when lowered.

BALANCE LUG

LATEEN.

"Now I am going to explain the meaning of a few technical sea terms which it is absolutely necessary for all would-be sailors to understand. Although you can find these explanations in any book on sailing, I am sure that you will remember them better if you have them in your own note-books.

"First, then, for the different parts of a sail, and I think you would each better draw a diagram of this balance lug, and then write on each part the name I give you for it. The top of the sail is the head (a), the bottom the foot (b); the forward edge is the luff (c), the after edge the leech (d); the upper forward corner is the throat (e), the lower forward corner the tack (f), the upper after corner the peak (g), and the lower after corner the clew (h); the stick to which the head of the sail is laced is the gaff if it ends at the mast, but if it projects forward of the mast it is called a yard. The rope by which the sail is hoisted is the halyard, that by which it is lowered is the down-haul, and that made fast to the boom, by which it is held, is the sheet. The forward end of a canoe is the stem, the after end the stern, the right-hand side is starboard, and the left-hand port; the windward or weather side is the side the wind blows from, and the lee or leeward side is the side toward which it blows.

"A canoe is sailing on the starboard tack when her main-boom is out over the port side, and is on the port tack when it is over the starboard side. Any boat sailing on the starboard tack has the right of way over those sailing on the port tack; that is, they must get out of her way. Any boat sailing free, or before the wind, must give way to any that it meets sailing close hauled, or with the boom drawn in until it is nearly parallel to the side of the boat.

"To beat is to sail on alternate tacks, in a zigzag direction, directly against the wind.

"To come about, or go about, is to change the direction of sailing from one tack to another. This is accomplished by turning the rudder sharply in the direction you wish the canoe to turn, and letting loose the main-sheet at the same time. The mizzen-sheet must be drawn or tripped in as close as possible. As the canoe gradually rounds to on her new course, the mainsail will fill on the opposite tack, the mizzen-sheet may be loosened, and off you go.

"To luff is to throw the canoe into the face of the wind, so that her sails will flutter when they hang directly fore and aft.

"Always know the direction from which the wind is coming by watching the little dog cave at your mast-head, the ripple on the water, or by feeling it blow against your face.

"At night every vessel, when under way, or in motion, carries a green light on her starboard side and a red light on her port side. (Port-wine is red.)

"A canoe when sailing at night must carry a white light at the head of her mizzen mast, where it will be behind her skipper, and not dazzle him.

"In sailing a canoe, never make your main-sheet fast, but always hold it in one hand or the other. Remembering and following this rule will save you from many a capsizes.

"Now my time is up, and the 'talk' must end; though I could keep on for hours upon this interesting subject of sailing. Come again to-morrow, and I will give you one more 'talk,' which must be the last, as I am going to start on a cruise myself to-morrow night."

"Then won't you tell us something about cruising, Mr. Russell, please?" asked Bob.

"Yes, and about sleeping in a canoe, and all that," added Aleck.

"And shooting rapids and things," said Ben.

"I don't know about shooting rapids," said Mr. Russell, smiling; "and as for 'things,' I would strongly advise you not to take a gun, then you will have no temptation to shoot 'things.' But I think I can give you some points on cruising and sleeping in a canoe, 'and all that,' as Aleck says. Good-by."

LITTLE HAWK.

BY WILLIAM O. STODDARD.

THE grand annual buffalo hunt of the northern band of Blackfeet Indians was made a few years ago under unpleasant circumstances. It was always best for them to live close to the boundary line between the United States and the "Canadas," but never before had they quarrelled at the same time with the British and American authorities, and with their ancient neighbors and enemies the Sioux. So there was no telling at what moment their buffalo hunt might be turned into something else into being hunted themselves, for instance. Not a warrior or squaw or boy among them, however, had any thought or fear of being hunted or "run down" by the buffaloes. Blackfeet were nowhere safe from the Sioux, but above the boundary line they were safe from the "bluecoats," and below it from the "redcoats." Bisons were not safe anywhere, for it was time that all red men should "jerk" much meat and dry it for winter consumption.

Just about the middle of the forenoon of one of the earliest days of that hunt a particularly enthusiastic Blackfoot boy was in the most unsafe place he could think of. It was the bare back of his own pony, and the pony was in the middle of a vast drove of bisons. All these were rushing madly in one direction, as if some sudden fear had taken hold of their shaggy minds, and they were sweeping the young hunter and his pony along with them. The excitement of following a fine fat animal he had already half killed and wished to finish had carried him so far in among the tremendous game that when the "stampede" came he could not get out. He was a fine-looking boy of fifteen or sixteen, and he was armed with lance and bow and arrows. He was not now trying to do anything with his weapons. He was watching the lumbering gallop of the wild-looking, angry, frantic brutes that were now crowding and wedging closer and closer on all sides of him. His pony was a good one, and sprang forward through gaps in the drove, snorting and trembling with fear. There was no telling at what moment one of those mighty bulls might turn upon him, and there could be no dodging in such a press.

The boy knew well enough what would become of him under those trampling hoofs if once his pony should go down. No wonder his black eyes flashed around so eagerly over the tumult and toss and surge of that great brown flood of living creatures. On they went, and their very haste and rush was some small protection to the young hunter. The maddest bulls were in too great a hurry to stop long enough to kill him and his pony. Every now and then sharply uttered guttural sentences burst from his lips, and some of these meant:

"How long can it keep up? Stop some time? Pony go down by-and-by! Then? Ugh!"

There was a full hour of that awful riding across the undulating plain, bare of trees, and then from the crest of a roll higher than the rest could be seen a line of forest.

"Ugh! Bad! Break all to pieces!"

He saw that the torrent of bisons poured right through the woods, and he knew that there would be no care taken by them to select a good path for him. He felt more and more strongly that he had better be almost anywhere else. Surely he would be crushed against trees, or scraped off by branches, or else the pony would stumble in the underbrush. One huge, black-maned, furious bison bull had already made several efforts to get alongside of him, but the woods looked even more terrible than the bull.

Nobody anywhere knows where thoughts come from, and the Blackfoot Indian boy did not know what a thought was. He had never heard of such a thing, and so he did not know that it was a thought which came to him so suddenly. It came at the moment when his pony lowered his head to go under the sweeping branch of a great oak, and when the deep, hoarse bellowing on both sides of him made him shiver all over.

In one instant the pony's back was bare, and the branch was occupied. The thought had said: "Throw your arms around it, and let the pony go on, but stick to your lance and bow."

The next thought that came to him was uttered aloud: "All go by. Never saw so many. Never see pony any more."

That was enough to be gloomy over, but no rush of the bisons could break down the gnarled and rugged old oak, and it was well worth while to sit and see them go by. It was a wonder how they should all have become stampeded at once, for the Blackfeet had assailed them only on one flank. The boy wondered and made guesses about it as he sat upon the branch, until, just as the tide of quadrupeds began to thin a little, there came an explanation. More wonder and trouble and peril came with it also.

Clear and sweet and ringing, a few notes of bugle music poured in among the trees, and was replied to by thick-throated bellows of the vanishing bisons. Then a rider in a red uniform gay with gold, followed by others not quite so gay, rode up to the very tree the young hunter was watching in. It was the bugler of a company of British cavalry, and once more the "recall" sounded far and near, for there was a national reason why red uniforms could ride no further in that direction.

One of the men who had pulled up near the bugler had been at once picked out as "Redcoat Chief," and he now suddenly exclaimed, "Orderly, see that little hawk perched in that tree. How did he get there? Take him. Now I'll find out where the whole band is."

"Come down, Little Hawk," shouted a soldier, riding as closely as he could to the boy on the branch.

The boy looked at him and at the carbines and sabres and brilliant red uniforms. Of what use would be a lance and bow and arrows and one Blackfoot boy up a tree against all these?

Another thought came to him, and he instantly came down from the branch with a quick, lithe, springing movement. It did not put him upon the ground, but upon the back of the trooper's horse, behind the saddle. The horse reared and plunged, but the officer remarked, "All right, McGinniss. You've got him. Bring your little hawk along. He has surrendered unconditionally."

"We caught him right upon the line," said another officer. "Did you note that, Major Huntington?"

"Certainly. I saw the surveyor's mark on the tree, but the branch the little hawk was perched on came out northerly. We caged him on British territory, Captain Fay."

"We can pump him when the interpreter comes up."

There was a slight mistake about that. The little hawk was as silent as any other untamed bird when the interpreter tried him. He had changed his perch because of a sudden idea that nobody would shoot at him while on the new one, but he expected to be killed sooner or later. That was his idea of war, and there was war between his band of Blackfeet and all these men in red uniforms. Of course it was his duty to die without betraying his chief and people.

That entire company of cavalry, with a score of scouts and half-breed Indians, had been hunting that drove of bisons, and the stampede was accounted for. The animals had run away from so much red, and from the bugle music. Now enough killing had been done, and the men whose business it was were gathering the best pieces of the large "game" and carrying them to camp. The officers and the men with them, and their prisoner, rode there at once. Not a word did they extract from him on the way; but as they drew near their tents three ladies rode out to meet them. They were wives of the officers of that command, and the Blackfoot boy had never seen anything else so remarkable.

Major Huntington shouted to his wife: "Nelly, we've caught a little hawk." And at that very moment he heard a voice of shrill astonishment behind him exclaim:

"Ugh! Squaw!"

The interpreter was a quick-witted man, and he instantly replied with a lot of information about those ladies. The Indian boy could not help himself after that. In a moment more they were looking in his face, and laughing merrily. He answered any question they chose to ask him, and some of his answers were true. He knew he had not put in any facts that would help the redcoats to find his people, but he told the truth about losing his pony and getting into the tree. One of the ladies gave him a pair of old yellow gloves, and made him put them on, and they all asked him to come and have some dinner. He was sure the soldiers were going to kill him by-and-by, but he went and ate his dinner bravely. It was the most remarkable meal he had ever seen or eaten, and it spoke well for him that he pricked his mouth only once with his fork. He knew from the interpreter the name they had given him, and Major Huntington thought he knew from him that the Blackfeet were beyond the border. British cavalry could not follow them into the United States.

"We will keep Little Hawk in camp overnight," he said, "and see if we can get any more out of him. In the morning we can let him take care of himself."

That was precisely what Little Hawk meant to do at the first opportunity. He was at war with all that camp and the whole British army, except those very liberal "squaws." They gave him a new red and blue blanket, and hung a brass medal around his neck by a green ribbon. In spite of all that, however, the men in red tied him up at nightfall like any other wild captive.

"Kill him another day. Ugh!" said he to himself. "Can't find Blackfeet. Little Hawk find. Ugh!"

The camp fires burned low toward the next morning, and a thick mist came crawling down over everything in preparation for an autumnal rain-storm not many hours away. Under the heavy cover of the darkness and the fog tough young fingers toiled at the secrets of hard knots till they solved them. There were soldiers asleep close by, but the men had hunted vigorously, and their slumbers were sound.

One by one the knots gave it up, and then it was as if a shadow slipped away through the grass toward the "corral," where the spare horses were tethered. The sentinel on duty there heard no sound and saw nothing. Little Hawk had marked where to find a bridle, and he needed no saddle. The mist settled more and more heavily, and the remaining half-hours crept rapidly away. So did Little Hawk, until he deemed it safe to mount his new horse.

"Ugh! Not killed this time! Little Hawk got horse. Worth ten ponies. Ugh!"

He wanted to whoop, and had to hold his breath to keep it in; but there was noise enough made on his account. When the bugler sounded the "reveille" that morning he was half asleep. In a minute more the whole camp was wide awake, and in another minute all the men in it were looking for the prisoner.

"Count the horses!" shouted Captain Fay; and he had hardly said it before the corporal of the guard touched his cap to him, with,

"One bridle missing, sir. One of the best spare horses gone, sir."

"The Little Hawk!" exclaimed the captain, stamping

"IN AN INSTANT THE PONY'S BACK WAS BARE."

hard with one foot only, because he had not yet pulled on his left boot. He was red in the face, and there was much red in many other faces in that camp, and there were many and varied exclamations. The ladies had a great many things to say.

It was just so, later in the day, in a camp of Blackfeet Indians a number of miles away from any place where Major Huntington was likely to search for them. Every soul stopped work upon the buffalo meat they were "jerk-ing," and hastened to hear the story to be told by a boy who came riding swiftly in. It was a great story, but every word of it was true, and it had to be believed.

At the end of it a gray-headed chief stepped out and carefully examined all that had been captured from the British army by the boy the British army had captured in the old oak. He loudly announced his decision: "Little Hawk! Big brave some day. Trade pony for horse. Keep horse. Keep blanket. Running Bull is a great chief. Trade Little Hawk another bridle for red-coat bridle. Ugh?"

That was the end of it, except that Little Hawk's father was also a great chief, and traded a good pony with him for the horse, and his mother traded an old blanket with him for the new one. Nobody could trade anything with him for the glory of his adventure, or for the brass medal, or for the fact that he had eaten one pale-face dinner with a knife and fork. The pony he lost was never heard of again, and may have decided to become a bison.

CHAPTER XIII.

THE UNWILLING "FAIRY."

"WE'LL have to be early, Agnes," Sarah Hamilton was saying, about eight o'clock the next morning, looking in at Agnes's door. "You know all the costumes will be there to be tried on, and you will have your rehearsal. Don't make Gordon angry by being late."

Agnes's toilet was soon over, and before nine o'clock she and Sarah were hurrying down Tremont Street, around some side streets to the rear of the entrance of the theatre, and for the first time Agnes was taken upstairs behind the scenes.

By a succession of short flights of stairs of the narrowest and dirtiest kind, with small landings upon which the principal dressing-rooms opened, they made their way to the top of the house. One portion of the large space here was enclosed, making a long room, the general dressing-room of the fairies and other young people who took part in the performance. Several cracked mirrors, or pieces of what one might have been dignified by the name, were fastened at intervals against the wall, and between them were small shelves containing the necessary toilet articles of the young girls who belonged to the chorus. Some old chairs, a rickety wardrobe, and half a dozen wash stands completed the furnishing of the room, which now, lighted by the pale rays of wintry sunshine, looked forlorn indeed; and at night the flare of gas-light from a jet-stuck in the wall shed an even more unnatural and curious color. It was cold and dreary enough, but several of the girls were already there inspecting the new costumes, presided over by a portly middle-aged woman, who tried them on one after another, all of which she declared would need alteration. Hard enough work was it to attend the rehearsals and prepare for the performance; but added to this was the necessity for sewing in the long room under Mrs. Bixby's sharp superintendence, every one of the girls having to make the alterations in her own costume.

Agnes felt no sense of pleasure in being arrayed in a pink tarlatan costume, and having the shoulders and waist twitched here and there by Mrs. Bixby's dirty fingers, and hearing a run of complaints from one and all, Mrs. Bixby saying half a dozen times she wondered what made Jennie Alger fall sick just at the wrong minute.

The girls were very kind, however, and poor little Agnes found some one ready enough to help her in altering the dress, and then in showing her the way upstairs to the rehearsal. Fortunately Mr. Gordon's place was filled by some one else, so Agnes contrived to get through her part without very much correction, and at two o'clock was glad enough to share some of Sarah's lunch in the dingy little greenroom, it being impossible to get home again before the second rehearsal was called.

So the day was spent; Agnes, still conscious of the feverish pain in her head and the soreness on her chest; but for the young people who dazzled a large audience in the "spectacular" drama there was little chance to rest, and no heed of grumbling or discontent. Five o'clock saw the two girls eager enough to get out in the rain and be home again for a hurried tea before the return to the theatre.

"There is the new hotel," Sarah said, touching Agnes by the arm as they passed under the shadow of a fine doorway on Washington Street, and Sarah looked up admiringly at the many plate-glass windows, illuminated by gas-light from within, of a fine new hotel. Agnes lifted her eyes wearily. There were figures to be seen within one of the windows, but she recognized nothing familiar about either of them, although, indeed, one was the young physician who had attended Margaret Hofmeister, and the other was Mrs. Mostyn's nephew Guy. The two girls, threading their way through the crowded streets, past the windows so gorgeously made inviting for Christmas, were speedily lost in the crowd, although Sarah did insist upon stopping long enough to look at the very splendid scene in one store representing a family party, dressed in the latest fashion, and seated on the most artistic chairs, waiting for the arrival of Santa Claus and his wonderful carload of treasures, which seemed to be approaching from the other window.

"I wonder," said Sarah, "if anybody ever had a Christmas like that? Do you know, Agnes," she eagerly continued, drawing a sigh, and turning her thin, dark young face, with a wistful look, toward her companion, "I often wonder whether there ever are times quiet enough to really have fun and some sort of comfort in them? I don't ever remember a Christmas without hard work, and it seems queer enough too. There was one dreadful Christmas. No wonder ma hates to think of the day coming around. Joey, our eldest boy"—poor Sarah from her constant care of the little tribe of brothers and sisters had come to regard them as though she shared their ownership—"Joey fell from the trapeze in the theatre, and was killed. I'll never forget that night. We are poor enough now, but we were worse off then. The scene-shifters—pa wasn't teaching then; he was doing carpentering at the theatre—they elbowed together and paid for the funeral. Well, come along, Agnes; we'll be late, and dear old Gordon will bless us in his most approved way. Let's wish that happy wax family a very merry Christmas."

"Oh, Sarah!" cried Agnes, "just for fun let's choose what we'd like for Christmas, if we could."

And, unheeding the jostling and rough pushing of the crowd, the girls, little more than children really at heart and in years, made their choice, Sarah declaring that, while they were about it, they might as well select gifts for the entire family; and so, from a warm cloak for Mrs. Hamilton to kilts and black silk hose for little Florian Augustus, the youngest boy, the family were in fancy provided with Christmas gifts, the girls going on, laughing, in spite of their fatigue, over the amusement their fancy had furnished.

Will Agnes ever forget that day and evening?

The Hamilton family were in a state of general excitement, Mrs. Hamilton having half a dozen of the small costumes, "given out" to her by the general costumer, yet to finish, and Mr. Hamilton, violin in hand, practising some of the "fairy" in his class in certain of their steps, while Sarah hurried about, getting supper ready, and rehearsing odd bits of her part, and wishing that Christmas plays need not begin so much in advance of the actual season.

Agnes felt too bewildered, and, if the truth had been told, too ill to eat, and as there was no money in the little household to provide even car fare, the girls started for the theatre again at half past six o'clock with Mr. Hamilton and the three little ones, who were to appear in Cupid's train that evening.

The stage, as they crossed it, was occupied by a noisy company of carpenters and scene-shifters, who, under some one's superintendence, were "setting" the first scene of the fairy spectacle, and with the sounds of hammering and loud talking in their ears the girls ran up the rickety stairs, and entered the general dressing-room, where some one at once called out, "Do shut the door quickly; it is perfectly freezing in here already."

And then began the process of getting into her stage finery, and—most trying of all—being painted and powdered in a way which Agnes thought made her look like a clown.

"It has to be done," Sarah said, "or you would look like a ghost with all the lights of the stage on you."

"Poor child!" said a tall young woman, who was one of the sprites in the play—a leader of the elfish band, "You do not look used to much of this sort of work. Whose little girl is she?" she continued, turning to Sarah; and poor Agnes's heart thrilled with pain as she reflected whose, indeed, was she in the world this Christmas season.

Casting one horrified glance at herself in the cracked mirror, she turned away, following the others to the wings, where Mr. Gordon, still excited and ill-tempered, was going about counting up the chorus, calling to this one and that, and ready to give Agnes a few instructions.

From her place behind the scenes, with the band of fairies whom she was to lead on the stage, Agnes could hear the overture, the ringing up of the curtain, and the sounds of the first music, followed by deafening applause. A giddy trembling seized her. "Go on," said some voice, as the leader of the chorus gave her a little push.

Did Jennie Alger do this, feeling as she did, the poor child wondered, as, with a throbbing heart, she found herself on the stage, a sea of faces surging before her, the music ringing madly in her ears, and a sense of utter terror fastening itself as though with cold hands upon her.

Sarah, from her station at the corner of the stage, where she was representing the princess in fairy lore, gave her a quick look of encouragement, which served to bring

Agnes sufficiently to herself to sing the first verse of the little song which every one had thought little Jennie Alger did so remarkably well; but, alas! it was done in a lifeless way. Agnes, worn out by fatigue, scant diet, and anxiety, sang with a choking sensation in her throat, and then stood still, awkwardly enough, gazing straight ahead of her across the orchestra to the first row of seats, where gradually she was beginning to distinguish some of the faces.

"There! go back!" whispered the tall leader of the elfs in her ear, and at the same time Agnes felt some one pull at her dress from behind. But she had seen something which made her heart beat more rapidly, and rooted her to the spot.

Out of the sea of faces two familiar ones had grown clear. Dr. Tabor and Guy Mostyn were sitting directly before her. Agnes recognized them both with a rush of painfully bewildering thoughts. No longer could she remember that she was one of Mr. Gordon's "fairies," that she ought to go back and wave her wand over the small people in pink and blue tarlatan grouped about the silvery grotto. She could see only the little room with the scarlet geraniums in the window; Margaret Hofmeister's white face on the pillow; outside, the early November snow falling; and within, anxiety and the helplessness of suffering to make an added chill.

"Go back, can't you?" came in sharp tones from the manager at the wings; but the words were spoken too late. Little Jennie Alger's unsuccessful "substitute," scarcely knowing what she did, staggered from the stage, and fell in a dead faint just behind the scenes.

CHAPTER XIV.

THE RECOGNITION.

THE audience rarely know what life is going on "behind the scenes." To the crowded audience, the eager listeners, that night, little Agnes Leigh seemed only a stupid girl blundering through her part in an ill-trained fashion, and with neither voice nor taste for music. Few could guess how many a one like this child had begun early to fight the battle of life, with want and cold and hard usage for their daily portion; but young Dr. Tabor, the physician from Halcorn, knew something of it. His wife had chanced to be acquainted with one or two young girls who had tried and failed in an overcrowded theatre, and with a physician's eye he had at once detected that the thin figure and weary voice of Jennie Alger's substitute were the result of illness and overwork.

"What a stupid girl that is!" Guy Mostyn said, contemptuously. He rarely visited the theatre, and on this occasion was rather anxious to show Dr. Tabor, who had invited him, that he was able to criticise music and acting; but he had hardly uttered the words before he caught the doctor's arm, and exclaimed, in an excited whisper, "Doctor, I do believe that is the very Agnes Leigh Aunt Eunice is trying so hard to find—the girl we all sort of turned out of Halcorn by our silly chatter."

"Agnes Leigh?" returned the doctor. He too remembered the skilful, tender little nurse at Margaret Hofmeister's bedside, and how the queer gossip about her family history had puzzled him.

Guy anxiously told the story.

"Oh, do let us go and inquire at once!" he urged; and as Agnes, with a terrified look and faltering steps, staggered behind the scenes, Dr. Tabor rose and made his way quickly to the box office.

Admission at the back, he was told, was out of the question, but he gave his card, and explained that his business was urgent; he need only see the manager; so, rather reluctantly, a boy was sent with him around to the draughty passageway at the back, where a curious scene greeted him.

Deathly white, so that the paint upon her cheeks looked more startling than ever, was poor Agnes Leigh upon one of the rude benches against the wall, one of the chorus girls flinging water in her face, and another fanning her violently.

"I am a doctor," said the young man, hurrying forward, followed by Guy. "Can I be of service? And tell me, is not this girl named Agnes Leigh?"

Sarah Hamilton had come off the stage by this time, and was bending over her little friend.

She looked up sharply at the stranger and said: "Yes, it is. Poor thing, she is all worn out; but I don't suppose she had any real talent for it, anyhow," she added, with the opinion of one brought up to the profession.

"I hope it will be the last occasion on which she needs to test it," said the doctor. "As you seem to be her friend, can you tell me how soon I can get her to the hotel where we are staying?"

"My aunt, Mrs. Mostyn, is there," said Guy. "We have been looking for her for some time."

Fortunately for all those interested—and many, now curious at what they heard, pressed around the little group—the first act had come to an end. Agnes sat up, dazed and bewildered, but smiled joyfully on seeing Guy. Exactly what followed seemed hard for her afterward to remember in detail. The doctor sternly forbade her returning to the stage. There was the delay of giving up her costume to some one else who could take her part, however badly; then the waiting which she insisted upon for Sarah, and the drive back to the Hamiltons', with the doctor and Guy Mostyn still in attendance; a sense of creating confusion and pleasurable excitement in the little household; and finally the finding of herself on a sofa in Mrs. Hamilton's back parlor, with some quiet restored, while the winter night drifted into morning.

PLANTS AS BUILDERS.

BY SOPHIE B. HERRICK.

IN Virginia, near where Chesapeake Bay meets the Atlantic Ocean, lies a wonderful forest, different probably from anything you have ever seen. Tall tree trunks rise out of the dark water below, and stretch up and up till they are lost in the great matted bed of dark green leaves, and boughs which seem as if they were the roof of a cavern above-ground. It is always dim and dusky beneath this roof, even at noonday.

Great coils of grape-vines bind together the tree trunks, and out of the water rise the cypress knees—trunks that have grown up and then turned suddenly back again into the water. These serve to steady the trees and keep them firm in the wet, insecure soil. Tall reeds and grasses grow up between the trunks of the trees, and hanging masses of solemn gray moss drape their boughs. Here and there the surface of the sullen water is broken by little tussocks of grass.

The water is a dark coffee-color, but clear and sparkling, and sweet to the taste. Over all this wilderness of solemn trees and dark water reigns a death-like stillness, broken only by the humming of millions of mosquitoes or the splash and rush through the water of some water-snake or venomous moccasin which has been stinging itself on a log, and drops into the water on your approach. Here in this Dismal Swamp the battle between land and water is going on. The land, aided by the plants, is continually gaining ground. Into the water the leaves are always falling; the dead boughs from the trees, the dripping gray moss and the juniper berries, making a solid mat and slowly filling up the pools.

The water has the power of keeping the leaves from decaying as they would on land. This water is a very wonderful thing. Many years ago, when I was a child, I went out from Norfolk, Virginia, to see the old war ship Pennsylvania, that was lying near the city. One of the ship's officers handed me a glass of what I took to be brown sherry wine. I tasted it, and found it was pure, sweet water. This was the coffee-colored water of the great Dismal Swamp, and it will keep sweet for twenty years, on account of the juniper berries that have colored it. I think the glass I drank had been something like that time in the hold of the ship.

In some of the Louisiana swamps the surface of the water is covered for many thousands of acres with a growth of grass and plants, making what is called a floating prairie, where twenty years ago there was an expanse of clear water. The grass grows thicker and thicker every year. Sometimes, when this floating prairie gets heavy and water-soaked, it will all sink into the shallow water beneath. When this has happened often enough, the lake of the past will have been converted into a soggy swamp. Willow-trees seem to come up of themselves, and their roots bind more firmly together the slight soil and grass roots, and the land is born out of the water, gaining solidity and firmness year by year. These floating prairies, when the grass and roots and earth are only two feet thick, are strong enough to allow a man to walk about with ease, though they are floating on clear water several feet deep underneath.

In some countries—Ireland, for instance, where there is a great deal of rain—moss and small plants growing on a soft muddy place make a deep coating. Each year's growth is packed closely down on the growth of the year before. In this way a peat bog is formed. In the open air, when plants perish, they dry up and blow away, or decay, and so are lost, but in the peat bogs the water, like that of the Dismal Swamp, preserves things that drop into it. Bog oak, out of which ornaments are sometimes made, is oak that has been preserved in the water and turned black and hard with years, but is perfectly sound.

About a hundred years ago the body of a woman was found deep down in an Irish peat bog almost perfectly preserved; even the hair and skin and nails were sound. She must have been there a long, long while, for on her feet were, not shoes, but ancient sandals, such as have not been worn for hundreds of years.

The solid packings of moss forming peat are cut into squares and dried, and then used to burn instead of wood or coal in many parts of Ireland. This peat is coal partly formed. When it is pressed very, very hard by machinery it is made into a kind of coal which burns quite well. Some of the peat bogs in Europe were formed by the cutting down of the forests by the Romans. The trees were left lying where they fell, and often dammed up springs, and so a bog was formed which in the eighteen hundred years since has grown into a peat bog.

In most bogs formed in this way the peat is not pure; it is mixed with mud and sand; but in some places, as in the swamps along the Mississippi, the water has been strained of its mud before it reaches the swamp, so the peat is made just of layers and layers of leaves packed together by the water, and is perfectly pure.

Sometimes when solid continents or islands have sunk beneath the water, whole forests have gone down with them, the fallen trunks of trees and stumps in place; the dirt has sifted over these, till new land has formed above the old, new forests have grown up and fallen and been buried. A cut through such a bed may be seen below; the layers of sand and shells between the layers of tree trunks show that it has been under water between-times.

In New Jersey there are great buried forests of cedar which have lain there for centuries uninjured. People actually mine for timber. Some of the tree trunks lie fifteen feet under-ground. One of these trunks, which had lived for five hundred years, as showed by the yearly rings, was underneath another which had a thousand yearly rings.

SECTION OF CLIFF.
(From Lyell's "Elements of Geology.")

In Louisiana, where the timber grows heavily, great trees are often torn up and carried down-stream by sudden and heavy floods. These get wedged, and dam the stream, so that though the water can filter through, everything which comes floating down the stream is stopped and packed together, and forms great natural rafts. About forty years ago the government had one of these removed, which measured ten miles long, seven hundred feet thick, and eight feet high. It was covered with plants, and even a few great trees sixty feet high were growing on the top.

The plants we have been talking about are good sized—some of them large trees; but there are other earth-builders among plants too small for the eye to see. These are very wonderful little plants; in many ways they seem more like animals than plants. Each one is a little greenish dot of jelly, with a glassy coat like a shell. They may be found in almost any water, but it takes a good magnifying-glass to see them. I have found them in the water from a running stream, in a spoonful dipped up from the hollow made in a country road by a horse's hoof, or in a way-side pool. In the seas and lakes and rivers of the Old World these little creatures lived and multiplied and died, dropping to the bottom, and making earth of their tiny glassy shells. A piece of this earth smaller than an ordinary bullet or green pea would have in it over two hundred million shells, and yet this earth covers thousands of acres several feet thick.

Out in the western part of Virginia, only about a hundred feet below the top of one of the highest mountains in the State, there is a lake nearly a mile long and a quarter of a mile broad. It is as clear as crystal, and if you take a boat and go out upon its still surface, you will probably look at the sky or the green banks till some one says to you, "Look down." Then you see a wonderful thing. Down at the bottom of the water is a dead forest; the trees are standing up, with their naked branches spreading abroad in the water far below you. How such a lake can exist so high up it is difficult to guess. The water must come from the small portion of the mountain above it. One old man said some years ago he remembered about seventy years before, when there was no lake, only a valley filled with trees. How or why the lake came no one seems to have found out, though many guesses have been made. It is thought that the water which drained from the mountain used to escape, but that the way of escape was somehow closed, and so the water filled the valley. The trees, of course, died, but the water kept them from decaying and being lost. I do not know of any other place in the world just like this; but the same thing may have happened long ages ago, and trees in this way have helped to be earth-builders.

NEW SERIAL STORY.

THE FLAMINGO FEATHER.

BY KIRK MURDOE,

AUTHOR OF "WAKULLA," ETC.

Our readers will be glad to learn that a new serial story (the title of which is printed above) will commence in the next number. Although the scene of the story is laid in Florida, "The Flamingo Feather" has little in common with the author's previous story, "Wakulla." "The Flamingo Feather" is a romance of the period of the early colonization of Florida, and it is of absorbing interest. Several of the characters are Indians, but the central figure would be the young white hero, and his devoted Indian friend.

The story takes its title from the flamingo feather, which was worn by an Indian chief as a distinguishing badge or sign.

The illustrations will be drawn by Mr. T. DE TULLSTEP.

OUR POST-OFFICE BOX.

SOUTH BROOKLYN, NEW YORK.

I have a little pet. Its name is Methuselah. My mother gave it that name. First I will tell you how I got it. I saw a little black chick popping its head out of the water. I asked a Senator would he get into his row-boat and row out into the middle of the lake and see what that was popping its head out of the water. The Senator went out, and there was a turtle no bigger than a 25-cent piece. He gave it to me, and I put it in a large bottle, with water. I fed it with live flies. The funny thing about it was, if I gave it a dead fly it would not touch it. When it was time to get ready for me to go home, I got a large empty match-box, with moist grass, and air-holes so he could breathe. A friend of mine, Father, who I said that before we would reach Buffalo it would die. When I got into the train I put it into the umbrella case. In the morning I looked at my turtle, and it was still alive. After I washed my face, I washed the turtle's. We arrived at Buffalo at 10 o'clock A. M.; I went and looked at my turtle again, and it was still alive. In the morning we arrived at New York, at seven o'clock. When I got home, I put it into a dish, and gave it plenty of flies. Now I've got it in a large glass globe, and it lives happily, and is very tame. I want you to tell me how you like this story.

RODERICK EISKINE M.

I think it is a capital story. Roderick. Let me hear from you again.

ALLIANCE STATION, ON WINDMILL, VICTORIA, AUSTRALIA.

DEAR POST-MISTRESS,—On behalf of my sisters, all-w-m to thank you for your kindness in printing their letters. I cannot describe their delight when they told me their letters had been printed. Already my sister Maudie has received two letters from her American cousins, one from a little girl in Texas, the other from a little boy 10 miles from his writing, in Cincinnati, who wishes to exchange stamps. She has written to both, so if the letters have come astray (which they might), I hope they will see by this delightful magazine that she has written to them.

Now I am going to tell you about our animals and birds. The main one is a very large bird, and when fully grown it measures seven feet in length. Its wings are very small; in fact, they can hardly be called wings, as they are of such small size as to be scarcely perceptible.

The plumage is a mixture of gray and brown, and the feathers of its head and neck are of a hairy texture. The lower jaw is short and stout, and it runs with great swiftness. When attacked, it kicks out like a cow; not forward, like the ostrich, but sideways and backwards. The eggs are of a dark green, and the number laid is from nine to eleven. I almost forgot to mention that the eggs are nearly as large as an ostrich's. Emus are very fond of music and sounds of any kind; but they are not nice pets, as they frighten the horses. They used to be very numerous here, but during the last seven or eight years they have nearly disappeared.

Papa and my brother counted seventy-two once while travelling, the emus crossing their track about one hundred yards in front of them. The largest and strongest male usually leads the rest. If they are driven to bay, they run and hide their heads; poor things! they fancy that then they are safe.

The lowly or mallee bird is a curious bird. It is more remarkable for the manner of building its nest than for its appearance. It is of a speckled brown, and about the size of a turkey hen. The nest is built in the shape of a cone; the circumference of it is twenty-four feet, diameter eight feet, and height four feet. The egg is laid in spiral form until the top is reached, each layer being covered with fine sand and decomposed leaves. The heat hatches the eggs, and as soon as the young ones are hatched they crawl their way out, and are then able to take care of themselves. Perhaps forty or fifty work at the same nest. The eggs are of a pinkish color, but turn to a dead white when set in turkey hen air. They cannot fly, but run with great speed.

Then there is the bower-bird, but I dare say this bird is known to American boys and girls. They build their bower on the ground, which they like exposed to the sun. The floor of the bower is strewn with bones, quartz, stones, buttons, and any bright things they can find. The birds are very fond of chasing each other in and out. The bower is like a small avenue lined with flags at the top.

Now for Postmistress. I could tell you a great deal more, but I must not trespass too much on your space and time. With love from my sisters and self.

LUCY S.

KEY WEST, FLORIDA.

At one o'clock on the morning of March 29, 1888, our island city was visited by a terrible conflagration. Houses and places of worship were swept away in a few hours, while strong men stood by unable to save the homes they had worked so hard to gain. For twelve or fifteen fire raged, leaping from one structure to another, sweeping all before it until it reached the water's edge, and even the docks were destroyed, and the great, leaping fire of the pier, the big hacco, and various things smoldered on what remained of the wharves. The fire did many curious things; a large house would burn to the ground and leave a smoldering pile of bricks, scarcely scorched by the heat. The St. Paul's Episcopal Church was also burnt. We had, by good luck, everything that was needed, the organ and introducing gas, had bought a new library for the Sunday school, and raised enough money to buy six new windows. Our bishop closed while the work was going on, and he died before the fire we lost our beloved pastor, but we still continued to work for the church, and just as the flames were about to reach the fire-sweep it away, and all we saved was the silver communion service, the font, the bishop's and pastor's chairs, sacred because of the death of both in the fire. The organ was destroyed, and now church and all must be worked for over again. During the destruction of the church the organ was preserved, and it was of sad interest to us. Two white pigeons hovered over the building, and finally alighted upon the two arms of the cross, remaining there, gazed, until they were again swept away. The tower was burning and swaying ready to fall, the bell tolled three times as if lamenting the great disaster that was going on through the city. The organ we had tolled for, and which had been ours so short a time, pealed forth chords sweet and melodious to the last, a requiem for our loved church. I received Harper's Young People as a present, and had a little girl, and had all the numbers on file ready to send to get bound, but the fire destroyed them also, and all that remains of my treasured papers are those that received since that event. We wish to build a brick church, and think we can if others will help in this (to us) Herculean task. We have another pastor for a lovely young girl, hold service and Sunday-school in the United States Court house.

ALICE F. WOOD, Post-Office Box 101.

NEW HAVEN, CONNECTICUT.

My brother takes HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE, and I take St. Nicholas, but I like HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE best. I enjoy reading the letters very much, and I have two pets, a lovely dog named Top, and a canary-bird named Beauty. I go to Dwight School, and am in room No. 6. I study reading, writing, spelling, geography, language, music, and drawing, and arithmetic. I ride horseback, and enjoy it very much. I love to play lawn-tennis.

EDITH V. (age eleven years).

CAPE MAY, NEW JERSEY.

I arrived at Cape May on the 1st of July, and since then I have had a splendid time. I go bathing every day. I can swim, and our teachers allowed the pupils to read books, two of which must be instructive; I took The Vassar Girls in South America and England and the volumes of Franklin and Washington. I also read a book named "Rolf Hovse" was lovely. I take dancing lessons on the pier. There are seven children in our double cottage—my cousins Helen and Flossy, my sisters Harriet and Arthur, my brother Herbert and Arthur, and myself. You may imagine what gay times we seven have. Arthur is our dearest life. Then I have a dog, a great Newfoundland dog; he is in the city named Arthur loves the water, and I have a difficult time in getting him out of it. Though I love to have vacation, I shall be pleased with my studies (which I love) in September. Dear Postmistress, please excuse this writing with lead-pencil; my pen is broken, and no stationery store is near. I wish you were in Cape May. Would you like to see us? I am afraid you would have to stop up your ears with cotton, for we make a dreadful noise when we get together.

RENÉ H.

NEW YORK CITY.

I have taken HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE two years, but have never written to you. I am greatly interested in "Lille Witness"—in fact, I like all Mrs. Lucy C. Fiske's stories. I have read a great many story-books. I am going to London, England, and I wonder if you ever been to Canada? I have, and enjoyed it greatly. I think the Windsor Hotel in Montreal is beautiful.

BELL STATION, PENNSYLVANIA.

I have a very pretty dapple-pony, and I named it Bess. I took a ride on it this morning, and it goes very nicely. My papa bought a very pretty saddle for it too. I hope to have some very nice ride. My cousins were over to see me to-day, and thought my pony was very pretty.

FLORENCE M. II.

EMMA, ILLINOIS.

I am left-handed. My school-mate's name is Lora F., and my name is Laura H. Her birthday is on the same day mine is, September 8. I like to read, and I study arithmetic, history, grammar, geography, spelling, and Fourth Reader. I have a sister older than myself—eleven years old—and three brothers. I have no pets, but I have a urean, which I think as nice as pets; don't you?

LAURA F. II. (aged 9 years).

I prefer living pets myself to the prettiest playthings, but I understand that a little girl's doll is almost as dear to her as the little girl herself is to her mother.

I am a girl ten years old, but I do not think myself little. I have been taking HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE for one year, and find it very interesting. My only pet is a little black cat.

A tame crow once came to our house. He belonged to the butcher of the village where I used to live. His name was Jim-Jim-Trow. He got the yellow foot for one year, and he lived in a veranda, because the maid had lived in the butcher's family. One day he tapped on the window till mamma let him into the house. He saw mamma's work box on the table, and he jumped on the edge of the box was broken. He knocked off the cover, and helped himself to mamma's thread. He got his feet in the thread, and he began to peck as if till he got one foot

He lope, and then pecked the other foot loose. He was very smart, and would steal the clothes-pins and run away with them. One day we heard a funny whistle, like some one blowing in a bottle, and soon saw that it was Jim Cricket; he would blow his long, low whistle very often. I have a pet dog whose name is Cricket; he is a little brown fox dog. I am eight years old.

THE WATER-LILY.

Once upon a time there lived a boy whose name was John, and he had a sister named Alice. One day, when they were playing by the river, Alice saw a pretty boat with no one in it, and so she showed it to her father. He wanted a boat very much, and he said, "I want a boat just like that."

"John," she said, "can't you pull it to shore by that stick?" Try and see."

John picked up the stick his sister pointed to, and pulled the boat to the land and tied it to a tree. Then the children ran home and told their parents, and brought them down to the boat, which they found was the Water-Lily. It was painted white, and the name by which it was called.

The father took them for a great many sails after that, and one day, when they were out rowing, a man rowed up to them and said, "Where did you get that boat?"

John told him how he had found it on the river, and had kept it ever since.

The man said, "John, don't let me use to save people's lives with. Will you exchange for this boat?"

John said he would. The man told them to go over to his house and exchange. He then gave John The Grand. It was painted in light blue and yellow. The children thought the name suited the boat, and they said it was perfectly good.

Now John is large enough to row, so he rows Alice a great deal. GRACE H. P. (age eleven).

MY DEAR POSTMISTRESS,—I am going to write and tell you how much we all enjoy HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE. We have taken this delightful magazine for years, and although I am only a boy I enjoy it as much as my little sisters and brothers. We live in New York, but spend our summers here. We have a beautiful place right on the water. But I will not write any more at present. G. A. C.

THE DEATH OF BANTY.

(A TRUE STORY.)

Some weeks ago a story appeared in HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE called "The Little Bantam." Now it is my sad duty to record Banty's death. His life began to fall soon after I told his history. Everything was tried to keep the spark of chicken life alive in him; my grandmother dropped coffee and whiskey down his throat to stimulate him, but he grew weaker and weaker. When he became motionless, grandmother put him in his little box and covered him up to die. When she began to look in him for the last time, supposing him dead, Banty lifted up his head and gave a farewell chirp. Then she shut down the lid and turned away. The next time we opened the box Banty's vital spark had fled. Under a tall cedar in his grave, a gladiolus is planted on it. My brother, a young student of the classics, wrote the following inscription and put it on Banty's head-stone:

THE JACKET

QUI CALLENT A VITA

ANTE DIEM, VI. DICENSIT. JUL. MDCCCXXXVI.

And so Banty died wept and lamented by all. ALICIA TRAPIER II. (aged 11).

BONNIE LASSIE JEAN.

In the little town of Melrose lived a widow and her two children, a boy and a girl. The boy was tall and slender, with dark complexion, eyes, and hair, and the girl was just as beautiful as a figure, had a pink and white skin, long, curly, golden hair, and blue eyes. The boy was seventeen, and the girl was fifteen. The girl was called "Bonnie Jean," was fifteen, and her mother's eyes, everybody's—light and comfort. The father had gone to the war and had been killed, leaving Jamie four years old and leaving a bonny baby of two. Poor wife and poor children! no husband or father to care for them. The mother worked hard to give them an education, and now they were paying her back.

Bonnie Jean, as every one called her, was one day sitting with a sick friend, Nellie Gray, and reading, in her soft low voice, the book she loved best—the Bible—when, looking up, she saw approaching a feeble old man, and as he passed, saw him stagger and fall. She ran to him, and, looking at him, Nellie, who was now sleeping quietly, she bounded out of the open door and reached his side. "Is there anything I can do for you?" was the next thing heard; and the stranger said, "A cup of water." His lips were parched, and he drank it eagerly, while Jeanie held the cup. In doing this little favor she saw the letter addressed to "Mrs. J. R. Bruce," which was the mother's name, so she asked him where he was going, and he said, in a voice broken with gasps, "I'm trying to find Colonel Bruce's wife. I'm Jeanie Bruce, and I'll take you to her when you are rested," she said, softly.

In a little while the neighbors saw what was not a new sight to them, Bonnie Jean helping an old man who was more than a hundred years old to her own home, and helping him to a bed, went to tell her mother the story. She came, and heard the story of her husband's last days, and read the mother's name, so she asked him where her eyes. One sentence she read aloud: "I know our Bonnie Lassie Jean will be an angel on earth, for I've never seen my dear old man since he died, though he had searched for thirteen long years, but when you are rested," she said, softly.

"He was right," gasped the old man, and died, leaving them to weep over the letter and wonder over him. He had gone to the Colonel to tell him that his "Bonnie Lassie Jean" was all he had seen or hoped for—a little "angel on earth."

When Jamie came home at night he heard the story, read the letter, and saw the man who the next day was buried under a willow, which all regard as sacred; for he was the bearer of a letter which had saved the old man's life. He died, though he had searched for thirteen long years.

Bonnie Jean lived to be full fourscore, and died in glory to go to her dear heaven.

DEAR POSTMISTRESS,—I have often wanted to write to you in HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE, but I never sent a letter before this, and I now write to ask if the Postmistress or one of the readers can please let me know where I can get the music, and the price, of the song, the first verse of which is:

"I am sitting alone to-night, darling,
Alone in the dear old room,
And the sound of the rain, as it falls on the roof,
Makes darker the gathering gloom."

I was fifteen on my last birthday, the 13th of July. I think HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE is a lovely paper. I am now reading "Lala Rookh," by M. G. L. I will be ever so much obliged if you will tell me about the song. LUCIA A. M.

If any little reader can give Lulu the information, she will doubtless receive it in an early number of the paper, but a much more direct way would be to apply to the nearest book or music store, as, if the song is not out of date, it could be procured for Miss Lulu.

in the Punjab wrote to an English journal a most interesting account of a baby elephant which he had introduced into the family as a playmate for his children. Young Bobbo was about four months old, and about four feet high. His education was a matter which demanded no small amount of care and perseverance on the part of his master.

To begin with, Bobbo had no idea of the wickedness of taking what does not belong to one. He was fond of cake and sweetmeats, and no amount of covering up and concealment seemed sufficient to prevent that flexible trunk from poking into all kinds of holes and corners, and appropriating just what he found to his liking. Fruit he considered a great luxury, and it was no unusual circumstance to find him making off with a bunch of bananas that would have supplied the family for a week.

When Bobbo was a year old, he was put to the task of drawing a small cart. Usually he behaved well; but occasionally, when something displeased him, he would land cart, contents, and driver in a ditch, and then look on placidly while his unfortunate freight was rescued from the pickle into

CHAPTER I.

RÉNÉ DE VEAUX.

ON a dreary winter's day, early in the year 1864, young René de Veaux, who had just passed his sixteenth birthday, left the dear old château where he had spent his happy and careless boyhood, and started for Paris. Less than a month before both his noble father and his gentle mother had been taken from him by a terrible fever that had swept over the country, and René, their only child, was left without a relative in the world except his uncle the Chevalier René de Laudonniere, after whom he was named. In those days of tedious travel it seemed a weary time to the lonely lad before the messenger who had gone to Paris with a letter telling his uncle of his sad position could return. When at length he came again, bringing a kind message that bade him come immediately to Paris, and be a son to his equally lonely uncle, René lost no time in obeying.

"HE TRAVELLED LIKE A YOUNG PRINCE"

He travelled like a young prince, riding a spirited steed, and followed by a party of servants, mounted and armed to protect him against robbers and other perils of the way. Behind him rode old François, who had been his father's valet, and was now his sole friend and protector. The big tears rolled down the boy's cheeks as he turned for a last look at his home; but as it was shut out from view by the trees of the park surrounding it, he brushed them away resolutely, and turning to his companion, said:

"Thou hast seen the last of my tears, François, and with them goes my boyhood; for hereafter I am to be a man, and men know not how to weep."

"Well spoken, my young master," replied the old servant, greatly pleased at the brave words of the lad. "Thou art already a man in feeling, and thine uncle Laudonniere will presently make thee one in fact, if the tales that come to us of his valorous deeds be true, and there is naught to disprove them."

"Tell me of him, François: for though he is my only uncle, I have but little knowledge of him or his deeds. Of what nature are they?"

"Well, then, he is a mighty navigator, and 'tis but little more than a year since he returned from the New World, whither he sailed in company with his Excellency Admiral Jean Ribault. He brings strange tales of those wonderful lands beyond the sea, and rumor has it that he is shortly to set forth again for them with a noble company who will establish there a sanctuary for our blessed Protestant faith."

The boy's interest was thoroughly aroused by this, and he plied the old servant with questions concerning his uncle and the New World. François answered these to the best of his ability, and even drew largely upon his imagination to aid his glowing descriptions of those distant lands of which the men of that day held such vague knowledge.

With such talk they beguiled much of the tedious journey, that occupied a week ere it was ended, and they entered Paris. Here they were finally set down before a modest dwelling near the King's palace, in which Laudonniere was lodged.

Upon meeting his nephew, the Chevalier embraced him warmly, and then holding him forth at arm's-length to gain a better view of him, exclaimed, "In good sooth, René, thou'rt a likely lad; and if thy heart be as true and bold as thy face promises, we'll soon make a man of thee such as even thy noble father would approve."

That evening uncle and nephew talked long and earnestly together concerning the latter's future; and ere they slept it was decided that, in spite of his youth, he should make one of the expedition that, even as François had reported, Laudonniere was fitting out for the New World.

The next three months were occupied in busy preparations for the long voyage, not unmix'd with vexatious delays and grievous disappointments, in all of which young René de Veaux bore manfully his share. He became each day more useful to his uncle, who intrusted him with many important commissions; and who, stern old soldier as he was, learned in this time to love the boy as though he had been his own son.

At length all was in readiness; the stores and munitions of war had been placed on board the three ships that formed the little fleet, the last colonist had embarked, and Laudonniere had taken leave of his King and of Admiral Jean Ribault, who was to follow him in a few months with a still larger company. On a bright May morning uncle and nephew reached the little sea-port town before which lay their ships, and hastened to embark and take advantage of the favorable wind that promised them a fair start on their long and perilous voyage.

As Laudonniere stepped on board his flag-ship his broad pennant was flung to the breeze from the mainmast head, the fleur-de-lis of France floated proudly from the mizzen, and amid the booming of cannon and the loud acclamations of the throngs assembled on the quay to bid them God speed, the ships moved slowly down the harbor toward the broad ocean and the New World that lay beyond.

For many weeks they sailed ever westward, seeing no ships save their own, and becoming every day more weary of the vast, endless expanse of sea and sky. It is no wonder, then, that when on the morning of the 22d of June the welcome cry of "Land, ho!" rang through the flag-ship, every soul on board rushed on deck with joyous exclamations to catch once more a glimpse of the blessed land. The cry that had brought them such pleasure had come from the mast-head, and it was some time before those on deck could detect the dim blue cloud, low-lying in the west, that was said to be land. Even then one man, who was known as Simon the Armorer, was heard to mutter that it might be land and then again it might not; for his part, he believed the whole world had been drowned in a flood, as in the days of Noah, and that the only land they should ever see would be at the bottom of the ocean.

As the day wore on, and before a light breeze the ships were wafted toward the blue cloud, it was proved beyond a doubt to be land, for some palm-trees and tall pines became distinguishable, and above all other sounds came faint, but distinct, the heavy, regular boom of surf.

By noon the ships had approached as near to the coast as was deemed prudent, and for the first time since leaving France their anchors were dropped and their sails were furled.

They had come to anchor off the mouth of an inlet, before which extended a bar upon which the great seas were breaking and roaring so frightfully that no passage for the ships amongst them seemed to offer itself. Laudonniere thought that he recognized the inlet as one leading into a broad river, on the opposite side of which was located an Indian village called Selay. This place he had visited two years before in company with Admiral Ribault, and he determined to reassure himself as to the locality. Therefore, bidding René accompany him, he entered a small boat, and ordering another full of soldiers to follow them, he gave the word to pull straight for the breakers.

Just as René thought the boat was to be swallowed by the raging seas, his uncle guided her with great skill into a narrow passage that opened in their very midst. After a few minutes of suspense, during which René hardly dared to breathe, they shot into smooth waters, rounded a point of land, and saw before them the village of which they were in search. On the beach in front of it a crowd of savage figures, nearly naked, were dancing wildly, and brandishing bows and spears.

Mean while the village that the boats were now approaching had been thrown into a state of the greatest excitement by the appearance of the ships, which had been discovered while yet so distant that their sails resembled the wings of the white sea-gull. Upon the first alarm all the warriors had been collected on the beach, and the women had left their work in the fields of maize, and hurried with their children to the security of the forest depths. When, however, the fleet came to anchor, and the Indians could distinguish the meaning of their banners, their alarm was changed to joy; for they had learned to love the French—who upon their previous visit had treated them with kindness—as much as they hated the cruel Spaniards, whose ships had also visited that coast. Then the women and children were recalled from the forest, the warriors washed the war-paint from their faces, and preparations for feasting were begun.

As the small boats approached, the men ran down to the beach to meet them, dancing and waving their weapons in their joy; and when they recognized Laudonniere standing in the stern of the leading boat, they raised a great cry of welcome that caused the forest to ring with its echoes. As the pious leader of the expedition stepped on shore, he took René by the hand, and both, kneeling on the sands, gave thanks to Him who had guided them thus far in safety in their perilous wanderings. Though the simple-minded Indians could not understand what Laudonniere said or was doing, they were so anxious to show their respect and love for him that all knelt when he did, and maintained a deep silence while he prayed.

When Laudonniere arose to his feet, the Indians crowded about him with shouts and gestures of welcome; but they readily made way for him when, still holding René's hand, he began to walk toward the lodge of their chief. He was as anxious as his followers to welcome the white men, but his dignity had not permitted him to rush with them down to the beach.

As they walked, René stared in astonishment at the waving palms, with richly plumaged birds flitting among their leaves, the palmetto-thatched huts of the Indians, the shining and inflated fish bladders that the men wore suspended from their ears, the moss-woven kirtles of the women, and, above all, at the mighty antlered stag that, stuffed and mounted on a tall pole, with head proudly turned toward the rising sun, rose from the middle of the village.

He in turn was an object of astonishment and curious interest to the natives; for although they had become familiar with the appearance of bearded white men, they had never before seen a white boy, René being the first to set foot on this land. The Indians had thought that all white men were born with beards, and that their closely cropped hair never grew any longer, so that this smooth-faced boy, whose golden hair hung in ringlets over his shoulders, was a much greater curiosity to them than they were to him. The old chief took an immediate fancy to him, and as he had given to Laudonniere the Indian name of Ta-lah (a palm) upon the occasion of his previous visit to Seloy, he now called René Ta-lah-loko (the palmetto, or little palm), a name ever afterward used by all the Indians in their intercourse with him.

The chief entreated Laudonniere to tarry many days in Seloy, but the latter answered that the orders of his own great chief were for him to proceed without delay to the river known as the River of May, and there erect a fort and found his colony. So, after an exchange of presents, they parted, and taking to their boats, the white men regained their ships. As they left, René gave many a backward glance at the pleasant little village of Seloy, where he would have loved to linger among its simple and kindly people.

As they crossed the bar in going again to the ships their boats were surrounded by a number of what they called dolphins, but what are to-day called porpoises, sporting in the great billows, and on their account Laudonniere named the river they had just left the River of Dolphins.

Spreading their white wings, the ships sailed northward forty miles during the night, and daylight found them standing off and on at the mouth of the great River of May. By the aid of a chart, made by Admiral Ribault two years before, they crossed its dangerous bar, and sailed up its broad channel to a point where many Indians were gathered making friendly demonstrations of welcome.

Short as was the time since they had been discovered off Seloy, swift runners had already conveyed the great tidings of their coming to Micoo, the chief of this part of the country, and he and his people were thus prepared to greet them on their arrival. When René and his uncle, followed by a company from the ships, landed, they were received with shouts and extravagant gestures of joy by the friendly Indians, and conducted by them to the top of a hill upon which Admiral Ribault had set a pillar of stone engraved with the French coat of arms. They found it twined with wreaths of flowers, and surrounded by baskets of maize, quivers of arrows, and many other things that the kindly Indians took this means of offering to their white friends.

Not far from this point Laudonniere selected the site of his fort, and work upon it was immediately begun. He named it Fort Caroline, in honor of King Charles IX. of France, and about it he hoped to see in time a flourishing colony of French Huguenots.

After all the stores and munitions had been landed from the ships, they sailed away for France, leaving the little company of white men the only ones of their race in all that vast unknown wilderness. As Laudonniere remained in command of Fort Caroline, René de Veaux of course remained with him, and thus became the hero of the surprising adventures that will be related in the chapters that follow.

AN APPRENTICE BOY IN THE UNITED STATES NAVAL TRAINING SQUADRON.

BY ESSIGN E. E. WRIGHT, U. S. N.

DOUBTLESS a great many of our boy readers have been attracted by the notices displayed from time to time in all our large seaboard cities, reading as follows: "Boys wanted for the navy." But how few have ever realized just what they meant, or could have obtained much information on the subject had they been so disposed! I desire in this article to give the boys, and especially those who have a strong inclination to follow the sea, a correct idea of the life and duties of a boy in the United States navy.

In the first place, the term boy, as it is now used in the navy, refers almost exclusively to the apprentice boy. The training system in the navy has been in operation for a long time, but it was not until a few years ago that it was reduced to a regular, organized, definite system. The idea is, of course, to enlist boys, and train them to be seamen, with the prospect open for them to become warrant officers, although they can never become commissioned officers. Here is where a great many boys, and parents also, make a mistake. They are under the impression that the training system is similar to the Naval Academy, and that boys are trained to be commissioned officers. Several cases of this kind have come under my observation. The sooner this idea is done away with, the better it will be for all concerned. Suppose, for instance, a boy enlists with the idea that he will become a commissioned officer. After being on board ship for a short time, he, of course, discovers his mistake, and at once loses all interest in his work, and finally runs away or is discharged as worthless. Let me now take a boy as a recruit, and follow him through a number of years.

A candidate for admission to the training service must undergo a rigid physical examination. He must be perfectly sound, between the ages of fourteen and eighteen years, and up to the standard size and weight for his age. He must also have a fair knowledge of the common branches. If he passes a successful physical and mental examination, more importance being attached to the former, and has the consent of his parents or guardians, he is then enlisted as a third-class apprentice. This can be done on any of the receiving ships at the Navy-yards; on the Minnesota, at New York, especially commissioned for that purpose; and on the New Hampshire, flag-ship of the training squadron at Newport. As soon as he is enlisted, he is fitted out with the required uniform, and his citizen's clothes are sent home.

The majority of boys are shipped on the Minnesota. Nothing is done with them there beyond fitting them out, and when there is a sufficient number—from twenty-five to forty—they are sent to the New Hampshire, which may be considered the primary school for their instruction. The regulations governing the training system state that boys are to be kept at least twenty months in the training-ships before being transferred to the general service. This embraces the time spent on the New Hampshire and the cruising training-ships. But this, like too many other things in the navy, is only true on paper; in practice the time varies from a few months to two years or more.

The New Hampshire may be called the receiving ship of the training squadron—that is, she is stationary, and does not go to sea. But the most important and difficult work in the whole training service is done on this ship, for it is here that the recruit is given his first idea of naval life. The boys are given careful and systematic instruction in the groundwork of seamanship, gunnery, and boats, and a good common-school education.

One of the first things a boy has to learn, and also one of the most difficult for some, is to keep his clothes and his person clean; and if you consider it an instant you will see why it might be so. For instance: Take a boy at fifteen years of age—we will suppose he has been brought up in a good home, and has always had some one to look out for him and take care of both his clothes and himself. Now put him on board a ship with three or four hundred other boys, and make him wash and mend his own clothes, neither of which he knows how to do properly. It is not surprising that he soon becomes dirty, especially as nearly all his clothes are white, though it may not be so much from habit as from the fact that he does not know how to scrub his clothes. This is one reason why boys who have been picked up in the streets of our large cities learn this part of their duty more readily.

Now I presume very few boys have any idea where clothes are kept on board ship. Of course each one can not have a chest, for that would take up too much room; but every boy has a canvas bag painted black, and of sufficient size to hold all his clothes, and his number painted on the outside. These bags are all stowed in rooms for that purpose, and placed under lock and key, with a competent person in charge, who will not open them without an order from proper authority. In addition, each boy has a small wooden box, called a "ditty box," about a foot square, fitted with a lock and key, in which he can keep small articles, such as writing materials and sewing gear. All clothes belonging to the boys are required to be plainly marked with the owner's name, with a stencil provided for that purpose.

The pay received is equal to, and often exceeds, that which a boy could earn by working in a factory. All boys are enlisted as third-class apprentices, with the pay of nine dollars per month, exclusive of their living, or board, as you might call it, and bind themselves to remain in the service until they are twenty-one years of age. Of course a boy's first outfit will very likely put him in debt three months or more, but after that time, if he is careful of his clothes, he can begin to have some money to his credit. Any boy of ordinary intelligence will have advanced far enough in his studies and drills at the end of three months to be promoted as a second-class apprentice, with the pay of ten dollars per month, and frequently very bright boys become first-class apprentices in from three to six months, with the pay of eleven dollars per month.

At eight o'clock they have breakfast. And here let me say a word about the food. It is good, plain, wholesome, and plenty of it, and will compare favorably with that of any working man. On holidays extra preparations are made, and the boys are given a dinner, as the following bill of fare will show, which would do credit to many good hotels:

FURLING A SAIL.

Three-quarters of an hour is allowed for breakfast, and during that time the boys must dress themselves in the uniform of the day, which, except Sundays and holidays, is always white. These white suits are made of light duck, and look very neat, the blouse, or jumper, being made with a rolling collar, and a black silk neckerchief is worn under the collar, and tied with a neat square knot at the throat. After breakfast, until half past nine, the time is occupied in clearing up the decks, sweeping down, cleaning bright work, and getting ready for the daily inspection at quarters.

The boys are divided into four divisions, and each division into six crews of sixteen each. In order to give them some little authority, and enable them to take charge of a number of people, each crew is commanded by two boys, called First and Second Captains respectively, who are selected from among their number for their intelligence, military bearing, and general good appearance. They are responsible for the conduct of the rest of their crew while at any formation.

At half past nine all the divisions are called to quarters by a bugle-call, and after prayers by the chaplain the boys are formed in two ranks, and are carefully inspected by the officers of the divisions. Every boy must be in uniform and clean. All those who do not come up to the standard are reported, and receive a certain number of demerits. When the inspection is finished (it generally lasts fifteen or twenty minutes), the exercises for the day begin.

The time is divided into four periods of an hour each, extending to half past three in the afternoon, with an hour for dinner, and a short recess between each period. The drills and school are so arranged that each division has an equal number of exercises in the different branches during the week. But do not suppose that the day's work ends here, for at half past three half of the boys are marched to the gymnasium, and are exercised until five o'clock. Then the clothes which were scrubbed in the morning are taken from the lines, and after being carefully inspected to see that each boy has his proper clothes, they are stowed away.

After the clothes are stowed away it will probably be time for supper, which takes place at half past five. After supper, until half past eight, the boys have the time for recreation. At half past eight the hammocks are taken below, and each boy swings his hammock on its proper hook, unlashes it, arranges his bedding, and at nine o'clock all hands must be in their hammocks and keep perfect silence. Any noise made after this time is promptly reported and the offender punished.

Two evenings during the week a professional music teacher gives instruction in singing to all those desiring it. A full brass band and orchestra is attached to the ship, playing mornings and evenings, and on Saturday evenings, for two or three hours, the orchestra plays specially for the boys for dancing. There are always some very fine dancers among them, and they appear to enjoy it very much. The large island belonging to the training station furnishes a fine play-ground for the boys, and foot-ball and base-ball are played with great interest on Wednesday and Saturday afternoons, when all drills and exercises are suspended. On Sundays divine service is conducted by the chaplain during the forenoon, and in the afternoon tables are rigged for the boys for reading and writing. There is an excellent library for the use of the boys, well stocked with books for all classes of readers, and an abundant supply of papers and magazines.

I have given a routine which may be taken as a fair example of each day's work. The system of punishment is very mild indeed, the fact being always kept in mind that the officers are dealing with boys, and not with men. A regular account of demerits is kept, and at the end of each week the boys are arranged in sections, according to the number of demerits, and of course the higher sections have more privileges. For instance, those in the first section are allowed to go ashore on liberty every Saturday, the second section twice a month, while those in the last section are allowed no privileges at all.

It is very rarely that they are kept on board the New Hampshire longer than six months before being transferred to the cruising training-ships. I have endeavored to give a plain and correct account of a boy's duties on the New Hampshire, which form the foundation of his naval career.

Now let us follow him on board a cruising ship. We will suppose he is transferred as a first-class apprentice. Most of his knowledge so far has been theoretical. Now he will have the practical experience to fit him for a sailor's duties. Naturally all boys desire a change, and are eager to be transferred to the cruising ships, to get to sea, and visit foreign countries. But in a short time most of them realize the comforts of their old home on the New Hampshire.

The cruising ships are of course much smaller, the quarters more crowded, and the ration much inferior, and in addition to all this there is that disagreeable sensation called seasickness experienced by most boys the first few days out. Gradually, however, all this wears off, and the young sailor gets accustomed to his new quarters, and enters upon his work with zeal, and soon is able to work aloft, handling sail like an old man-of-war's man. A regular routine of drills is established also on these ships, but less varied than on the New Hampshire, the principal branches to be taught here being practical seamanship and gunnery.

It takes from six months to a year, depending upon a boy's abilities, for him to become advanced to the grade of ordinary seaman, each promotion bringing a corresponding increase of pay. At this grade they are transferred into the general service on a regular cruising man-of-war, although frequently the demand is so much greater than the supply that they are sent out before they have advanced beyond first-class apprentices.

Now to consider what a boy may become, let us suppose he ships at sixteen years of age, and he ought not to enlist any younger than that, for unless he is much beyond the average in size and strength he will not be sufficiently well developed to endure the drills. Suppose he remains six months on the New Hampshire and one year on the cruising training-ships, then he will be seventeen and a half years of age when he is transferred to a regular man-of-war. After making a full three years' cruise he ought to come back an able seaman at twenty and a half. Then after making another cruise, if he improves his time, he should be able to pass an examination for boatswain or gunner, and if successful will receive an appointment as a warrant officer in the navy, with a good salary and a permanent position.

Of course I do not mean to say that all boys can do this, or even that one in a hundred can, but I do mean that there is that object to strive for; and in any case, whether he decides to remain in the navy or not, he has obtained at the age of twenty-one a fair education and an amount of practical knowledge and an idea of discipline which cannot fail to be of use to him in after-life.

BITS OF ADVICE.

BY AUNT MARJORIE PRECEPT.

THE BIG BROTHER.

THERE are many things which nobody at home can do half so well as the big brother. For one thing, he can keep the peace. If there is a dispute between two of the little ones, or a general row in the nursery, the big brother has only to say the word, and the belligerents will cease their strife. Belligerent is a long word, but the boys who are reading Cæsar may tell the others that it is made up of two Latin words, one of which means war, and the other waging or carrying on, so that when two children are quarrelling and saying cross words, which may presently cause blows, they are properly called belligerents. Mother is a happy woman if she can trust her big boy to be her right-hand man, to settle all that goes wrong, and to set a good example.

Nobody equals a big brother in taking the children's part when they are attacked, whether it is by a savage dog, an occasional bull in the meadow, or the bad boys from the next street. How safe they feel when brother Tom advances boldly to the rescue, and how proud they are of him, with reason, too! for is he not strong and brave and quick to act, knowing just what to do and just how to do it. I never yet heard of a cowardly big brother; did you?

On excursions, picnics, and all sorts of summer expeditions a big brother should act as general and commander-in-chief. The success of such pleasure trips depends a good deal on the planning and on the orderly carrying out of the plans. A big brother with a head for managing will make everything go smoothly from morning till night.

Of course a big brother knows how to mend a ball, how to cover one which is wearing out and in need of doctoring; how to make a kite and to fly it; how to tie up a cut finger and extract a thorn; how to soothe a sleepy child with a song or a story, and to receive visitors cordially in the absence of pater and mater.

Some of these duties fall naturally to the lot of the elder sister, yet there is no reason why the brother should not share them. Two lines of poetry, which some of you remember, express my idea of the big brother:

"The bravest are the tenderest,
The loving are the daring."

LACROSSE.

BY J. A. HODGE, J.C.N.

EVERY English boy plays cricket, every American boy plays base ball, and every Canadian youngster knows how to wield the lacrosse stick. Lacrosse is an Indian game adopted and improved by the English Canadians. Of all games, when well played, it is the most exciting, combining simplicity in its rules and regulations with skill and variety in its methods of play, and speed and energy in its requirements of every player. The sport is growing in popularity in the United States, and especially among the class who can best and easiest learn it—boys from ten to eighteen. In the United States only a few players and a very few clubs really play good lacrosse, and consequently the game is often misjudged by both players and spectators. Compare the tennis of our American players of six years ago with the tennis of to-day in any of our tournaments, and a faint picture is presented of the difference between an average game of lacrosse upon this side of the Canadian line and one between veteran players on the other side. So do not judge the game until you have seen it at its best. Almost every set of beginners, when they find themselves armed with sticks resembling polo mallets, rush pell-mell for the ball, and begin a ludicrous game of "shimmy."

A few words of advice to beginners will perhaps be more useful to most of my readers than any suggestions addressed to more advanced players, especially as it is not yet always possible for new clubs to procure any one experienced in the game to give the best of all instruction, personal example on the field of play.

First choose a stick. Let it be long enough to just reach the armpit when one end is resting on the ground. It should be as light as is consistent with strength.

The other requirements are hard to indicate, as individual taste must govern your choice, if you have no older hand at the game to choose for you. Do not start to play a game until you have become accustomed to your stick. Let the club pair off and practise "passing." Hold the stick with the left hand near the netting, the right at the end or butt of the stick. Perhaps it is as well to pass on the ground, at first rolling the ball slowly, and then swiftly, until it is caught quickly and neatly with as few motions as possible, and returned accurately with no delay whatever. Then toss the ball to and fro, catching it in the widest part of the stick, never batting it, and taking it on the fly rather than on the bound. This sort of practice should be constantly indulged in, for no player is too old at the game not to profit by it. Practise also picking the ball up while on the full run. Finally, practise long-distance throwing and catching.

One of the most useful methods of practice is "playing tag." Two of the players choose sides, and then the players of one side seek to pass the ball between themselves.

Of course this causes the players to pair off, each pair consisting of a player from either side. In this way they practise passing, catching, picking up, running with the ball on the stick, and dodging—everything, in fact, except long throwing and tries at goal. In playing tag, it is well sometimes to play in front of a goal, when the defence men of the twelve, including the goal-keeper, can play against the attack men, whereby very good practice is given both.

Goal-throwing can best be practised by placing a player between the goal posts (which are six feet high and six feet apart), and arranging half the other men in front of the goal, and half behind. Thus:

×, goal-keeper; a, b, c, d, players in front of goal; c, f, g, h, players behind goal.

Then let a, b, c, or d throw the ball for the goal. If the goal-keeper stops it, he returns it to them, and another throw is made. When the ball is thrown wide, or the goal-keeper does not stop it, e, f, g, or h captures it. The goal-keeper then turns around, and seeks to stop the ball thrown from that side. These three methods of practice—passing, playing tag, and goal-throwing—should be continued for some days before beginners try even their first practice game, and should be kept up as part of every day's practice as long as the club plays at all. Very few players are necessary to make such practice interesting, and it gives each player more to do than a regular game, and enables him to become more thoroughly familiar with his weapon than a hand-to-hand contest can. Such practice is to the lacrosse player what rifle practice is to the soldier.

When a majority of your club have learned to handle their weapons, they can attempt a game. At first do not try to win, or you will all play shiny, and not lacrosse; but try to pass neatly and accurately, and seek to improve your own play rather than prevent your opponent from making his play. Of course this rule only applies to a practice game of beginners.

The rules of the game are so simple, and so like those of polo on horseback or the game of the same name played on roller skates, that I will not give them in detail. Any dealer in athletic goods will furnish copies of them.

The goals should be from 200 to 300 yards apart, and the ball must pass between the goal posts, and not higher than their tops—six feet from the ground. The ball must never be touched by the hand.

The first requirement of a good game is that the individual players should know how to handle their sticks, and to catch and throw the ball quickly and accurately. The second and all-important requirement is that the twelve players of each side should play together, as if governed by one head and seeking one result, without desire on the part of any one for the display of individual skill or prowess.

The ball is started in the middle of the field, and if your club behaves as beginners generally do, six or eight will rush for the ball in a body, and there will be a "scrimmage" over the ball, which will last, with short intermissions, for most of the game, and before long several will assert that they have played their last as well as their first game of lacrosse. But persevere. The first game of cards, of checkers, of chess, of base-ball, of football (watch the first Freshman game of football at college), or of tennis does not represent the game it pretends to be.

When the ball is started, all the players, with the exception of the goal-keepers, should be paired off all over the field, each man close to one of his opponents. If the the ball immediately to him, and he tries for the goal. Do not run too much with the ball. It gives your opponents time to gather in front of the goal, it fatigues you, and it withdraws you from the part of the field you are expected to cover. This is especially important for defence players to remember, for if they leave their positions, and the ball gets past them, a goal is almost a certainty. No one player is expected to play the whole game. Let him seek to play in his part of the field perfectly, rather than to cover other men's territory and play their game for them.

Seek to watch as many good games of lacrosse as occasion in your neighborhood. I believe that a tennis or a lacrosse player can learn more by seeing really good players play their game than by a week's practice. Never miss an opportunity to play a better team than your own. In no other way will your own play be as easily improved. The more superior an opposing team is, the better for you—at least while you are learning the game.

possession of the ball is disputed by the two players who "face off," let the others approach near them, but not near enough to interfere with their movements. They will each seek to "tip" the ball with his stick or foot to some friend who has thus approached, and he will have a much better chance of securing it than if he had blindly rushed in and entangled himself in a "scrummage." Of course a brilliant dash in between the two players will sometimes secure the ball, but wait until you see the chance. Don't fight for the ball blindly as if with your eyes shut. Use both eye to see and brain to calculate, and just at the right moment act with all the courage and strength that you have.

Having secured the ball on your stick, use your eyes again, and note where you are in relation to your goal, where your nearest opponent is (you may not have to use your eyes to ascertain the latter), and, above all, look out for some player on your side who is near the goal you are attacking, and who is "uncovered." By one who is "uncovered" is meant one who is not closely checked by an opponent. Pass the ball to him swiftly and accurately, just where he can catch it without being checked by an opponent. All this, of course, must be done as quickly as a short pass fields a grounder to first base. If there is no one "uncovered," then drop the ball by a high pass directly in front of the goal and close to it, or run with it toward the goal until you are checked, or until some one from the other side runs out to meet you. He will have to leave one of your friends "uncovered," and you pass

This year is a most promising one for lacrosse in this country. The New York Lacrosse Club have won the championship of the United States from the St. Paul team, and so have brought it into the vicinity of most of the lacrosse clubs. They have won a game from the Torontos, one of the best three teams in Canada, and therefore in the world, and have thus increased the interest in the game here. This is augmented by the visit of two or more Canadian clubs to New York, and by the trip of the Belfast team of Irish gentlemen to this country. But more encouraging than any and every event of this year and of all former seasons is the fact that the game is being played by numberless junior clubs all over the country, and by the principal colleges. The boy can learn lacrosse, as he can learn everything else, better than the man. It is a game that, like tennis, men and boys of all ages, shapes, sizes, and weights can play. The short and thickest, the long and lean, the cool and the swift, can all find an appropriate place for themselves on the field. Every boy who loves a manly sport which demands pluck and endurance, speed and skill, a quick sharp eye and a deft steady hand, a cool calculating head and a strong hardy body, will like lacrosse—when he once really learns to play it.

THE LAND OF FRESH AIR.

BY MARGARET E. SANGSTER.

DUST and glare on the city street,
 Ailings blistered with scorching heat,
 Poor little children fever-flushed,
 Waxen faces like blossoms crushed,
 Never a breath of the sweet fresh air
 In the dingy court and the narrow stair:
 What can the babies do but die
 Under the fierce and burning sky?

Yet cool and fragrant the green hills are Under the kisses of sun and star,
 Grasses wave and the tall reeds shake,
 Ripples dance over stream and lake,
 Over the stones the brooklets dash,
 Over the cliffs the torrents dash,
 Skip the larks in the pleasant shade,
 Skip the larks in the mossy glade,
 May we not carry the babies there,
 Into the world of the sweet fresh air?

Here they go on the rushing train,
 Off to the beautiful farms again,
 Up to the sunny fields that lie
 Under the face of the open sky,
 Down to the homes like happy nests
 Hiding in hollows of mountain crests;
 There they shall tumble, romp, and play,
 Free as the birds, the flying day,
 Have plenty to eat and never a care
 While they stay in the land of the sweet fresh air.

Driving the cows to the pasture lot,
 Hunting for eggs in the queerest spot,
 Fishing for hours beneath the bridge,
 Climbing the steps of the pine-clad ridge,
 Checks with the roses of health aglow,
 Feet that are flitting to and fro:
 Very well will the babies fare,
 Once in the land of the sweet fresh air.

BOYS WHO BECAME FAMOUS.

BY DAVID KER.

THE STRANGE FLAG.

A BOY lay asleep in the mid-day sunshine upon a broad flat ledge of rock, with his sunburned face pillowed on his bare brown arm. Most people would have thought it a rather dangerous place for a nap, for the ledge was many feet above the waves which were now breaking against the foot of the crag in spouts of glittering foam, and he was lying so near the brink of the precipice that had he happened to turn over in his sleep, he would have fallen headlong over its edge down into the lashing sea below.

There he lay, however, sleeping as soundly on that perilous perch as if he had been at home in his father's little fishing hut among the cliffs, built all of driftwood, with huge stones piled upon its roof to keep the furious wind from tearing off the shingles.

But although the boy's slumber was so deep, it was plainly anything but peaceful. His hands were clenched, his teeth set, the muscles of his face worked convulsively, and half-formed words came brokenly from his quivering lips.

He dreamed that he was sailing the seas in command of an armed vessel, at the mast-head of which fluttered a very strange flag, the like of which he had never seen before. Then suddenly another ship, larger than his own, came alongside of him, and a terrible battle began. He heard the shouts of the combatants, the thunder of the cannon, the crash of falling spars and shattered timbers; then a ringing cheer broke forth, as the enemy's flag came slowly down, and he started and awoke.

The din of the cannonade seemed to be still in his ears, but in reality it was the deep, hollow boom of the waves that had surrounded his rock and cut him off from the shore.

But this mattered little to one who was the best swimmer of his age for miles around. Clambering nimbly down the steep face of the rock, he plunged headlong into the sea, and rising like a cork on the crest of a huge wave, struck out gallantly for the shore.

Just as he reached it, a familiar voice shouted his name, and he saw a tall young man in the uniform of an English naval officer standing on the beach above him.

"Aha!" cried the latter, "my friend Paul trying to drown himself as usual. What have you been doing?"

The boy answered by relating his dream.

"Well, I dare say I shall see you commanding a ship yet," said the young officer, "for you're a right good sailor already. But as for this flag of yours—what did you say it was like?"

"All covered with red stripes, Mr. Pearson, and thirteen white stars in one corner, on a blue ground."

"Well, your dream was wrong there, my lad," chuckled Lieutenant Pearson; "for I know every flag that flies, and there's none such among them. Whatever flag you fight under, it won't be that, unless you patch it up for yourself."

The sun was shining upon the sea as brilliantly as ever, but its brightest rays could not pierce the cloud of smoke which wrapped two ships that lay side by side, spouting fire at each other from their battered port-holes.

The captain of the smaller vessel—a short, strongly built, very handsome man, with a keen black eye—gave his orders as coolly as ever, but his bold brown face was growing very grave and stern. And well it might. His whole deck was one heap of torn canvas and splintered wood. Nearly half his crew were lying dead, and the hollow gurgle beneath his feet told how fast the fatal water was pouring into the hull where a heavy shot had pierced it below the water-line.

Suddenly there was a lull in the firing, followed by a deafening shout of triumph. Down came the British flag from the place where, torn though it was with the pelting shot, it had fluttered defiantly till now; and as the victorious captain sprang aboard the enemy's ship, he saw the English commander—a tall, fine-looking man, with a thin streak of blood across his weather-beaten face—offering his sword in token of surrender.

The conqueror started, and looked keenly at him.

"Do you remember the flag of my dream, Mr. Pearson?" asked he, pointing to the Stars and Stripes floating above them from the stump of the only mast that was left.

"What!" cried Captain Pearson, in amazement, "are you my little Scotch friend John Paul?"

"They used to call me so then," answered the other, "but now I'm better known as Paul Jones."

And American history will tell, as long as the world lasts, what work Paul Jones did under the banner of the Stars and Stripes.

CHAPTER XV.

HOME AT LAST.

FANNY PIERSON opened her eyes one December morning with a queer feeling, as though she must be still in dream-land, or else some one not at all like herself.

She was lying comfortably in a pretty brass bedstead, and the walls of the room were bright and tasteful and pretty; the dressing-table facing her, if a trifle old-fashioned, was decidedly pretty with its long, narrow, mahogany-rimmed glass and chintz curtaining, and various trifles about suggested a very different sort of home comfort and refinement from the gaudily decorated little chamber in Baker Street which Fanny shared with Louise at home. It was delightful to look about her, but still more so to realize that she was actually a guest at Brier Lawn, having been detained there the night before by a heavy snow-storm, Louise was coming up in the morning, and the two girls were to assist Mrs. Mostyn in preparing for a welcome guest.

* Begun in No. 37, HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE.

Fanny jumped up, and gayly hummed a little tune while she made her toilet. It seemed of little consequence in this warm, hospitable dwelling that a snow-storm was going on outside. The white flakes flurried past the windows, and seemed to Fanny almost as though they were nodding good-morning. While she was dressing, Jane, the house-maid, had come in and lighted up a little fire on the hearth in her pretty room, and Fanny had talked to the girl as she heard Mrs. Mostyn do, in a kind and pleasant way, though the young girl had yet to learn exactly how to blend gentleness and dignity without condescension of manner and too much that was patronizing.

All the servants in the house knew that Mrs. Mostyn expected a young girl from Boston who was to live with them. Three days only had elapsed since Dr. Tabor's telegram announcing that Agnes was found, but the time had been well employed at Brier Lawn in making ready for her reception, and Mrs. Mostyn wisely enough had invited Fanny and Louise Pierson to assist in her preparations.

"Nothing like setting the girls at ease at once," was her reflection; and it would do Fanny good, as the wise old lady knew, to come in contact with the household at Brier Lawn under such circumstances. From all she had heard of Agnes, and from what she knew of her dead mother, the old lady did not doubt but that the companionship of her "adopted daughter," as she felt sure she would soon come to consider Agnes, would be a useful association for such girls as the Piersons.

At breakfast conversation about the coming guest was cheerfully carried on, Fanny entering with zest into the prospect; and when, a little later, she accompanied Mrs. Mostyn to the room prepared for Agnes, the young girl said, looking with some timidity at her hostess: "Mrs. Mostyn, it does seem as though no welcome could be quite warm enough for her, doesn't it?"

After which Mrs. Mostyn felt sure that she had done right in taking Fanny into her counsels.

When Louise arrived the two girls were despatched in Mrs. Mostyn's carriage to Miss Leroy's with a note of invitation from Mrs. Mostyn, and which read as follows:

"DEAR MISS LEROY,—Will you let your girls spend Christmas Eve at my house in a purely social way to welcome my dear young friend Agnes Leigh, who will, I hope, return to you in January as a pupil, making her home, however, with me. I count upon you and Miss Jane for my Christmas dinner party, of course, as usual.

"Sincerely yours, EUNICE MOSTYN."

The girls at the Academy were at recess when Fanny and Louise, having given their note into Miss Jane's hands, made their way to the school-room to explain the object of their absence that day, and also to whisper a word or two about the invitation. And here Fanny showed that her repentance was sincere. It was when Belinda Myers said, in rather scornful surprise: "Why, Fanny, what do you mean by talking this way of Agnes Leigh? You were the very one who first set us against her."

Fanny's lip trembled slightly, but she answered in a determined voice: "I know it, Belinda, and it was a mean thing in me to do. I hadn't any real ground for it, as I see now; and I'll tell you what it is, girls"—here the old favorite in the school looked around with an honest flush on her pretty face—"if anything I can do to take back what I said can be done, you may count on me for it, and if I hear anything further against Agnes Leigh, I think I will just die of the shame of it, for I well know it has been all my fault. What do you suppose would have happened if only Mrs. Mostyn hadn't taken hold of things just the right way? I do believe that from this day out no one of you can ever accuse me of gossiping or turning everything into ridicule."

And Fanny, as enthusiastic in her new resolve as she had been thoughtless before, nodded her head at the girls and walked away, with just a suspicion of tears trembling about her eyelashes.

Mrs. Mostyn had been right in her estimate of Fanny Pierson's nature. Shallow it would always be in some matters; but there was a real heart to touch, and the girl was ready to take correction when it was administered in the right way. Moreover, it was, as the old lady discovered, her spirit of activity which needed turning in the right direction; she was too strong and healthy and light-hearted to be content with the aimless life she had led, and Mrs. Mostyn felt that the young girl might grow into a wise woman, full of a good and useful activity, if only now the right means were used to prevent her frittering away all her ambitions by letting them drift into foolish channels.

Some natures—such a one was Louise's—seem always to find their own level of usefulness and content; but such as Fanny's need the help of a stronger one near them, the guidance of some other hand. So in life it sometimes happens that the responsibility of being such a help and such an influence belongs to the quiet ones whose virtue and heroism we do not always see or perhaps believe in, the active, turbulent, and perhaps shallower spirits attracting our attention, coming to the front with all their impulses, their wise or foolish sayings or doings, and appearing so brave that we are apt to forget how much is due to the patient kindness and good-will, the hope and encouragement, which has produced it.

The girls were plunged into an excited and exhilarated discussion over Mrs. Mostyn's inopportune party; not more than two or three of them had ever been to Brier Lawn, and it was evident that both Miss Leroy and Miss Jane considered the occasion an important one, for the girls were told that a half-holiday would be given them to look over their best dresses and make any needed preparations.

No one, however, felt half the enthusiasm over Agnes's return that Mrs. Mostyn did. The happiest of feelings stirred the old lady's mind and heart as she superintended the furnishing of two pretty rooms just beside her own.

"We must make it cosy and home-like and cheerful above all," Mrs. Mostyn had said; and assuredly the result was attained in perfection, for, from the dainty lace and soft wool hangings to the rugs and the open fire, everything spoke of ease and good cheer.

Then the sounds of sleigh-bells on the drive reached them suddenly. The girls remained upstairs, while Mrs. Mostyn opened wide the front door herself, and a moment later Agnes was in her arms.

"My child, I am so thankful to have you!"

This was all the welcome, and more than Agnes had hoped for. How beautiful, how refreshing, it all seemed! To be taken upstairs by Mrs. Mostyn, to find herself in the beautiful room prepared for her, to be told that she was to rest an hour, to have her tea brought to her by Jane—such a dainty, refreshing treat!—and to know that her old school-mates were coming there to meet and welcome her—what wonder that Agnes, lying on the sofa, could only feel silent and full of thanksgiving.

When Mrs. Mostyn, sitting beside her, told her that this was to be her home, Agnes hardly knew what to say, but flung her arms around the old lady's neck and cried out that she never could do enough—never be grateful enough for all that had been done for her.

"And now, my dear," said Mrs. Mostyn, "I am going to leave you with two of your former school-mates, who are waiting here to see you, and you must not come downstairs this evening until I send for you."

Two hours later Mrs. Mostyn was seated among her young guests in the drawing-room, where, when all were assembled, she said briefly that before Agnes joined them she had just a few remarks to make.

"I want all of you young Halcorn girls and boys to know," the old lady began, smiling upon the young faces before her, some of the boys of the town having been included in the invitation, "that I look upon Agnes Leigh as my own daughter, and so I want to tell you just how she happened to come here last summer. Her mother was as dear to me as any child could be, but she married, and went far away, where I lost sight of her for years. Agnes's father had a good office offered him in Boston, it seems, last winter, and the family—Agnes has one brother—came on from the West, glad of this new prosperity; but Mrs. Leigh fell ill and died; Mr. Leigh's own health failed, and at last he was obliged to take a position as under book-keeper in the Dorchester prison. Agnes wished to spare him as much pain or anxiety as possible, and came here to Halcorn expecting to find in me the protection she knew I would extend to her mother's daughter.

"You are all young, and think how you would feel at fifteen to find yourselves alone in a strange place, where the only friend you had expected to meet was away. This was Agnes's position last summer, but she might have struggled on had there not been a foolish feeling started against the poor child; then sickness—fever—broke out in the home of her friends the Hofmeisters. After that Agnes was more friendless than ever, and went to Boston, where I have at last, through Dr. Tabor, found her. This is all of the story; you see there was really neither mystery nor romance about the child. Her father died three months ago, so that she is entirely alone in the world, except for her brother and myself, and, let us hope, all you young and happy Halcorn girls and boys whom I trust she will be among, taking her place in your lives."

Mrs. Mostyn ceased speaking with a bright look at the little company, and I need scarcely say that a few moments later Agnes's entrance into the room, with Fanny Pierson at her side, was greeted by an enthusiastic company.

The evening passed swiftly and delightfully; youth requires but little to make it forget past woes and welcome new pleasures. All the young people felt themselves fast friends of Agnes Leigh before the party broke up, and the last tinkle of sleigh-bells had been heard at Brier Lawn.

Then followed a quiet half-hour with Mrs. Mostyn in Agnes's own room. How delightful it was to plan for a little visit from the Hofmeisters and the Hamiltons; to know that she, Agnes, through Mrs. Mostyn's liberality, could give poor, hard-worked Sarah the chance for "comfort and some fun with it" that she had so longed for; nay, indeed, perhaps some of the very Christmas treasures the two girls had inspected in White's window. Best of all, to feel that a life of work and study and home peace was begun for her.

How strange it seemed to reflect that only a day or two before she had been wondering how this Christmas Day would dawn! And here was she sitting with her hand in Mrs. Mostyn's, listening for the first sound of Christmas-bells at Halcorn!

It was when they were walking home from church on Christmas morning that Fanny Pierson told Agnes something of her recent experience at Brier Lawn.

"I don't believe," said Fanny, earnestly—"I don't believe anybody could have made me see things just as Mrs. Mostyn did. But there! She is unlike any one I ever knew. I believe I shall be worth something myself if I can see her and you often. I thought, maybe, it would please her if I said something like this to you."

The pretty, careless face was bent down nearer to Agnes, and Fanny's eyes looked furtively into hers.

"Bless her!" returned Mrs. Mostyn's new daughter, kissing the soft round cheek near her. "Dear Fanny, I will never forget this, and I thank you so for telling me."

"Oh, there!" cried poor Fanny, dashing away her tears with a shamefaced air; "I don't mean to be a goose—perhaps," and she held out her hand hurriedly. "We will get to be good friends some day, since you don't despise me, Agnes; and if I am never worth very much, I shall be better some ways, I know."

And if Fanny was correct to a certain extent in the first part of her prediction, so also was she in the last; for I believe no one ever had it to say afterward that her tongue was uncontrolled or her love of gossip injurious, and Agnes and Mrs. Mostyn were among her truest friends.

That Christmas week at Brier Lawn never could be forgotten by any of the party assembled there. First came the Hamiltons, young and old, to be made thoroughly happy in various ways; then the Hofmeisters, father and daughter; and arrangements for a little school for Margaret planned most successfully; after which Agnes's own work began anew.

Haleom speedily accepted Agnes as Mrs. Mostyn's adopted daughter. I cannot tell you that no shadow ever again came into the young girl's experience, for life holds its dark threads as well as its shining ones for her as for all of us, but that one year of her life made her more than ever strong in her soul and in her sense of charity and justice. No one, I believe, has ever heard from her lips a hasty judgment; no one of the many who have, in her widened sphere, come under her influence has felt from her voice or eyes a chill or a too stern rebuke. Every one in Haleom hopes and expects that she will live to take her old friend's place, to give peace and comfort to the weary ones, and good cheer to those who are in need; and Christmas-time each year since that of her return has been made at Brier Lawn a special festival for the homeless and forgotten.

THE END.

"WAKE UP, MAMMA! BABY'S WAKE!"

THE'S YOUNG PEOPLE for a long time, and like it very much. I keep each year's numbers, and have them bound. I should like to describe my beautiful home in Braintree, and tell you all about it, but I have not time till I am older and can make it more interesting.

NORMAN B. W.

SEABRIGHT, NEW JERSEY.

I am twelve years old, and my home is in Brooklyn, but at present I am in Seabright spending my vacation. I like Seabright very much; and I go driving here a great deal. My uncle and aunt are also here, and in different hotels.

We are acquainted with Professor M., who, as you know, gives all the carnivals and kindnesses. They would have a carnival at the hotel where my uncle is stopping. If so, I will probably dance. I will write again and tell you about it, if I have only one danced in the kindness. It was in Brooklyn last March, and was in the "Swedish National Dance."

Dear Walter sends me my beloved HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE, every Tuesday. I am very much interested in "False Witness." A. M. S.

VERMONT, ILLINOIS.

I found the bird's-nest, exactly as Emma describes it, in a low oak tree, under the name of fax-bird or wild canary in Vermont. Now I will describe the birds. The male is spotted black and yellow, while the female all yellow. Their eggs are spotted at one end, while at the other end there are scarcely any spots at all. We have a very large lawn full of trees, and there are many birds around it. The boy who is willing, I will write and tell about the many different kinds of birds. I have such a nice canary, which I call Sprite. I am twelve years old, and I never saw them just ten days before Christmas. My mamma promised me I should have a party when my birthday comes again. I have the loveliest little golden-crowned kinglet, whose name is Ethel. I don't like to play with dolls, but I like to sew for them ever so much. I had two owls, but one night they both flew away, and they were a nice and ripe as could be.

DORA D.

You, too, must write again about the birds.

EASTON SHORE, MARYLAND.

DEAR POSTMISTRESS,—I have just read Emma C. says that you said you would like to get letters from children who tell about birds. I will write of the varieties that abound here. Nearly all that she mentions are native of this country. I have also the beautiful English mocking-bird, and one is building its nest in a tree near our house, and my mother and I listen to it singing every morning. The cat-bird has a very pretty voice, although when one goes near its nest it makes a noise like a kitten, which is not so pretty. We have a mixture with scarlet-troated humming-birds. I have read that it is very dangerous to approach their nest, as they fly at your eyes and injure them very much, and very often destroy the sight entirely. The Baltimore oriole makes its home here too. Its nest is about six inches long, and it is fastened to the tree by wrapping cord, tied to the rough in as perfect a knot as any one could tie. I have a nest that I got from the branch of a weeping willow. I could tell more, only I have not time in making my letter too long to be printed. I am thirty years old. I love HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE. MARY D. H.

You must write again, my dear.

All the way from the other side of the globe comes this little story of

THE INDIAN RAID.

"Now, Walter, take care of mother and the girls, and don't get afraid if any Indians come around, but just load your gun and help mother. I'll be back again about five o'clock this evening. Good-by." And with these words my brave young man walked away from his log hut, his gun over his shoulder, and whistling a merry tune. He had lately come over from Michigan to America with his wife and two children, Walter (the eldest, a youth seventeen years of age), Mary, Kate, and Jane.

After their father had left, the young man took down his gun, cleaned and loaded them, so as to be ready for any foe which might make an appearance. "The Indians were rather numerous in this part of the country, and several of them often made by them upon the 'pale-faces,' as they called the whites in the neighborhood."

Everything went on smoothly till about twelve o'clock, when Walter, having gone to reconnoitre, fancied he saw something moving about among the brushwood. His brain being full of stories about Indians, and the fact that he had seen the white men he thought he would go and see what it was. Scarcely had he gone fifty yards from the house when he heard a yell sounding low in the distance, and another, and another, but gradually growing louder and louder as they approached, until he saw a poor boy as if he were nearly alive with them.

His first thought was to run home to his mother and sisters and apprise them of the danger which he had run along with the Indians. He could, like a frightened hare, his fears increasing as he wondered how his mother and sisters and himself could get out of Indiana alive. When he got home, he found the house in just the same order as when he left it. He rushed breathless into the room, and sat down on a chair, waiting till he had his breath to speak.

"Why, what is the matter?" cried his sister. "You seem to have run as if the Indians had been after you, running along with them."

"Oh, just you—wait till—I get—my breath," said her brother, stopping between almost every word.

When at last he did really tell them, Mary said: "Well, it is funny we did not hear the yells, for you were not very far off. And poor father, too!" she shuddered.

"Oh, it's no matter about father," said her brother; "he is all right at the settlement. It's only the people who are far from it that are in trouble. They started up in the morning, and did not notice us, and pass right by. But get the guns ready, and let us barricade the house, so as to be ready for them if they do come."

Accordingly the doors were shut tight and heavy things were pushed against them; the shutters were put to and bolted strongly, excepting only at the top of the house, where was used as a loop-hole, and to which room they now resorted. In this room they kept the whole afternoon, watching the smoke which rose up between the trees every now and then, and which they knew very well was the last of many of the settlers and their homes, and wondering if their own would be the next. But the afternoon advanced, no Indians came, and they were beginning to think that they were safe, when they were startled by a loud knocking at the door.

"What is that?" cried the boys, and they ran out. "Oh, there are the Indians!" But their mother told them that they need not be frightened; Indians would never knock; so that it must be false.

In an instant they were down stairs; but their mother told them to keep back, and she would see who it was. She opened the door, and saw her husband standing on the step, as hearty as possible, and very thankful to see that his family were all safe.

After anxious inquiries as to how they had fared when he left, he told them he had not heard of the ravages of the Indians till about five o'clock in the afternoon, when he had run in and told them that the Indians had come again, and were burning and killing. "I set out as soon as I could, expecting to find the house burned and you killed; but thank God, I found you all well," said the poor man, with tears of joy at his family's safe deliverance. They were kind and kind to him, and he had a good night's sleep, and done the same to a heap of others, and it's a wonder they did not come here. But the officers at the settlement in town have just arrived, and they are waiting for me. I came along. I guess they will make it pretty hot for the wretches, for they were pretty mad, I tell you."

To tell you how the Indians' camp was ransacked and the owners taken prisoners, and how they were all shot for murdering the poor settler, would make my story too long. But it was done, and the settlers were hardly ever troubled after that in that part of the country, for the lesson was a bitter one to the Indians. LILLIE G. KILLGORE, SANDWICH ISLANDS.

PERTH AMBOY, NEW JERSEY.

It is very pleasant here in the summer-time, and as we live almost directly on the water, we have the full benefit of all the bathing, rowing, and sailing that can be done. I am twelve years old, and have a brother and sister who are both older than myself. I have a little dog named Dot. I have only taken HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE since last New-Year's, but think it delightful.

BIRDIE S.

LOS GATOS, CALIFORNIA.

I am a little girl ten years old. I go to school, and study reading, writing, arithmetic, geography, and drawing. My brother takes HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE, and I like to read the letters very much. I have a cat and a pet pigeon; the pigeon will eat out of my hands and play with me. Good-by.

EMERY S.

VERMONT, NEW YORK.

I have taken HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE for three years. Although I have taken it so long, I have only written once. I think it is just a lovely paper, and I like to read it. I have had it in my place in it about General Muff, and it seemed so funny that I should have a cat named Muff. I think she is the best cat I ever had. I will write her whenever she wants anything, and hardly ever has to be told to. She is a dark Maltese, and is considered very handsome, and she is so particular that she will not sleep on the floor, but gets up on a chair. We are all very fond of her, and would not part with her for a good deal. We have a strawberry garden, and get quite large strawberries out of it. The other day we got one that weighed an ounce, and it measured six and a half inches. We have never seen here in the States. We go in bathing nearly every day, and I can almost swim. DORA V. T. T.

CLAREMONT, IOWA.

I like Mrs. Lillie's stories very much. I am eleven years old, I go to school, and study reading, spelling, writing, arithmetic, geography, and grammar. I take music lessons on a piano, and like them very much. My father gave me HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE for a Christmas present. CORA M.

Lorraine B. de L.: The little story was in pencil, and written on both sides of the paper, so it could not even be considered. Please use one side only, and use ink, not pale, but good black ink.—To all the boys: My little fellows, you must wake up; the girls are surpassing you. Will you not send me so many letters that I can some week fill two-thirds of the Post-office Box for a change, with letters from the boys? I know how busy you are out-of-doors, but still I do not like to be neglected altogether.

WAS IT INSTINCT?

A WESTERN lawyer, whom we will call Mr. Lawrence, recently related the following, which is true in every particular: "I rode lately some thirty or forty miles out of the city with my friend Mr. G—— in order to help him in opening his summer cottage, which had been closed during the winter. We had a delightful drive, and found things looking all right about the cottage. Mr. G—— unlocked the door of the barn, and led his horse in to stable him while we should examine the premises more fully. On closing the barn the fall before he had placed a quantity of oats in a hammock suspended from the floor above.

"You know," said Mr. G——, "that rats and mice won't get into grain which is kept in this way." He took a small measure, and dipped his hand into the hammock of oats. "Good-gracions!" he cried. "Don't you ever believe that story again. The inside of this heap of oats is entirely eaten out. I shall have to go over to my neighbor's and borrow some feed for my horse."

"He started at once to 'negotiate the loan,' and I idly thrust my hand into the heap of grain lying in the hammock, with a vague idea of starting any rats or mice which might lurk there. There was indeed a mouse's nest in the grain, and my hand came into contact with some of its inmates. I withdrew it with great celerity. As I did so, the mother mouse appeared on top of the grain, running for dear life. A little mouse followed her, and catching on to its mother's long tail, clung to it with a grip like death. A second mouse followed his brother, and caught on to his tail just as the first one had caught on to his mother's; a third one followed, and did the same; and before the mother in her wild flight had reached the rope by which the hammock was suspended, a fourth little one was clinging to the tail of the third.

"Incredible as it may seem, the mother mouse, with four little ones, each hanging to the tail of the one in front of him, ran nimbly up the suspension rope of the hammock, made her way on the face of a beam to the side wall of the barn, and disappeared from view, leaving me overcome with wonder and admiration.

"Now," asked Mr. Lawrence, in conclusion, "was this instinct on the part of the little mice? Would all mice have done in just this same way? Or was this an uncommonly smart family of mice, with an uncommonly smart mother?"

MABEL DINES OUT ALONE.

(Previous instructions from Mamma.)

I MADE her stand beside me, my bonnie little girl; I arranged each dainty ruffle, and smoothed each sunny curl. "Now, baby, you'll be careful in all you do and say; You will not trouble Auntie while dining there to-day. You'll take your place in quiet, nor ask for anything. But eat what Uncle gives you, or what the waiters bring. You won't take too much pudding when there's no Mamma to check;

And when it comes to sweetmeats, you'll scarcely taste a speck."

(Result, as described by Auntie.)

The feast was rich and splendid, the board held flowerets rare, But yet my rose-bud tender was the sweetest blossom there. Her eyes were bright as diamonds, her speech a birdie's song;

She was frugal as a hermit, lest she might eat something wrong.

When asked to take some pudding, she answered at her ease; When questioned as to ice-cream, said, "A little, if you please." Alas that such behavior should end in utter wreck!

The sweetmeats come; the little tongue licks, "Thankh; I'll take a peck."

HARNEY MAY CORDUA, SECOND UNITED STATES CAVALRY.

THE YOUNGEST SOLDIER IN THE ARMY.

BY GENERAL T. F. RODENBOUGH,
U. S. A.

HARNEY MAY CORDUA was born December 24, 1882, at Laredo, Texas, and is therefore about three years and eight months old (October 1, 1885). His father, R. F. Cordua, now of Galveston, Texas, was formerly a soldier, and served from March 30, 1852, to April 25, 1862, in the Second United States Dragoons, in Company A, most of the time as a sergeant. He took part in many weary marches and many desperate and bloody encounters with the Indians, and proved himself a good soldier.

Although no longer a soldier, he often thought of his old regiment and its gallant record, and when, twenty years after his discharge from the army, a son was born to him, the old sergeant determined to dedicate his boy, in name at least, to his old regiment, then stationed two thousand miles away, in Montana. The little fellow was christened after two of the most distinguished officers of the Second Dragoons, and, at the request of the father, was duly assigned as a recruit to the sergeant's old company, as the correspondence given on Page 694 will show.

"HEAD-QUARTERS SECOND UNITED STATES CAVALRY,
FORT CUSTER, M. T., January 1, 1883.

"SIR, YOUR letter of December 28, 1882, received. We have taken up (unofficially) Recruit Harney May Cordua, and assigned him to Troop A, Second Cavalry.

"I congratulate you in the renewal of your younger days in the person of your boy.

"Hoping you will ever keep alive your feeling for the regiment, I am, very respectfully, your obedient servant.

"CHARLES F. ROE, Adjutant Second Cavalry."

(Copy of Order of Assignment.)

"HEAD-QUARTERS SECOND UNITED STATES CAVALRY,
FORT CUSTER, M. T., January 1, 1883.

Order No. 2.

"UNassigned Recruit Harney May Cordua having been reported by letter to these head-quarters, is hereby assigned to Troop A.

"By order of Colonel J. P. HATCH, commanding the regiment.

"CHARLES F. ROE, First Lieutenant and Adjutant."

Thus our young hero was officially adopted as the "child of the regiment." In the following June, Harney May was presented with a beautiful cup of solid silver, made by Tiffany, and bearing the following inscription, "Harney May Cordua, from the Officers of the Second United States Cavalry." This was acknowledged by his father in a letter from which we make an extract:

"The undersigned hereby acknowledges, with feelings of sincere pride, the honor conferred upon him by the officers of his beloved old regiment. The recipient has ever had the welfare of the command at heart, been truly proud of his association with the same, and remembers with unalloyed affection the brave officers under whom he had the honor to serve. He returns sincere thanks to the donors for their kind and handsome souvenir, and assures them that it will be truly cherished by.

"Yours to command, R. F. CORDUA."

Perhaps a short account of the regiment which bears upon its rolls the name of so young a recruit may be interesting. It was organized in 1836 for service in Florida against the Seminole Indians, of whom Osceola was one of the greatest chieftains. There the duty was very hard, dangerous, and unhealthy. The soldiers had to hunt the Indians in dense thickets and swamps almost impassable; part of the time they were on horseback, and again they pursued the Indians in canoes, or followed them on foot through the undergrowth called "saw-grass" (sharp green blades which cut their clothes to shreds). The Indians fought the troops for several years, and were only driven out after hundreds of brave soldiers had been killed, or had died from the effects of exposure.

When the Mexican war opened, the regiment was the first cavalry regiment to cross the Rio Grande (or Grand River) into Mexico with General Taylor (whose soldiers called him "Old Zach"); it bore a glorious part in all the battles which followed, and escorted General Scott when he took possession of the ancient City of Mexico at the head of the United States forces in 1847. One of the most gallant deeds during that war was Captain May's charge at the head of a squadron of the regiment upon a Mexican battery at Resaca de la Palma; not only the guns, but a Mexican general, La Vega, were captured by the American dragoons. Captain May was a very handsome man, and a magnificent horseman, and for a long while his name was famous. It was this officer who commanded Sergeant Cordua's company, and whose name now belongs to young Harney May.

From Mexico the regiment found its way to California, Texas, Kansas, and Utah. In 1856 it made a terrible march in winter-time to the foot of the Rocky Mountains and to the Great Salt Lake to watch the Mormons, who had defied the authority of the United States. Many soldiers and thousands of animals perished from cold and hunger. Upon getting up one morning to march it was found that five hundred horses, mules, and cattle (carried along for food) had perished during the night. This camp was ever after known as the "Camp of Death."

When the "Great Rebellion" of 1861-65 broke out, the Second Dragoons were brought to Washington, and sent to Virginia, where they took part in many battles, and kept bright the glorious reputation for courage, ability, and fidelity to the Stars and Stripes which they had long before earned. After the great conflict between the North and the South—which, let us hope, may never be repeated—the regiment, now known as the Second Cavalry, was again sent out upon the great plains, and, after years of hard service against the Indians, crossed the Rocky Mountains about two years since, and is now serving on the Pacific coast.

If our hero, whose portrait heads this account, is the youngest soldier in the army, General Harney, whose name he bears, is the oldest. This officer is now eighty-six years of age, but still very active. General Harney entered the service in 1818, and his name has been borne on the army register for sixty-eight years. He joined the regiment in Florida, and became its Colonel in 1846. He was a man of great size and strength, and in his younger days was noted for his athletic powers. He was a noted runner, and for that reason, and on account of his great strength, was much respected and feared by the Indians.

It is related that upon one occasion, at Fort Winnebago, in 1830, the Fox River was frozen over, and the garrison improved the opportunity to have winter games. An Indian was confined at the fort for some offence, for which the penalty was a flogging. Harney, then a Captain, concluded to give the Indian, who was very fleet, a chance in a race on the ice; told him he would give him a hundred yards the start, and in case he (the Indian) reached a certain point first, he would be excused from punishment.

Both men wore moccasins, and both were stripped and belted for the race, Harney carrying a cowhide whip. Both started at the word, and Harney was rapidly gaining on the Indian, when the cunning savage darted to the right, toward a spot where the ice was thin. Being light in weight, the Indian passed the spot safely, but Harney went through into the water. Being a good swimmer, he soon crawled out, and hurried to his quarters, very angry, very wet, and covered with icicles. The Indian did not return, having earned his freedom by cunning if not by fleetness of foot.

General Harney won great distinction in Mexico, and his charge up the steep sides of the Cerro Gordo, April 17, 1847, at the head of his brigade, causing the Mexican General Santa Anna to retreat with his troops in great disorder, is one of the bravest things recorded in the history of the United States.

So our young readers will see that Harney May is rich in godfathers. There are forty officers in the regiment which has adopted him, and each officer is one of his godfathers. His welfare will be a matter of interest to the soldiers of the regiment as well as to the officers. More than eight hundred men will therefore watch the boy's growth, and it is not too much to look forward to the time when he may become a cadet at West Point, and after many years of honorable service he may rise to command the famous corps in which he has just been enrolled.

BY HOWARD PYLE,
AUTHOR OF "PEPPER AND SALT," ETC.

THERE were a Fiddler, a Tinker, and a Shoemaker jogging along the road.

The Fiddler was as merry a little toad as ever you could wish to see; as for the Tinker and the Shoemaker, why, they were as sour as bad beer. By-and-by they came to a cross-road, and there sat an old body begging.

"Give a poor old woman a penny or two—do, now," she says.

"Pooh!" replies the Tinker and the Shoemaker, and off they walked, with their noses in the air as though they were hunting for flies up yonder.

As for the Fiddler, he had another kind of a heart under his jacket; so he gave the old woman all that he had, which was only two pennies.

"A cake for a pie," said the old woman. And what would the Fiddler like to have in the way of a wish? for all that he had to do was to ask, and it should be granted.

Oh, there was little that the Fiddler had to wish for; but since they were in the way of it, he would like to have it for a wish that whenever he would say "Rub-a-dub-dub!" this staff in his hand would up and fight for him, and all that he would have to do would be to sit and look on.

After that they said "Good-morning," and the one went one way and the other the other. Then the three companions plodded along together until, by-and-by, night came, and there they were in a deep forest. After a while they saw a light, so they jogged along more rapidly, and presently came to the house.

Rap! tap! tap! They knocked at the door, but nobody came; so they opened it for themselves and walked in. No, there was no one at home, but there was a table spread with a smoking hot supper, and places for three. Down they sat without waiting for bidding, for their hunger was as sharp as vinegar.

Well, they ate and they ate and they ate, until they could eat no more, and then they turned around and toasted their toes at the warm fire. That was all very well and good; but by-and-by all the wood was burned, and then who was to go out into the dark forest and fetch another armful?

"Not I," says the Tinker.

"Not I," says the Shoemaker.

And so it fell to the Fiddler, and off he went.

But many a one spills the milk mug to save the water jug, and so it was with the Tinker and the Shoemaker; for, while they sat warming their shins at the fire and rubbing their hands over their knees, in walks an ugly little Troll no taller than a yardstick, with a head as big as a cabbage and a good stout cudgel twice as long as himself in his hand.

"I want something to eat," says he.

"You'll get nothing here," say the Tinker and the Shoemaker.

"That we'll see," says the Manikin; whereupon he snatched up his club, and, without more ado, fell upon the Tinker and the Shoemaker and began beating them with all his might and main, and never stopped until he was too tired to drub them any more; then he went away whither he had come, and all that the two fellows could do was to rub the places that smarted the most.

By-and-by in came the Fiddler with his armful of wood, but never a word did the Tinker and the Shoemaker say, for they had no notion of telling how such a little Manikin had dusted the coats of two great hulking fellows like themselves; only the next day they were for staying where they were, for their bones were too sore to be jogging just then, I can tell you!

Well, that suited the Fiddler well enough, and so they lolled around the house all day, for they found all that they wanted to eat in the cupboards.

After supper there was more wood to be brought in from the forest, and this time it was the Tinker and the Shoemaker who went to fetch it, for they had settled it between them that the Fiddler was to have a taste of the same broth that they had supped.

Sure enough, by-and-by in comes the ugly little Troll with the great long cudgel.

"I want something to eat," says he.

"There it is, brother," says the Fiddler; "help yourself."

"It is you who shall wait on me," says the ugly little Troll.

"I shall not," says the Fiddler.

"That we will see," says the Manikin, and he gripped his cudgel.

"Hi!" says the Fiddler; "and is that the game you are playing?" Then, "Rub-a-dub-dub!" says he.

"GIVE A POOR OLD WOMAN A PENNY OR TWO."

Pop! Up jumps his staff from the corner where he had stood it, and then you should have seen the dust fly! This time it was the Manikin who hopped over the chairs, and begged and bawled for mercy. As for the Fiddler, he stood by with his hands in his pockets, and whistled. By-and-by the Manikin found the door, and out he jumped, with the Fiddler at his heels. But the Fiddler was not quick enough, for before he could catch the little Troll he popped into a great hole in the ground, like a frog into a well, and there was an end to that business.

After a while the Tinker and the Shoemaker came back from the forest with their load of wood, and then how the Fiddler did laugh at them! for he saw very well how the land lay. As for him, he was all for following the little Manikin into the hole in the ground; so they hunted here and they hunted there, until they found a great basket and a rope, and then the Tinker and the Shoemaker lowered the Fiddler and his staff down into the pit.

The first body whom he saw was a Princess as pretty as a ripe apple, but looking, oh! so sad at being in such a place. The next he saw was the ugly little Troll, who sat in the corner and growled like our house dog when the cat comes near him.

"So!" says the Fiddler; "there you are, are you? Then it is 'Rub-a-dub-dub' again." And this time before the drubbing was stopped it was all over with the Troll.

And then who was glad but the pretty Princess? She flung her arms around the merry little Fiddler's neck and gave him a right good smacking kiss or two; and that paid a part of the score, I can tell you. Then they sat down, and the pretty Princess told him all about how the Troll had carried her off a year and more ago, and had kept her in this place ever since. After that she took a pure gold ring off of her finger and broke it in two; half of it was for the Fiddler and half of it was for her; for they were sweethearts now, and that was to be a love-token.

Then the Fiddler put the Princess into the basket, and the two fellows above hauled her up. By-and-by down comes the basket again, and it is the Fiddler's turn. "See, now," says he; "suppose that they are up to some of their tricks;" so he tumbled a great stone into the basket in the place of himself. Sure enough, when the basket was about half-way up to the ground, down it came tumbling, for the rogues above had cut the rope, and if the Fiddler had been there in the place of the stone, it would have been all over with him.

Then the Tinker and the Shoemaker told the poor Princess that if she did not promise to tell everybody that they were the lads who had saved her from the ugly little Troll, they would make an end of her there and then, and that was the long and the short of it. So there was nothing for the Princess to do but to promise. Then away they jogged, as little was to be gained by staying there for a longer time.

But if anybody was ever down in the dumps, the Fiddler was the fellow. After a time he saw a pretty little fiddle that hung back of the cupboard. "Aha!" says he, "there is some butter to the crust, after all; and now we will just have a bit of a jig to cheer us up a little." So down he sat, and began to play. And then what do you think happened? Up popped a little fellow no higher than your knee, and as black as your hat.

"RUB-A-DUB-DUB," SAYS THE FIDDLER."

"A PRINCESS AS PRETTY AS A RIPE APPLE."

"What do you want, master?" said he.

"So!" said the Fiddler; "and is that the tune we play? Well, I should like to get out of this, that I should."

No sooner said than done; for he had hardly time to pick up his staff and tuck the fiddle under his arm, when—whisk! he was up above as quick as a wink.

"Hi!" said he; "but this is a pretty fiddle to own, and no mistake!" And off he went, right foot foremost, to follow his nose and see where it led him.

After a while he came to the town where the King lived, and there was a great buzzing and gossip. And this was why: all the folks were talking about how the Tinker and the Shoemaker had brought back the Princess from the ugly little Troll, and how the King had promised that whoever did that was to have her for his wife, and half of the kingdom to boot. But the Princess did nothing but sit and cry and cry. As for marrying, she vowed and declared that she would not do that till she had a pair of slippers of pure gold, and a real diamond buckle on each slipper; and nobody in all of the town was able to make the kind that she wanted.

"So!" said the Fiddler; "that is the way that the wind lies, is it?"

So out he went to a shoemaker's shop. "Will you take a journeyman shoemaker?" said he.

"What can you do?" asked the master shoemaker.

"I can make a pair of slippers such as the Princess wants, only I must have a room all to myself to make them in," says the Fiddler.

That was a tune that tickled the shoemaker's ears, I can tell you. He was wanting just such a journeyman as that; and so the bargain was closed, and that settled the business.

As soon as the Fiddler was alone he drew out his fiddle and began to play a bit of a jig, and there stood the little black fellow, just as he had done before.

"What do you want?" says he.

Why, the Fiddler was wanting such and such a kind of golden slippers, but he only wanted one buckle to them, and that must be made of real diamonds.

Oh! that was an easy thing to have; and there they were, just as the Fiddler had ordered.

"But there is only one buckle," says the shoemaker.

"Tut!" says the Fiddler; "turn no hairs gray for that, brother. Just tell the Princess that the Fiddler has the other, and matters will be as smooth as cream."

Well, the shoemaker did as the Fiddler said, and you may guess how the Princess opened her pretty eyes when she heard that her sweetheart was thereabouts. Nothing would suit her but that she must see that journeyman shoemaker. But when they sent to fetch him, he was gone.

And now would she choose either the Tinker or the Shoemaker? That was what they wanted to know.

Well, there was nothing left for the Princess but to say "Yes," for she felt sure that the Fiddler would be on hand at the right time. So the next day was fixed for the choosing, at which the King was glad enough, for he had little or no peace of his life with all this pestering and talking.

It was not long before the Fiddler heard of that. So off he went and played a turn or two on his fiddle.

"WHAT DO YOU WANT, MASTERY?"

"And what do you want now?" says the little Manikin.

Why, this time the Fiddler was wanting a splendid suit of clothes for himself, all of silver and gold. Besides that, he wanted a hat with a great feather in it, and a fine milk-white horse.

Oh, well, he could have those things easily enough; and there they were. So the Fiddler dressed himself in his fine clothes, and mounted upon his great milk-white horse, and set off for the King's house, with his staff across the saddle in front of him. Up he rode to the castle, and when he knocked at the door they did not keep him waiting long out in the cold, I can tell you.

There they all sat at dinner, the Tinker on one side of the Princess and the Shoemaker on the other. But when they saw the Fiddler in his grand clothes they thought that he was some great nobleman for sure and certain, for neither the Princess nor the two rogues knew who he was. The folks squeezed together along the bench, and made room for him. So he leaned his staff in the corner, and down he sat, just across the table from the Princess.

By-and-by he asked the Princess if she would drink a glass of red wine with him.

Yes, the Princess would do that.

So the Fiddler drank, and then what did he do but drop his half of the ring that the Princess had given him into the cup before he passed it across to her.

Then when the Princess drank, something bobbed against her lips, and when she came to look, lo and behold! there was the half of her ring.

And if anybody in all of the world was glad, it was the Princess at that very moment. Up she stood before them all. "There is my sweetheart," says she, "and I will marry him, and no one else."

As for the Fiddler, he just said, "Rub-a-dub-dub," and up jumped the staff, and began to thump and bang the Tinker and the Shoemaker until they scampered away for dear life, and there was an end of them.

The King was ever so glad to have the Fiddler for a son-in-law in the place of either the Tinker or the Shoemaker, for he was a much better-looking bit of a lad; besides, the others had done nothing but brew trouble and worriment ever since they had come into the house.

THE OLD SCHOOL BOOKS.

BY R. W. McALPINE.

WHAT pleasant memories cluster round these volumes old and worn, With covers smirched, and bindings creased, and pages thumbed and torn!

These are the books we used to con, I and poor brother Will, When we were boys together, in the school-house on the hill, Well I recall the nights at home, when side by side we sat Before the fire, and o'er these books indulged in whispered chat, And how, when father chided us for idling time away, Our eyes bent to the task as though they'd never been astray. The old-time proverbs scribbled here, the caution to beware ("Steal not this book, my honest friend") scrawled roughly here and there,

The blurs, the blots, the luncheon spots, the numberless dog's ears, The faded names, the pictures, and, alas! the stains of tears, All take me back in mind to days when cloudless was the sky, When grief was so short-lived I snubbed before my tears were dry; When, next to father's angry frown, I feared the awful nod That doomed me, trembling, to advance and humbly kiss the rod, How bright those days! Our little cares, our momentary fears, And o'en our pains, vanished with a burst of sob and tear, And every joy seemed great enough to balance all our woes. What pity that when griefs are real, they can't be balmed so! The school-house stands in ruins now, the boys have scattered wide; A few are old and gray like me, but nearly all have died; And brother Will is one of these; his curly head was laid Down by the cross, at father's side, beneath the willow's shade. These books so quaint and queer to you, to me are living things; Each tells a story of the past, and each a message brings, Whenever I sit, at eventide, and turn their pages o'er, They seem to speak in tones that thrilled my heart in days of yore. The school-boy of to-day would laugh, and throw these old books by; But, think you, neighbor, could his heart consent if he were I?

DR. WARD'S MOUNTAIN LASSIE.

BY BELLE WILLIAMS.

MR. BURNS, on the whole, had improved. So said Dr. Ward, as he looked down reflectively upon his corduroy hunting blouse and new top-boots. But then Dr. Ward had examined his patient last August, almost a year ago, and that same verdict had been the result. This had become the doctor's preliminary duty to his yearly "roughing" in the Adirondacks.

"Cheer up, man," said the kindly doctor, as he glanced up from his buckskin toes and caught a look of despair; "we'll have you out of this in another year. This camp life's just the thing. Eat plenty, and don't exert yourself. Look there, now—call that pretty?" he exclaimed, pointing to a pair of guide-boats shooting over the lake. In a moment they drove their bows into the sand, landing the three young mariners in a heap.

"Hah! Nell Burns, think you can beat us, if you are fourteen and weigh a hundred and ten?" and fat little nine-year-old Dudley swaggered up the rustic bark wharf, quite content to let Arthur and Nell reach their father's tent first.

"Well, chickens," was the doctor's greeting, "you're fine specimens of health, I'll warrant. Hey! my mountain lassie; good stout muscle there," he continued, approvingly, pinching Nellie's pretty round arm. "Well, I must be off to Paul Smith's. A fifteen-mile drive isn't a matter of minutes in these woods," and the doctor was soon paddling off in his canoe toward the end of the lake, where his team awaited him.

"Papa, we've been invited," began Arthur.

"You're right, we have," echoed the "old man," as the children were fond of calling matter-of-fact Dudley.

"Sh!" cautioned Nellie, foreseeing a tiff.

But Arthur, as usual, was too sweet-tempered to fire up on small provocation.

"Yes," he resumed; "the Misses Dempster are going to have a camp-fire party to-night. They've invited all the nice people from Saranac; but they'll have a night ride of it home again. Can't we go?" he asked, quickly, mistaking his father's depressed look for a silent refusal.

"I don't care what you do," answered Mr. Burns.

"Ask Aunt Lot; I'm too tired to listen now."

The children walked slowly over the grass toward the bark kitchen, where Aunt Lot was helping Mary, Vene's wife, with the dinner.

"No, of course you can't go," she said, after hearing their request. "Vene's going hunting to-night with Miss Dempster's guide, and there's no one to send for you."

"My!" interrupted Nellie; "I think I can row half a mile," with an emphatic squeeze round each little brother. "I haven't been in the mountains two summers and part of a winter for nothing. What is there to be afraid of on the lake? It's not like walking through the woods at night."

"Goodness! Aunt Lot's too scary," and the "old man" sniffed contemptuously. "She's so little the boat hardly wobbles a mite when she gets in. Then she's afraid it'll tip over 'cause her hair ain't parted in the middle."

Arthur began to laugh uproariously. But Aunt Lot's thin face, grown white and wizened by months of devotion to a sick man's whims, bore the resigned look which meant that the children had gained the day.

Toward sundown that evening a little red craft shot out into the lake.

"I'll sit in the middle," proposed Nell, "and you two boys balance the ends. The 'old man' can take one oar, and we'll let Art sit in the stern and paddle."

Nellie was very womanly, so womanly that the sojourners in the wilderness remarked it—"So careful of her little brothers." Miss Dempster had known Nellie's mother years ago, and Nellie was very like her, she said, with those large pleading gray eyes and the sweet, firm mouth.

The boys went to sister now with their joys and griefs, for sister always had a loving touch and comfort in store. In return the girl loved these twin brothers with a deep, ever-strengthening devotion, drawing them closer day by day. They could be merry too, and as they neared the neighboring camp their gay laugh ringing over the placid lake heralded their approach.

Miss Sarah came down to meet them, while in the parlor tent, on her rustic lounge upholstered in Turkey red, lay Miss Dorothy, waving her hand. Miss Dorothy was an invalid.

On the platform before the parlor, which Miss Dorothy called her piazza, sat the group of guests, and in the middle of them the guide's "beautiful smudge" defied mosquitoes. Ransom had so skillfully sandwiched the chips and said in his pan that not the tiniest blaze disturbed the cloud of smoke. Plentiful weeping and choking amid conversation testified to the strength of his defence against winged marauders.

"Now, Sarah," said Miss Dorothy, "we must have the camp fire lighted, and our picture will be complete."

There in front lay the marvel of skill. A number of stout logs were piled up, and above these, balsam boughs supported in the centre a queen tree, whose graceful top surmounted the structure. Slowly the flames crept out at the bottom, mounting higher and higher, until the pile was one vast conflagration.

The group of watchers, half reclining in the weird, uncanny light, and thrown into strong relief by the shadows of the forest, seemed like goblins of another sphere. But the spell was broken by the merry voices, as "B-i-n-g-o," "Old Dog Tray," and many a college glee wound up in peals of very human laughter.

At last there came a lull. But Miss Sarah was equal to the occasion:

"Come, Ransom, refreshments ready?" she called out.

"Oh yes, Miss Dempster; had it friz a spell ago. The old skeu gave fine cream to-day."

Good bys came at last.

As the boats departed, Miss Dempster struck up "Scotland's burning." From one to another the round was carried, until "look out!" "fire! fire!" echoed from all parts of the lake. One by one the responses died in the distance, fainter and fainter grew the medley, and dissolved like mist into thin air.

The boys were too sleepy now to help row, but sister was able to manage alone.

"Wake me up for the 'all hands off,'" was Dudley's remark, as he settled himself for a nap.

"Port ho!" shouted sister, when near the shore.

Dudley roused up then, and stood in the bow ready to act as guide; but as he sprang, one tired foot caught in the boat's edge, and a black little heap fell to the sand.

Nellie's sigh of relief upon reaching home changed to a gasp of dismay, for, with one groan of pain, the heap lay fearfully quiet.

"Aunt Lot!" she screamed—"Aunt Lot!" and catching the lantern from the edge of the wharf, flashed it into the child's face. It looked ghastly and drawn in the dim flicker, but a slight convulsive twitch showed that he was not dead.

Quickly she gathered him up, and staggered toward the camp with her load. Aunt Lot met her on the way, and her exclamation of surprise died upon her lips as she saw that some dreadful accident had happened.

"Sh!" she cautioned Arthur, sharply, who was sobbing with fright; "don't wake your father," and, turning, led the way to the boys' tent.

There, as they tried to undress the little fellow his suffering roused him, and his piteous screams of appeal drove the listeners almost frantic in their helplessness.

"Nellie, what shall we do?" cried Aunt Lot, wringing her hands in despair. "His arm is broken—I can feel the sharp end of the bone clear through the flesh—and God only knows how else he's hurt."

"We must have the doctor," said Nellie, fiercely, pushing Arthur aside; "but Vene—gone hunting!" and the words fell with a chill upon their hearts.

The nearest help was Dr. Ward, at Paul Smith's hotel, fifteen miles away. The only men who could bring relief in their extremity were the two guides, by that time roaming the mountains in search of deer. They might be gone two days, and every moment was fraught with agony to that child.

"Aunt Lot"—and the words came with determination—"I will bring the doctor. I've rowed five miles for fun, and I can row eight miles now; then there'll be six miles to walk: you know it's a mile shorter by the lake and 'carry.' If I can only keep the trail! But, oh dear! it will take so long; Vene can't do it in less than four hours. Aunt Lot, don't let Dudley die before I get back. Give him brandy, and hold his arm together—anything to keep him. Heavenly Father, take care of us!" she sobbed, running out into the darkness.

Catching up the lantern that was still burning upon the wharf, she pushed off in the Delight.

The lake looked black and forbidding under the starless sky, and a chill miasma seemed to creep over its surface. The lantern in the stern threw scattered red gleams on the water, and lit the way for a few feet around.

But there was no wavering in Nellie's arm, and the steady dip of the oars told surely upon the eight miles.

"I must be careful of Morton's Point," she thought, "there are so many shoals there," and she stopped a moment to hold the lantern high up and take her bearings.

"Passed it!" she exclaimed aloud, as her heart gave a quick leap at the danger so safely distanced.

Presently the arms began to falter, and there were yet two miles ahead.

At that moment a sudden rustling and breaking of the underbrush gave warning that the boat was very near shore. On the bank stood a startled fawn, with head thrown back, and bright eyes fastened upon the moving lantern.

"Poor thing!" murmured the girl. "Very likely your pretty mother is running miles off to lead Vene and Ransom away from her baby. That must have been a providence!" quickly came the comforting thought, for the sudden fright had lent new strength.

The Indian "carry" was reached at last. The weary girl pulled up the boat from the water, then sank to the ground exhausted. Long pent-up tears came, and flowed until her heart seemed bursting. But Mother Nature is wise. She knew how to relieve the overwrought nerves, and beneath her healing touch a feeling of peace and calmness returned. Sitting up, Nellie smoothed the silk skirt that had so lately graced the party, and looked at her watch.

"Only an hour and three-quarters! I am glad I wore my jersey," she reflected, with a smile, "or I couldn't have rowed so fast. But Dudley may be dead even now." The thought darted like an arrow through her brain, and springing up, the brave girl set out upon her long tramp.

Through dense underbrush, over fallen logs, lay the track, a narrow foot-path at best, sometimes so faintly trodden as to be scarcely distinguished amid the thick scattering of fallen leaves. Often a reconnoitring tour was necessary in order to make sure of the trail. Once or twice an open trampled spot was reached, where a party of travellers had broken their single file while crossing from lake to lake.

With a sigh of relief whenever such a place appeared, Nellie paused to gain fresh courage. Each mile had seemed six, and as step after step dragged wearily on the fear constantly arose that she had, after all, lost her way, and was roaming aimlessly about in the great Adirondack wilderness. But these spots were sure signs of human contact, and they proved her only reassurance.

While she rested a moment, with her head on her arm, which had been thrown heavily over a fallen log, the sharp crack of a rifle broke the dead stillness.

Starting up in alarm, she strained her ears intently, but could hear no sound.

"It must be the guides!" And calling aloud with all her strength, "Vene! Vene! Ransom!" she received in answer only the echoes of her own voice.

With beating heart she resumed her way, and had walked, perhaps, another mile, when the lantern slowly flickered and died out.

That possibility had not occurred to her.

"Oh! I might have known," she wailed aloud. "I might have known it wouldn't last! Aunt Lot must have put it on the wharf at dark. What shall I do?"

Not daring to stop and wait the long night through for daylight, stumbling hopelessly forward in the darkness, she caught her foot in a tangle of briars, and, with one wild cry, knew nothing more.

Dr. Ward was aroused from sleep, in the middle of the night it seemed to him, by a loud rapping at his door and calls for instant help. Dressing quickly, he found a few men grouped about a figure on the sofa in the large parlor.

"What! Nellie Burns!" he exclaimed. "How's this?" glancing inquiringly at Mr. Burns's guide as he applied restoratives.

"Don't know, doctor. Me and Rant was out for a night's shootin', and got pretty near Paul's a-trackin' up an old doe. When we fired at the thing we thought we heard a voice callin', but you know them crecturs do make sorrerful noises sometimes. Rant he said it was my sooperstishun; but sure enough, in another second we heard a scream, and I knowed that wasn't no doe. Wa'al, we made short tracks for the spot, and found little Nell here, with her face lung into the bushes, and all the life gone out of her. It didn't take us long, I tell ye, to get her by you."

"No," said the doctor, "she has only fainted; this blood is from the scratches on her face and hands;" and even as he spoke the girl returned to consciousness, and seized his hand.

"Quick! quick!" she gasped. "Dudley's hurt. He may be dead now. Go!—oh, don't lose a minute! He's screaming—he's screaming!" and she sank back weakly.

"But you must take me too," she cried, again starting up.

"Man, get out your spryest horses," directed the doctor, looking toward his host. "Yes, we'll take this lass back with us," he said, patting the torn hand wonderingly as the almost incredible truth flashed upon him.

When the gray dawn crept over the sky, relief came to the little sufferer in camp. The doctor pronounced it a bad fracture, but found no other injuries. With good nursing the boy would get well in a few weeks.

"But there's no knowing what might have resulted from inflammation if the arm had been neglected much longer," he said, with a grave shake of the head. "I wish the world held a few more like this mountain lassie of mine," and the great doctor stooped and kissed the brave face.

CHAPTER II.

A WONDERFUL DELIVERANCE.

THE building of Fort Caroline occupied about three months, and during this time the friendly Indians willingly aided in the work of preparing the tree trunks (which, set on end, were let deep into the earth close beside one another) and in digging the wide moat that surrounded the whole. A heavy embankment of earth was thrown up on the inner side of the palisade of tree trunks, and upon this were mounted a number of great guns.

During the time thus occupied René de Vaux became acquainted with Mico's son, a young Indian of about his own age, named Has-se (which means a sunbeam), and a strong friendship was speedily formed between them. They saw each other daily, and each learned the language of the other.

After the ships had sailed away, René's uncle found time, even in the midst of his pressing duties, to attend to the lad's education, and every morning was devoted to lessons in fencing, shooting the cross-bow, and in military engineering. The evenings were passed with the good Jacques le Moyné, the artist, who was a very learned man, and who taught René Latin and how to draw.

Although his mornings and evenings were thus occupied, René had his afternoons to himself, and these he spent in company with his friend Has-se, who instructed him in the mysteries of Indian woodcraft. Now it happened that while Has-se was a merry, lovable lad, he had one bitter enemy in the village. This was a young man somewhat older than himself, named Chitta, which means the snake. Their quarrel was one of long standing, and nobody seemed to know how it had begun; but everybody said that Chitta was such a cross, ugly fellow that he must needs quarrel with somebody, and had chosen Has-se for an enemy because everybody else loved him.

One afternoon Has-se asked René to go out on the river with him in his canoe, as he had that to tell him which he did not wish to run any risk of being overheard by others. René willingly agreed to go with him, and taking his cross-bow and a couple of steel-tipped bolts, he seated himself in the bow of the light craft, which Has-se paddled from the stern. Going for some distance down the river, they turned into a small stream, from the banks of which huge moss-hung oaks and rustling palm-trees cast a pleasant shade over the dark waters. Here the canoe was allowed to drift, while Has-se unburdened his mind to his friend.

It seemed that the day of the Ripe Corn Dance, the great feast-day of his tribe, was set for that of the next full moon. On this day there was to be a series of contests among the lads of the village to decide which of them was most worthy to become bow-bearer to Mico, their chief and his father. This was considered a most honorable position to occupy, and he who succeeded in winning it, and filling it satisfactorily for a year, was, at the expiration of that time, granted all the privileges of a warrior. The contests were to be in shooting with bows and arrows, hurling the javelin, running, and wrestling. Has-se had set his heart upon obtaining this position, and had long been in training for the contests. His most dreaded rival was Chitta, and while Has-se felt ready to meet the Snake in the games of running, shooting, and hurling the javelin, he feared that, with his greater weight, the latter would prove more than a match for him in wrestling. Could Ta-lah-loko advise and help him in this matter?

"Ay, that can I, Has-se, my lad," cried René. "Thou couldst not have hit upon a happier idea than that of asking advice of me. 'Tis but a week since I removed a cinder from the eye of Simon the armorer, and, in return for the favor, he taught me a trick of wrestling that surpasses aught of the kind that ever I saw. I have practised it daily since, and would now confidently take issue with any who know it not, without regard to superior size or weight. I will show it thee if thou wilt promise to keep it secret. Ha!"

As they talked the canoe had drifted close in to the shore, until it lay directly beneath the gigantic limb of a tree that extended far out over the water, and from which hung a mesh of stout vines. As he uttered the exclamation that finished his last sentence René seized hold of a stout vine, and with a quick jerk drew the light craft in which they were seated a few feet forward. At the same instant a tawny body was launched, like a shot, from the overhanging limb, and dashed into the water exactly at the spot over which, but an instant before, Has-se had sat.

The animal that made this fierce plunge was a panther of the largest size, and if René had not chanced to catch sight of its nervously twitching tail, as it drew itself together for the spring, it would have alighted square upon the naked shoulders of the unsuspecting Indian lad. René's prompt action had, however, caused the animal to plunge into the water, though it only missed the canoe by a few feet, and when it rose to the surface it was close beside them.

Has-se seized his paddle, and with a powerful stroke forced the canoe ahead, but directly into the mesh of trailing vines, in which it became so entangled that they could not extricate it before the beast had recovered from his surprise, and had begun to swim toward them.

A bolt was hurriedly fitted to René's cross-bow and hastily fired at the approaching animal. It struck him near the fore-shoulder, and served to check his progress for a moment, as with a snarl of rage he bit savagely at the wound, from which the blood flowed freely, crimsoning the water around him. Then he again turned toward the canoe, and seemed to leap rather than swim in his eagerness to reach it. A second bolt, fired with even greater haste than the first, missed the panther entirely, and the boys were about to plunge from the opposite side of the canoe into the water, in their despair, when an almost unheard-of thing occurred to effect their deliverance.

Just as one more leap would have brought the panther within reach of the canoe, a huge dark form rose from the red waters behind it, and a pair of horrid jaws opened, and then closed like a vise upon one of its hind-quarters. The panther uttered a wild yell, made a convulsive spring forward, its claws rattled against the side of the canoe, and then the waters closed above its head, and it was dragged down into the dark depths of the stream to the slimy home of the great alligator, who had thus delivered the boys from their peril. A few bubbles coming up through the crimson waters told of the terrible struggle going on beneath them, and then all was still, and the stream flowed on as undisturbed as before. For a few moments the boys sat gazing in silent amazement at the place of the sudden disappearance of their enemy, hardly believing that he would not again return to the attack.

When they had regained the fort, Laudonniere heard with horror René's story of their adventure with the "tiger" and the "crocodile," as he named panthers and alligators, and bade him be very careful in the future how he wandered in the wilderness. He did not forbid his nephew to associate with Has-se, for he was most anxious to preserve a friendship with the Indians, upon whom his little colony was largely dependent for provisions, and he considered René's influence with the Indian lad, who was the son of the chief, very important.

On the afternoon following that of their adventure Has-se came into the fort in search of René, and anxious to acquire the promised trick of wrestling. After securing his promise never to impart the trick to another, René led him into a room where they would not be observed, and taught it to him. It was a very simple trick, being merely a feint of giving way, followed quickly by a peculiar inside twist of the leg; but it was irresistible, and the opponent who knew it not was certain to be overcome by it. Has-se quickly acquired it, and though he found few words to express his feelings, there was that look in his face, when he left René, that plainly showed his gratitude.

When next the silver sickle of the new moon shone in the western sky, active preparations were begun among the Indians for their great Dance of Ripe Corn. The race-course was laid out and carefully cleared, clay was mixed with its sand, and it was tramped hard and smooth by many moccasined feet. A large booth, or shelter from the hot sun, under which the chiefs and distinguished visitors might sit and witness the games, was constructed of boughs and palm leaves. Bows were carefully tested, and fitted with new strings of twisted deer sinew. Those who had been fortunate enough to obtain from the white men bits of steel or iron, ground them to sharp points, and with them replaced their arrow-heads of flint. Has-se with great pride displayed to René his javelin or light spear, the tough bamboo shaft of which was tipped with a keen-edged splinter of milk-white quartz obtained from some far northern tribe. Guests began to arrive, coming from Seloy and other coast villages, from the sea islands of the north, and from the broad savannas of the fertile Alachuia land in the west, until many hundreds of them were encamped within a few miles of Fort Caroline.

At length the day of feasting broke, bright and beautiful, and soon after breakfast Laudoumiere, accompanied by René de Veaux and half the garrison of Fort Caroline, marched out to the scene of the games. Here they were warmly welcomed by Mico and his people, and invited to occupy seats of honor in the great booth. Upon their arrival the signal was given for the games to begin.

First of all came the races for wives, for at this feast only in all the year could the young men of the tribe get married. Even now they were obliged to run after their sweethearts, who were allowed so great a start in the race that, if they chose, they could reach the goal first, and thus escape all further attentions from their pursuers. They generally allowed themselves to be caught, however, and so became blushing brides. Thus, on this occasion and in this manner, Yah-chi-la-ne (the eagle), a young Alachuia chief, gained the hand of Has-se's beautiful sister Nethia (the Day-star).

The contests among the boys, to decide who of them should be Bow-bearer to their chief for the ensuing year, followed, and as the great drum (Kas-a-lal-ki) rolled forth its hollow booming notes twenty slender youths, of whom the handsomest was Has-se (the Sunbeam), and the tallest was dark-faced Chitta (the Snake), stepped forward. All were stripped to the skin, and wore only girdles about their loins and moccasins on their feet; but Has-se, as the son of the chief, had the scarlet feather of a flamingo braided into his dark hair.

From the very first Has-se and Chitta easily excelled all their competitors in the contest, but they two were most evenly matched. Has-se scored the most points in hurling the javelin, and Chitta won in the foot-race. In shooting with the bow, both were so perfect that the judges could not decide between them, and the final result of the trial became dependent upon their skill at wrestling. When they stood up together for this contest, Has-se's slight form seemed no match for that of the taller and heavier Chitta, and when, in the first bout, the former was thrown heavily to the ground, a murmur of disapprobation arose from the white spectators, though the Indians made no sign to express their feelings.

In the second bout, after a sharp struggle, Has-se seemed suddenly to give way, and almost immediately afterward Chitta was hurled to earth; but how, no one could tell except René, who with the keenest interest watched the effect of his lesson. As Chitta rose to his feet he seemed dazed, and he regarded his opponent with a bewildered air, as though there were something about him he could not understand.

Again they clinched and strained and tugged, until the perspiration rolled in great beads from their shining bodies, and their breath came in short gasps. It seemed as though René's friend must give in, when, presto! down went Chitta again; while Has-se stood erect, a proud smile on his face, winner of the games, and Bow-bearer to his father for a year.

Has-se had still to undergo one more test of endurance before he could call himself a warrior. He must pass through the ordeal of the cassine, or black drink. This was prepared by the medicine-men, of roots and leaves, and to drink of it was to subject one's self to the most agonizing pains, which, however, were but of short duration. In spite of his sufferings, the youth who drank from the horrid bowl was expected to preserve a smiling face, nor admit by word or sign that he was undergoing aught but the most pleasing sensations. If he failed in this one thing, no matter what record he had previously gained for courage or daring, he was condemned to share the work of women, nor might he ever again bear arms or take part in the chase or in war.

Immediately after his overthrow of Chitta, Has-se was led to an elevated seat, where he could be seen of all the people, and a bowl of the awful mixture was handed him. Without hesitation, and with a proud glance around him, the brave youth swallowed the nauseous draught, and then folding his arms, gazed with a smiling face upon the assembled multitude. For fifteen minutes he sat there, amid a death-like silence, calm and unmoved, though the great beads of perspiration rolling from his forehead showed what he was enduring. At the end of that time a great shout from the people told him that his ordeal was over, and, weak and faint, he was led away to a place where he might recover in quiet from the effects of his terrible sufferings, and enjoy in peace the first glorious thoughts that now he was indeed a Bow-bearer and a warrior.

Réne sprang forward from his seat to seize and shake his friend's hand, while from all, Indians as well as whites, arose shouts of joy at the victory of the brave and much-loved lad who wore the Flamingo Feather.

As the angry Chitta turned away from the scene of his defeat his heart was filled with rage by these shouts, and he muttered a deep threat of vengeance upon all who uttered them, those of his own race as well as the pale-faces.

CANOE "TALKS."

BY THE COMMODORE OF THE NEW YORK CANOE CLUB.

IV.—CRUISING.

"OF course," said Mr. Russell, when the Archer boys came to him for the last of their canoe "talks" in the club-house, "you all expect to enjoy this summer's canoe cruise very much."

"I should say we do," answered ever-ready Bob.

"We certainly expect to," said the more thoughtful Aleck; and,

"If we don't enjoy canoe cruising, I don't know of anything we should enjoy," remarked Ben.

"My most important bit of advice," said Mr. Russell,

CANOE SHELTER FOR SLEEPING UNDER

"is for each one of you to consult the wishes of the others in everything during the cruise. You must constantly bear and forbear; and the opportunities you will have for 'giving in' to each other will, if made the most of, be a source of happiness to you for long years to come.

"Never try to cruise up-stream. Plan your trip so that you will start at the head of some river, or as near the head as you can find good water, and cruise down.

FLAMME FORCÉE.

"Do not try to cover too great a distance in one day. Twenty-five miles per day is enough, and is more than you will sometimes care to make.

"Never hurry yourselves. Take plenty of time to fish, bathe, land and explore the country on either bank of the river, or do whatever else seems pleasant to you. Spend Sunday in camp, and make of it a day of complete rest."

"And go to church?" asked Bob.

"Yes, go to church, if you are camped near enough to one, and feel that it will do you good to do so. But one of you should always stay near the canoes and guard camp.

"Most of the things necessary for you to take are mentioned in the list you have shown me, that your uncle Harry included in his 'Camp Needs and Comforts,' and printed in YOUNG PEOPLE of July 1, 1884.

"You will not need the knapsacks, but you will each need a water-proof bag in which to carry your clothing.

"Your mess chest, which will be carried in the middle of the 'Peterboro' canoe, should be three feet long, one foot high, and eighteen and a half inches wide, inside measurement. Its top should have a cover of painted canvas, with flaps that will come down over the edges. Part of this chest should be filled with as many tin boxes, each six inches square and a foot high, as may be required. These boxes should have tightly fitting hinged covers, and on each cover should be painted a letter that will indicate the nature of its contents.

"For ordinary cooking you may trust to an open camp-fire, or take one of the many little folding sheet-iron stoves that are to be found in any of the stores where camping goods are for sale. For emergencies, however, I would carry a spirit lamp, flamme forcée, and a quart of alcohol.

"Bob and Aleck will sleep on light cork mattresses, spread on the ground beneath their inverted canoe, but Ben will need a canoe tent such as I have here."

At this point Mr. Russell took from one of the canoes near him a bundle of striped awning cloth, which, when unfolded, proved to be a small tent to be suspended from the two masts of a canoe above the cockpit, and buttoned down around the coaming. The method of arranging it is shown in the last illustration on this page.

Resuming his talk after exhibiting the canoe tent, Mr. Russell said: "Of course all small articles that must be kept absolutely dry should be carried beneath the watertight hatches of Ben's 'Nautilus,' and your bedding, after being well aired and dried each morning, must be carefully rolled in rubber blankets before being stowed in the canoes.

"Remember what your uncle Harry told you about dishes and cooking utensils, and cleanse them thoroughly immediately after each meal.

MESS CHEST.

"Always land and make your camp before sundown.

"When you discover rapids or other dangerous places ahead of you, land and explore them thoroughly from the banks before attempting to run them in your canoes.

"In choosing camping grounds, carefully avoid low, wet lands and the vicinity of swamps or ponds of standing water; also remain under cover so long as any night mists hang over the river.

"Keep a daily log of your cruise, for future reference and amusement.

"This is all the advice I have time to give you in present, and it is probably much more than you will remember.

"Now good-by, and a jolly trip to you."

With these words the athletic young master stepped into his canoe and started off to join a friend on a long cruise along the sea coast, while the Archer boys turned toward home to make use of their newly acquired knowledge, and prepare for their own cruise on inland waters.

A CANOE CAMP OUTFIT.

A STORY OF THE SEA.

Alice and Punch expect to spend a happy day on the beach.

For Alice is devoted to crabbing—a sport which Punch also regards as highly amusing.

Alice's first capture, however, nips Punch's leg with his claw, and that amiable person gets a shocking fright.

And before Alice can reach him, he is floating on the briny ocean, in a most helpless manner.

Things might not have been so bad if Alice had not been so eager, for she loses her balance, and plunges in headlong.

They return home, Punch not feeling at all well, and Alice having lost all taste for crabs—and crabbing.

A QUIET TIME WITH THE ILLUSTRATED PAPERS.

OUR POST-OFFICE BOX.

JULIESBURG, COLORADO.

I live in a pretty little town called Julesburg, in Colorado. It is only one year old, and has several hundred inhabitants, most of whom have come within five or six months. The town is two miles from the southwest boundary of Nebraska, and situated on the Platte River, which is half a mile wide, and full of bluffs, which at this time of the year are nice and green. The town is on a beautiful ground, rising about ten feet in twenty rods for a stretch of three miles back to the bluffs; these bluffs extend back about three miles further, when you come to a beautiful rich table-land on either side of the river; and this tract of land, on which the town is situated, is north of the river, and is six or eight miles in extent up and down its banks. Up the river about five miles there were two towns, and this was a good many years ago. One was a military post, which was moved to Sidney; the other was massed by the Indians. The Indians burned the town and killed most of the people who lived there, and left nothing but parts of sod houses, ionic, bricks, and old caved-in cellars. Buffalo horns are scattered all over the town. There are a few antelopes here; my uncle shot one, and I had a taste of it. There are wild horses over south of the river about forty miles. A man was picking up buffalo bones, and found the point of an Indian's arrow in one of them. This country was once called the American Desert, but it does not look like one now. There are many re-freshing showers we have had. I have two little kittens; one is named Robinson Crusoe, the other is not named. I have been taking HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE three years, and think it a charming paper. I am interested in "False Witness." Do you know our father? Well, goodbye. I am your constant reader. HANNY L. C.

LOUISVILLE, KENTUCKY.

I have just come home from a delightful trip in the country. My friend and I spent most of the day about the house, in the evening walking or riding, according to the weather. The garden was so comfortable and pleasant that our strolls around the country were not very extensive. Looking eastward, one sees the large woods on one side and the hay-field on the other. This scene looks grand when in the evening the setting sun throws its brilliant lights upon it. The woods appear to be on fire, and the house wrapped in red, pink, and golden colors; these constantly change until the night covers it with a dark mantle. KATIE D.

AGASSIZ, MAINE.

I have wanted to write you for a long time, but have never had courage enough to do so till today. I am a little girl ten years old, and have taken HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE for three years. I study reading, writing, spelling, arithmetic, geography, grammar, history, French, and music. I should like to have some little exercises to correspond with me. ALICE V. TORREY.

CASTLETON, NEW YORK.

DEAR POSTMASTER,—I am now visiting at my aunt's. They have two dogs, a cat, and a bird. Sport is very homely, but very amusing. He and the cat have fine times together; if another dog dies at the cat, sport flies at him and barks.

My aunt had two cats, but one day, when she went to church, they got out and one of the dogs killed one. I have a very sweet little-doll, that has three teeth. I left it on the stoop, and the dog came and ate the hair out, but I gilded it on again. I have written once before, but I am ten years old, quite tall for my age. At home I have a box of toys, a pet, and it was brought up to eat out of my mouth. I live in New York, but I like this place, "Castleton-on-the-Hudson." It is very much; it is built on three hills. The weight is very long here. We took a long ride to Valatie and Kinderhook, and all the country around looks lovely—such beautiful farms, and lots of little pink pigs and white sheep. MAY G. T.

PAINES CITY, NEBRASKA.

I am nine years old, and go to a country school. Our school is out of study Third Reading, spelling, writing, arithmetic, and filling blanks. I made a paper-doll house, and I think it was very nice. Would you like a pet, and I have seven cats and kittens between them. I have a wax doll, and sister has one too. I think Harp's Young People is a very nice paper. My favorite stories are "Little Miss Santa Claus," "The Minister's Barrel," "A Fortunate Mistake," "The Three Runaway Girls," and "False Witness." I send the Post-office Box and funny pictures. I send the receipt for Johnny-axe, as Currie W. C. wanted it. One quart of buttermilk, two tablespoonsful of butter, and one egg, for a thick batter, one teaspoonful of soda, the same of salt; bake in oven. I composed this letter, but pa wrote it for me. ELLA V. C.

NEW YORK CITY.

In your issue of August 3 some one writing from Milwaukee, Wisconsin, who signs herself "Stella," asks for some nonsense verses beginning "Mr. Tenyson's Tupper, Tupper, von Burns." I think this is what she refers to:

"Mr. Tenyson Tinkleton Tupper von Burns
Was no poet, as every one knew,
But the fact that he had his poetical turns
Was well understood by a few.

"I long, I aspire, I suffer and sigh,
When the fever is on, he confessed;
You never should have I wept for, why?
My faculties cannot be expressed!

"Ah, what avail language, ink, paper, and quill,
When the soul of a gifted one yearns?
Could I but write what I think, all creation would Brill!"

Said Tenyson Tupper von Burns."

They appeared in St. Nicholas for December, 1881. C. S. C.

FORT ADAMS, NEWPORT, RHODE ISLAND.

DEAR POSTMASTER,—I wrote to you once before, but my letter was not printed for some reason. I say I must not be discouraged, but try again. My sister Nellie, who is eight years old, says very often she is going to write to you, but she is not to be depended upon, for she would rather any time play croquet or read than write a letter. Nellie takes HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE, but we both enjoy reading every word of it. I liked "Job's opportunity" very much, but I think "False Witness" is quite as pretty a story. This is a large military post, situated near Newport; we have a new steamer that runs twice a week, one hour, and a beach very near our house, where we go to bathing when it is warm enough, and some of the gentlemen on the kind enough to give me such little gifts to swim. We have two lovely Maltese cats; we call them Ko-Ko and Midge; the latter because he looks so small beside Ko-Ko. I know you generally say that birds and cats and birds don't agree; for that was dreadful that happened to your bird—but I had a bird given to me, and before long it had become so fond of hanging the cage on, we put it on the table in my bedroom, and one evening, when Nellie went upstairs to be sure that the doors were closed, she found the bird generally say that it was going to go to sleep close beside the birdie. He seems to like to Clippie very much, and loves to hear him sing, but I wouldn't like to trust him very far.

The buttercups and daisies were beautiful in their season, but it is now past, and so I have to be contented with the flowers in our garden; I am sorry to say this is not a success this year, on account of the dry weather; the only things that are pretty are the sweet-peas. I am ten years old. Good-by. Your loving friend,
MARIE C. R.

SHELBYVILLE, INDIANA.

You may have seen the name of this town in the papers lately, as three American fishing vessels were seized here by the customs officers. This town was principally settled by immigrants when the United States gained their independence. It soon became the largest place in the province, having a population of twelve thousand. It was the only place where immigrants left the town and went to other settlements along the coast. Now it has a population of about two thousand. As I am collecting stamps, would you like to have five cents of mine (age eleven) exchange with me. I will close now, with love.

EDWARDS, PENNSYLVANIA.

A little while ago there were fears of the death of little Pete, our gosling, but he did not die, and now he is quite big, and so tame that he follows you all over. I do not know why we were so worried with him when he is real big. He will sometimes get in your way when you walk, but I guess a great many of the readers of HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE would like to have a gosling like him. He is so cunning. He and another were batched under a turkey, with a whole brood of little turkeys. These two goslings could not live with the turkeys, so they were taken away and raised by hand. One of them had a topknot on his head, and was very pretty, but this poor little fellow did not live very long. His name was Pete. C. L. F. (aged eleven years).

HAMILTON, NEW YORK.

DEAR POSTMASTER,—We are three cousins, and all enjoy HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE. Last week, with some other cousins, we gave a party entertainment. It consisted of tableaux, recitations, etc. One of the tableaux was "The Sleeping Princess," and another, "Bo-Peep." Hamilton is quite a pretty village, but very quiet now, because of the schools not being in session. Madison University and Colgate Academy are situated here. Rev. Edward Everett is giving a very fine lecture here Commencement week. Will the Postmaster kindly tell us where the home of L. M. Alcott is situated? We send some of our publications, and hope to see this letter in print.

KATIE S., FLORENCE B., JENNIE S.
Miss Alcott's home is in Concord, Massachusetts. I cannot answer the question which I do not publish.

MARBURG, PENNSYLVANIA.

Everybody is away from home, to stay for a week, except my brother, sister, and myself. My sister is fifteen years old, and I am thirteen, so we do not know very much about keeping house. Every night we put a club by the bed, in case of a prowling robber or any other unwelcome visitor. We like HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE very much, and we have read every word of it, and it likes it too. When is Jimmy Brown going to write again? I think that "False Witness" is a very interesting story. My sister and I like Miss Alcott's stories very much indeed, especially "Little Women." Is "Mildred's Bargain" published in book form, and if it is, where can I get it, and what is the price? We have read every receipt for chocolate-creams, and not one of them has been a success. If any of the Little House-keepers would tell us a good receipt, we would be very glad. We like to work in the garden, and as we live in the country, we have a good chance to take plenty of exercise.

EMMA M. B.
Good receipts for chocolate-creams are in order; please send some. Messrs Harper & Brothers will send Mildred's Bargain to any address for $1.

SMITHVILLE, PENNSYLVANIA.

DEAR POSTMASTER,—I am very much interested in our Post-office Box, and I thought I would write to you. I have two very tame named Spot. My brother has two pigeons that are very tame. When he feeds the turkeys they come and peck at his feet. I have a cat named Emma when HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE came; I like it very much. My brother and I got it for a Christmas present from our brother who lives in Iowa. EMMA J. M.

ROME, NEW YORK.

We are very sorry to say that we have written to you and our letter was not published. But we are not discouraged, and will write another. I will write you as often as I can, though we do not live here; and we were spending our summer vacation here. We go in bathing every day, and we both can swim. We often go rowing, and the lake is very calm. Every day passes so quickly that it is impossible to get in all we should like to. We stop at Spring Beach, which is a part of the lake, very early in the morning. There are two steamers that run on this lake; we sail in them very often. Hot afternoons we spend in a grove. There are a great many children here. There is a bathing man who goes in bathing every day. Spring Beach has several mineral springs, also a pond containing about five hundred trout.

JOSEF P. AND ERIC C.

READING, PENNSYLVANIA.

I will soon be thirteen years old. I have taken HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE a number of years, and like it very much. I have a cat named Canary-bird. He is so tame that he sits on my finger and allows me to carry him about the house. He also eats from my mouth. I play the violin, and have been going to the High School one year.

ESTELLA L. T.

CHARLESTON, SOUTH CAROLINA.

I am a little girl nine years old. I have been taking HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE for some time, and I like it very much. I have a cat named Lewis, but he is too young to sing yet. We have a dog named Epic; he is a bull dog, but not cross, and the other day he brought two strange dogs into the house. I have a piano, and I have taken music lessons on the piano for five years. I like "False Witness," "Who Knows Best?" and "Bits of Advice." Also like Howard Pyle's stories. I go to school and study geography, catechism, reading, history, spelling, and music.

E. BARRY O'D.

GREENSBORO, OHIO.

It is very warm here, and my sister Nell has been down in the cellar trying to keep cool. As nearly all your subscribers tell about their pets, I will tell about mine. I have a cat named Lewis, but he is too young to sing yet. We have a dog named Epic; he is a bull dog, but not cross, and the other day he brought two strange dogs into the house. I have a piano, and I have taken music lessons on the piano for five years. I like "False Witness," "Who Knows Best?" and "Bits of Advice." Also like Howard Pyle's stories. I go to school and study geography, catechism, reading, history, spelling, and music.

IDA C. W.

ROSE HILL, VIRGINIA.

I am a little girl seven years old. I have taken HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE for a year, and love it very much. I live in the country, in Virginia, and I want to tell you two strange things that have happened at our home lately. A few weeks ago two broods of chickens were hatched out the same day, and I gave both broods the same feed, and shut in the other brood, but the first brood shut up escaped from her box the next day, and going to the place where her fourteen chicks were with the others, called them all and took them to the box where she had been shut up, leaving the others with the other hen. Wasn't that bright? The other thing is that a raspberry vine growing in front of a fence, and which had a seed dropped there and took root. If you think this is a good enough letter, please print it with my others. Four true friends, G. C. M. Of course it is good enough. It is a very good letter indeed.

Here is a letter from two fine little fellows who live in Ohio:

We are twin boys, and will be eight years old in November. We live at Mount Echo, Ohio, and have a beautiful view of the Ohio River and the Kentucky hills. One brother has a dog named Lewis, but we will go over the hill to school in the fall. We have two dogs, one a water spaniel, which we call Douglas, the other a little yellow dog named Dot. We like the Young People very much, it is such a comfort to us, especially on rainy days. We would like to see the Postmistress, which shows an interest in the boys and girls, and if she would come to see us in the early part of summer we would just load her with roses. Will she send me a letter for such little boys as we are. Good-by. We remain, as ever, great lovers of HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE.

RICHARD AND THEODORE B.

WOODLAND, CLAYTON, NEW YORK.

I saw a letter in your last number from Bebe H., who lives on a bank of the St. Lawrence. I live on the opposite bank, about two miles from Clay. Our woods are very beautiful, and I am right in the middle of a small wood, so we called it Woodlands. We have a beautiful view of the river, and on clear days we can see the Canada shore. I love to sit on the piazza and look at the river. I think it is very beautiful. We go fishing for the whole day. We take our lunch along, and at noon we land on some island, and the boatmen cook the fish we catch in the morning. I love to go fishing, and I don't know when we start out again, and I fish until it is time to go home. Last summer I went through the Lake of the Woods. It is a lake right in the middle of an island. At one place it is so narrow that you can barely get the boat through. Once we went to the camp of the canoeists on Grindstone Island. I saw the clock marked "New York Times."

AMY R.

Another little girl and I are writing a little paper, as we think it great fun, and we want to see how many of our little friends are taking HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE would send us some letters, poetry, or prose, made up by themselves. We would like it very much if they would. Our address is—

G. N. BARLOW, I. O. Box 161, Lenox, Massachusetts.

PHILADELPHIA, PENNSYLVANIA.

I am a little boy ten years old. Last winter I went to school, and studied English, arithmetic, writing, arithmetic, dictation, diction, composition, French, grammar, geography, and history. I had a canary for a pet, but it died. I have a mouse, and I named it Uncle Sam. I have a cat; its kittens; he calls it Phillip Sheridan. I have taken HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE ever since it was first published.

J. I. MCK.

DOWNSTOWN, SIERRA COUNTY, CALIFORNIA.

DEAD POSTMISTRESS.—I take great interest in the Post-Office Box. Emma C. W.'s letter reminded me that I might tell you something about birds in northwestern California. One of the prettiest, I think, is the yellow hammer. The back, head, wings, and tail are a very delicate blue. Its breast is the same color, dotted here and there by small black spots. Can any one tell me the name of this bird? It is about the size of a robin; it has a bright yellow top-knot, a bright red breast, and black wings and tail. Swallows are very numerous here; they build their nests of mud under the eaves. The nests are very neat, and are of a great variety. The bright yellow wild canary is very beautiful, and sings very sweetly. The woodpeckers are very numerous. I wrote to HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE last year, and I was very glad, and felt very proud to see my letter in the Post-Office Box. I would like very much to correspond with some girl in the East. One more question, and I shall have finished. I have a button, which is a button-string; I have one, containing nine hundred and ninety-nine buttons, no two alike. It is over fifteen feet long, and weighs seven or eight pounds. I am very proud of it.

ALTA VAUGHN.

MARLBORO, PENNSYLVANIA.

I live in a small village at the top of a high hill. It has only thirty-one inhabitants, and is very quiet. I like HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE very much, and think the name just suits it. We also take the Look's Companion and the Crafts Magazine. I have a very pretty little pet named Dot. I named it Topsy, after the Topsy in Uncle Tom's Cabin. I also have a white gosling, a drake; its name is Thomas. At night, when it goes to bed, he is full all the way up to his mouth; I can feel the grass beside his neck. I have a curly brown dog; it is a water spaniel, and I call him Rock. There are a great many chestnuts here; some are very large. Will you please tell me if "Talking Leaves" can be sent to me. G. E. B.

Talking Leaves is published in a very pretty style, and makes a charming gift-book. Its price is $1, for which Messrs. Harper & Brothers will send it to you.

NORTH CAMBRIDGE, MASSACHUSETTS.

DEAR POSTMISTRESS.—The interest which some of your young people have manifested over finding long words, reminded me of the amusement I have had from asking friends to repeat after me, Waver's Probabilities of Dates, and I had an old pronunciation. I will add that all the vowels have the long sound with the exception of those in the last two syllables, which have the short sound. Let those of your readers who are not familiar with the word attempt to correctly pronounce it after reading it through. Afterward they may try transmagnificatantiajolly.

PHILADELPHIA, PENNSYLVANIA.

DEAR POSTMISTRESS.—My brother has been a subscriber to this charming paper since January, and he has enjoyed it very much. I walk a mile and a half to school twice a day, but do not mind it so much, because I am used to it. I am in the Third Class. I have a brother named John, who is now old. I have a darling little brother, whose name is James Arthur; he is nineteen months old—just old enough to get into all kinds of mischief. He has walked and talked since he was a year old. I have no pets now, but has a very pretty cat, which we called Limpy. Do you not think that was a strange name for a cat? I will tell you how we came to call him so. We found him in the yard one cold winter day, with his nose, eye, and tail sore, and he limped with one foot. Mamma dropped eye-water in his eye, and bathed him with liniment. He grew better in a short time, and did not even limp, but he never liked to play. As soon as he came home in the evening Limpy left, and did not return till papa left in the morning. When we moved, he became scared at the move-men, and we could not catch him. I remain, with much love, EMMA L. M.

NEW YORK CITY.

I have taken HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE since No. 3, and have enjoyed it thoroughly. I am twelve years old. As the Fourth of July happened to come on Sunday, it was celebrated on the fifth, and to commemorate the event papa took us to Newburgh, which is sixty-five miles up the Hudson. On the Hudson we saw the Palisades, Yonkers, the Sugar-loaf Mountain, the Highlands, and the Places. In Newburgh we saw Washington's headquarters, which contained a boat worn in the war by the Hessians, Washington's chair, and numerous other things.

Alice E. H.: Write as often as you please, dear. I am sorry there is not room for your letter now.

—Will some girl or boy write to Alice R. B., 372 Broad Street, Providence, Rhode Island? This Alice may also write again, as her little letter is crowded out this time—Gerie W.: I am glad you belong to a juvenile missionary society, as I am much interested in all such work.—Jessie L. B.: Write again, dear, and tell me about the flowers near your home. Jessie is one of my California girls—Maggie L. Aikman, Box 354, Winnipeg, Manitoba, would like to receive a letter from Edith Aikman, thinking they may possibly be able to claim relationship.

Exchangers will please send their notices on separate slips, and not on the sheet with answers to puzzles or in the middle of their letters.

A MUSICAL GENIUS.

A FEW days ago I was trying to write a story for the amusement of the rising generation, when a friend interrupted me to ask my advice as to a certain dog, which he was doubtful whether he should keep or not. I was impatient of the interruption, and advised him to sell the animal. But that advice did not suit him; he was very fond of "Pepper," who, or which, was in addition such a hopeless mongrel that he doubted whether he should find a purchaser.

"Then keep him," I suggested.

"He's too expensive," protested my friend, who had now taken up permanent quarters in my arm-chair. "He eats too many things. He chewed the tail off one of my coats yesterday, and last week ate up half a book."

"What book?" I inquired, absently.

"A treatise on the Great Pyramid; more than I could ever get down."

I did not feel the slightest interest in Pepper, which I had only seen once, when he made straight for my legs. All the time my visitor was discoursing on his merits and demerits I was trying to think out my story. In an absent sort of way I began digging my pen into my blotting-paper, then into my desk. A more than usually vicious dig broke the points off, leaving them sticking in the wood.

I tried to pull them out, and damaged my finger. Then, in a moment, an incident of many years ago flashed across my memory, and Tommy Pavcy came to my mind for the first time for at least a couple of decades.

Now that there is no fear of interruption I will try and recall the incident in question.

Tommy was a small stout boy of nine. He very much wanted to be taller, and he used to hang to the tops of doors as long as he could hold on in order to stretch himself out. He had various other peculiarities, amongst them a great love of music.

He possessed a jew's-harp, which he could play in a distressing manner. He also had a miniature bagpipe or bagpipes, whichever is correct, which uttered doleful noises. But his greatest triumph was a harp made of a "merry-thought" chicken-bone, with elastic stretched across. This we thought he could never beat.

But he did. He discovered that if you stuck a broken pen-nib in the table and gave it a flip with your finger it gave out a musical note. The note varied with the distance it was driven in and the size of the nib, so that it was possible to tune it.

Tommy discovered this invaluable secret during writing class one day, and communicated it to the rest of us in order that we might assist him in collecting the necessary materials. There was havoc in pens that day; never had so many required renewal. Tommy treasured up the broken nibs, and employed his time when the master's eye was not on him in fixing them into the edge of the deal table, where they were out of sight.

Our master was an easy-going but irritable man. He discovered after a time that some mischief was on hand, but not seeing quite what it was, took no notice of our behavior till he found that Tommy was evidently the source of it. He edged his way gradually toward the centre of attraction, and then bent down over a small boy as if absorbed in the youngster's efforts.

Tommy, thinking all was safe, began fingering his instrument. The sound caught Mr. Lockwood's ears, and he glanced up.

Tommy saw he was discovered, and tried to dislodge his nibs. He managed to extract all but two, which broke off short.

"What have you there, Pavcy?" asked Mr. Lockwood.
"Nothing, sir," replied Tommy, giving the regulation answer without hesitation.

Mr. Lockwood, however, was not quite satisfied; he had seen Tommy pulling out something from the table. He bent over and passed his hand quickly along the edge. A sharp exclamation told that he had discovered something; one of the broken points had caught his finger.

Poor Tommy paid for that accident by having a couple of hundred lines to write. He also had to replace all the pens which had been broken, which cost him fourpence. So Tommy's musical propensities received a decided check.

ENGLISH LAWN-TENNIS PLAYERS.

BY HOWARD A. TAYLOR.

A FEW months ago* I gave the readers of HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE some hints on lawn-tennis which I trust they found of practical benefit to their games. One of the best practical methods of learning to play is to study the game of a first class player. The very best of these, however, live too far away for my American readers, and so I am going to tell you what the best English players have done, especially their champion, William Renshaw.

To speak correctly about the play of Englishmen as a class would be a difficult task. Their methods, on the whole, are almost the same as those of their American cousins, and differ individually, much as ours do in the United States. To this remark there is one important exception. Our base-ball batting on this side of the Atlantic has a good deal of influence on our instinctive methods of hitting the tennis ball. As the custom in base-ball is to strike with a horizontal swing of the bat from the shoulder, we are apt to hit the tennis-ball in the same way—to take it at the highest point of the rebound, with the racket held almost horizontal from the shoulder.

Now in England, where a boy is brought up, so to speak, on the perpendicular swing of his cricket bat—the very opposite of the base-ball motion—he unconsciously takes to hitting the tennis-ball in the same way. Instead of hurrying the stroke, and taking the ball wherever he happens to meet it, the Englishman is apt to wait as long as he can—almost to the second rebound of the ball. Then with his eye, the coming ball, the racket, and the point of attack in the opposite court all in one perpendicular plane, he gets an infinitely greater amount of accuracy in his stroke than does the American. I have seen a base-ball trainer at college follow out this principle for attaining accuracy by making his pupils throw the ball directly overhand or underhand from base to base, instead of at horizontal arm's-length, the more common method.

What I have said brings us to the idea that cricket practice is tennis practice too. And so it is, as many of our best players witness, who come from the cricket clubs around Boston, New York, and Philadelphia. But cricket practice is an aid only to a certain degree, and, indeed, in time becomes even a hindrance. There is a delicacy of play in tennis unknown and even antagonistic to the instincts of the average hard-hitting cricketer, which must compel any one who wishes to arrive at the highest tennis honors to give up cricket play entirely. English tennis players surpass us in their form of play, but the fact that they keep up their cricket too long leaves them with much less delicacy of play than we have. The slow, careful "placing," often so effective in our own tournaments, is almost an unknown quantity in England. So long as I have any respect for my legs I would not play with an Englishman without plenty of back and side nets. He could tire me out in one set running after the balls that passed far beyond my reach. As I have explained, he will send the ball with a great deal of accuracy in a given direction. He is not apt to aim for one side of the court, and have the ball fall in the other or beyond a side-line. That part of his stroke is well enough. On the other hand, the stroke is so forcible and so inaccurate in its perpendicular direction that it is far less likely to be stopped by an opponent than by a net, either the court net or a back net.

Now when we realize the fact that the English champion has transported the correct cricket stroke to tennis, that he has a superior delicacy of play to any other man in the world, and finally that, differing from all his countrymen, he can strike his opponent's court every time, we get some idea of his powers.

I have been asked to give some intelligible idea of Mr. Renshaw's prowess. Possibly some of my readers have witnessed one of the unfortunate winners of the All-comers Prize at Newport playing off for the championship with our own champion, Mr. Sears. Perhaps he has seen the balls go off the champion's racket down one side or the other of his opponent's court, utterly beyond the reach of the latter, who, standing spell-bound in the middle of the court, stares at the passing balls until, in sheer disgust, he would like to hide his head from the on-looking crowd. Well, I have seen Dr. Dwight, who is about equal in technical skill to Mr. Sears, occupy just such a position against Mr. Renshaw as the Newport All-comers winner did above. When the English champion is fully on his mettle, which is about every other time he plays—and always when the match is of importance—the best of the English players have nothing to do but gaze open-mouthed in the opposite court at the ball coming back off his racket.

Now how does all this happen? In the first place, he has discarded all cautiousness of play. Lest he should cramp his game by too much carefulness of style, it is his rule to refuse odds of more than fifteen in a game to any of his opponents. As he can give those odds to any one of them, he must be well used to counting his games that way. But this lack of caution is only comparative. He is a brilliant player, to be sure, and yet a thoroughly steady one. I think his brilliancy consists in trying to "kill" every ball. His steadiness consists in succeeding. Contrary to the correct rule for inferior players, he seldom returns the ball simply to await his opportunity, but usually to settle matters on the spot. No matter how the ball comes to his court, it is pretty sure to be returned where his opponent will not reach it again. He plays forward and back about as the average players, scarcely running forward to "smash" as much as he is generally reputed to do. The only thing peculiarly noticeable in his style is a sudden wrist motion at the end of his strokes, which gives, especially in his volleying, the sharp, decisive character to his play. The elbow is held very rigid, and the force of his stroke comes only from his wrist, which must be of immense muscular power.

But I have been speaking of Mr. Renshaw at his best. On an "off" day one can notice the same amount of speed, the same accuracy of direction, but a greater tendency to fall into the common English fault of hitting the ball over the back line. On a very bad day the net, too, gets its share of the balls. Of course, with this great amount of force the least deviation from the correct angle of his racket is apt to send the ball flying over the back net. This description may call to mind the methods of play of two or three "brilliant" players at home. But between them and Mr. Renshaw one feels an instinctive difference. I think Mr. Renshaw's best game gives the impression of being the correct measure of his everyday play—as if he were doing what he really was trying to do. There are on this side of the Atlantic several players who can do wonderful things with the racket for a set or so. But they scarcely know what they are doing; certainly not how they do it.

And this is what seems to be the drawback to the further advancement of good play in this country. Until we learn this especial lesson that the English champion teaches us, we can scarcely be said to have arrived at any of the possibilities of the game. Some one of our good players will bring forward a very strong game for a set, a match, or even a tournament, and yet at the end sink back into his old position, with no advantage whatsoever gained from his sudden spurt—except, perhaps, the prize. Now why is this? I believe that Mr. Renshaw when he makes a good stroke knows just why he made it and how he made it, and in consequence is sure he can make it again. To say that no player in this country but Mr. Sears makes his strokes except instinctively is a sweeping assertion, and yet, I fancy, one not far from the truth.

Has any one of my readers, in practice or in a match, ever stopped to consider just why and how he made that last good stroke? Suppose the same stroke comes again immediately. I will wager that if he stops to think of his previous methods, and tries to put them in practice again, he will grow confused, and fail in the rally. There is nothing to be done but to try for the stroke by instinct again, just as before, and consequently there is no gain from the previous practice of the stroke. It can't be right, as is often the case, that a player should be at his best after no practice at all. Putting head-work into the general game is a different matter from considering the method of each stroke. Now this kind of "instinctive" play, as I shall call it, is certainly wrong, and causes all this up and down play in tournaments. What is a boy's game good for if, his physical condition being all right, he can't bring out all his play at command? A well-practised baseball player knows that an easy "fly" when it comes to him will be held; if it is not, he understands the cause of his failure. And yet what tennis player is sure that he can return even the easiest balls?

I imagine that in that lies the difference between the play of the champion and that of his brother, Mr. Ernest Renshaw. In technical skill they seem about equal; but while E. Renshaw's strokes are instinctive, W. Renshaw's strokes are from knowledge. When instinct deserts, Mr. E. Renshaw has nothing to fall back upon. He has consequently run all the way up and down the tennis ladder, while his brother sits securely on the top. We in America are unable to study this quality of play in the English champion, and yet we have a good substitute for him in this respect in Mr. Sears. Inferior in technical skill to perhaps a half-dozen Englishmen, he has yet held the American championship more securely than they could for the last five years, simply because he knows why he plays as he does, and in consequence is ready with his play at any time. In this quality he is second only to W. Renshaw. Self-reliance caused by a knowledge of one's own game is the best quality for a tennis player. That is the making of a champion, and not a self-reliance based on luck and past victories. Our great fault lies just here. This it is that makes one so disgusted when playing badly, and brings the hopelessness of improvement to view.

So to such of my readers as really care to make a study of the game I would give this practical advice as a result of their and my own acquaintance with Mr. Renshaw. As it is stupid on all sides to get any one simply to knock balls over a net to you, the practice opponent must yet be used at times solely for that purpose. Do not give up the time to simply knocking balls back and forth to each other, for you will not get the same balls to play that you do in a game. But, on the other hand, play a set or so a day with an opponent utterly regardless as to whether he is victorious or not. When he returns the ball to you, forget all about him, or about getting the ball back to his court where he can't return it. But before his stroke, decide on some point in his court in which you wish to practise putting the ball. Then give your whole attention to the coming ball (watching it as long as possible) and to the movement of your own racket in hitting it. If the stroke is a successful one, consider why it was so, with a view to playing it that way again. If it is bad, recognize clearly the false method of making it.

As lawn-tennis is a very quick game, I have given advice not easy to be followed. But I would say to each young player that without actual knowledge of his own methods of making each particular stroke, he can never hope to—well, I won't say arrive at—but at least to hold any high honors in the game. That is the chief lesson we should learn from William Renshaw's play.

THE PERSONAL HISTORY OF POLLY JAY.

A STORY FOR GIRLS AND BODIES.

BY KATHERINE D. McILVAINE.

I AM not an ordinary doll at all, for I learned to say "papa," "mamma," and "milk" in my earliest infancy, which was spent with Mrs. Barlow (who kept a toyshop) in Philadelphia. In time I was bought by old Miss Jay to send to a little girl in New York, where I went in the trunk of a young lady named Agnes, who was very pretty and sweet. The journey was not very interesting. It was only one long shake, with an occasional bump, and I found it very wearing. Then I found myself in the arms of the dearest little girl of five years old that ever was seen, and who was my dear little mother for a great many years afterward.

"Aunt Mary sent her to you," said Agnes.

"Oh, Cousin Agnes!" cried little Alice. "Isn't she too beautiful?" and then she kissed me three or four times, and I felt very happy.

"What shall I call her, mamma?" she asked. "She must have a name, you know."

"I think you ought to name her for Aunt Mary, as she sent her to you," said mamma.

"But," said Alice, "I have Big Mary already, and if I call this dolly Mary too, she'll always be making confusion."

"Indeed," said Agnes, "it won't do to let her make a confusion. But Polly is the same as Mary; why don't you name her for Aunt Mary by calling her Polly Jay?"

"Why, yes, Cousin Agnes, that's splendid. Come, Polly Jay, and let me introduce you to Big Mary, and make you feel at home."

Big Mary was a great big doll with a china head, and black china hair in very tight curls. She was weak in the waist, and always sat lopsided. Willie Stripes was a knitted doll, and he and I never did get on together. His face and hands were bright pink worsted, and his eyes were only two black beads; he had a very violent temper, and not a particle of intellect. Alice was never very fond of him, he was too disagreeable; but she was good to him from a sense of duty, which was more than he deserved, anyway.

Alice's mamma and Agnes and Hortense (Alice's nurse) all went to work to make me some clothes, so that I should be presentable in society, and very soon I had four dresses and a pink cambrie wrapper, besides a coat and hat to wear in the street and a night-gown to wear at night. I slept in a little black-walnut bedstead with Big Mary. She was too long for it, so Alice always had to double her feet up under her chin, which must have been rather uncomfortable; but Mary never complained: she was a very good doll always.

Willie Stripes had a cradle to sleep in, but his clothes were all sewed on, and Alice often forgot to put him in it: so he usually staid awake on a chair in the corner of the nursery, and once he spent the night on a pin-cushion full of needles in Hortense's work-basket.

We used to have very good times indeed those days, especially me, for my little mother was very devoted to me, and took me everywhere she went, nearly, and played with me all the time at home. Whenever any one came, Alice always wanted me to talk, and one day I tried so hard to say "Alice" instead of that stupid "milk" that I broke something inside of me, and couldn't say anything at all. I felt very badly about this, and so did Alice. She cried, and I would have too, but dolls don't have any tears.

"Don't cry, birdie," said Alice's mamma. "Let me see if I can fix Polly;" and she took her sharp scissors out of her basket.

"Oh mamma," cried Alice, "please don't cut Polly! I'd rather never have her speak again than have you cut a hole in her."

"Why, darling," said her mamma, "I'm not going to hurt Polly. I'm only going to rip this seam in her side, so that I can take hold of the strings and fasten them on again to the machine that makes her talk."

"Oh, but, mamma, I can't have my dear Polly cut open. I don't want you to do it, mamma; indeed I don't."

"Well, if you don't want her mended, I don't," said her mother; and Alice clasped me in her arms and ran off into the nursery.

"Oh, Polly Jay," she cried, "you've had such a narrow 'scape! Isn't it fortunate, Polly, that I'm not a baby?—'cause if I had been, I couldn't have told mamma that I didn't want you ripped up; and even if it wouldn't truly hurt you, Polly, I should feel as if it did."

After a while she took me into her mother's room again. "Mamma," she said, "what's the name of the thing inside of me that makes me talk?"

"Do you mean the larynx?" asked mamma.

"I suppose that's it. I'm going to play that Polly Jay's got a slight 'fection of the larynx. That's the reason she can't talk any more. Don't you know Mrs. Morton has a slight 'fection of the eyes, and that's the reason she can't see."

Not long after this a Mrs. Renwick came to stay with Alice's mother. She had a little boy named Sylvestre, about nine years old, whom she brought with her.

"NOW I LOOK LIKE A REAL LIVE BUTCHER," HE SAID."

I have heard that cats have what is called an antipathy to dogs; now dolls have just that same sort of feeling for boys. I had never had anything to do with them; the nearest approach to a boy that I had ever known was Willie Stripes, and though I suppose Sylvestre Renwick would have been considered a handsome little fellow, I never could see any beauty in him from the minute Alice brought him into the nursery and introduced him to Big Mary, Willie Stripes, and me.

He said I was "a stunner," which, I suppose, is some awful thing. He called poor Mary "old waddler" and "buttermilk," and he threw Willie Stripes up in the air, and declared he was made out of his old mittens.

For several days Alice hardly came near us, for Sylvestre, of course, wouldn't play dolls, and she had to play horse and ball with him. But one morning Hortense took her to the dress-maker's, and Sylvestre was to go to drive in the Park with his mother and Alice's; but when the time came he wouldn't get ready, and his mother, after waiting a little, went off and left him. He lay on the floor and kicked for a while, and then he concluded to get up and amuse himself. There was a large closet just opposite the nursery door, in which house-linen was kept. He took all the linen from the first two shelves, and piled it on the third; then he got a paper of tacks and a hammer, and drove them in about a foot apart along the edges. After this he dragged Alice's little table into the middle of the closet, and put a ball of darning cotton on top of it, and he took out his knife, and opened the big blade, and laid it down beside it; then he pinned a towel around his neck, and put his belt on over it.

"Now I look like a real live butcher," he said. Unfortunately his eye fell on us as we sat in a row on the dolls' bed. He took Willie Stripes first, and hung him by the neck to the door knob. Big Mary came next. He took all her clothes off, and was going to hang her up that way, but her china head was only sewed on through two big holes in the edge of her neck. He took his knife and cut the stitches, and hung her head up by itself. Her arms and legs came next; they too were only sewed on. He ripped them off. Poor Mary! How sorry I felt for her! I should have felt worse had I not been sure that my turn would come soon, and it did. "Here, Miss High-and-lofty," he said; "I'm the butcher, and you're spring lamb. Now say 'baa!'"

I couldn't say "baa!" of course, and I wouldn't have said it if I could; so he said it for me a great many times. But, alas! I wasn't sewed together in sections, like Big Mary.

Well, if any one will believe it, that dreadful, horrid boy actually chopped my legs and arms off with his knife, and sawed me in two around my waist. My sawdust just strewn the floor. Nobody will ever know how I felt (unless it may be Big Mary), torn limb from limb, and hung up all around that closet. And I kept thinking all the time of the grief I knew my dear little mother would feel when she came home. I heard her happy little voice at last, talking to Hortense. That wicked Sylvestre walked to the head of the stairs in his butcher's apron, and said, as bold as brass, "Come on, Alice; I'm playing butcher. Don't you want some beef?"

"I AM ONLY A SILLY GOOSE, POLLY JAY."

She followed him to the door of the closet, where she saw Willie Stripes first, and pulled him off the door handle. "Why, Sylvestre," she said, "it makes poor Willie so uncomfortable to hang with his head down." Then she saw Big Mary and me inside. I never saw any one so angry.

"Sylvestre Renwick," she exclaimed, "you are a bad and cruel boy, and I hate you! You've killed Big Mary and Polly Jay. Oh, Polly! Polly!" and she snatched us both, piece by piece, from the walls, and ran with us into her mother's room, and cried as if her heart would break.

Hortense began to scold Sylvestre in French, and as he didn't understand a single word, the effect was perfectly awful. He began to feel very uneasy.

"Say, Alice," he said, "I didn't suppose you'd care."
"Go away, bad boy," said Alice, still crying. "I wish you'd never come here."

Sylvestre left. Presently he came back again. "Say, Alice, I've got a pony at home, and here are all the things I've got here; you can have 'em."

"I don't want your old things," sobbed Alice. "I wish I'd never seen you."

Sylvestre went away a second time, feeling even more depressed than before. Hortense was sewing Big Mary together as fast as she could, and Alice sat on the bed holding me tight in her arms, and every time she looked at me she cried afresh, for, alas! Hortense couldn't mend me. Half an hour went by. Big Mary was dressed, and looked as if nothing had ever happened to her, when Sylvestre looked in a third time.

"Alice," he said, "please don't tell. Mamma 'll be awful mad, and I'll just catch it. I'm real sorry."

Mrs. Renwick was very much vexed with Sylvestre, and wanted to do all she could to repair the mischief.

"You shall have a new doll, dear," she said, "as much like Polly Jay as we can find. You shall get it yourself."

"It wouldn't be Polly Jay," said Alice. "And if you please, Mrs. Renwick, I don't want any other doll at all. I couldn't love her as I do Polly, and perhaps mamma can mend her."

Finally it was decided to buy me a new body, and put my old head on it, which wasn't hurt at all. When this was done I felt quite myself again; and Alice too felt better about me.

I did not see Sylvestre again all the next day. The day after that, however, he came into the nursery, looking very much subdued. Alice picked me up, and held me tight.

"Go 'way," she said.

"You needn't be afraid, Alice," said he. "Here's my new top; please take it; and here is this for you too," producing a paper. "I gave a man on Sixth Avenue five agates for it. I'm awful sorry, truly I am; I never thought you'd feel so bad. Please say you forgive me."

Alice was silent. So was Sylvestre.

"I wish I hadn't done it," he said. "I'll never do it again." Sylvestre certainly looked sorry.

"Well," said Alice at last, with a sigh, "I will forgive you, Sylvestre; but I don't want the things."

Sylvestre looked deeply hurt. "I wish you would take them, Alice; it doesn't seem as if you really forgave me unless you do."

Alice slowly stretched out her hand and took the paper and the top. Then she let Sylvestre kiss her, and they were friends again.

"It's one of those spiders that bob up and down," he explained; and so it was. It was made of a little piece of rabbit's skin and a lot of wiry legs. There was a ring in its back with an elastic in it to dance it about by. They seemed to enjoy it very much, but I thought it was horrid—worse than any real spider that I ever saw, and bigger.

After a while Sylvestre said, "Alice, don't you believe I am really sorry now?"

"Yes," said Alice. "And, Sylvestre, I'm sorry you had to stay in bed all day yesterday."

"Well," said the young man, "I did think mamma might have whipped me instead. I asked her to, but she wouldn't."

"Oh, Sylvestre!" exclaimed Alice, aghast.

"Pshaw! that's nothing," said he. "It don't last long, and if I'd been up I could have gone to the circus in the afternoon, and now Barnum's gone."

A few days after this, Sylvestre and his mother went home, and nothing remarkable happened for a long time. One day Alice let me fall over the balusters from the third story and break my head. She tied it up with ice-water bandages for several days, but it didn't get any better, and I don't think she expected it to, so it was mended with a new one, and I did not look much like what I used to; but I've heard that people change as they grow older. Certainly Alice did. She was a good deal taller, for she was ten years old, and had a governess who came every day and taught her a great many things. The nursery was called "the school-room" now, and it had changed too, but I always sat there just the same, and Alice played with me in the afternoon and on Saturday; and so three years more passed away, and Alice kept on growing. One day she came to me, and said, joyously:

"Oh, Polly, I am going to Europe, and I sha'n't come back for a long time—not till I am quite grown up, and then I shall be too big to play with dolls; so good-by, Polly."

Then Hortense came and put me and my clothes away in a drawer, and there I staid for five whole years, and very lonely I felt, I can tell you. At last somebody came and pulled me out; and who should it be but my dear little mother, grown up into a tall young lady!

"You dear, funny, old-fashioned Polly Jay!" she cried. "How very glad I am to see you! You haven't changed a single bit. I must say you keep your individuality remarkably well; for though you've had three bodies" (I forgot to say that a puppy at the sea-shore chewed up the kid one that Mrs. Renwick got for me) "and two new heads, you are the very identical Polly Jay that Aunt Mary sent me. No amount of new limbs could change you." So she carried me back to the school-room again, which was now fitted up for her use, and I lived on a shelf in the closet.

Once I heard my dear little mother, as I still called her to myself, talking about a missionary box to be sent to the far West.

"Alice," said Mrs. Elliot, "why don't you send some of your old dolls to those poor missionary children?"

"To be sure, mamma," said Alice. "What a splendid idea! I'll send Big Mary and Willie Stripes, but not my dear Polly Jay. I never can part with her."

I felt so proud and pleased, you can't imagine, and I lived on happily on the closet shelf.

At last Alice came and took me down. Then she got out my pink silk dress trimmed with lace, and put it on me.

"You must have a new sash, Polly Jay," she said, and she cut off a piece of white satin ribbon, and tied it around my waist. "You don't know that you are being dressed for my wedding, do you, Polly?" she went on, in her sweet voice. "But you are, for I am going to be married to-morrow." Then she took all my clothes, and me too, and went up into the attic, and opened a trunk under the window. She put my things in first; then she held me tight in her arms for a minute. "I am a woman now, Polly Jay," she whispered, "and I must put away all my childish things. I am not a little girl any longer. You mustn't think because I am crying that I am not happy, or that I do not love him, Polly, because of course I do; I can't tell even you how much. I am only a silly goose, Polly Jay; that is all." Then she laid me in the trunk, leaned over and kissed me, and said, "Good-by, dear old Polly Jay," and she shut the lid down and turned the key in it.

I heard her go singing down-stairs, and this is the end of my history. If any one doesn't believe it, if she will come up in the attic, and open the old leather trunk with brass nails in it, under the window, she will find an old yellow wax doll with the color all faded out of her cheeks, her flaxen wig all out of curl and hanging on one steel pin in front (if it doesn't fall off altogether), and with a faded pink silk dress on. That's me. My life has been in some respects a hard one. I don't believe there ever was a doll whose career was interrupted by so many accidents. All this, however, I could have endured, knowing the love my little mother bore me. But now my heart is broken quite in two, for Alice has actually married that identical Sylvestre Renwick who made butcher's-meat of me fifteen years ago.

LETTERS FROM A BLUE-COAT BOY.

BY HUGH FRANCIS FOX.

CHRIST'S HOSPITAL is one of the Royal Schools of England, having been founded by the young King Edward VI. in 1552. Its numerous endowments give it a revenue of over $300,000 a year, which is devoted to the education of twelve hundred boys. Four hundred of these are at the preparatory school at Hertford, about twenty miles from London, where the new boys are required to serve a period of probation before entering the main school in London.

The management of Christ's Hospital is in the hands of governors, each of whom, by virtue of a donation of $2500, is entitled to send one boy to the school every third year. The system of education is so excellent that many wealthy people have offered to pay highly to procure admission for their sons. Only those children whose parents are unable to give them a good education are, however, eligible. The school affords the best facilities for the most advanced studies in classics, mathematics, and modern languages, and the acquirement of a thorough commercial education. There are also masters for music and drawing, and the boys are drilled every day. The school contains a fine swimming bath and gymnasium, and has a capital cricket field in the suburbs.

The "Blue-coat Boys," as the scholars are called, still wear the quaint costume of the sixteenth century. This consists of a dark blue cloth gown reaching to the ankles, yellow stockings, and black velvet knee-breeches. The gown is open in front, and when the boys want to play they tuck their skirts inside their leather girdles, which they wear round the waist. The bright nickel buttons on the gown and breeches bear the image of Edward VI. Round the neck is a pair of old-fashioned white clerical bands. The boys don't wear any hats, and a "Blue" in a high wind is a funny-looking object, with his hair blowing about, and his gown puffed out like a big balloon.

The following letters from a Blue-coat Boy give some idea of life at Christ's Hospital in recent years:

HERTFORD.

DEAR MATER.—I don't mind going without a bat at all, and I have learnt how to tuck my gown into my girdle when I play, but I wish I wasn't a new boy.

I haven't touched my grub yet, as I don't feel very well. I bought a shilling's worth of jumbles at the tuck shop last night, and eat them in bed, with some condensed milk and sardines another fellow gave me. I have got a bad toothache to-day. I think I must have caught cold in my tooth on the journey. Please send me some wool to put in it.

The fellows sent me down to the cook this morning to have my mouth measured for a spoon. The cook told me to shut my eyes and open my mouth wide, and then he crammed it full of salt. Don't you think that was awfully mean, mater? Your affec. son.

HERTFORD.

DEAR MATER.—I like school a great deal better now. The fellows are all collecting pins. One fellow hasn't any roof to his mouth, and he is showing it at a pin a peep; so I thought I would show my enlarged tonsils. I let them have three peeps for two pins, and called it "The Great and Only Tonsil Show"—patronized by the Queen and all the Royal Family." I got no end of a lot of pins; but some of the big chaps wanted to tickle my tonsils with a tooth-brush, so I closed the show. Please send me a whole lot of pins on my birthday.

I got in an awful row this morning. The fellow next me had a cold in his head, and sniffled like anything all through first lesson. He hadn't any handkerchief, so he asked me to lend him mine. I hate lending other fellows my handkerchief; but I didn't want to use it, so I told him I would lend it him for a penny a blow. He said he didn't think less than three blows would be any good, and he had only tuppence with him; so I let him have three blows for tuppence. I dropped one of the pennies on the floor, and the master heard it, and made me tell all about it. Then he said I was a wretched little money-grubber, and wasn't fit to sit with the other boys, and told me to go outside and play with the sparrows. I have lost five places by it, and think it is very hard lines. Would you lend your handkerchief to another fellow for nothing? Give my love to the children. Your affec. son.

HERTFORD.

DEAR OLD MATER.—Thanks awfully for the sticking-plaster. The fellow who sits next to me in church has a game-leg. He says he was riding on the elephant at the Zoo, and some one made faces at him, and he ran away with him on his back, and one of the keepers tripped him up with some string, and he tumbled down and threw him onto the path, and broke his leg.

There is a new boy sitting by me who has yellow hair and red eyes, and blubs all the time, because he is homesick, I suppose. He has just showed me his album, and his sister is as ugly as anything. She is all squint-eyed, and her face is covered with freckles. He says he is going to ask me to stay with him in the summer holidays, but I don't mean to go.

I haven't any more to say, so I will say good-by.

Your affecate son.

LONDON.

DEAR MATER.—Please address my letters Mr. H. F. Fox, now I am a London fellow.

There are eight hundred boys in the London school, and some of them are nearly twenty years old, and have whiskers. We come out of morning school at a quarter past twelve, and at a quarter to one preparation bell rings, and we all tear off to our wards to get ready for dinner. At one o'clock the bugle sounds, and we march to the hall play-ground and fall in by the side of our ward flags. There are sixteen companies of fifty boys each. We fall in in double rank, behind the corporal and monitor, and stand at ease till the bugle goes again. Then the sergeant gives the word of command:

Then the band strikes up, and we march round the play-ground and into the big dining-hall. When the boys are all at their tables, the warden gets onto his platform, and gives three raps with his hammer, and we have to stop talking. We all sing a hymn, and one of the Grecians gets into the pulpit and reads grace, and then the warden raps again, and we begin to eat.

The sergeant is awfully brave, and has five medals. He says he knew the Duke of Wellington quite well, and fought beside him in the battle of Waterloo. He has no end of a big chest. The brass band makes a jolly row. There are fifty boys in it, and they have a big drum and five kettle-drums. Your affec. son.

LONDON.

DEAR MATER.—We are learning "The Lady of the Lake" this term. I think poetry is jolly fun. If you won't let me be a soldier, I think I would like to be a poet. Do you think Sir Walter Scott was much older than I am when he began to be a poet? I wrote you a poem in the French school this morning, because I had nothing to do. I wrote it without thinking at all, and it only took me half an hour.

Don't tell any one I am writing poetry, please, because they would only chaff me. Your affec. son.

BLUE-COAT BOY, WITH GOWN TUCKED UP FOR PLAYING.

LONDON.

DEAR MATER.—We had the first public supper last night. They have them every Thursday in Lent, and heaps of people come to see them. While we are having supper the people walk round the hall and watch us. The Duke of Cambridge presided last night, and he patted me on the head as he passed me. One of our beadle's was in the Crimean war, and the Duke went and talked to him. The beadle said "your honor" every minute, and at last the Duke said, "Don't call me your honor—call me sir."

After supper we all have to "bow round." The wards form into ranks, with the matrons and monitors in front. The boys who carry the bread basket come next. Then come the rest of the boys, the table-cloth, knife, and water boys coming last. We walk past the President two at a time, and bow to him, and he bows to us. We must get very tired of bowing by the time it is over.

There is a jolly swimming bath in the school, and I am learning to dive. I generally manage to go flat on my stomach, and it hurts like anything.

I am going to get as strong as I can this term, so that I can thrash all the fellows at home next holidays.

Your affec'ate son.

LONDON.

DEAR MATER.—The Chinese Ambassadors were at the last public supper. They are awfully funny-looking men. The fellows say that if a Chinaman has his pigtail pulled, he will be disgraced forever. One of the fellows dared me to pull their tails, so I squeezed in by them when they were getting into their carriage after supper, and gave one of their tails a jerk. The old heathen turned round and jabbered at me like anything. I couldn't understand what he said, but it sounded as if he was swearing. I tried to get away, but one of the beadle's collared me, and I thought I was in for no end of a row. Just then, though, I heard a shout, "Fours to the rescue!" and a lot of our fellows came running up. The beadle made a grab at one of them, and another fellow tripped him up, and I ran under the horse's nose and got away. It was too dark for him to see my face, so I think it is all right.

Your affec. son.

LONDON.

DEAR MATER.—On Easter-Tuesday the whole school marched through the streets to the Mansion House, where the Lord Mayor lives. When the Lord Mayor was ready, the big doors were thrown open, and we marched into the Venetian parlor. The Lord Mayor was sitting at a table in his swell robes, and the mace-bearer and a lot of other men in uniform were standing behind him. The Lord Mayor gave each of us a brand-new shilling, and a footman with powder all over his head handed us two buns and a glass of wine. Last year one of the fellows said he was a teetotaler, and refused to drink his wine, and the Lord Mayor sent him a nice book afterward, so I thought I would refuse to take the wine too. He didn't give me a book, though, and I think it is a regular sell.

CHITTA'S REVENGE.

SO HASSE the Sunbeam became Bow-bearer to his father the great chief Mico, and Chitta the Snake was disappointed of his ambition. By some means he became convinced that René de Veaux had instructed Hasse in his newly acquired trick of wrestling; and though he had no proof of this, he conceived a bitter hatred against the white lad. He had especially included him in his muttered threat of vengeance against all those who greeted his final overthrow with shouts of joy; but, like the wily reptile whose name he bore, he was content to bide his time, and await his opportunity to strike a deadly blow. After the games were ended he disappeared, and was seen no more that day.

His absence was hardly noted, for immediately after Hasse's victory the entire assembly repaired to the great mound which had gradually been raised by the accumulation of shells, bones, broken pottery, and charred wood that many generations of Indian feasters had left behind them, and here was spread the feast of the day. Then followed dancing and singing, which were continued far into the night.

At length the dancers became exhausted; the men who beat the drums and rattled the terrapin shells filled with dried palmetto berries grew so drowsy that their music sounded fainter and fainter, until it finally ceased altogether, and by two hours after midnight the whole encampment was buried in profound slumber. Even those whose duty it was to stand guard dozed at their posts, and the silence of the night was only broken by the occasional hootings of Hup pe (the great owl).

Had the guards been awake instead of dreaming, it is possible that they might have noticed the dark figure of a man who noiselessly and stealthily crept amid the heavy shadows on the edge of the forest toward the great granary, or store-house, in which was kept all the ripe maize of the tribe, together with much starch root (koonti katki) and a large quantity of yams.

Occasionally the dark figure skulking among the shadows came to little patches of bright moonlight, and to cross these he lay flat on the ground and writhed his way through the grass like a snake. A close observer would have noticed a dull, steady glow which came from a round object that the skulker carried with great care. If he had been near enough he would have seen that this was a large gourd, in which, on a bed of sand, was a quantity of live coals taken from one of the fires that still smoldered about the epola, or place of dancing. In his other hand the man carried a few fat-pine splinters that would burn almost like gunpowder.

At length, without having attracted attention from any one of the encamped Indians, or the drowsy guards upon whom they depended for safety, the figure reached the granary and disappeared amid the dark shadows of its walls. Crouching to the ground, and screening his gourd of coals with his robe, he thrust into it one end of the bundle of fat-pine splinters and blew gently upon them. They smoked for a minute, and then burst into a quick blaze.

Beginning at one end of the granary, this torch was applied to the dry thatch that covered it, and it instantly sprang into flame. As the figure ran along the end of the structure, around the corner, and down the entire length of its side, always keeping in the shadow, he applied the torch in a dozen places, and then flinging it on top of the low roof, where it speedily ignited the covering, he bounded away into the darkness, uttering as he did so a long-drawn, ear-piercing yell of triumph.

By the time the nodding guards had discovered the flames, and given the alarm, the whole granary was in a blaze, and the startled Indians, who rushed out from the lodges and palmetto booths, could do nothing but stand helpless and gaze at the destruction of their property.

Meantime the author of all this mischief stopped when he had gained what he considered a safe distance from the fire, and, concealed by the friendly shadows of the forest, stood with folded arms and scowling features gazing at the result of his efforts. At length the light from the burning building grew so bright that even the shadow in which he stood began to be illuminated, and he turned to go away. As he did so he shook his clenched hand toward the burning granary, and muttered, "The white man and the red man shall learn to dread the fangs of the Snake; for thus do I declare war against them both."

As he spoke a voice beside him, that he instantly recognized as that of Hasse, exclaimed, "What! is this thy work, Chitta?"

For answer Hasse received a blow that stretched him, stunned and bleeding, on the ground, and Chitta, saying, "Lie there, miserable Bow-bearer, I will meet thee again," sprang into the forest and disappeared.

When Hasse, aroused by the shouts of the guards and the glare of light, had rushed from the lodge in which he slept, he had seen a figure standing between him and the light, and had approached it to learn the cause of all the excitement. He was just about to speak when he recognized Chitta, and heard him utter the words that at once declared him to be the author of the conflagration and the enemy of his people and their friends.

Not being able to appreciate the petty spirit of revenge that influenced the Snake, Hasse gave utterance to his exclamation of surprise, and in return received the cruel blow for which he was so little prepared. When he recovered consciousness he found himself in his father's lodge, lying on a bed of deer-skins, while his sister, the beautiful Nethla, was bathing his temples with cold water.

It was now broad daylight, and the great granary, with all its contents, had been reduced to a heap of smouldering ruins. About the lodge in which Hasse lay were gathered a great crowd of Indians, awaiting his return to consciousness, to learn what he knew of the occurrences of the past few hours, and in what way he had been connected with them. By the earliest light of day a band of experienced warriors had tracked his assailant from the spot in which the young Bow-bearer had been discovered through the tall grass and underbrush from which the fugitive had brushed the dew in his flight to the river's edge. Here one of the canoes that had been drawn up on the beach was found to be missing, and search parties had been sent both up and down the river.

As Hasse slowly recovered consciousness and opened his eyes, his sister bent over him and whispered, "Who dealt thee the cruel blow, oh my brother?"

Receiving his faint answer, she sprang to her feet, and turning to her father, who stood near, exclaimed, "'Tis Chitta the Snake who has done this thing in revenge for our Hasse's success in the games of yesterday."

From the entrance of the lodge the old chief proclaimed the news, and all through the great assembly were heard cries of anger against Chitta the Snake.

The destruction of this winter's supply of food was not only a serious blow to the Indians, but to the little garrison of Fort Caroline as well, for Laudonniere had just completed arrangements with Mico for the purchase of the greater part of it. Only a small quantity of provisions remained in the fort, and though the forest contained an abundance of game, and the river teemed with fish, the French soldiers were not skilled in either hunting or fishing, and had become dependent upon their Indian neighbors for what they needed of such food. It was therefore with feelings of surprised alarm that on the second day after the burning of the granary they noticed the absence of all Indians from the vicinity of the fort. Scouts were sent to the Indian encampment to discover the cause of this unusual state of affairs, and they soon returned with the report that the place was wholly deserted, and that not an Indian was to be found. Not only had all the visiting Indians disappeared, but also every soul of Mico's tribe, and, what was more significant, they had taken with them their lodges and all portable property.

Laudonniere at once realized the full force of the situation. His soldiers were worn out with the labor of building the fort, and many of them were prostrated by a peculiar fever that racked their joints with severe pains and unfitted them for duty. The store of provisions upon which he had depended to feed his men through the approaching winter had been destroyed. The Indians, who might have provided him with game, had abandoned him and gone he knew not whither. His men knew nothing of the art of winning for themselves a livelihood from the wilderness that surrounded them. Although the soldiers had been allowed to think differently, he knew that some months must still elapse before the arrival of reinforcements and supplies from France. He himself, worn out by anxiety and overwork, was beginning to feel symptoms of the approach of the dreaded fever, and he feared that ere long he would be unfitted to perform the duties of his important position.

In this emergency he decided to hold a council with the officers of the garrison, and ask their aid in deciding what was to be done. He therefore sent word to Soisson his Lieutenant, old Hillaire the Captain of Artillery, Martinez the Quartermaster, Chastellux the Chief of Engineers, Le Moyne the artist, and to René his nephew, bidding them meet him in council. He added René to the number, for though he was but a lad, he had proved himself to be wise beyond his years, and his uncle wished him to fully comprehend the difficulties of their position.

The council met in the commandant's private room, and Laudonniere, stating the situation clearly to them, asked what was to be done. Some suggested one thing, and some another, and the discussion was long and earnest. Le Moyne, the artist, added to the perplexities of the commandant by stating that he had heard rumors of dissatisfaction among the garrison, and threats that unless provisions were speedily obtained, they would build a vessel, abandon the fort and country, and attempt to make their way back to France.

While the discussion was at its height two soldiers appeared at the door, leading between them a slender young Indian, whom René, with a joyful cry, at once recognized as his friend Has-se-the-Sunbeam.

THE "AMERICA" CUP.

BY NAUTILUS.

THE America's cup, homely, old-fashioned piece of silver as it is, has, by thirty-five years of generous rivalry between England and America, the two greatest yachting nations, become the emblem of the yachting supremacy of the world. It was first offered by the Royal Yacht Squadron of England as the prize of their annual regatta to be sailed around the Isle of Wight on August 22, 1851.

The schooner-yacht America, which had been built and launched in New York during the earlier months of that same year, had been sailed across the ocean as one of the contributions from the United States to the first of the great World's Fairs, then being held in London, and was finally permitted to enter this regatta. In it, though she sailed against a fleet of fourteen schooners and cutters, she won so easily that at the finish the Aurora, which came in second, was eight miles behind her, and the rest were nowhere to be seen. With this splendid victory the America's cup was first won, and never since that day has it left our hands.

In 1857 the gentleman who owned the America when she won the cup presented it to the New York Yacht Club, to be held and defended by it as a perpetual challenge trophy, and to be raced for by the representative yachts of any foreign club. Although the conditions of this gift were published throughout the world, it was not until nearly fourteen years later that the holders of the America's cup were challenged to a race for it.

The second race for the cup was sailed in New York Bay on August 8, 1870, between the English schooner-yacht Cambria, owned by Mr. James Ashbury, and twenty American yachts. It aroused the most wide-spread interest, and was witnessed by a greater number of people than any similar event has ever drawn out. Although it was a most exciting race, the Cambria was easily beaten by the American schooner-yacht Magie.

Mr. Ashbury returned to England determined to try again for the cup, and the following year he came over with the new schooner-yacht Livonia, which he had built on purpose to race for it. Then followed a series of six match races, in every one of which the Livonia was beaten—three times by the Columbia, twice by the Stapho, and once by the Dautless.

The next challenge for the cup came from Canada in 1876, and in July of that year the schooner-yacht Countess of Dufferin, representing the Royal Canadian Yacht Club, appeared in New York Bay, and began to make ready to win it. This she did not do, however, for she was very badly beaten by the Madeleine, of the New York club, in two races, and so the cup did not go to Canada.

Captain Cuthbert, the builder and commander of the Countess of Dufferin, went home very much disappointed, but determined to try again for the cup if he ever got a chance. Nothing was heard from him until 1881, when he again appeared in New York with a new sloop-yacht named Atalanta, which he had brought from Lake Ontario by way of the Erie Canal and the Hudson River. She represented the Bay of Quinte Yacht Club. The New-Yorkers were very ready to give Captain Cuthbert a race, and they selected the iron sloop-yacht Mischief to meet and beat the new Canadian yacht. This the Mischief did so thoroughly in two races that in the second the Atalanta's time at the finish was not taken at all, as she did not come in until long after everybody else had gone home.

Last year the famous English cutter-yacht Genesta came across the ocean to try and capture the America's cup. She was so much larger and more powerful than any existing American sloops that something had to be built to race with her. So the Priscilla was built in New York, and the Puritan in Boston. After they had sailed several races against each other the Puritan was chosen to meet the Genesta and defend the cup. So gallantly did the white sloop from Boston perform her duty that she beat the Genesta in two out of three races, and thus the fifth attempt to capture the coveted trophy failed.

Now the English cutter Galatea, longer by ten feet than the Genesta, and in every way the most powerful yacht ever sent to capture the America's cup, has come over the ocean after it. She is a last year's yacht of just the same age as the Puritan, and has already made for herself a splendid record. In addition to the Puritan and Priscilla, two new sloops, the Mayflower, of Boston, and the Atlantic, of New York, have been built to defend the cup. These four will sail a series of trial races before this paper is issued, which will result in one of them being selected to meet the Galatea, and beat her in two out of three races, if she can.

SWIMMING BIRDS.

BY SARAH COOPER

DUCKS and geese present themselves at once to our minds as familiar examples of swimming birds, and we can see how exactly their boat shaped bodies and long necks are suited to living on the water. Then they are web-footed, which makes swimming an easy matter, and their short legs are placed far back on the body. This position suits very well for paddling in the water, but it makes their gait upon land extremely awkward, so much so that "to waddle like a duck" has become proverbial.

First diving into the water, then flying up into the air, these swimming birds are necessarily exposed to great changes of temperature, and as a protection against such sudden changes their bodies are covered with a thicker and closer plumage than other birds have. The coat of down next to the skin is also very thick. There is, moreover, an unusually large supply of oil from the oil-gland, which keeps the plumage from getting wet, and gives the feathers that beautiful gloss so noticeable in the duck.

These birds have an odd way of gobbling up their food, often taking in mud and water at the same time; but their broad flat bills are furnished with rough plates around the edge which form a very good strainer. Being richly supplied with nerves, this strainer is able in some way to select the particles of food and keep them in the month, while the mud is allowed to run out.

More graceful than the ducks and geese are the swans, with their long necks gently curved, and their wings partly lifted when swimming, as if to catch the wind. Nevertheless, when attacked, they show another side of their nature by making a loud hissing sound and striking violently with their wings.

Wild ducks, geese, and swans are excellent fliers as well as swimmers, and they can be recognized at a distance by their wedge-shaped flocks. In reality, these birds fly in two lines, which come together in front, and gradually separate toward the last of the flock, so that the general appearance of the company has the shape of a wedge. The leader flies at the point where the two lines meet, and when he becomes weary he leaves his post to his next neighbor, and falls back to the last of one of the two lines; but meanwhile, during this change of leaders, the flock keeps in perfect order. In these migrations the birds fly thousands of miles, and they build their nests in summer among the lakes and marshes of cold northern countries.

Less familiar than some of these land birds, but not less interesting, is the whole host of sea-birds, whose habits are necessarily very different. Many of these sea-birds pass their lives entirely upon the ocean, and sleep at night with their heads tucked under their wings as they float on the waves. They feed upon the fishes and other small animals which they snatch while skimming over its surface, and only go on shore to raise their young ones.

For this purpose they often select lonely islands and steep bald cliffs. Here thousands of them raise their young upon the bare rocks, and mingle their screams with the roar of the waves below.

In a certain sense, perhaps, these birds are destitute of the charms we usually expect to find in birds. They seldom take any pains with their nests, and their note is only a shrill cry; but these defects are easily overlooked after once seeing them upon the lonely ocean, and learning something of the wild, free lives they lead.

First of all, there are the gulls, so abundant all over the world. With their strong wings they fly rapidly and gracefully over the sea, and when their keen eyes discover a tempting morsel in the water beneath, they make a sudden dive to procure it. These birds meet in large numbers to raise their young on the rocks, or on the sand-bars at the mouths of rivers and bays. The graceful, elegant gulls generally keep quite near the shore, and are not found very far out at sea.

The stormy petrel, on the other hand, is met at great distances from the land. Although the smallest of web-footed birds, and not larger than a swallow, it is very brave, and flies over the roughest sea with perfect confidence, rising with the billows and sinking with the falling waves as if in sympathy with the storm. Watching the petrels is one of the delights of a sea-voyage. To all appearances the same little flock hovers over the wake of the vessel from day to day, and looks as if it might intend to cross the ocean in company with this particular vessel. These tiny little black and white birds are commonly called "Mother Carey's Chickens." They live constantly on the water. Once in a while they make a dive under the waves, or float for a moment upon the surface, and then resume their onward flight with as much spirit as before.

The largest of all the swimmers is the albatross—a powerful bird with white body and black wings. It also seems to delight in a fierce gale, and skims over the surface of the ocean without touching it. It is, nevertheless, an expert swimmer when it deigns to light upon the water. An albatross has been known to follow the course of a ship in mid-ocean for many weeks.

The eider-duck, too, is a real sea-bird; but it does not fly well, and its habits are peculiar in many ways. Eider-ducks spend the winter in large flocks on the arctic seas; but when spring comes they select their mates, and the happy pairs swim off by themselves to the shore. The female makes a large loose nest of dry grass and straw, and lines it with a thick layer of down which she has plucked from her own breast. In this warm nest she lays from six to ten pale green eggs, and a supply of loose down is generally placed near by to cover the eggs with when the hen is off in search of food.

Eider-down, as you may know, is very valuable on account of its lightness and softness. The eggs are also valuable, and bring a good price when offered for sale; so it often happens that the natives of these cold countries are on the lookout for the nests about this time, and carry them off as soon as they are filled with eggs. This is the way our eider-down is obtained. The mother-bird in her distress makes another nest; but her down is gone, and she has nothing to line it with, so her mate is now obliged to strip the down from his breast also. The natives do not disturb this second nest which the male has lined, for if they should destroy the nests too often, there might be no eider-ducks to visit their shores.

Very different birds from these are the penguins. When on land they can do nothing but stand up in an odd manner, for their legs are placed right at the end of the body. Then their paddle-wings hang down at their sides, and, covered with short scale-like feathers, are entirely useless for flying; but they answer very well in swimming and in scrambling upon the rocks.

Penguins live only in the southern hemisphere, as the auks and guillemots, their distant cousins, are found only in the north. They spend most of the time in the water, and are sometimes found at a great distance from land. When they come on shore and stand upright in long lines, with their white breasts glistening in the sunlight, they are said to look like an array of soldiers.

We must not forget the pelicans, too—those awkward, ungainly birds that look almost too heavy to fly. But they are not so very heavy after all, for their bones contain a great many air-sacs, and the large heads are nearly all bill. That curious bag that hangs underneath is only a tough, flabby skin, which makes a convenient pouch for the pelican to scoop up fish with and carry them off to the shore to be eaten at leisure. Pelicans are common on our Florida coasts.

THE CAPTIVE QUEEN.

A Fairy Tale.

BY LORD BRABOURNE

(E. R. KNABORULL-ENGESSEN)

All who delight in wonder stories, and especially those who have read the charming fairy tales written by Mr. EDWARD H. KNABORULL-ENGESSEN (now Lord Brabourne), will be glad to learn that a new story from his pen will commence in the next number of HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE.

It is ingenious and amusing, and young readers will follow the search for the Captive Queen with unflagging interest.

The story will be illustrated by Miss ROSINA EMMETT.

OUR POST-OFFICE BOX.

HAVE you had a good time this vacation, chicks—just the happiest time you ever had? Some of you in the country, some in town, some climbing, canoeing, fishing, swinging, driving home the cows, riding old Brown Bos, going to the mill, gathering wild flowers, picking apples, running errands, rocking the baby, reading HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE, and writing letters to the Postmistress; busy and merry, and lovable and good. My little men and women, as I write to you this morning I think of this one in Australia, that one in Honolulu, another in Bohemia; others in France, on the Rhine, among the Alps, in Norway; of a bevy in England, a troop in Scotland, a bright-eyed cluster in Wales; and of more children than I can begin to count, from Maine to California, over this wide land.

Possibly somebody else may know more children than I do, but, my dears, I doubt it. And as for invitations, why, if I should begin a pilgrimage to all the pleasant places to which the girls and boys have asked me to come this summer, I should not get back until Christmas.

What I want to say is this. You who are away will soon be packing your trunks for home, taking with you the shells, the curious stones, the dried grasses and pressed flowers, which will be pleasant reminders of summer when the snows shall be falling. You who are at home will be getting books together in preparation for school. Little folk in England and America will soon be going to school again. Make a good use of your time, my dears. Take my advice, and observe this rule: Always be as neatly perfect as you possibly can. Do your best every day. Never allow your love to slight anything, but dot your 'r's, and your 't's, and mind your 'p's and 'q's. Be neighborly, that is, kind and obliging, to every one who needs your help, but do not yourselves lean more than you can help on other people.

Always did the best she could."

PETERSBURG, VIRGINIA.

DEAR POSTMISTRESS,—While in Washington I went to Corcoran's Art Gallery, named after its founder, W. W. Corcoran, who also founded the Louise Home for Aged and Indigent Gentlewomen. While in the Gallery I saw a ring made from the famous Charter Oak. There are statues there taken from the ruins of Pompeii, and also from Rome, Athens, and other ancient cities. The paintings are wonderful, and the most beautiful that I have ever seen. As you go up the steps from the entrance you can see two types of ancient Egyptian tapestry which were taken from the drawing-room of some English lord. After staying in Washington a while longer, I went over to Baltimore, which is forty miles distant. It is very beautiful, and some parts are beautiful. It is called the Monumental City, because it has so many monuments and churches. I went out to Druid Hill Park, which is next in size to Central Park in New York. In this Park there are the Maryland and Mansion Houses; the latter was at the time of the Revolution the residence of the British. From the Maryland House you can see a natural arch formed by the trees. I went to see the branch of the Enoch Pratt Library, at the corner of Hollin and Calhoun Streets, and there I read HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE, which they keep on file. Anybody may get a book and sit down and read, and if you are a resident, you can take the book home; that is, if you have a recommendation from a citizen. After seeing other sights, I got ready to leave. I went by boat, and passing old Fort Mifflin, near which the famous "Star-spangled Banner" was written by Francis S. Key. At night the phosphorus playing around the fort made it look beautiful. I saw some unlike electric lights. In the distance you could see the red beacons of the light-houses. In a short time we came into Chesapeake Bay. In the morning we came to Old Point. From there we took the train to Richmond, thence back to Petersburg, after having been absent six weeks.

UNIONVILLE, PENNSYLVANIA.

I have written to you before, but my letter was not printed. I enjoy HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE very much. Why does not Jimmy Brown relate some more of his funny experiences to his waiting friends now, and am having a very nice time. I have to practise on the piano an hour a day. The only pet I have are an emu and a kitten. I like to read very much, and am always glad when my paper comes. EMMA S. C.

UNIONVILLE, PENNSYLVANIA.

I have taken HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE since November last, and I never read any books so nice as these are. At the moment I am looking going to have them all bound in one. I used to live in Hamilton, but a few weeks ago we moved out to the country. The scenery around here is beautiful, and would fascinate an artist. Below our house the Grand River runs steadily along, and I can find it at almost any place. I have seen some of the best scenery in the world. My father and I enjoy reading it immensely. I think Miss Alcott and Mrs. Lillie write lovely stories, and my little sisters and brother like to look at the pictures very much. Howard writes me letters to his stories are very strange and very nice. I never saw anything like them before. I am going to take lessons on the violin. I love it very much. FANNIE B. S.

INDOLENE ISLAND, ST. LAWRENCE RIVER.

I am here now, as it is vacation. We are staying on our own island in the St. Lawrence River. It is one here in size. There are mostly pine and oak trees on it, and there are great many bucke-berry bushes. The house is built nearly in the middle of the island, and the house is very nice, and is at one side. The house has a piazza almost all around it, which makes it very pleasant, as we can move about when the sun shines, or the wind is too strong. The house is often is up here. The other day my sister, a friend, and myself went around the Canadian Islands, and saw the Solva can. The Canadian Islands are much more beautiful than those on the American side. They are not built on so much as ours are, as the Canadian government won't sell them, and will only lease them for a certain number of years. This boat goes through a place called the Lost Channel, and the current is so swift there that it carries the boat right along. A great many of the islands are beautiful houses built on them, and many of the people own steam-yachts. The name of our island is Indolene. I think it is very appropriate, because we don't come away to work, we come to rest. I am sure if you have ever been here you must think it a very beautiful place; if you haven't been here, I hope you will come soon.

GREENSBORO, INDIANA.

I have taken HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE for a long time, and am always very glad when it arrives. I have neither brothers nor sisters, but I have a very dear friend, Florence Christy, and we are together a great deal, although she is only twenty-one months old and I am eight years old. She calls me "Deddie," and her nurse Kate "Tab." My favorite authors are Mrs. Lillie, Howard Pyle, and Ernest Ingersoll. I have no pets except a cat. I have twenty dolls.

ELIZABETH LYMAN F.

KINGSTON-ON-THE-Hudson, NEW YORK.

I think that HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE is one of the loveliest magazines I have ever seen, and I wait for it eagerly and welcome it heartily every week. Mrs. Lillie's stories are very interesting. "Jo's Opportunity." Miss L. M. Alcott is my favorite author. The place where I live, Kingston, is very beautiful. It was built by the British, and was destroyed by the British on the 29th of October 16, 1777. I will tell you about the old Senate House here. It is long and low, very old-fashioned, with solid oak doors ornamented with large brass knockers. It is built of a kind of rough gray stone, and has this inscription on a white board over the door: "Colonel Wessel Ten Broeck, born at Westphalia 1635, erected this stone house about 1720." The Convention of the State of New York was held in the year of the adoption of its first Constitution, 1777, and the Convention met in this building on the 29th of October 16, 1777. I hope you will see it yourself some time. I think old-fashioned places are lovely.

I send a splendid receipt for taffy: Four tablespoons of water, eight of vinegar, twelve of sugar; boil until it becomes brittle in water; cool, then pull till pure white.

Please send a good receipt for chocolate fudge.

MATSON, ILLINOIS.

I hail from the great prairies, "where the soil is rich and the land is level." Here we have lovely trees, and all "the flowers that bloom in the spring." My father is an editor, so I can see many papers and magazines; but HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE is a great favorite with me, as I like to read very much. "We are four." I am the oldest. My pets are chiefly cats, and my brother has a little dog who is a great friend of my little tabby kitten. They play like two kittens together. My father is an editor, so I can see many other in an unusually affectionate manner. The other cats all make big tails at him, but little Miss Muffet never does. I send you my first effort in poetry.

DEAR POST-MISTRESS.—We women of the south of the subscribers to write to the Post-office Box describing ways of making presents, as we are beginning our Christmas ones now. With love, ENNA S. and EDITH C.

VERMONT, N. Y.

I have written to you once before, but as I did not see the letter in the Post-office Box, I thought I would try once more. If you have a little niece very much, I always look for it, as it will give me great pleasure to see it. I am in the Fifth Reader, in arithmetic, I am in measurements in grammar, and in spelling; in geography, I have a copy-book, No. 4; and in history. Our teacher says that the Combination is the largest mine in the world but one. I have two pets in the shape of kittens; their names are Phillip and Pallas. In five weeks we are going to Germany. ERIC B. (aged ten).

CANTON, MASS.

I am a little girl ten years old, and live near the banks of the Androscoogin River. My cousin sends me HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE, and I like it very much. I always read the paper in the Post-office Box first. I see almost all the boys and girls write and tell about their pets. I have a bird; he is just learning to sing. His name is Willie. I have two cats. I have a little brother Charlie, who is eight years old, and a little sister Millie, who is five. We go to Sabbath school every Sunday, and sometimes I recite, and when I recite, I shall study elocution. I go to school, and study reading, arithmetic, and spelling. It is vacation now. LIZZIE M. A QUEER DISPUTE.

"Oh dear me," sighed the student's mouth — for the accident had given his eyes a smart, and nose a half-diffusion; — "how very tired I get doing nothing but talking for this student, who sometimes tires one to death making the silly speeches he has read out of his great books!" But then he never could get along without me."

"As for that," said one of the Eyes, snappishly, "the never could get along without me, and my twin brother, for he never could read those volumes without our aid. Don't you think so, brother?"

"Yes," drawled the other Eye, as he rolled luxuriously on his bed.

"But, my dear fellows, it would be impossible for the Student to get along without me," said the neglected old fellow, and then he added, "I had hitherto been silent. "Why, don't you know that every night I serenade the student and the lodger on the same floor. And don't you know the story of the musician who used to play on the great organ, that had three key-boards, with his nose? And as for you, my dear Mouth, you may as well talk for the student," but pray did you never hear any one say, "Why, he talks through his nose?" And as for you, my dear Eyes, the great Milton was blind when he composed Paradise Lost."

"But," said the Eye, "composing is quite a different thing from reading; for though one reads the book, he cannot be composed for others to read. So we are brought into use."

"Really," said the Mouth, quivering with offended dignity, "you people are very proud. Do you forget, I should like to ask, that through me the student gets all his nourishment? Surely I am the most useful of us all!"

"Yes," said the Eye, "at all events, if it were not for us the student could not sleep; therefore, since sleep is as essential as food, we must surely be as great as the Mouth."

"Yes," said the Eye, "but for me the student could not have sweet music to lull him to sleep. But oh dear me! the student is waking."

"What a queer dream I had!" said the student, giving a yawn as if a rousing shake, "I wonder which is the most essential to me after all."

The student could never settle that point. Do you think you can?

The paper coming to me every week seems like a grab-box. Every week we have a grab; for I get all of it, but I can't see its contents? But unlike the real grab-boxes, where some poor articles are found, everything here is of great merit, and every one is satisfied. I have come to the Roxbury High School, and though last year I was only a "frisky junior," next term I shall be a "dignified middle," and will study French, geometry, history of the Middle Ages, English literature, and drawing. I like botany very much, and have examined a large number of flowers. ANNE A. M.

We had an entertainment at our school at the close of the term. I was in the piece taken from Dickens's David Copperfield. I was Aunt Betsy, and Howard J. was David. We had a broom drill, and a water drill at a festival at the Methodist church. I have a younger sister named May. MAGGIE B.

WOODBRY, NEW JERSEY.

DEAR POST-MISTRESS,—I read in a recent number of HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE you would like the boys and girls to write to you about their travels. I took a trip to Gettysburg and Luray. We saw all the important places along the road, and the views of Luray were one of the most beautiful. At Gettysburg we saw Little Round Top and Culp's Hill, and other hills and mountains, beautiful monuments, and the National Cemetery, where the national monument is. There is a small stone placed at the head of each soldier. There is a bronze statue of Reynolds and his horse, and the monument which is very pretty. We also visited Luray, and saw the wonderful cave. As you enter you come into a beautiful enclosure. From this we passed by the Fish Market and the Ball room, and some parts of the cave there are electric lights. Just think of it, dear Post-mistress, I have been one hundred and sixty feet under-ground. Good by. GEORGE E. P.

BIRD-NESTING.

Wicked practice,
Naughty play,
And the use of bird's claws.
Don't you know, my little boy,
Birds are not made for a toy?

They have fathers,
They have mothers,
Little sisters, little brothers;
When you take the young away,
What will all these birdies say?

Little birds
Build their nests,
Do their very, very best;
Lay their blue eggs, one, two, three—
Never meant for you nor me.

MY DEAR POST-MISTRESS,—Although I have written to you before, I want to send another message thanking you for publishing my "Beholdings." I am glad you thought mine good enough to share a corner in your lovely Post-office Box. To be chosen from the many you receive is indeed a compliment, and I hope to merit the honor again. I have been away from the mountain country enjoying the beautiful scenery, gathering wild flowers, and having fine camps

It seems good to be at home for a time, though, for when I am away I miss my dear little pet canary, who sings so nicely. With love, and a big kiss for this time. ETHEL A. B.

A PARADISE FOR TOADS.

THE paradise I have in mind is an irrigating ditch. It runs along one side of a quiet street in the prettiest town in Colorado. Tall cottonwood-trees shade it well from the sun; on either side bushes of sweet clover grow taller than a man's head, and red clover and dandelion blossoms, in their season, make a carpet soft enough to satisfy the most case-loving toad, and gorgeous enough to please an Eastern king. From dawn until dark the hum of insects is heard. Honey-bees fly among the clover, daddy-long-legs, large and small, run awkwardly over the grass, lady-bugs nestle in the heart of the dandelion blossoms, and every species of bug and insect known to Colorado ditches hop, fly, or swim over the surface of the water.

On one side of this ditch is a well-shaded lawn, and this the toads seemed also to regard as their undisputed territory. All summer it was their sleeping-room. Every night they settled down in the soft grass, and every morning found them so deeply embedded in it that only a small part of their backs was visible. If we touched them, the shut eyes would open for a moment, then close again. The hour at which his toadship preferred to rise had not come, and although by waking him often enough we might deprive him of his morning nap, we could not compel him to go for his breakfast until he was ready to eat.

Between nine and ten o'clock usually they left their little round beds, and went to the ditch to catch their breakfast. Down their capacious throats went flies, daddy-long-legs, lady-bugs, little moths, and even butterflies. One gulp, and a small butterfly would disappear. But they did not limit themselves to small ones. They can swallow butterflies of such size that in the beginning the attempt looks like an impossibility. In one instance I watched for fully three minutes a struggle between a big yellow one that was determined not to be swallowed and a toad that wanted it for his dessert. His mouth was stretched to its utmost width; the butterfly, half-way in, fluttered its yellow wings violently, and tried to recede from its disagreeable position. For some seconds at a time the toad would remain perfectly motionless; then suddenly, with a great effort, he would swallow; a little less of the yellow wings was in sight, until with one last convulsive gulp they disappeared altogether. It is fortunate for our flower-beds that toads are such a nuisance; from their breakfast-time until dark their sharp eyes are open, and every foolish fly that stops for a moment near to scratch his head with his foot, every grasshopper that swings tantalizingly on a leaf a few inches above a pair of those watchful eyes, will be very likely to meet a sudden, ignominious death.

Two of these toads were seen actually and unmistakably walking. The first one that tried this unusual manner of locomotion was very large. He straightened out his legs until he stood nearly upright, and putting first one foot ahead and then the other, he walked nearly three feet, slowly and unsteadily.

After this we watched carefully, and at last the performance was repeated. This time it was a small toad. The family cat came up on the porch with a piece of ham in her mouth. This attracted her notice, and he watched her motions intently. In a few minutes she went away, leaving a scrap of the meat. As soon as she jumped off the porch the toad straightened himself up, and walked slowly and quite steadily a little more than one foot toward it, stopped, dropped to his usual position, and walked the rest of the way.

CHAPTER I.

THERE was once a King who had everything in the world to make him happy. He ruled over a people who were so devoted to him and to his royal house that they took real pleasure in paying the taxes which went to support his crown and dignity. It is true that these taxes sat lightly upon them, because their country was rich and prosperous, and they were thought to be such a brave nation that no enemy ever dared attack them. So a long peace enabled them to plough and sow, to buy and sell, and to grow rich as fast as they could, and their King was never in want of money, for they gave him as much as he could possibly desire.

He had, moreover, something which was more likely to make him happy than his money, or than anything which his money could buy, and this something was a Queen whom everybody allowed to be the most beautiful and charming woman that they had ever seen. Her face and figure were both as nearly perfect as possible, and were only equalled by the sweetness of her disposition, which made everybody who came near her admire and love so delightful a creature. With such a wife the King might well be happy; and when I tell you that the royal pair were blessed with several children who were good and dutiful, as well as healthy and beautiful, you may well imagine that there was little wanting to complete their perfect happiness. Such a state of existence, however, is not permitted to any of the dwellers upon earth, and for that reason, I suppose, the events which I am about to relate were allowed to take place.

Upon one lovely summer's evening the King and Queen, having dined early, took it into their heads to stroll together in the gardens and shrubberies which surrounded the palace. This was a pleasure in which they often indulged, and never before had anything occurred of a disagreeable nature. Upon this particular occasion, however, they had not strolled far when the Queen suddenly discovered that she had left her pocket-handkerchief upon a table in the room which they had just left, and the King thereupon returned to fetch it, leaving her seated upon a bench beneath an oak-tree, under whose leafy shade the royal pair had passed many a pleasant hour, and which was a favorite spot with them both. To hurry from the seat under the oak to the palace and back was certainly not the work of more than three minutes, and the King returned within that time, gayly singing a stave of an old song as he waved the recovered handkerchief in his hand. What was his surprise to find that the Queen had disappeared!

At first he thought that she must have hidden herself behind the oak. Then the idea struck him that she must have wandered into the wood beyond the shrubberies; but she had not had time to go far, and if this had been the case, he would surely have seen her.

But he saw her not. He called aloud; he uttered her name again and again in tones which betokened his alarm when there was no reply. He ran hastily to and fro, at one moment imploring his Amabilia (for such was the Queen's name) no longer to conceal herself, at the next giving vent to such lamentable cries as would naturally proceed from an agitated mind. Still all was silent around him; no voice replied to his frantic words; his beloved had disappeared just as if she had sunk into the ground beneath his feet, or flown up to the skies above his head; there was no sign or trace of her left, nor had he the slightest clue by means of which he might hope to discover the mystery of her disappearance. Never before had the King been so completely baffled, and he could hardly believe the misfortune which had befallen him.

Returning hastily to the palace, when he had searched and shouted until it was perfectly clear that shouting and searching were useless, he gave orders for his Great Council of State to be immediately summoned, and while this was being done he despatched numerous messengers through the shrubberies and woods, with directions to explore every thicket and bush, and penetrate within every cave and corner in which it was possible for a human being to be hidden. For although he felt sure that something very uncommon had happened to his adored Queen, the hope still lurked within his breast that, even if she had been spirited away, or carried off by robbers, she might still be within the neighborhood of the palace, and he therefore neglected no possible means which might lead to her recovery.

The Great Council soon assembled, and having listened with due respect to the story which the King had to tell them, took the matter at once into their serious consideration, and talked over it together for three weary hours. At the end of this time they came to several resolutions, which the Prime Minister laid before the King, making at the same time an eloquent speech, at the end of which no one could possibly tell what he meant. The resolutions, however, spoke for themselves, and were well worthy of the talented men who had produced them.

The first was that her Majesty the Queen was lost; the second, that it was most desirable that she should be found; the third, that it was expedient to wait until something should turn up which might give them some idea where to look for her. When these resolutions were published, everybody was struck with the proof which they gave of the great wisdom of those who had prepared them, and the people were told by all the newspapers that there never had been such a Council and such a Prime Minister as they had then the good fortune to possess.

As the people in those days generally believed what the newspapers said, this was very satisfactory to everybody except the King. He, poor fellow, could not for the life of him see how these resolutions were likely to restore to his arms his lost Amabilia; and being of an active mind, the idea of waiting for something to turn up was not at all according to his views of what ought to be done. If he had been compelled to follow the advice of his Great Council he would probably have gone mad; but, fortunately for him, this was not the case, for he was not only a king in name, but had power and authority such as kings had in those old times. So as soon as he found that the course recommended to him was that which any child or old woman could have followed as well as a powerful monarch, and which was unworthy of his rank and position, he dismissed his Council, kicked the Prime Minister down-stairs while he was still explaining his resolutions at great length, and ordered such measures to be taken as appeared to be suggested by common-sense.

He caused advertisements to be put into all the newspapers, making his loss known, and offering a large reward to any one who would give such information as might throw any light upon the matter. He sent letters by special couriers to all other kings and princes, telling them what had happened, and asking them to make inquiries in their several kingdoms; and having done everything in his power to invite assistance from every possible quarter, he abandoned himself to his grief in a proper and becoming manner. He gave up shaving, never had his hair cut, put on his clothes in a careless manner, went out without his hat, ate mustard with his fish and sugar with his roast beef, and, in short, did half a hundred of those extravagant and foolish things which are often noticed in persons who are under the influence of a great sorrow.

As the courtiers all thought it necessary to follow the example of their King, it will easily be imagined that the court soon began to lose all appearance of splendor or even of neatness, and every one seemed to vie with his neighbor in discomfort and untidiness. The very ministers appeared clad in old and ill-fitting garments; such a thing as a new hat or a well-brushed coat was never seen within the palace walls, and the shadow of the heavy misfortune which had befallen the King brooded over the whole of his dominions.

This was indeed a sad state of things, and those who loved the King feared that his reason would become affected, and that even worse would follow. As day succeeded day and no news was heard of the lost Queen, no change came over the aspect of the court, the most hopeful people began to despair, and the future of the kingdom appeared dark and desolate.

One fine morning, however, a wonderful thing took place. The King, to the surprise of all the inhabitants of the palace, came down to breakfast with his hair properly brushed, his beard decently shaved, and dressed in a red coat, with leather breeches and top-boots, just as in the good old days he had always been used to appear upon hunting mornings. He roundly rated his personal attendants for their slovenly appearance, told the Prime Minister that he looked as if he had not had a bath for a week, and sent the Lord Chamberlain home at once with directions to have his hair cut and to put on a better coat. Then, while the other ministers and courtiers were wondering what could be the meaning of this sudden and hopeful change, he told them that he had that night had a dream of the greatest interest and the most vital importance.

His hearers naturally showed much excitement at this news, and earnestly besought his Majesty to unfold his dream at once. This, however, he declined to do in open court, and desired that the Great Council should immediately be called. To them he declared that which had happened. In the dead of the night he had been asleep, which was not uncommonly the case, nor was it unusual that when in such a state, especially after a hearty supper, he should be visited by dreams of a more or less exciting nature. But this particular dream had, in its excitement and interest, surpassed any which he had ever had before.

An old man had appeared to him, dressed in a long flowing garment, and wearing a beard, perfectly white, which hung down from his venerable face as far as below his waist, and then turned up again on each side in a manner curious to behold. His face was furrowed by wrinkles which betokened great age, the hand which he stretched out toward the King trembled as if from the same cause, but his eyes were remarkably vivid, and almost dazzling in their brightness, and his voice was clear, although he spoke with tremulous accents and as if the effort to do so cost him some exertion. So plainly did the King see this ancient man that he could hardly believe that it was only in a dream that he did so, and with such startling clearness did his words fall upon the royal ears that it seemed as if they had been spoken through a trumpet. And these were the strange words he spoke:

"The cow, the rabbit, and the old kangaroo
Came marching down the hill.
They said that the Queen to the King had been true,
And had vanished against her will;
And where she was gone to nobody knew
But the cow, and the rabbit, and the old kangaroo."

AUTUMN LEAVES.

BY E. L. BENEDICT.

CRIMSON and scarlet and yellow,
Emerald turning to gold,
Shimmering there in the sunbeams,
Shivering here in the cold;
Waving farewell as the tempest
Ruthlessly tears them apart,
Fluttering, dancing, and rustling
As hither and thither they dart;
Recklessly sailing the rapids,
Lazily swimming the pools,
Playing "I spy" with each other
Under the puffy toadstools.
Wreaths for the walls of her dwelling
Each neat little house-keeper weaves,
And there, amid delicate fern sprays,
Nestle the bright autumn leaves.

INSECT NURSERIES ON PLANTS.

BY E. D. WALKER.

MANY insects get the help of plants in raising their families. In the spring the mother goes to her favorite growth, bores a tiny hole into the leaf or stalk, drops an egg there along with an irritating fluid, and then leaves her little one entirely to the plant's care.

A fly's bite stings a twig as much as a hornet's does a boy. Instantly the spot begins to swell. The lump enlarges as the branch grows, until a grand dwelling is built for the infant fly, which nestles in a smooth round cell at the centre. He is completely shut in from light and air, and you couldn't guess how he got there if you didn't know. It was a puzzle to philosophers for many centuries, just as the king wondered how the blackbirds got into his pie. The egg rapidly increases in size, and soon becomes a white worm (called a grub), which grows fat on the sap juices generously served him. After some weeks of this free board and lodging he finds the place a tiresome dungeon, and eats a way of escape to the outer world. Then he changes to a fly, and buzzes out into the last chapter of his life.

Every insect of these habits is especially fond of one kind of vegetation, and always visits that, if possible. It is very particular too about the part where the egg is laid, one kind preferring the bud, another the leaf, while some attack the stem, and some the roots.

The oak is the most popular resort for gall flies. Occasionally the galls (as these insect swellings are called) seem to outnumber the acorns. You must get under the tree to see them best, as they hang under the leaves and from the new shoots. Notwithstanding the great variety of gall shapes, the flies making them are very similar in appearance, and some are only distinguished by their swellings. Oaks know the difference in fly poisons better than men know the difference in the flies.

The largest galls, known as "oak-apples," because of their size, are attached to the central vein of leaves. While growing they carry gay colors of red and yellow, and when mature are brown and shiny. They are light puffy things with brittle shells. The occupant's chamber is a hollow ball suspended in the centre, like the hub of a wheel, by hundreds of delicate spokes. In an autumn stroll among oak woods you will see many of these scattered on the ground. Each has a round hole on the side and another matching it in the central chamber, through which the fly crawled out. The cause of this immense monstrosity was a little black fly with a body like a garden ant and broad wings. About six weeks before the hole appeared she alighted on this leaf, and running back and forth, selected the spot for her baby's residence. She uncoiled from her tail a long hair-like tube, divided lengthwise into three parts, sliding on each other, so that the channel could be enlarged for the egg to go through, and contracted into snug shape for packing away.

Piercing the leaf vein with this egg depositor, she wiggled it around until the hole was widened to the egg's size, conveyed through the tube the wee white ball, and planted it in the pit with some stung juice. The oak did the rest.

In many villages of England the 29th of May is celebrated in honor of the restoration of Charles II. to the throne. These large galls are then gathered and gilded as ornaments appropriate to the occasion, the King having hidden in the Royal Oak after the battle of Worcester. The quantities of them used in this way has given to the holiday the name "Oak-apple Day."

Another oak fly likes the buds best, and compels the tree to give her child the rich nourishment that should have gone to a new branch. Her gall is decorated with the leaves of the branch, which is dwarfed and finally killed for the insect's benefit. A third kind produces the fuzzy growth with a hard centre, like a small bunch of golden silk.

The cherry galls are a staple of commerce. They are round as marbles, and solid, except for the grub cell. Cut one open, and you find it full of strong bitter juice which stains your hands inkly black. In fact, the iron knife-blade made ink of it. To wash it off you must use some acid, as vinegar or lemon. These galls, boiled with a little of iron, have given the world its best writing fluids for centuries. The most important element of civilization depends, therefore, on this meek little fly. Ink galls are found so abundantly near the town of Aleppo, in Smyrna, that most of Christendom is supplied from there, and the tradesmen call them "Aleppo galls." They are used also for tanning and medicine.

The rattle-box gall lets the worm-cell roll around loose inside, and is less common than the others. Currant galls copy red currants in size and color. The little seed-like pocket galls, hanging in pouches from under white-oak leaves, drop off in the autumn, and the uneasy grubs caged within keep up such a continual kicking that their cells are hopping merrily among the leaves with a strange rattling noise, to the astonishment of every one who knows not the reason. The round hollow spots, lined with a thick crust under many oak leaves, are another style of fly cradles. These eight varieties of galls, with several others on the root, prove what favoritism the oak suffers. Of course they are never found all on the same twig, as they are drawn here for convenience.

The oak stingers demand a complete house for every individual, but some insects are not so particular. On the sweet-brier and blackberry a number of eggs are laid near together and enclosed in one large hotel, with a separate room for each, making the plant look as if it had the mumps. This is the case with many bushes, especially prickly ones, on which the flies do not like to promenade.

Frequently you may find in the woods leaves covered with small fancy topknobs, each nourishing its grub, like the witch-hazel and grape leaves in the illustration.

By the country road-side or river-bank a common gall swells the golden-rod stalk into a round bunch. This is the work of a fly. The long gradual swelling on this plant is made by a little moth. As moths cannot sting, this lodger did not wake up to find his home built around him as did the young fly, but had to help form it himself. When the worm hatched from the egg that was fastened to the rod, he dug straight for the heart of the stem, and gnawed away there until it bulged out into a roomy apartment. Then he opened a front door for his use later on, and plugged it up with a silk wad of his own spinning. This done, he contentedly lounged about in his trim quarters, feasting on the choice diet in the juicy pith. Before long his resurrection day brought him wings, and pushing aside the silken barrier, he flew away into his paradise of woods and fields. The golden-rod has a third gall on its flower.

The poplar galls pictured here are of a different order of architecture. The builders are plant-lice. Mother Louse glues a tiny egg on her chosen portion of the family tree, but makes no sting. The little one, as soon as she hatches, begins to bite the green under her, and keeps spurring the plant until a house is grown large enough to satisfy her. She fills it with a swarming brood of children. Several doors are always open, and when the young are large enough, they ramble off to look after themselves, but the mother always stays within, spending her entire life there. One variety of plant-lice thinks there is no place like the junction of the flat leaf surface with the stem, and makes there a pea-sized ball with two door slits. Another goes to the tip of the branch, and nibbles a home of the cocks comb pattern, bright green while growing, and drying into a crispy shell. In the spring you may find in this the wingless mother and a crowd of her winged progeny.

The rose, dogwood, chestnut, cherry, apple, morning-glory, huckleberry, and, in short, almost all common green things, support these baby farms for insects. Some tend their charges two or three years before they become of age. Even the modest wild-strawberry vine has to nurse the youngsters of a certain fly. Excepting mosses, ferns, and fungi, every plant seems obliged to entertain one or more of these unwelcome guests, and is under orders to do its share toward raising winged creatures.

The famous "apples of Sodom," which were long thought to be fabulous, beautiful to the sight, but when tasted crumbling into bitter ashes, are now considered to be Oriental galls. Have you ever gathered "swamp apples" to eat as a delicacy or to pickle—the green juicy lumps growing among the flowers of the azalea or "swamp-honeysuckle"? These too are galls.

If you are observant in your out-door strolls you will discover a wondrous variety of unnatural bulbous growths. Cut them open, and the soft, harmless, sleepy worm at the centre will show you the infant form of the insect which made them. To capture the fly you need only break off the branch bearing the gall, place it in water to keep it fresh, and cover it with a fine gauze net. Though the fly can eat a tunnel out of his prison, he does not chew thread, and when he comes out you have him safe.

Sometimes the grubs are turned out of their homes by other tyrants. In examining many galls you will come upon some where the first inhabitants, for whom they were made, have been devoured and their nests seized by more unscrupulous insects, which were parasites on parasites.

A FISH STORY.

BOYS WHO BECAME FAMOUS.

BY DAVID KER.

STRUCK DOWN IN THE DARKNESS.

A BLACK, bitter winter night, the hoar-frost of which stood white and thick on the beards of the soldiers who came tramping in from their cold night-watch, stamping their half-frozen feet, and striking their beunumbed hands hard against each other.

War was raging in every part of England, King Charles and his nobles battling with the Parliament and the people. Among the other places that were being fought for was the old town of Leicester, and it seemed now as if a few days more must decide which party was to have it.

The cutting wind that had been blowing fiercely all day had lulled about nightfall, and all was deadly still; but ever and anon a red flash broke through the darkness, and the deep boom of a gun told that the enemy was on the watch.

Those in the guard-room were hardy and practised soldiers from the picked men of Cromwell's army—all except one. That one was a tall, brown-haired, rather coarse-featured lad of eighteen, with a strangely wistful look in his large, deep, earnest eyes, like one who was always seeking something which he could never find.

He had little about him as yet from which his companions could have guessed that he was to grow into one of the famous men of the world; but even these rough soldiers had already begun to notice that he was thoughtful beyond his years, fond of asking strange and searching questions, and always eager for every chance of doing any one a good turn. Was there a hurt to be bandaged, a sick man to be tended, a ration of bread to be shared with a hungry soldier, a prisoner in need of a kind word to cheer him up, the young recruit was foremost of all; and he was already known among his comrades by the name of "Helpful John."

The strain of this rough camp life was evidently beginning to tell upon him, for his face looked pale and thin, and his eyes shone with a feverish light; but he was putting on his steel cap as briskly as ever to go forth to his duty, when one of the men interfered.

"Tarry, friend John; thou art willing, but will without strength is naught. Thou hast been sick, and art not overstrong even now; wherefore I will take thy turn of watch for thee, even as thou didst take Repentance Brownrigg's but a week ago."

And before John had time to remonstrate, brave Salvation Hawkins had gone forth with his long pike in his hand into the cold black night.

To and fro he paced, straining his keen eyes into the surrounding gloom for any sign of danger, and keeping time to his measured tramp by humming under his breath the grand old battle psalm with which Cromwell's "Iron-sides" had so often turned to flight the hosts of the enemy:

"The mighty Lord is on my side,
I will not be dismayed;
For anything that man can do
I will not be afraid.

"The nations, joining all in one,
Did compass me about;
But in the name of God the Lord
I will them all root out."

A flash—a crack—a whiz through the still air and poor Salvation Hawkins lay dead on the frozen ground, with his white face turned upward to the cold, starlit sky.

Many a grim visage softened into sadness when the corporal's guard that had come to relieve the sentinel brought back his lifeless body; for he had been a warm-hearted comrade as well as a brave soldier, and there were few there for whom he had not done some act of kindness.

"And it was my work that he was doing!" cried young John, with a pang of generous regret at the thought of another man having died for him.

The words were heard by the captain of the battery, who had just come up—a sturdy old "Miles Standish," who could fight as well as pray, and who fought none the worse for having prayed first; just the man, in fact, to serve for a model (as he afterward did) for the Mr. Great-heart, whom we all know in the Pilgrim's Progress.

"Young man," said he, solemnly, "assuredly the Lord hath great things in store for thee, since He hath thus redeemed thy life from destruction. To His name be the glory!"

The old warrior was right; for in after-days "Helpful John" did such work as will preserve so long as the world lasts the name of John Bunyan.

CHAPTER IV.

HAS-SE IS HELD PRISONER.

SALUTING his commandant, the sergeant of the guard, who held the prisoner on the right, reported that this young savage had been seen skulking in the forest near the fort, and that, deeming his presence and movements very suspicious, he had sent a party of men to capture him. They had gone out by a rear gate, and, making a long detour, had surprised him just as he was making off through the underbrush, and after a sharp tussle had secured and brought him into the fort.

At the first appearance of his friend, René had started up with an exclamation of joy to go to him, but his uncle sternly bade him keep his seat. He obeyed, but scowled angrily at the soldiers, who still retained their hold of Has-se, as though fearful that if they let go he might in some mysterious way vanish from their sight.

Laudonniere commanded them to release their hold of the prisoner and to retire from the room, but to remain within call. They did so, and the young Indian, left to face the council, drew himself up proudly, and folding his arms, stood motionless. René tried in vain to catch his eye that he might by a sympathetic glance assure him of his friendship; but the other betrayed no recognition of his presence, nor once looked in his direction. He was dressed in the full costume of a young warrior who occupied the honorable position of Bow-bearer to a great chief, and in his hair gleamed the flamingo feather that proclaimed the station in life to which he was born. His handsome figure, proud face, and fearless bearing caused the members of the council to regard him with approving glances, and it was with less of sternness in his tone than usual that, after the door was closed, Laudonniere said, "Now, sir, explain to us the meaning of this sudden departure of thy people, and the reason of thine own action in thus acting the part of a spy upon us."

With flashing eyes the young Indian answered, in the French that he had learned of René: "My name is Has-se. I am the son of a chief. My father and my people have been friendly to you and your people. This country is ours, and in it we go where we please when we are ready to go, and stay where we please when we are ready to rest from going. I have done nothing that I should be brought here against my will, and until I am set free I will answer no questions. Has-se has spoken."

René's face flushed with pleasure at this brave speech of his friend; and even Laudonniere admired the young Indian's coolness and courage, but he nevertheless felt it his duty to maintain his dignity and question him sternly. To all his questions, however, Has-se remained dumb, absolutely refusing to open his lips. The words "Has-se has spoken" with which he had ended his defiant speech signified that he had said all that he had to say, and nothing should induce him to speak further unless his condition of being set at liberty were complied with.

At last Laudonniere called in the soldiers, and ordered them to take the prisoner to the guard-house, and there treat him kindly, but to watch him closely, and on no account allow him to escape. When Has-se had thus been removed, Laudonniere turned to the members of the council and asked what, in their opinion, should be done with him.

Le Moyne, the artist, advised that the young Indian should be set free at once, and treated with such kindness that he might thereby be induced to give them the information they sought to gain. Then René de Veaux, blushing at his own boldness, jumped to his feet, and made a vehement little speech, in which he said that Has-se was his dear friend, and that, as he himself had said, they had no right to make a prisoner of him, besides much more to the same effect. He became so excited in his defence of the Indian lad that finally his uncle interrupted him, saying:

"Softly, softly, René! Thou art right to defend thy friend if indeed he be not our enemy, but thou hast no authority for finding fault with those who are much older and wiser than thyself."

Blushing furiously at this rebuke, René sat down, while his uncle continued: "I am also of the opinion that this young savage should be courteously entreated and set at liberty. Thus shall we win favor with his tribe, with whom it behooves us to remain on friendly terms."

The others of the council did not, however, agree with this, but thought the better plan would be to retain the Indian lad as a hostage, and demand of his tribe a great quantity of provisions as his ransom.

As they were in the majority, Laudonniere hesitated to act contrary to their counsel, and finally said that they would hold him for at least one day, and that in the mean time René should visit him, and endeavor to extract from him the desired information regarding the movements of his people.

When René, armed with his uncle's authority for so doing, passed the sentinel and entered the guard-house, he found the Indian lad seated on a rude bench in one corner, with his face buried in his hands. He sprang to his feet at René's approach, and stood silently regarding him, not knowing but that he too had become an enemy. Carefully closing the door behind him, the impulsive French boy stepped quickly over to where the other stood, and embraced him, saying, as he did so, "Surely, Has-se, my brother, thou canst not think that I am aught but thy friend?"

Thus reassured, Has-se returned the embrace, and said, "I know thou art my friend, Ta-lah-lo-ko, and I did wrong to doubt thee for a moment; but it maddens me to be thus caged, and I am become like Nutchah the hawk when restrained of his liberty, suspicious of all men."

Then both boys sat down on the bench, and René questioned Has-se regarding the sudden departure of the Indians, and why he was there alone.

Has-se replied that while he had no secrets that all men might not know, he would have died rather than answer the questions of those who were his captors, and as such commanded him to speak. To his friend Ta-lah-lo-ko he would, however, talk freely and with a straight tongue. He said that after the destruction of the store-house containing their supply of provisions for many months, Mico, their chief, had decided that it would be best for his people to remove to the land of the Alachuas, their friends, who had provisions in plenty, and remain there until the next season of corn planting. He caused their departure to be made secretly, for fear that the white men would seek to detain them as hunters for the fort if they learned of the intended movement, and he wished to avoid any shadow of trouble between his people and their white brothers.

"He had undoubtedly the right to act as seemed to him best," said René; "but why didst not thou accompany thy people, and what brings thee here to the fort?"

"To see thee, Ta-lah-lo-ko, and thee only, did I come," answered Has-se. "I learned, after we had been some hours on the journey, that which affects thee so nearly that I could not leave thee in ignorance of it and without a warning. What I learned is that Chitta regards thee with a deadly hatred, and has sworn to have thy life."

"Mine!" exclaimed René, in great surprise. "Why does the Snake bear malice toward me? I have no quarrel with him."

"That I know not, unless he suspects that it was thou who taught me the trick of wrestling that overthrew him, and thus lost him the position of Bow-bearer that he so greatly desired to obtain."

"It may be so," said René, musingly, "though how he could learn it I cannot think, nor why, even if he had knowledge of it, it should be cause for his wishing my death."

"Ah, Ta-lah-lo-ko, thou dost not know Chitta. His nature is that of the serpent whose name he bears, and for real or fancied wrongs to himself his revenge is cruel. Having once conceived a bitter hate against thee, he will have thy life, or risk his own in attempting to take it."

"In that case," said René, "I am deeply grateful for thy warning, and will take care that Master Chitta does not find me unprepared for him in case he seeks me out."

"Now," said Has-se, "I would speak of another matter. I know that you white men have but little food within the fort, and must soon suffer for want of it if more is not obtained. There is none left in this country; but the Alachuas, to whom my people have gone, have an abundance. If one of thy people would go with me to them, and offer them things such as thou hast and they have not, in exchange for food, he would thus obtain a supply for the fort. If many went, the red men would be afraid; but with one they would talk, and if he were my friend, then would his safety be assured. Wilt thou go with me to this distant land, Ta-lah-lo-ko?"

"Why," answered René, hardly knowing what to say to this sudden and unexpected proposal, "thou art a prisoner, Has-se, and dost not even know if my uncle will release thee. How, then, dost thou speak with such confidence of journeying to the land of these Alachuas?"

With a meaning smile Has-se answered: "Walls and bars may answer to cage men, but they cannot confine a sunbeam. If thou wilt go with me, then meet me when the light of the second moon from now touches the waters where Alapatta the great alligator delivered us from Cat-sha the tiger. With my life will I answer for thy safety, and at the next full moon, or soon after it, thou shalt return to thy people."

René would have talked more of this plan, but just then the door of the guard-house was opened, and the sergeant appeared, saluting, and saying: "Tis the hour of sunset, Master De Veaux; the guard is about to be relieved, and I must request you to retire and leave the prisoner for the night. Surely you must be tired of talking with such a pig-headed young savage."

"WITH FLASHING EYES THE YOUNG INDIAN ANSWERED"

Not caring to exhibit his real feelings toward Hasse before the sergeant, René bade him good-night very formally, and added, "Mayhap I will see thee on the morrow; but count not on my coming, for I may not deem it worth my while to visit thee."

"I should think not," said the sergeant, as he closed the door behind them and barred it. "A young gentleman such as Master De Veaux can find but little pleasure in intercourse with such ignorant creatures. For my part, were I commandant of this fort, I would make slaves of them all, and kindly persuade them to my will with a lash. They—"

"Hold there!" cried René, as he turned toward the sergeant with flashing eyes. "If thou speakest another word in such strain of those who have treated us with naught save kindness, I will report thee to that same lash of which thou pratest so glibly."

The astonished sergeant muttered something by way of apology, but René, not waiting to hear it, hurried away to report to his uncle the result of his mission to the prisoner, and then to his own quarters to think over the startling proposal made to him by his friend.

The next morning Hasse had disappeared, and was nowhere to be found. With a troubled countenance the sergeant of the guard reported to Laudonniere that he had looked in on the prisoner at midnight, and found him quietly sleeping. He had visited the room again at sunrise, and it was empty. The sentinels at the gates and those who paced the walls had been closely questioned, but declared they had seen nobody, nor had they heard any unusual sound. For his part, he believed there was magic in it, and that some of the old Indian witches had spirited the prisoner up the chimney, and flown away with him on a broomstick.

Although troubled to find that his prisoners could thus easily escape from the fort, Laudonniere was relieved that the disposal of Hasse's fate had thus been taken from his hands. He said to René: "I am glad that thy friend has escaped—though I like not the manner of his going—and I trust he may come to no harm. I would, however, that we had been able to send a company, or even one man, with him to this land of the Alaciuas of which he told thee, for mayhap we might thus have obtained provision; but without a guide I know not how it could be discovered."

"Do you think I could have gone, uncle?" inquired René, eagerly.

"Thou, lad? No; thou art too young and tender to be sent on such a perilous mission. It should be one of double thy years and experience. Let no such foolish thoughts fill thy head yet awhile."

THE LITTLE GAME-KEEPER.

STOCK, LOCK, AND BARREL.

A TALK ABOUT GUNS AND SHOOTING.

BY FRANKLIN SATTERTHWAITE

Part I.

THREE pairs of legs dangled over the side of the old wreck on West Hampton beach one day early last summer, while their owners—Mr. Theron, and his old friend Exham's two manly boys, Bill and Carson—watched with interest the graceful circling of a flock of tiny plover over the heavy surf.

"Those are the little chaps, boys," said Mr. Theron, "that your father and I used to crack away at when we were learning to shoot, years ago. We had one gun between us, and used to take turns. If your father was alive now I believe he would get you a gun, and never rest contented until you learned to shoot on the wing, for he was always a very thorough and enthusiastic sportsman."

"Now tell us all about when you and papa went shooting, Mr. Theron," chimed in both boys at once, wiggling up close, so as not to lose a word by the roaring of the waves. "Whom did the gun belong to?"

"It was mine," replied Mr. Theron, smiling at the remembrances the conversation brought up. "It was a little single-barrel muzzle-loader, and when I got it and showed it to your father we both thought we were made for life, and although it was just out of the shop, we used up a cruget of oil on it the evening it was sent home, and hardly slept a wink that night, thinking of the birds we would shoot the next day. I got the gun in a queer way, and it shows it's an ill wind that blows nobody good."

"I was thirteen, just about your ages, when one day I was standing by the edge of our meadow watching Aaron Flumerfelt, the store-keeper, load his gun. A couple of city sportsmen had come in the old stage, which was so long that it looked like a bowling-alley on wheels, and had put up at the tumble-down hotel to have a few days' English snipe-shooting. Mr. Flumerfelt—who disliked city people very much, and was under the impression that they came to the village only out of spite, to deprive the countrymen of the birds that visited the meadows every spring—no sooner saw them than he hauled on his long boots, and grabbing up his muzzle-loader, started for the marsh. Ordinarily it was Mr. Flumerfelt's custom to ignore the presence of the infrequent purchaser of penny toys at his store, but on this occasion, having no one else to storm to, he delivered to me his trade on 'city gunners' and the terrible havoc they committed whenever they saw fit to come his way. A very excitable man was Mr. Flumerfelt. He thumped down the charges of powder and shot as if he was preparing a blast, having first put caps on the tubes to prevent, as he said, 'the powder from oozing out.'

"Them down-country folks won't get nary a snipe if I can help it," he shouted; and to give force to his determination he thumped the butt of his gun down on the log across the ditch, and the gun went off, the charge taking off the end of his nose, and sending his broad-brimmed hat sailing above the cat tails. With a yell, old Flumerfelt dropped his gun, and holding on to what remained of his nose, ran shouting back to the village.

"When I got home, I asked my uncle, with whom I was spending my Easter holidays, if he would not get me a gun. Though it's nearly thirty years ago, I can now see the expression on my uncle Sylvanus's face when I asked him this. He was a great lover of field sports himself, and the idea that I desired to follow in his worthy footsteps tickled his fancy immensely. I saw his eyes twinkle when I broached the subject, but he only replied 'he would see about it.'

"Now there happened to live near us an old bachelor, known to every one as 'the Colonel.' Unquestionably he was the most accomplished sportsman of his time residing in the North, and, boy-like, I was never tired of listening to his inexhaustible fund of shooting stories, of the exploits of his famous breed of pointers, and of the miraculous shots he had made with the gun Mr. Joe Manton, of London, had made for him. He was a most happy story-teller. One listening to him could almost see old Nat and Grip pointing, stiff as rocks, in some old weed field, and showers of quail falling before the unerring aim of the redoubtable Colonel, as the sturdy old man sat up in the big arm-chair in the billiard-room, pointing his cue about like a gun, with his tight-buttoned frock-coat, broad, smooth face, and great eyes so wide apart that they often made me think he looked like the big stuffed woodcock on the mantel-piece.

"Now, as it happened, Mr. Flumerfelt's mishap stood me in good turn; for this unsportsmanlike exploit so amused my uncle and the Colonel that before I went to bed it had been settled that John Mullen, the New York gunsmith, should make me a single-barrel gun, and that my 'young idea' should be taught how to shoot—providing that the consent of three grandparents and a maiden aunt, all of whom took a hand in my bringing up, could be secured. The old people fidgeted a good deal before they said 'yes,' but my aunt, who had been nearly frightened to death in her younger days by looking at a leather shot-pouch which she expected would 'go off,' and who imagined she could see me being brought home trussed with a ramrod, and several pounds of shot in my body, was horrified at the idea, and had at last to be voted out of the council.

"Boys, it was an anxious time for your father and me when all this was going on; but at last the gun was ordered, and while waiting for it to be finished every book on shooting in my uncle's library was read through several times. We learned, of course, much that was useful, but I do not believe there were two boys out of every ten thousand who ever had as thorough and capable instructors in every particular concerning the safe and proper way to handle a gun and its use in the field as we had. We were taught from the start not to regard a gun as a toy or a plaything, but to seriously understand that it was to be a means of giving us pleasure in our hours of recreation. My uncle and the old Colonel drummed this into us, criticised our ways of carrying the gun and loading it, and threatened so vigorously to take the gun away from us if their instructions were not carried out to the letter, that from the very start we learned but one way to use the gun, and that was the right way. So thoroughly was all this ground into me that I am to-day just as careful with my gun as I was thirty years ago when I was taken out shooting under my uncle's wing. The only wonder to me is, from the number of thoughtless, careless, and ignorant people I meet out shooting, that accidents of the most dreadful kind are not of more frequent occurrence.

"No helter-skelter boy should ever be allowed to have fire-arms, and the age of a boy when permitted to learn to shoot depends entirely upon his character and disposition. Somewhat of a sermon, you will perhaps say, young gentlemen; but this gun business and learning to shoot, especially in company with other boys, is a very serious matter, and may end, if you are careless, in having your own or some friend's nose blown off, like old Flumerfelt's, and you will be lucky if you are not minus your arms or your heads, any of which events would be peculiarly annoying to your relatives and friends."

The leaving of the beach stages put a sudden stop to the story, and Bill and Carson talked of nothing else on the way home but of the time when they could coax their mamma into letting them go shooting as their papa and Mr. Fred Theron had done years ago.

Several days after this, Mrs. Exham, who was a very pretty little woman, with soft blue eyes and light brown wavy hair, drew her chair close to where Mr. Theron was smoking on the piazza, and exclaimed:

"Gracious, Fred! what on earth have you been filling my boys' heads with guns and birds for? They have given me no rest for three days, wanting me to get them each a gun and ask you to teach them how to shoot. They are always dear, affectionate little fellows, but they have been so unusually attentive of late I knew something was in the wind."

"Well?" replied Mr. Theron, refilling his pipe.

"Well, indeed, you know very well that my boys are too young to own guns. Why, Bill is only fourteen, and Carson is a year younger."

"Not a bit too young, Fanny, for the boys to begin to shoot. They are chips of the old block, and the love of shooting is born in them. Much better to let them have a couple of good guns and let me teach them how to use them, now you have an opportunity, than have them, boy-like, go poking off with other boys and their cheap guns, which are continually out of order, or with some careless bay-man and his old muzzle-loader. There is far more danger in this than in placing the responsibility with such steady boys as yours are at the start."

"I do not know but you are right, Fred," said Mrs. Exham, quietly, who had great confidence in the opinions of her husband's old friend. So in this way it was settled that the boys should have the guns, and Mr. Theron kindly promised to go to New York the next day and consult with an old friend of his who was considered an oracle on gun-making.

IN THE WOODS.

BY ELLA RODMAN CHURCH.

WHEN Fred Benson and Katie Dunlap first went to Buttermilk Springs neither of them expected to have anything like a good time, and when they first saw each other neither of them supposed that they would ever be friends.

Yet here they were, on a hot August day, off alone on the edge of the woods, quite lost, and wondering what each would have done without the other.

Fred arrived at the Springs first, with his father and mother, and Katie came a week later, with her aunt and uncle. Buttermilk Springs was a long way off from New York, where Fred lived, and a still longer way from Richmond, where Katie belonged; and as it was a new place for people to go to, there were not very many there that summer. It was wild, too, and rather lonely. The only children, except some babies, were the girl and boy of twelve and thirteen; and when Fred saw Katie getting out of the lumbering old stage that brought passengers from the station ten miles away, he groaned that she was not a boy, and pronounced her in his own mind a fashionable, stuck-up little fine lady.

Miss Dunlap was rather elaborately dressed for traveling, as she was accustomed to be on all occasions, and such a thing as "a print frock," which her aunt was soon advised to let her run about in, was not to be found in her wardrobe. She had an endless amount, however, of beautifully fine white dresses, very simply made, which she always wore during the heat of the day at home, and she had not been long at the Springs before she refused to wear anything else until evening. A shoemaker in the neighborhood had made her a pair of stout boots, in which her little feet seemed almost lost, but they did good service in tramping over the rough roads; and with her golden hair combed to the top of her head, and hanging down behind in a thick looped braid, Katie was, in spite of her queer costume, a fair, dainty-looking little girl, whom most people called pretty.

She was very much indulged by her kind-hearted aunt and uncle, as well as by the old colored "mammy" who had nursed her mother when she was a baby, and she had some rather curious notions in that graceful little head of hers. Fred soon found that she was not "stuck up," although his father and mother declared that she was a perfect little lady; but "stuck up" meant something different from this. She played croquet and lawn-tennis nicely and honorably, never losing her temper, and she was not at all a bad hand at a game of checkers or backgammon on a rainy day.

Katie could tell stories, too, by the hour, out of wonderful books she had read; and she believed so many of these strange things herself that she almost persuaded Fred to believe them too. She would often sit with such a dreamy, far-away look on her face that the boy, who soon began to think it the sweetest little face in the world, sometimes wondered if she were not one of the dryads or nymphs or water-spirits that she was so fond of talking about. It seemed as if she might dissolve into air and float away.

But "mammy's" opinion was somewhat different from this.

"Reckon yo' gwine to stay with us yet awhile, Mis' Katie, chile," she would say. "Don't see no wings a-sproutin' when yo' sets yo' shoulders like that!"

She was a bit obstinate, this sweet-faced little Katie, and soft as "her way" was, she always seemed to have it.

Captain Shucks, the landlord of the hotel, was a fat, good-natured man, who seemed to spend most of his time on the broad piazza with his hat tilted over his eyes; but he was awake long enough to tell his young guests wonderful stories of the bears and wolves and rattlesnakes that had been found "off on the mounting" when he first settled at Buttermilk Springs.

"And are there any there now?" Katie would ask, in a startled tone, as she listened eagerly to these exciting adventures.

Fred hoped that there were; but his timid companion always felt relieved when the Captain assured her that the hunters had driven them all away long ago, except, perhaps, a stray one now and then. He advised them, however, to "keep clear of the mounting."

"Though 'tain't no ways likely," he added, with a laugh, "that you'll run across it, seein' it's a good six miles off."

Fred had already invited his father and Katie's uncle to accompany him on a hunting excursion there, but the gentlemen laughingly declined.

The woods near the house were considered perfectly safe, and on this warm August afternoon little Miss Dunlap said to her obedient companion, "Let's go ever so far in—further than we ever went before. It looks so good and cool off there."

"It does look good," replied Fred; and away they went, without hats or any preparation for a long stay.

There was a wide path for some distance, with grand chestnut trees, now loaded with small green balls, on each side. Then they took a little foot-path that looked attractive, for a laughing, bubbling brook was running along beside it; but it twisted and turned, leading them on and on, till at last they came to a rough fence, beyond which there was a small open space, and then more trees and woods.

"I'm tired to death," said Katie, as she mounted to the top rail of the fence with Fred's help, and leaned, exhausted, against the trunk of a large white birch tree. "I can't walk a step more, and—and I believe we're lost!"

She didn't cry, although she felt like it, for she saw the trouble in Fred's face, and she knew that he would do his very best. Besides, it was her own fault that they had come. Nothing seemed familiar to them, and they could not see a house of any kind in the distance, as

"I CAN'T WALK A STEP MORE. I BELIEVE WE'RE LOST!"

Katie sat there, looking off into space, while Fred, leaning on the fence, gazed earnestly in the same direction, trying to think of some way out of their difficulty.

Presently he said, "If we could only get over there to those other woods, and walk around the edge of them a little way, perhaps we should see a house or find our way home."

As soon as Katie felt able to move again they tried it. They did not find any house, but they found plenty of wild blackberries, and, tired and warm as they were, they gladly feasted on the refreshing fruit. The bushes were thicker just within the woods, and the berries more luscious, and the wanderers were drawn from one point to another into the midst of rocks and berries and young trees, until Fred suddenly exclaimed, quite joyfully, "Why, Katie, there must be some people some where near us, for lots of berries have been picked here only a little while ago. How they've broken the branches, though, and trampled them down!"

Just then the little girl heard a sort of sniff behind her, and she turned to see a large dark animal on its hind legs, apparently making a bow. She stood quite still with fright, and her face was perfectly colorless, while Fred thought at first that she had seen a rattlesnake in the bushes.

But there was more sniffing, and the clanking of a chain, while a half-grown bear put out a paw in a sociable way, as if to shake hands. He was certainly very polite, but poor little Katie was nearly frightened to death, and Fred stood for a moment dazed by the new turn of affairs.

He was a brave boy, however, with a very clear head of his own, and he now reasoned that wild bears do not wear chains around their necks, neither do they bow nor shake hands. This one had, therefore, escaped from some private owner who had taken pains with his education, or possibly from a travelling menagerie; so boldly approaching him, Fred took hold of the chain and led the obedient animal to a strong young tree, where he securely fastened him. The chain was a good long one, and Bruin immediately clambered up the tree, and seated himself in a crotch that was about ten feet from the ground.

Here he looked so funny, as he gazed down at them with his queer little eyes, that Katie, who had felt at first like fainting, began to laugh.

"I suppose he doesn't look much like a hamadryad, if that is the young lady that lives in trees," said Fred, regarding his new possession with a puzzled air: "but you're a plucky girl, Katie."

"And you're a brave boy," was the reply. "But I wonder what will happen next?"

Next, fortunately, they heard the sound of voices, and it was quite time, for the day was near its close. The voices belonged to a party of men who were searching the woods for that very bear, as he was one of the most amusing members of a menagerie just arrived at the nearest town.

The men were very grateful for being saved a longer search, and they gladly took the young lady and gentleman in their wagon to Captain Shueck's, where an excited group of relatives were nearly frantic over their disappearance. Fred's father, however, was rather proud of his boy when he heard the story, while the Captain laughed until he was tired, and said it was the queerest bear-hunt he ever heard of.

"And you went right to the foot of the mounting," said he: "why, you must have walked six miles or more."

Katie's feet showed this by their blistered condition, and she did no more walking for several days, while "mammy," whenever the shoulders seemed to be getting "set," had only to say, "You 'member, chile, that day when you done run away to the woods?"

Allegretto.

Lit-tle Bo-peep has lost her sheep, And can't tell where to find them; Leave them a-lone, and they'll come home, And bring their tails be-hind them. Lit-tle Bo-peep fell fast a-sleep, And dreamt she heard them beat-ing; When she a-woke, she found it a joke, For still they all were fleet-ing, Then up she took her lit-tle crook De-termined for to find them; She found them indeed, But it ma-le her heart bleed, For they'd li-ft their tails be-hind them.

OUR POST-OFFICE BOX.

ROCKAWAY, N. Y.

DEAR POSTMISTRESS.—Perhaps some of the distant readers of our YOUNG PEOPLE would like to hear of Albany's Bicentennial from a brother and sister who helped to swell the crowd visiting that city during the celebrations. On Sunday, July 15 memorial and historical sermons were preached in the churches. Monday the festivities began, ending Thursday, July 22. We reached our capital city on Wednesday morning. It was beautifully decorated, and presented a very gay and festive appearance as we rode into the depot on cars so packed with eager people that one could scarcely breathe. We passed under two evergreen arches, which were erected on the spots where formerly stood the North and South gates of the city. On the northern one was the inscription, in old English, "Ye North gate of ye city; Ye grate route to ye Canadas;" and on the southern one this, "Ye South gate of ye city; Ye grate route to ye pasture." Historical tablets were scattered over the city, and a loan exhibition of old curiosities attracted many visitors. About 10 o'clock we witnessed a grand parade of civic organizations—firemen, secret societies, Sons of Veterans, and consisting to beguiling and impressive. In the afternoon there were races on the river, and later, a parade of steam-boats. At Washington Park we listened to a lovely concert by a celebrated band. In the evening we saw a play represented by an Italian singing troupe on a highly decorated platform, with the coat of arms of Albany between them. The next was "The Spirit of Discovery," three young ladies strolling in a lovely shell-dress, with dolmans covered with glittering scales; the dainty boat was surrounded by blue and silver waves. Following this came "The Northmen," an ancient race of Phoenician type, manned by sturdy old Northmen pulling vigorously at their oars in the blue canvas sea. Then came "Landing of Columbus," a boat moored on the rapids, where Columbus and his men, planting the Spanish flag; in the background many gilt and silver palms, from behind which Indians peer. After this, Columbus and his men, in the background, men trading with the Indians before it. A pretty one was "The Legend of the Catskills"; a disturbing cave in the background; Rip Van Winkle and the other little mountain folk in picturesque costumes playing nine-pins, and as in Irving's familiar tale, the rolling of the ball revealing a milking machine, which was scolded back from the sky by a cavern. Another boat, called "The Duke of York's Charter," represented the granting of James's Duke of York's charter for the Province of New York in England. The next was "The Albany Charter"; interior of a log cabin, the charter on a table, and two men contemplating it. A Home-scene in old Albany represented an old Dutch couple seated on the porch, lovers a little distance away, and friendly Indians talking with some Dutchmen. The eleventh boat was "The Shrine of Schenectady"; a log cabin in the background, from which flames (Greek fire) issue; several Indians binding their half-dressed victims. This scene particularly interested us, as we live near Schenectady, and our father is acquainted with a lady who lives now in the only house which was saved during that terrible massacre. The marks left by a tomahawk are still to be seen on the wall. "A Heroine of Revolutionary Days" represented Margaret Schuyler in the act of saving her baby sister from the hostile Indians. The next boat, representing the burning of the General Schuyler's mansion; a lovely feature of this scene was a glittering fountain of silver tinsel. "Resurrender of Burgoyne" was represented by the act of surrendering his sword to Gates; in the background stood a horse so true to life that many thought it real. As this boat passed slowly down the street, I saw a street for the air, as the patriotic people thought of the splendid victory and the importance of the event in their country's history. Up to the last was "The Completion of the Erie Canal," a canal-boat, the Sueca Chief, just coming through the lock. The last was an emblem called "Past, Present, Future," and cannot be described in detail. One boat I do not remember distinctly enough to describe. At midnight (Wednesday) the bells were rung, cannons were fired, and numerous rockets were set off, but far above the city. This was the "ringing in" of the Bicentennial day, the two-hundredth anniversary of Albany's incorporation. At the same time a curious ceremony was being performed in one of the parks. The Knights of Mosaic is a secret society, burning blue-lights, dressed as ghosts, and with their hair all up, and wearing the old century; a speech was made, and then the weird company dispersed. The next morning (Thursday) there was a grand military procession of nearly two hundred companies, which escorted President Cleveland, Governor Hill, Mayor Thayer, William McKinley (poet), and other distinguished guests to the Hotel, where in the evening reception was given them.

ST. MARY'S HOSPITAL,
407 WEST 10TH STREET,
NEW YORK CITY.

Distance does not appear to make any difference in the interest you all take in us. I look for the little children at the Hospital. Before me I have a letter from two girls (Edna and Amy West), which came all the way from Colorado, and another from a boy (John) who lives in Chicago, which fund they heard through HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE. These girls live in the country, and have plenty of fresh air, and can scarcely realize how happy they are to be in the city, and in the big city-bull city. At this writing we have at St. Mary's by the Sea, Rockaway Beach, about forty of these children, and of whom I have not heard of yet. I have had only children who need fresh air, but who require medical treatment besides. They have been at the shore since July 1st, and I think the benefit which they have had has been to them. Their little faces have turned from a milky white hue to a pretty, healthy brown, with just a shadow of red in the cheeks. They never seem to tire of the sea and white sand, and each child at starting has her own white sand shovel; but before many days pass the shovel breaks, and has to be replaced with a tin shovelful, and I am not quite certain whether the shovelful does give more pleasure than the shovel. It is interesting to watch the different ones, and see the variety of fies and things which can be made from the pretty sand.

This year they are also taking great pleasure in a dog and cat which have become part of the family at the beach. Some of the children at first shrink back from the dog Frolic, but it does not take long to inspire them with confidence, and they are now so fond of him that they have become accustomed to her rubbing herself against them, and bringing them the ball which she so swiftly runs after and fetches. The dog is very demure, and while all will take to her for her gentleness, yet she does not give them the good nature that Frolic does by her occasional clumsiness.

The number of children that we can accommodate is, of course, small compared to those who are at private boarding places, and for this reason we have to confine our work to the really sick Hospital children. Should we ever have a large number, it will give us much pleasure to do so.

You will be interested to hear something of the little occupant of Harper's Young People's Cot. It is a little girl, a German and English in a delightful way. All the answer necessary to her is written in Yiddish, and she will talk to you for quite a long time with his two or three words of English and many more of German, while at times his big brown eyes seem almost to speak for themselves. It is much to be noted in what he is talking to you about. His name is Oscar Berg, and he is fond of many playthings, being an inquiring nature, and he will give you words in German in telling them apart—I suppose to find out how to put them together again.

I want to tell you about the many beautiful flowers which we have had at the Hospital during the spring and summer from readers of HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE: flowers of all kinds, some highly cultivated, and of most delicate perfume and colors, which tell at once of the care that has been given to their cultivation, and also the pleasure which they have given to the "carers" of them; roses—roses of all kinds—and what more beautiful than a rose? Then come the lovely wild flowers—God's own work—and can we imagine anything more delicate and chaste than these? They speak to us of the beautiful cow-woods and the green grass, which are so resting and refreshing both to eyes and mind. How can the little children be anything but grateful to receive them, and give you so thoughtful for them, and give them glimpses, by these pretty flowers, into the beautiful things of this world, of which these little sufferers in their own homes—if we cannot do better, we have not the slightest idea? But before I stop talking about the flowers, I must tell you of one little girl who has been at the Hospital, and who, in weeding, and seeing so many beautiful flowers, asked if he might not take some of them to the little sick children. Consent was gladly given, and she brought the flowers, and sent to the Hospital, and gave much pleasure to the little ones by his gift and thoughtfulness. I could tell you much more that would interest you, both about the flowers, and about the little ones, but I must not make my letter too lengthy for fear of tiring some of the little folks.

We hear good accounts of the little ones at Rockaway, and hope by the latter part of September to have them back at the Hospital, looking and feeling well and strong; but then, when they get well, how they are obliged to go back to their own homes, and in nearly all cases, I think, it is with a feeling of regret that we are compelled to part with them.

This letter, written by a lady who withdraws her name, was written to me by a sister, Catherine, and the children will, I am sure, be very glad to read it, and to hear of the dear little boy in Harper's Young People's Cot.

Some time ago I saw a letter in the Post-office Box from a kitty-cat, and was very much pleased with it, though, as a rule, I do not like cats. My mistress has suggested that perhaps you would like to get one from me.

My name is Solomon Grundie, and I've heard my mistress say I'm as handsome a puppy as any other she ever had. I'm contented, too. I don't know just what that means; no doubt it's a compliment.

My brother Cole and I have a very good time in the country. We chase rabbits and hunt for bears—although we've never found any yet—and tress the cats, and accompany our master and mistress all the time.

There are three cats living here; their names are Dido, Maria, and Guly. Dido is a city kitten, and wears blue ribbons. Mistress says she is pretty and aristocratic. Guly is a country kitten, and she is dreadfully stuck up, for every time I come where she is, she humps up her back and says, "S-k-i-t-z! s-k-i-t-z!" get away, you horrid cat!

HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE is very nice, I think. I have often seen pictures of dogs in it, which I admired very much. Some of the prettiest I looked at a good deal like me. SOLOMON GRUNDIE.

P. S.—My mistress subscribes to your paper.

CONROCK LAKE, CAMBRIA COUNTY, PENNSYLVANIA.

DEAR POSTMISTRESS.—We are two cousins, spending the summer in the mountains by Lake Conroch. This lake is owned by the South Fork Fishing and Hunting Club of Pittsburgh. The lake is artificial, but is said to be more beautiful than Lake Geneva or any of the Scottish lakes, and is surrounded by mountains of half wild, and has a dam eighty feet high. There are three large sail-boats, many small ones, and more fine boats than on any other lake in the middle West. On the banks of the lake are many cottages. The only drawback in living here is, we get HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE a day later than we are in Allegheny, which is our winter home. Although well acquainted with you for many years, we have never written you a letter, so we hope to see this one in print.

MARGERY AND ALLY.

ROSE HILL COTTAGE, BROWN.
My brother and I take in HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE, and enjoy looking at it very much, and like reading "The Lost City," "Roif House," and the Post-office Box. Please print my letter, because I should like to see it in HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE. Good-by.
LILLIAN N.

OSWEGO, MARION COUNTY, NEW YORK.
I live in the country, one and a half miles from Oswego, in a beautiful village, and on a hillside from our veranda, and we have a small telescope with which we can see for miles. Most of the children tell of their pets. Mine is a cat named "Cap," and she is a very nice cat, and who is nearly seven months old, and whom we all think is the nicest baby that ever was. Do you like her name? I do not go to school now, nor have I been since a year ago. I have been sick with pleura-pneumonia, and am not well enough to go. I have taken music lessons, but do not take them now. I have music dearly, and I enjoy reading nearly as well as anything. I have read a great many books. I am now reading the History of England, in which I am greatly interested.

ALLIE M. C.
 CORVU, N. C.
 I am thirteen years of age. I have two brothers and one sister. I have been corresponding with Miriam H. and find her very interesting. I received a letter from her to-day, also a photograph of herself. I have taken HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE year after year, and have a good many pets. My brother Allen, aged fourteen, had two doves and a tame rabbit. My younger brother, George, aged eight, has a pet dog named Cyp, that follows him all over; you hardly ever see it without the other.

HELEN V.
 FALLING WATERS, GEORGIA.
 I live in Atlanta, Georgia, but my mother comes more and spends some time when the weather is hot. I like it too. There are many rivers in the river. I am taking HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE, and like it, and say my lessons better since I have it for it. I like to read and hope I can always have it. I like "St. Christopher," "Uncle Jacob," and about the "Ogre" best. I had my seventh years old till November. I am a tiny dog given me, but a wiggler when we ever it and killed him.

WILLIAM LOWRY P.
 ADDRESS: DALE, NEAR SHEFFIELD, ENGLAND.

MY DEAR POSTMISTRESS,—I want to thank all my dear American cousins who so kindly wrote to me. I asked them to send me some pretty letters, and of course I cannot possibly respond with over thirty girls; but I think them all very, very much indeed, and I will try and answer as many as I can. I have been out on my own age. Your paper is the most delightful one I ever read; you do not know how pleased I am it was published in England. I told you in my last letter that I lived in a pretty village in North Derbyshire. Castletown is not far from here, where the Peavils lived; I suppose you had read Peavils of the Park, by Mrs. Hemans. My mother and father drove there one day, but I have never been. The front of our house faces the Derbyshire hills, and we often go for long walks on to the moors. We are having our summer holidays now, and our governess will not come back for six weeks. As I have corresponded with America, should you please send if some girl in Europe would write to me who is about sixteen, as that is my age.

I hope my letter will be printed, as I want all the girls who write to me to see it. I send my love to them all; and I must thank Daisy W. For the pretty flower she sent me, and also Louie M. For the letters she writes to them as soon as she can. I must say good-by, dear Postmistress. From one of your loving readers of the Post-office Box.

JESSIE B.
 TOWNVILLE, CRAWFORD COUNTY, PENNSYLVANIA.

I wish to tell Bertie Roller, through the Post-office Box, that I was very ill at the time his letter arrived—I would like to write letters or understand them when read to me. His letters were very interesting, and I enjoyed receiving them very much. I do not know his address, or if I would write to him. Lovingly, HARRY FAY.

VICARAGE, ST. MARGARET'S, IRELAND.

I am a little girl ten years old, and live at Iklee. I do not take HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE, but my cousin does, and she lives with us. I have not been very well lately, and could not go to school, and did not know what to do; but I so enjoyed reading HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE, that I have a little sister named Olive (she is seven years old) and a brother, Eric (fifteen). I have a dog, and my sister has a cat, Topsy. My father is a beautiful fisherman. I wish you could see them—don't you? This is the first letter I have written, and I hope that it will be printed. I sometimes make up poetry. I wish you would like some of it.

WYNIFREDE P.
 I would like to see your poetry, dear.

CATHERED HOSE, CYPRESS BRIDGE, KEV. ENGLAND.

I write to tell you that we have left Hammer-smith, and have come to live here. It is a very nice place, with a large house standing in beautiful grounds, large trees, and a park full of beds of flowers of different kinds, and nice lawns. In the kitchen-garden, which is surrounded by a high wall, there are three large hot-houses, with splendid plants growing in them. There are vines of grapes, which will soon be ripe. In the garden there are various kinds of vegetables, such as cabbages, radishes, cauliflowers, asparagus, strawberries, currants, and various fruit trees. We have also a large field and playground in a wood, in which we are allowed to climb if we do not rock the nests. We are also to have a pond for gold and silver fish in the field, and which will take some water-lilies growing in it. We are to have a few sheep in the field soon, to eat the grass. My companion and I are glad it where it is needed, for which we will get an allowance of fourpence for every book at the end of the week, which gives us each about one shilling besides our usual allowance every Saturday. I forgot to mention that we have a pony-yard and beach near the stable-yard and coach-house. CHARLIE H. H.

REFFALO, N. Y.

I began taking HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE in 1882, and have three volumes bound. I am very much interested in it, and am going to begin taking cooking lessons next Friday with my friend Isa H. We have already started a school, and I shall go to the Buffalo Female Academy, and expect to sit together when we begin school again. I should like very much to have a correspondence with a California girl who signed her name "Maud W." BESSIE LIVINGSTON.

GRANDMOTHER'S LETTER

BY VELLIE V. BENSON.

My grandmother gave me a party every Saturday. It was a fashionable blue-room; each guest wore a blue champagne dress. And carried a dust-pan and broom.

She taught us to march just like soldiers; we had to stand up very straight, and present arms! the moment she said so (our bullets were cakes, which we ate).

We cooked our own supper together; it was candy with nut-meg stirred in. And cookies cut out with a thimble. All picked round the top with a pin.

Then sweet Katie Gray cracked the chestnuts. (There were lots of the meats piled up high); we each had an apple turnover (I like them much better than pie).

Oh, the games we all played! I can't mention! There were more than a dozen, I guess; and none of us had any mishap. "Except Nellie Brown tore her dress.

My grandma can tell such nice stories (They're nicer than any you read). How one day she was lost in the coal-pit. And they found her by seeing her little.

She was naughtily once, when she was little, she cut off her hair just for spite. And then there was company at dinner: 'Oh, didn't she look like a fright!

She used to lie down by the fireplace, and once her dress got all on fire; and she sat in the great coffee chair, she sank to her knees in the mire.

Yes, we had a nice time at the party—at least I know I had, for one. The others said nothing about it. 'T'posse they went home when 'twas done.

Yes, I'm young—well, you see, I was sleepy, I shut my eyes 'cause they were tired, when I woke there was nobody there.

Jack thought he would tease me next morning, but grandma just said, "Never mind." She's a darling to give me that party. And she always so pleasant and kind.

LOVELAND, COLORADO.

WASHINGTON, D. C.
 My brother has a canary, but I have no pets since Maria and Louie came. I am very busy in bathing. A boy down here killed an alligator ten feet long. I have a mocking-bird and some pet chicks. There is a fish in my tank called the tarpon; it is very large, and is sometimes called the silver fish; the scales are used to make fishscale flowers, and the fish is caught by spearing.

GRACE L. C.
 CLEARWATER HARBOR, FLORIDA.

My home used to be in Oglethorpe, Florida, but my papa moved to Florida. I have a little sister seven years old; we have gay times fishing and playing on the beach; we go over to the island and gather shells; we lie sun-bathing in bathing. A boy down here killed an alligator ten feet long. I have a mocking-bird and some pet chicks. There is a fish in my tank called the tarpon; it is very large, and is sometimes called the silver fish; the scales are used to make fishscale flowers, and the fish is caught by spearing.

BUFFALO, N. Y.

DEAR POSTMISTRESS,—I have taken HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE for three years, but this last year I bought it weekly in my subscription. I like "Nan" and "Rolf House" ever so much. I think "False Witness" is splendid, too. I should like to correspond with a girl who signed herself "Cad." I hope this letter will be published, as it is the first I have written to you.

Care of C. E. Wallbridge, Buffalo, New York.

LEWIS, TENNESSEE.

I am a little girl twelve years of age. My papa takes HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE for us. I like it very much, the continued stories especially, and like "Rolf House" and "Jo's Opportunity" best of all. I live in the mountains, and have five brothers and four sisters; two squirrels, one a squirrel-hawk, and a little black cat named George. It is great fun to see the squirrels turn their wheel. I go to school and study geography, reading, arithmetic, grammar, and spelling. I can play the piano by note. I hope to see my letter in print, as I wrote once before, and it was not published.

HELEN H.

SHILOAN, CANTON, MOUNTAIN, N. Y.

We are cousins, aged twelve and thirteen. We have taken this lovely paper ever since it has been published, and haven't written a letter yet. We are spending our vacation in the Catskills, and we hope this letter will be published, for our friends at home don't know anything about it. We see that most of the girls and boys write about their pets. We have a pony named Harry, a canary named Charlie, and a kitten. We liked "Silent Pete" very much, and think "False Witness" will be nice. SADDIE AND EMMA.

WEST HAMPTON, N. Y.

I am a boy fourteen years old. I had taken HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE before; I have begun to take it again. I like the stories "False Witness" and "A Nautical Expedition." Besides HARPER'S, I take the Youth's Companion. I like both. The school here closed several weeks ago. I study grammar, geography, writing, and arithmetic. We live about three miles from the beach, and there is a vessel cracked down there. My father is a minister. I have a cat and many young chickens. We have quite a number of fowls. I must close now. If Halle W. L., whose letter lately appeared in the Post-office Box, will send her full address to the President of G. A. C., No. 33 Clark Street, New Haven, Connecticut, she will receive two very pretty holders, and perhaps some useful hints to help the mission band in their work of charity.

DITTY-BAG STORIES.

BY HOPE HOWARD.

EVERY petty officer and sailor in the American navy owns a ditty-bag. In it he keeps his needles and thread, his tapes and buttons, for repairs, and, above all, his treasures; his precious home letters also, and the pretty trifles he has picked up for his loved ones as he roams the boundless sea.

The name of ditty-bag comes from Dittis cloth, a Manchester stuff of which it was originally made. Until within two years each sailor provided his own ditty-bag. Since that time the navy serves to all forward what they call a ditty-box, which is divided into compartments to hold the haberdashery, and having a little mirror in the inner part of the lid.

The first time I ever heard of a ditty-bag was in connection with the antics of a mischievous monkey on board a man-of-war. A sailor lad was one afternoon sewing some buttons on his jacket, his ditty-bag lying beside him, crowded with its many treasures. The monkey seized it and ran, the lad giving instant chase. After dodging him at every turn, the monkey sprang out upon the bowsprit, and running to the extreme end, began beating the bag upon it, to the destruction of everything breakable within. Then fixing his eye upon the sailor with an expression of grinning defiance, he took the bag by the two corners at the bottom, after well loosening the string, and deliberately shook all the contents into the sea.

That is my first ditty-bag story. Here is another:

THE LIEUTENANT-COM-
MANDER'S STORY.

I was stationed on one of the school-ships of our navy, which had been on its summer cruise to the tropics. Among the many pets which had been collected by the ship's company was a monkey so intelligent and brimful of pranks that he supplied amusement for every day and hour. He was especially fond of the surgeon, and followed him on his rounds at the hospital, and was frequently with him in his office.

One day an officer, in a friendly bout with a brother officer, rolled up a newspaper he was reading, and threw it at him. He missed aim, and the ball of paper hit a drum, which sent forth a "boom!" very loud and startling. The monkey was standing near the drum, but not in contact with it. The ball of paper had not come near him, but he was very much frightened at the boom, and thought he had been hit.

He began, in an agitated, trembling manner, to examine himself—felt of his arms and legs, muttered, and blinked his eyes, took up his tail and scanned it, passed his hands about his shoulders, across his neck, over his head; then he passed each toe under inspection, and again beginning at his arm, finally settled on his left elbow as the seat of the injury.

As soon as he convinced himself, by sundry jabberings and arguments with himself, that he had located the mischief done him, he took the elbow in his right hand, and hurrying up to the doctor, he began chattering in mournful tones, rocking himself to and fro, tending his elbow as if it were a greatly afflicted member, and telling the doctor a long and earnest tale about his misfortune. The doctor leaned over and felt of the elbow, patting it, and expressing great pity. But this would not satisfy Joeko. He went toward the doctor's office, looking back, and chattering for him to follow. Finally the doctor followed, and having rubbed the elbow with some preparation, Joeko became very comfortable, and jabbered his thanks as plainly as if it had been in the Queen's English.

A TALK ABOUT GUNS AND SHOOTING.

BY FRANKLIN SATTERTHWAITE

Part II.

IN a dingy little shop the following morning Mr. Theron sat perched upon a pile of box gun-cases, listening to the aproned old gunsmith laying down the law.

"It's just as important that a boy should have a safe gun as a man," said he; "it must be well made to be safe and to execute well. The market now is flooded with cheap clap-trap guns which are dangerous to use, and from their low price have fallen into the hands of exactly the class that is most unfit to be trusted with fire-arms. The cheap breech-loaders made for boys are carelessly put together, rough, heavy affairs, and unsafe for boys to carry and awkward for them to use. Though some boys learn to shoot well with them, yet a boy should be given a practical gun—one that will kill when properly held, and with nothing of the toy character about it.

"It should be a single-barrel breech-loader—length of barrel about twenty-eight inches, weight from five and a half to six pounds—and be of No. 12 gauge. It is far more easy to get shells to fit this size bore anywhere in this country than any other. They can be loaded with two and a half to two and three-quarter drams of black powder and an ounce of shot. Providing the powder is good, this charge will be sufficient to kill any bird a boy is likely to come across. The gun should have a double grip action, which can be tightened as occasion requires, and the locks should be those that can half-cock. The spring snap action for opening and shutting a gun is liable to get out of order, as also are rebounding locks; yet if the spring action is preferred, the gun should close with a leathery sound, for the sharp snapping of any spring-action closing device is but the announcement of a heavy friction, and consequent wear and tear.

"Unless, too, the locks on the rebounding principle are of the best workmanship, they are unsafe. It is much better that a boy's gun should be made with as few springs as possible, as there is less likelihood of its getting out of order. Let him have a gun with locks on the old-fashioned half-cock principle, and teach him to carry his gun, when loaded, at half-cock, which is the only safe way. The gun should balance well, and be free from ornamentation. The stocks in all boys' ready-made guns are much too long, which prevents the gun from being quickly brought to the shoulder. The length of stock from butt to the trigger, when the lock is at full cock, should depend entirely upon the length of the boy's arms for whom the gun is intended. It is an easy matter, as the boy grows larger, to lengthen the stock. Such a gun as I have described will, with average usage, last for a great many years, and will always be worth preserving as a family relic."

Mr. Theron, before leaving, gave the order for a couple of guns; and one day in the early part of September the expressman delivered at Mrs. Exham's cottage a large wooden box, which contained the guns in their leather cases, with a complete outfit of cleaning and loading implements, and a goodly store of cartridge shells and ammunition.

It was with great pleasure that Mr. Theron instructed Bill and Carson in the art of loading the first batch of cartridges, cautioning them at the start to always protect the cap by placing the brass end of the shell in the stand made for the purpose, when forcing down the wads upon the powder and shot, and also teaching them the required pressure necessary to properly ram the cartridges. When this was done, he illustrated to them the different ways of holding and carrying a gun.

"Remember one thing above all others, boys," he said; "never under any circumstances point a gun, whether it is loaded or not, in the direction of a living being; and when you are not cleaning your guns, never fool with the hammers or triggers. Thousands of guns have been accidentally discharged in this way, and thousands of good fellows shot, and thousands more have had most lucky escapes. When there is no game about, carry your guns on either shoulder, the hand being free of the trigger guard, with the butt well down, so that the barrel will point in the air above your head. Carrying a gun in a balanced position on your shoulder is a dangerous affair; it is not only liable to slip as the hand relaxes its grip, but the barrel points out behind parallel with the ground, and covers objects you cannot possibly see.

"When there are indications that birds are not far distant, as you are both right-handed, you can carry the gun in the hollow of your left arm, and your right hand grasping the stock back of the trigger guard. When you are approaching game, the gun can be carried in front of you, with the barrel pointed upward. Never trail a gun, as it is liable to catch in objects and swing wildly about.

"Remember, also, to always withdraw your cartridge before getting over or under a fence, into a wagon or boat. A loaded gun in either a wagon or boat is a very dangerous thing. If, however, you are shooting out of a wagon, the gun should be held (not rested) in front of you, with the barrel pointed upward. If shooting out of a boat or blind, the guns should always be pointed the same way, whether they are held in the hand or rested in front of you. You must not, on any occasion, both shoot at the same time out of a boat that is not stationary. In fact, boys, I advise you to let shooting out of a moving boat, when together, severely alone.

"Never stand your gun up against the trunk of a tree or the side of a building, lest it fall down and be discharged or broken. When taking a rest, place your gun in a position from which it cannot fall. Never pick your gun up by the barrel or drag it to you in this way. There are a dozen men shot every week by doing this. Always make it a practice to lift your gun by grasping the narrow part of the stock just back of the trigger guard. Learn from the beginning to follow these simple instructions, and you will not shoot yourself with a breech-loader, nor any of your companions. I warn you, however, never to go out shooting with a crowd, whether you be a boy or man. Two persons are enough to have loaded guns in one place. The third person is always shooting some one or getting shot."

That afternoon Mr. Theron took the boys out on the meadows, where there were a number of sand-pipers and other small bay-snipe. He taught them how to take aim at sitting objects, and, by aiming at the lower part of the body of a single bird on the ground, not to overshoot it. By holding the left hand well forward of the trigger guard he showed them how the gun could be steadied and held firmly against the shoulder. The boys were also quick to learn that the gun should be instantly discharged as soon as the object of aim was covered. For some time the boys were kept out of shot of each other, until they became accustomed to handling their guns and proved to Mr. Theron's satisfaction that his instructions were closely followed. Then they were allowed to go off shooting together, and soon learned to estimate the proper range to shoot—which can only be picked up by experience—and to become good sitting shots.

"How long do you think it will be before we learn to shoot flying?" asked Carson of Mr. Theron one afternoon. "We had several flocks of yellow-legs pass us to-day, and none of them would alight. It was dreadfully provoking."

"Yes, I whistled one flock right over my head," chimed in Bill.

"You missed them, eh?" asked Mr. Theron.

"No, we didn't, because we knew it was of no use to shoot," replied Carson.

"Well, young gentlemen," said Mr. Theron, "how do you expect to get the birds unless you shoot at them? You will never learn to kill birds on the wing until you bang away whenever you get a chance. While reading and writing can be taught by books and a school-master, shooting birds flying must for the most part be picked up by yourselves. Here, Carson, stand in front of me, and when I count three, put your gun up and as quickly as possible cover the martin-box on the top of the arbor."

Mr. Theron counted, and stooping down, sighted the box along the barrel as Carson brought the gun to his shoulder.

"Well done!" he exclaimed; "well done, my boy. If your gun had been loaded, and you had drawn the trigger as the butt pressed against your shoulder, you would have blown the Martin family to smithereens. Always keep both eyes open and look steadily at the flying bird you wish to shoot; at the same moment raise your gun, and the instant the butt touches your shoulder—shoot. Practice will make the eyes and hands act mechanically with one accord. I advise you to learn to shoot flying with both eyes open, because you can see more with two eyes than with one. I have sometimes seen gentlemen shut both eyes when they shot, but I never saw them hit anything. If the gun 'fits' the shooter, there will be little trouble in his covering a bird flying away from him if he does as I say. There is a knack to be acquired in pulling the trigger at exactly the right moment. Practice and some thought on the subject will teach this. Birds, however, that are crossing you cannot, unless very close to you, be killed at point-blank aim. Allowance must be made for the rapidity of their flight and the distance which they are from the gun. At first, boys, you will invariably shoot behind crossing birds. You will aim at the head bird in a flock, and see, to your great astonishment, the last bird drop out. There is no better way to learn the range of a bird flying past you and to shoot on the wing than by standing by the edge of a pond and shooting at every bird within range that crosses its surface. You will see every time where the shot strikes the water, and this will tell you whether you are shooting over or under, behind or in front of, every bird. When you don't kill, you will at once see where your aim was at fault, and when a similar shot presents itself, try and correct your mistake.

"A great many persons say, when they miss, 'Oh! that bird was too far off.' Now it is just as bad sportsmanship to shoot at a bird out of range as it is to miss one. As looking across water is deceptive to the unaccustomed eye, stick up a piece of brush in the pond twenty yards from the shore, and another ten yards further off, and shoot at all the birds that fly between or over the two bits of brush. Your guns will scatter the charge properly at this distance, and if you miss, you will know it is not the gun's or the bird's fault, but your own. You can practise putting up your gun on objects in your room as well as out-of-doors, and by doing so frequently you will soon find that your point-blank aim is becoming correct."

It was only a few days after this that Bill came running home from the beach early one morning, and, while still a long way off, waving a diminutive sand-snipe to his mamma, who was on the piazza. It was his first bird shot on the wing, and never was a boy more highly elated or a bird more thought of. After this, almost every day the boys brought home birds that they had shot flying, until at last the killing of snipe on the wing or the picking off a plump quail as the bevy rose from the stubble was no longer a novelty to Mr. Theron's young friends Bill and Carson.

THE FLAMINGO FEATHER.*

BY KIRK MUNROE,
AUTHOR OF "WAKULLA," ETC.

CHAPTER V.

THE ESCAPE OF HASSE AND RÉNÉ.

THIS speech from his uncle both pleased and troubled René. He was glad to learn that it was deemed advisable for some one from the fort to visit the land of the Alachuas, and troubled to find that if he went with Hasse, he must do so without permission from his uncle. Nevertheless he felt certain that he, being Hasse's friend, and also regarded by the Indians as the son of the great chief of the white men, could undertake the mission with a greater chance of safety and success than any one else. He would have urged this view of the case upon his uncle's attention, but feared that speaking of the subject a second time would only result in his being absolutely forbidden to leave the fort on any pretence. The lad felt himself to be truly a man, now that he was nearly seventeen years old, and like all manly, high-spirited boys of his age, he was most anxious to enter upon any adventure that promised novelty and excitement.

Réné's appearance at this time was very different from that of the boy who, less than a year before, had left the old chateau of his fathers with tear-stained cheeks. His long curls had fallen under the shears, and his closely cropped hair showed to advantage his well-formed head. He was tall for his age, his muscles had hardened with constant exercise, and his face, neck, and hands were tanned to a ruddy brown by the hot suns, beneath which he had spent so many months. His brown eyes held a merry twinkle, but at the same time there was an expression of pride and fixed purpose in his face that well became it.

At this time he wore a small plumed cap, a leathern jacket, knee-breeches, stockings of stout yarn, and short boots, the legs of which fitted closely to his ankles. Simon the armorer had made for him a light steel corselet that he wore over his leathern jacket whenever he went beyond the walls of the fort. Upon all such excursions he was armed with his well-tried cross bow (for which he carried a score of steel-tipped bolts) and a small but keen-edged dagger that hung at his belt.

After considering Hasse's proposal all the morning, René finally decided to accept it, and, without notifying any person in the fort of his intention, to accompany the young Indian to the land of the Alachuas.

In accordance with this plan, he gathered together a number of trinkets, such as he knew would be acceptable to the Indians, and during the afternoon he conveyed these to the forest beyond the fort, where he bound them into a compact package and carefully hid them.

Réné could not account, more than the others, for Hasse's disappearance, nor imagine how his escape had been effected; but he felt certain that the young Indian would be true to his word, and await his coming at the appointed place of meeting when the moon rose above the pine-tree tops.

As it would not rise until nearly ten o'clock that evening, and as his uncle retired early on account of his indisposition, René was able to bid him an affectionate good-night and receive his customary blessing without arousing any suspicion of his intended departure in the breast of the old soldier.

Leaving his own quarters about nine o'clock, with his cross-bow over his shoulder, René walked with an unconcerned air, but with a beating heart, directly to the main gate of the fort, at which he was challenged by the sentinel on duty there. René gave the countersign, and was recognized by the soldier, who, however, firmly refused to allow him to pass.

Thus turned back at the very outset of his adventure, René knew not what to do. Should he attempt to scale the walls, he might be shot while so doing, and at any rate there was the moat beyond, which he could not possibly cross without detection.

While he was thus overcome by the difficulties of his position, and as he had about concluded that he had undertaken an impossibility, he was startled by the deep tones of the great bell that hung in the archway of the gate striking the hour of ten o'clock. Directly afterward came the measured tramp of the guard and the clank of their weapons as they made their round for the purpose of relieving the sentinels on duty and replacing them with fresh men. René sat so near the gateway that he could overhear what was said when that post was relieved, and distinguishing the voice of his old friend Simon the armorer, he became convinced that he had been placed on duty at this most important point.

After relieving this post the guard resumed their march, and passed so close to where René sat in the shadow of the great gun that, had the night been a shade lighter, they must have seen him. As it was, he escaped detection, and once more breathed freely as their footsteps sounded fainter and fainter in the distance. After a while he heard them return along the opposite side of the fort, and finally halt in front of the guard-house, when silence again reigned throughout the entire enclosure.

As René still sat on the gun-carriage, thinking how he might turn to account the fact of his friend Simon being on duty at the main gateway, the sound of a groan came from that direction. As it was repeated, the lad sprang to his feet, and walked quietly but rapidly toward the place whence it came. When near the gateway he laid down his cross-bow, and advanced until brought to a halt by a sharp challenge in the gruff voice of old Simon.

Réne gave the countersign, and added, "It is I, René de Veaux, good Simon. Hearing thy groans, I came to learn thy cause. What distresses thee so grievously?"

"Ah! Master De Veaux," answered the old soldier, "I fear me greatly that the fever of the bones with which so many of our men are suffering has at length laid hold on me. I have been warned for some days of its approach, and only a few hours since obtained from good Master Le Moyne physic which, if taken at the outset, prevents much pain. I left it in the smithy near the forge, not deeming the attack so near, but the chill of the night air hath hastened it, and already am I suffering the torments of the rack. Tell me, lad, wilt thou fetch me the phial from the smithy, that I may test the virtue of its contents?"

"Not so, good Simon," answered René, whose thoughts had been busy while the old soldier told of his troubles. "I will gladly aid thee, but am convinced that it can better be done in another way. Go thou for the physic, for thou canst more readily place hands upon it than I, and at the same time apparel thyself in garments thicker and more suited to the chill of the night than those thou wearst. I will stand watch until thy return, and pledge thee my word that none shall pass."

All his soldier's training forbade Simon to accept this offer, and the struggle in his mind between duty on the one side and his sufferings on the other was long and pitiful.

Finally pain conquered, and with a gruff "Well, well, Master René, I must e'en take thy advice, and obtain speedy release from this pain, or else be found here dead ere the post be relieved. Keep thou open keen eyes and ears, and I pray that no harm may come of this my first neglect of duty in all the years that I have served the King."

As soon as Simon was out of hearing, René went and recovered his cross-bow. Then he carefully and noiselessly unloosed the fastenings of the gate, and swung it open a few inches. This accomplished, he shouldered Simon's heavy pike, and patiently paced, like a sentry, up and down beneath the dark archway, until he heard approaching footsteps.

He called softly, "Is that thou, Simon?"

"Ay, lad," came the answer.

Then laying down the pike, and seizing his own cross-bow, René slipped quickly through the gate, and with noiseless footsteps fled swiftly across the bridge that spanned the moat, and disappeared in the black shadows of the forest beyond.

Although the moon had risen, and was now well up in the eastern sky, so that the bridge was brightly illumined by it, René crossed unnoticed. The gate swung to noiselessly behind him, and Simon failed to detect that it had been opened; indeed, the old man spent some minutes looking for the lad in the archway before he became convinced that he was gone. Even then he considered that René was only endeavoring to tease him by thus slipping away, and muttering something about a boy being as full of mischief as a monkey, the soldier shouldered his pike, and once more resumed his measured paces up and down the archway.

At the edge of the forest René stopped, drew from his bosom a note that he had written before leaving his room, and thrust it into the end of a cleft branch that he stuck into the ground near the end of the bridge. It was addressed to his Excellency the Chevalier Laudonniere, Commandant of Fort Caroline, and its contents were as follows:

"MY DEARLY BELOVED UNCLE,—Doubtless I am doing very wrong in thus leaving the fort and undertaking an important mission without thy sanction. It would seem, however, that circumstances are peculiarly favorable to my success in this matter, and I feared lest thou wouldst forbid the undertaking out of a tender regard for my youth and inexperience. I go with the Indian lad Hasse, my friend, to the hand of the Alachnas on a quest for provisions for the fort. In case of my success I will return again at the end of a month or shortly thereafter. If I fail, and return no more, I still crave thy blessing, and to be remembered without abatement of the love thou hast ever extended to me. No person within the fort has aided me in this matter, nor has any one of thy garrison knowledge of my departure.

"I remain, dear uncle, with sincerest respect and deepest love, thy nephew RÉNÉ DE VEAUX."

Having thus taken measures to inform his uncle of his departure and the mission on which he had set forth, René tightened his belt, shouldered his cross-bow, and turned into the dark pine forest. He made his way swiftly down the river-bank toward the appointed place of meeting, where he hoped to find Hasse still waiting for him, though it was already past the hour that the latter had mentioned. On the way he stopped and recovered the package of trinkets that he had hidden in the forest that afternoon.

As he neared the little stream on the bank of which the Indian had promised to await his coming, he uttered the cry of Hup-pe the great owl, which was the signal Hasse had taught him. To his joy it was immediately answered from a short distance in advance. In another moment he stood beside his friend, who without a word led him to where a canoe was hidden beneath some overhanging branches. They stepped in, a few strong strokes of the paddles shot them clear of the creek, the bow of their craft was turned down-stream, and ere a word had been spoken between them, they were gliding swiftly down the glassy, moonlit surface of the great river toward its mouth.

NAPOLEON THE SECOND.

THE STORY OF A LITTLE KING.

BY ELEANOR BRADFORD.

ON the 20th of March, 1811, the people of Paris were gathering in crowds about the palace of the Tuileries, filling the air with loud hurrahs, and waving their caps with eager demonstrations of joy. Bells were clanging and clashing from all the tall steeples, flags were flying gayly, and one hundred and one guns announced to the world that a son was born to the great Napoleon, the conqueror of Europe.

All Paris was radiant with joy both on that day and later, when the little prince was taken to church for his christening in a robe of silver tissue trimmed with ermine, a duke for his train-bearer and an emperor and a queen for his sponsors. He was named Napoleon Francis Joseph Charles, and received the title of King of Rome.

Life seemed to be opening very brightly for the little boy, but the brightness was of very short duration.

When he was about a year old, his father set out on that disastrous Russian campaign which was the beginning of his downfall. It was at this time that the little prince's portrait was painted by Gérard, a celebrated French painter, and sent to the Emperor, reaching him on the eve of the battle of Borodino.

A year or two later, foreign armies were thundering at the gates of Paris, and the Empress fled with her little boy to Austria. The Emperor had abdicated and gone into exile, and the King of Rome was left without home or country or title or lands. Even his very name was taken from him, the name of Napoleon being suppressed by order of the Emperor of Austria, the boy's grandfather. Henceforth he was called Franz von Reichstadt, and the great name of Napoleon Bonaparte was as though it had never been.

Nevertheless the little boy had not forgotten his former greatness nor that of his father, and he kept a warm corner in his heart for him.

Once a plan was formed to carry him off to his father at Elba. It was settled that he should be conveyed out of the palace in a great basket of linen which was sent every week to the laundry. The little prince was very eager to go, and he had been safely smuggled into the basket, when, to his attendants' dismay, a little boy, the prince's playfellow, wanted a share in this fine new play, and began to scream out, "I want to go to ride in the basket too! I want to go to ride in the basket too!" Before he could be pacified, attention had been aroused and the enterprise failed.

Long afterward, when one of the princesses was conversing with General Tommariva, he mentioned three persons whom he considered the greatest captains of the age.

Little Franz listened with great attention. Suddenly he interrupted the general eagerly. "I know another one," he said, blushing deeply.

"Who, your Highness?" asked the general.

"My father," said the boy, running away as fast as he could go.

The general ran after him, caught him, and said, "Your Highness was right to speak so of your father, but you were wrong to run away."

But notwithstanding the loneliness of his position, he was not unhappy. His home was at Schönbrunn, a lovely country-house near Vienna, and he and his grandfathers were great friends. The Emperor felt a great tenderness for the little lonely boy, and whoever was excluded, his private room was always open to his little Franz.

He was an amiable boy, though reserved and undemonstrative and possessed of a strong will. Unlike his father, he had no liking for mathematics, and he cared not at all for either art or music. But the strangest thing of all was the absolute distaste which he manifested for fables and stories of all kinds. "It is not true," he would say when he heard one; "then what's the good of it?"

He could not bear the thought of being deceived, and was apparently unable to discriminate between falsehood and fiction.

He made one exception, however, in favor of Robinson Crusoe, perhaps because he was fond of acting it out. There was a little Tyrolean chalet in a lonely place among the trees near the palace, and there the little prince used to go with his tutor and play at being Robinson Crusoe. He made all his household utensils and his garden tools himself, and made them very well too, and he also dug out a cave like that of the veritable Robinson on his desert island. His favorite study was history, and his great passion was for a military life.

It is impossible to say into what sort of man the young prince might have developed had he lived. As it was, he had many good and solid qualities, but he apparently lacked the great force of character which made his father so eminent.

He was ardent, eager, and impetuous, but variable, and, according to his biographers, was a curious mixture of child and man.

His health had always been delicate, and he was hedged about with constant restrictions which prevented his pursuing his chosen career, and at the same time irritated him beyond measure. He was constantly struggling against his own weakness and defying his physicians, who bade him remember that he had a spirit of iron in a frame of crystal. This weakness made him often gloomy and depressed as he grew older. In a moment of hopelessness he exclaimed, "My birth and my death—that is my whole history."

As long as he lived the Bonapartists cherished the hope that he might one day be their sovereign. In 1830 a feeble attempt was made to proclaim Napoleon II. Emperor, but it failed utterly.

But all hopes of that nature were soon extinguished forever when the prince died at Schönbrunn in 1832, in the same room in which his father had once slept as conqueror of Austria.

WHAT I KNOW.

BY AMY ELIZABETH LEIGH.

I KNOW

Where the prettiest flowers grow:
Not the kind that a cool wind kills,
That live in pots on our window-sills,
But blossoms that bloom of their own free wills,
All golden and speckled, and shaped like bells,
And filled with sweetest smells.

And I know

Where the most musical breezes blow,
And where the blackberries ripen first,
And how the flying-squirrel's babies are nursed,
And when the nut burrs are ready to burst,
And where the birds come to bathe and drink
And chirp and chatter; and—somehow—I think

That I know

Where dozens of children ought to go
(I'd like to go with them to show them the way!),
And make up their minds that they'd go and stay
(For you can't learn everything in a day),
And I'm almost sure that perhaps by-and-by They'd know very nearly as much as I.

BITS OF ADVICE.

BY AUNT MARJORIE PRECEPT.

HATTIE'S HAT.

HATTIE came in with a bright color, and eyes which flashed. "Aunt Marjorie," she exclaimed, "is there anything wrong about my dress? I met Cousin Ed, and he said, 'Good-morning, dear. May I ask, when did you arrive from Tonga?' And when I said, 'Please explain, Cousin Ed; I do not understand,' he answered, 'Pardon me; I was looking at your head-dress, made-moisele.'"

On Hattie's hat, nestling daintily among the ribbons, was a tiny wren. On another of her hats, as I remembered, there was a gray wing, the wing of some sea-bird; and still another was adorned with golden plumes.

"My darling child," I said, "in the Tonga Islands travellers tell us that the ladies wear whole forestfuls of birds on their bonnets, and trim their gowns with feathers. In some of these and in the Malay islands the men wear garments composed of feathers, and have queer dances, in which they look very grotesque, for each has mounted on his own head the head of a murdered bird. It is, you see, a savage fashion, and if our girls thought about it, they would hardly like to wear dead song-birds on their pretty heads just as those fierce islanders do. The Audubon Society, of which your cousin is a member, is trying hard to protect the birds, and the Legislature has been invoked to prevent ladies from killing all the little warblers. In the past few seasons the darling things have been swept off by thousands, because fashion has ordered that they should be worn on our bonnets and hats. That tiny wren on your hat, dear, no doubt was torn away from her nest and her fledglings."

"I see," said Hattie, "that I have been a horrid thoughtless girl." And unpinning the bird from its place with energy: "I, for one, will never wear a dead bird again. It is a hateful fashion!"

Hattie has been as good as her word, and I have written this at her request.

THE CAPTIVE QUEEN.

BY LORD BRABOURNE

AUTHOR OF "PUSS-CAT MEW AND OTHER FAIRY STORIES," ETC.

CHAPTER II.

WITH the sound still ringing in his ears, the King awoke, and started up in bed with the intention of asking the old man what he meant. But there was no old man there. Everything was silent except the ticking of the clock on the mantel-piece; there was no light save that which the rays of the moon gave through the half-closed curtains of one of the windows; no trace remained of any mysterious visitor, and for half a moment the King believed that he must have been mistaken. But no—it was impossible: that figure was too real to have been only the fanciful creation of his brain; those rhymes, strange and ludicrous as they would have seemed at another time, referred to the present unhappy circumstances too plainly to be mistaken. The dream (if dream indeed it were) had evidently been sent for some purpose, and it would be folly and madness to neglect the information which it conveyed.

The King sprang from his bed, hastily drew aside the curtains of all the windows in his room, and gazed out into the night as if he expected that the moonlight would disclose some further part of the vision which had roused him from his slumbers. It was not so. He gazed in vain. Everything appeared to be the same as usual, and with a sigh of disappointment the monarch once more betook himself to his bed—but not to rest. Sleep had forsaken the royal pillow for the rest of that night; the King tossed to and fro in weary longing for the morning, as uncomfortable as a sick person disturbed by a mouse, or, worse still, one who is tormented by a crumb in his bed which worries him whenever he moves.

As, however, all things come to an end at last, so did that long and dreary night, and as soon as the dawn of daylight lit up his bedroom, and the shadows of night had faded away before the rising sun, the royal dreamer arose once more, determined to summon the wise men of his kingdom with the least possible delay, in order to obtain from them an explanation of his wonderful dream. He had not to wait for their advice, however, before some little help came to him from another quarter. On entering his dressing-room he perceived, to his great surprise, that instead of his usual morning dress, his hunting clothes had been put out for him, although he was perfectly sure that he had given no orders that they should be so placed. There night, of course, have been some mistake on the part of the servants, but as these, on being asked, one and all denied that they had put the clothes where they had been found, his Majesty naturally came to the conclusion that it was the act of no mortal hand, and, taken in connection with his dream, that the meaning of the latter was in some way or another to be discovered by the use of the clothes. As the ordinary way of making use of these was to put them on, the King at once proceeded to do so; and as those who had intended them to be worn doubtless intended also that the sport to which they belonged should be followed, the royal commands were issued for a hunting party, and the members of the Great Council were told, as soon as they had assembled and heard the King's story, that they must at once prepare to attend the hunt.

They looked at each other in astonishment as they received the orders, being unable to discover any connection between the dream which they had heard and the pleasures of the chase which they were commanded to follow. It was not usual to hunt cows, a rabbit seemed rather an ignoble object of pursuit for a powerful monarch, and a kangaroo had never been heard of in that country. Still, the King's orders must be obeyed, and in due time everything was made ready, and every minister, courtier, and other person who could obtain a horse went forth to the hunting party which had been so suddenly arranged.

The chief huntsman, clad in bright colors, led the way to the forest, and the noble pack of hounds, in which the King had always taken great pleasure and interest, entered upon their work with lively joy, and soon made the hills and dales reëcho with their deep voices. I do not know (because those who told me the story did not mention) what was the game which they pursued—whether stag, boar, wolf, or fox was the especial object of that day's chase; and therefore I will not graft anything of my own invention upon this truthful history. All I have to do with are the main facts which bear upon the important event which had caused the hunting party to take place, and how those facts occurred upon this eventful day.

The forest was upon the side of the vast mountains which rose on one side of the palace, and extended for many miles each way. It was an immense tract of woodland, and composed of various kinds of trees; at one time you were surrounded by oaks of mighty size, then you found yourself in the midst of low beech coppices extending right and left as far as you could see, and again you suddenly entered a huge grove of pine and fir trees stretching to an apparently endless length.

On rode the King and his court, and the sound of the horns rang through the forest as the hunt rolled away to the right, the gay colors of the riders and the trappings of their horses forming a pleasing contrast with the darker hues of the woodland through which they passed.

Suddenly the King reined in his steed, and turning away from his attendants, rode away down a track to the left as fast as he could go. The courtiers paused for an instant, and then dutifully followed their sovereign, who, however, rode at such a furious pace that he very soon disappeared from their sight. On they pushed notwithstanding, and for some time continued their pursuit without the smallest idea of what the King intended by his hasty flight, or in what direction he was going. Suddenly, however, they emerged from the pine forest through which his headlong race had been taken, and found themselves in the midst of one of the broad tracks which traversed the mountain from top to bottom, and although principally used by wood-cutters and peasants, formed the only means of communication with the country which lay beyond the forest, excepting the river which flowed around the base of the mountains. Here the courtiers drew rein, for a sight met their eyes the like of which none of them had ever seen before.

The King, dismounted from his horse, stood holding it by the rein in the very middle of the track, while slowly descending and approaching the spot where he stood was a procession of an extraordinary character.

On the right was a large dun cow, in the middle a rabbit, and on the left an animal which none of the lookers-on had ever seen before, but which, from pictures with which they were acquainted, they knew at once to be a kangaroo.

But it was not only the appearance of these three animals which excited the astonishment of the courtiers. There was something which surprised them still more. The cow had around her neck a collar, to which were fastened a set of hand-bells, which she rang, perfectly in time and tune, in a manner which was little short of miraculous; the rabbit had a fife, on which he accompanied the hand-bells with wonderful correctness; and the kangaroo had a belt around his waist to which was attached a drum, upon which he beat the accompaniment with a zeal and energy which caused the woods to reëcho with the sound, and his hoarse voice, together with the shrill treble of the rabbit and the deep bass of the cow, filled the air with the following words, which every one of the listeners distinctly heard as if spoken in his ear:

"The cow, the rabbit, and the old kangaroo
Come marching down the hill;
They say that the Queen to the King has been true,
And has vanished against her will;
But where she is gone to nobody knew
But the cow and the rabbit and the old kangaroo!"

As this strange procession drew quite close to the King, the three animals came to a stop, and once more sang the same words to the same curious tune to which they had been singing it since they came into view.

It may well be supposed that the royal bosom was agitated by the most conflicting feelings. Joy that he had obeyed the uncontrollable impulse which had led him to turn his horse away from the hunt; hope that he was at length about to hear tidings of his lost Amabilia; doubt and fear as to what those tidings might be—all these feelings kept the King silent for a few seconds, and then, his deep affection for his Queen overcoming every other sensation, he exclaimed, in a voice the accents of which trembled with the emotion of his heart.

"Oh, cow, rabbit, and kangaroo, only tell me how to get back my Queen, and the names of all three of you shall be blessed by me and mine for evermore!"

To these words the animals replied in a manner which the King hardly expected. The kangaroo gave a curious sound between a bark and a grunt, the rabbit squeaked shrilly, and the cow, opening her mouth widely, gave vent to a moo which sounded loudly over hill and dale.

As these sounds told the King nothing, because he had never been properly instructed in the animal language, he was about to say something more on his own account and in his own tongue, when the three creatures before him began a new song which ran after the following fashion:

"Take up the rabbit, and ride the cow,
And follow the kangaroo,
And thus shall you learn the 'where' and the 'how,'
And what you have got to do."

HANK ATWOOD'S TRADE.

BY SOPHIE SWETT.

"HULLO, Hank! Want to trade?" Hank poked up his ears, as he sat swinging his legs from a hoghead just outside "Nezer Coffin's" store.

It was Phile Doane, from Fleetwell, who had called to him. He was eighteen years old, and some people said he was "too smart"; but Hank "guessed he couldn't get the better of him."

Hank was born with a trading bump. It was a family tradition that when he was teething he insisted upon exchanging his rubber rattle with a baby visitor, and the first time he went to school he "swapped" his primer for a jew's-harp.

His brother "Lisha" was owner and captain of the Polly Baker. She was only a little pink-sterned schooner, but she had weathered fierce northeasters off the Banks many a time. Sometimes she came home with a full fare, that meant plenty and good cheer all winter, and sometimes she hadn't "wet her salt," and then they often went to bed hungry.

"YOU'VE TAKEN GOOD CARE OF HER, ANYHOW," SAID 'ISHA."

"Want to trade for that cranberry patch of our'n down by the old mill?" said Phile, sitting sociably down on the other end of the hoghead.

Did he want to trade? Why, cranberries, rightly managed, were a sure thing! His heart gave a great leap.

"But I hain't got anything to trade with," he said.

"You've got Nep, 'n' we're wantin' a hoss," said Phile. Nep! Of course Nep belonged to him. Lisha and Hank were half brothers. Lisha's father had left him the Polly Baker for an inheritance, and Hank's father had left him a sturdy colt, born on the Cape, and taking as kindly to sand as a camel.

Nep was called the mate of the Polly Baker. Just as soon as the Polly was to be seen at her moorings Hank harnessed Nep, and by the time Lisha had come ashore in the Polly's sharp-keeled tender Nep was ready to draw it over the long tide-washed stretch of sand and beach-grass between the shore and the fish-houses.

"Cranberries is worth ten dollars a barrel up to Boston, 'n' that patch will yield fifty barrels," said Phile. "We wouldn't sell it for nothin' you could name, only bein' it's too fur from home for us to take care of. You'd only have to hire a few pickers, and there'd be your five hundred dollars as clean as a whistle."

It was a dazzling prospect. It would be showing some people what a boy could do. Hepsy, Lisha's wife, didn't think much of boys.

"But we couldn't do without Nep," he said.

"Lisha will go clear off to the Banks, fish is so scarce, 'n' he won't be home before Thanksgivin', or mebbe Christmas, 'n' a hoss ain't much use in the winter, 'n' his keep is dear. And you could buy him back in the spring."

Hank said he would go and look at the cranberry patch, about a mile away. It was flooded—cranberries have to be occasionally to keep them sound and flourishing—and it was not easy to tell what condition they were in, but those that Hank picked were sound, although not very large, and they were turning red.

"Most ripe. It's the early cranberries that fetches the money," said Phile.

"I'll trade," said Hank.

He had to swallow a great lump in his throat as Phile led Nep off, and although Hepsy took it for granted that Phile had hired Nep, he had to tell her something so like a falsehood that it left a very bad taste in his mouth.

"What is Phile Doane over here for?" said Hank's friend Hi Nickerson, down by the fish-flakes that night. Hank was almost bursting with his secret, but he didn't wish to tell it before little Enoch, Hi's brother.

Little Enoch was considered wise, but it was Hank's opinion that he was rather dull. He didn't care for trading, and he didn't want to go in search of Captain Kidd's treasures, as Hi intended to do. But he was always "looking into things." He knew what caused the tides, and what heat and cold were, and just what kinds of wind and weather were likely to prevail.

"Phile didn't come any too soon," said little Enoch, wisely. "Worms have got into his cranberry patch."

Hank had to endure his great anxiety that night. Just as soon as it was light he and Hi went down to the cranberry patch. Little Enoch was right, as little Enoch was apt to be. The worms had begun their ravages at one end of the patch, and Phile had taken him to the other end. But about half the cranberries were still sound, and they worked hard to prevent the worms from doing any further damage.

"In a week, now, you can begin to pick," said Hi.

Captain Howes, of the sloop Betsy, was engaged to take the first cargo to Boston.

Hepsy went down to Provincetown to visit her step-mother, and insisted upon taking Hank with her. He didn't like to leave the cranberries, but Hi promised to look after them.

The weather had been unusually warm for September, but Hank awoke in the night in Provincetown shivering, and wishing he had another blanket. He shivered still more when he remembered the cranberries. The very thought of a frost strikes terror to the heart of a cranberry grower.

It was cold the next morning, but Hepsy would not hurry home; and when they did get started, how slow the stage horses were! And four miles from home the stage broke down. It was ten o'clock when they reached home.

Hank had to pretend to go to bed, but he stole softly down-stairs again and out of the house. Flooding would prevent the frost from striking the cranberries. If he could only reach the floodgates before it was too late! How he ran! It was almost as light as day. But moonlight is treacherous; it makes a ditch look like smooth ground. Hank felt a great shock, and the stars seemed swooping down from the sky and dancing before his eyes. He tried to rise, but a sharp pain in his ankle made him sink down again.

It seemed hours, but it was only a few minutes, before he heard the tramping of a horse's hoofs on the road.

"Help! help!" he cried.

The horse was stopped suddenly. Its rider was their neighbor Lysander Fearing, going to Fleetwell after Dr. Johnson, because little Abby Ann had the diphtheria and seemed to be choking to death. The good man hastily drew Hank out of the ditch, and set him on his horse, and mounted in front of him.

The doctor was soon aroused, and had his horse harnessed, and proposed to take Hank home in his carriage.

"You have a good horse," said Hank, tremulously, as the doctor's steed settled into a swift trot as familiar to Hank as the whinny he had uttered at the sound of Hank's voice.

"Yes; bought him of Phile Doane. Paid a good price for him—you're apt to pay a good price for what you buy of Phile Doane—but I wouldn't sell him for half as much again," said the doctor.

A good price and half as much again, and the cranberries frost-bitten! Oh Nep!

What a dark world it was! and the most miserable boy in it was Hank Atwood. Even the scolding and the hot herb-tea that Hepsy administered when he got home didn't seem to make things much worse.

But a boy can sleep if the world is dark, and Hank was awakened by Hi Nickerson's voice at his bedside late the next morning.

"Lucky you flooded the cranberries!" said Hi. "Lots of 'em are frost-bitten all round. Our'n are as fair and harsome!"

Hank would have thought he had been dreaming, but for a twinge in his ankle.

"I'll tell you what, then," said Hi, after Hank had told all he knew about it, "it was little Enoch. I'll fetch him, and we'll ask him."

Little Enoch admitted that he had opened the floodgates. He knew when there was likely to be a frost; he had learned by "looking into things."

"Hi, we'll make him a partner," said Hank, huskily.

The injury to Hank's ankle proved to be only a strain, and he was able to help pick the last of the ten barrels of cranberries that went up to Boston on the sloop Betsy. It seemed a long while to wait for the captain's report.

"Pootty poor market for cranberries," he said. "But I managed to average six dollars a barrel for 'em."

Hank counted the money with a sinking heart.

"I went over to Fleetwell the other day," said little Enoch. "I told Dr. Johnson how it was, and he agreed to let you have Nep for just what he gave Phile for him. And you've got enough money all but five dollars."

"I've got a dollar besides," said Hank, "but that's all."

"I've got three dollars and seventy-five cents that I was saving to buy some natural history books. I will lend you that."

"Joe Phillips offered me a quarter for my Cap'n Kidd book, and I'm kind of tired of it anyway. That'll just make up the five dollars," said Hi.

"But you won't have anything for your share," said Hank.

"I had the reg'lar pickers' wages, and I've got the experience—little Enoch says that is wuth consid'able—and I don't see's you've got any more."

"I'll pay the borrowed money anyway, but I'll work for it. I won't make another trade without asking Lisha—not till I'm twenty-one," said Hank, firmly.

They all three went that day and brought Nep home in triumph. He had grown fat and sleek, and his fare had been luxurious.

The very day after Nep's return, as Hank sat on the doorstep whittling, he heard the sound of Lisha's horn, and there was the Polly Baker and the half-dozen other boats that had gone out with her. Hank harnessed Nep in a trice, and was down at the shore when Lisha came off in the tender, looking, as Lisha always did, as if he had only been off for a day's trip, with a basket of freshly caught cod in the boat, and a big one in his hand of which Hepsy would shortly make a fry for supper.

"You've taken good care of Nep anyhow," said Lisha. "He ain't been livin' on marsh hay and herrin' bones."

And Hank knew that he was a great deal happier than he deserved to be.

MR. THOMPSON AND THE JUNE-BUG.

BY ALLAN FORMAN.

BUZZ, buzz—bump! buzz, buzz-z-z—bump!"

"Shoo!" exclaimed Mr. Thompson, drowsily.

Buzz, buzz—

"Get out!" ejaculated Mr. Thompson, wildly waving his newspaper. It seemed to have the desired effect, for the buzzing grew more and more indistinct, and as Mr. Thompson sank contentedly back into his easy-chair it seemed to have ceased altogether. It was just the dusk of a summer's day, and after having eaten a good dinner and read his evening paper, Mr. Thompson was sitting beside the open window in the twilight, and meditating—at least that is what Mr. Thompson called it. The young man who had the next room said that that was the funniest way to pronounce s-n-o-r-i-n-g that he had ever heard. But then the young man in the next room was always poking fun at Mr. Thompson, and as he did not meditate nearly so much as he ought to himself, it was not to be supposed that he knew much about it. At any rate, Mr. Thompson said that he was meditating, and though he did breathe regularly with a strange humming noise, he surely ought to know whether he was asleep or not, and on this particular evening he assures me that he was wide awake, but in deep thought. He sank back contentedly into his chair, and was just beginning to meditate softly when the buzzing began again.

Buzz, buzz—bump! bump—buzz!

Mr. Thompson paid no attention to it until, with a vicious bump, the buzzer thumped against his forehead, nearly knocking off his spectacles, and fell into his lap.

"Shoo!" murmured Mr. Thompson.

"Shoo yourself!" buzzed the intruder. "Why don't you keep your head out of the way?"

"Why don't you look where you are going?" responded Mr. Thompson, indignantly.

They sat and stared at each other for a while in silence; finally Mr. Thompson asked, "Who are you, anyway?"

"I'm a June-bug, or a Dorr-beetle, or a May-bug, whichever you choose to call me," responded the beetle.

Mr. Thompson hesitated for a moment, and began to meditate. As he drew a long breath through his nose the June-bug exclaimed, in a tone of satisfaction, "There, that is the first sensible word I have heard you say this evening."

"I was only meditating," remarked Mr. Thompson, mildly.

"Of course you were," said the June-bug, triumphantly. "A man can't make a sensible remark without meditation."

Mr. Thompson was not aware of having spoken, so he hastened to change the subject.

"What makes you bump against things so?" he asked, rubbing his forehead where the June-bug had struck him.

"For fun," answered the June-bug. "You don't think it's fun? Just try it and see;" and before Mr. Thompson could say Jack Robinson he found himself on the window-sill beside his new-found friend. He was no longer a staid and respectable-looking middle-aged gentleman, but he realized with some misgivings that he was a very clumsy and common looking beetle. He was a dark chocolate color all over, and he could feel gauzy wings under his hard back. He unfolded his shell-like back, and stretching his wings, he flew easily over to the window ledge. He crawled along this with some feeling of delight, and looked curiously down upon the piazza beneath. There were seated Miss Angelina, the young man who boarded in the house, and two or three others.

"I wonder where Mr. Thompson is?" said Miss Angelina, in a pause in the conversation.

"Suppose he's up in his room snoozing," said the young man, with a laugh.

Mr. Thompson never did like that young man; jaw he positively hated him, and in his excitement he tumbled off the window ledge before he could think to spread his wings. Down, down, he went, until he struck fair and square on top of the young man's bare head. He jumped up with a yell, and muttered something about "those pestiferous June-bugs," while Mr. Thompson recovered himself, and flew away contented and happy.

But no sooner did he begin to fly than he experienced a wild desire to bump against things; the intoxicating pleasure of the buzz, buzz—bump! was apparent to him now. He was joined by his new friend, and together they managed to make things pretty lively for the occupants of the piazza. Mr. Thompson refrained from bumping against Miss Angelina many times, though he could not resist the opportunity of snatching a kiss or two as he passed. Miss Angelina announced her intention of going into the house.

"The place seems full of June-bugs," she said. "One of them has been buzzing around me all the evening."

"Worse than old Thompson!" growled the young man under his breath, for which impolite remark Mr. Thompson butted full-tilt against the end of his nose.

After the people had gone into the house, all the excitement of staying around the piazza vanished with them, and Mr. Thompson suddenly discovered that he was tired. He accordingly flew up to his open window and settled comfortably on the window-sill, his companion following him.

"How old are you?" Mr. Thompson asked, abruptly, after he had rested for a moment.

"Do you mean as a bug, or in all?" inquired the June-bug, good-naturedly.

"In all," said Mr. Thompson.

"Three years," replied the June-bug. "Three years is the limit of life in a June-bug—two years as a grub, and one summer as a bug." The June-bug drew a deep sigh.

Mr. Thompson felt sorry for him. "Tell me about it. I thought that—that—" Mr. Thompson hesitated.

"—That insects only lived one season," said the bug, finishing the sentence. "That is generally true, but with us it is different. Three years ago this coming fall my mother dug a deep hole in the ground and laid a number of small yellow eggs in it. In the spring these eggs hatched out into large white grubs. You have seen them in freshly ploughed ground. We lived all summer under the earth, burrowing blindly—for we had no eyes—eating the soft roots of grass, small shrubs, potatoes, or whatever we happened to come into contact with. We grew large and fat, and in the fall, when the frosts came, we curled up where we had burrowed deep down in the earth and slept during the long winter. The next summer we spent in the same way, growing larger and stronger and fatter each week. That fall something told us to burrow deep and hollow out quite a large nest before we went to sleep. This nest answered for what you men call a chrysalis. During the winter the change went on, how I hardly know, and in the spring I found myself as I am now, only my shell was quite soft, and I was very weak. I burrowed laboriously to the surface, and found myself free. In a few hours my wings had hardened, and since then I have been flying around, enjoying my short life as best I may."

"'THE PLACE SEEMS FULL OF JUNE-BUGS,' SAID MISS ANGELINA."

There was such a tinge of sadness in the June-bug's voice that Mr. Thompson felt sorry for him, and he said, "At least you have little to fear while you do live."

"No; my hard shell protects me. The birds and animals can't eat me now, though as a grub all the birds sought me as a great delicacy. But now men are afraid of me, though I cannot possibly harm them. I can neither sting nor bite. All I can do is to bump." And Mr. Thompson thought he could detect something like a chuckle under the June-bug's horny cover, as if at the recollection of some especially mischievous bumping adventure. But he saddened again immediately, and added: "Men try to kill me whenever they can, but so far I have managed to make my escape. Here comes a man now."

"What on earth are you doing, Thompson? You'll be out of that window!" exclaimed a familiar voice; and Mr. Thompson found himself grasped by the young man who boarded in the house, and forced down into his chair.

"Been asleep, eh?" rattled on the young man. "Did you ever see so many June-bugs? The air is full of 'em."

"So you came in here to kill me?" growled Mr. Thompson, ungraciously.

The young man started back in surprise. "I came in just in time to save you from falling out of the window," he said; and adding under his breath, "The man is clean daft," he backed out of the room.

The next morning the young man told how he had entered the room and found Mr. Thompson balanced in a most dangerous position on the window-sill, and of his subsequent strange remark. Mr. Thompson was obliged to make some explanation in self-defence, and that is how the story got around. Nobody believed it except Miss Angelina. For my own part, I looked in a big book of natural history, and found that all that the June-bug had told Mr. Thompson was strictly true. So I never dared to tell Mr. Thompson that I did not believe his story.

OUR POST-OFFICE BOX.

THE "Three Little T's" have been favorite contributors to the Post-office Box, and I have always been very much pleased to hear from them. I wondered how they were faring when I read of the great calamity which had visited beautiful Charleston, the city which I had seen on a bright New-Year's Day, when I walked along the Battery, looking at the silvery waves of the bay, and wore at my belt roses and hyacinths gathered from a lovely out-of-doors garden in midwinter.

These girls have written a very graphic description of the earthquake. I think they have behaved with real presence of mind that night. I hope that the worst is over, and that no other earthquake may ever shake their city.

CHARLESTON, September 6, 1886.

DEAR POSTMISTRESS.—We have had a dreadful earthquake here, and we don't know whether it is over yet, because we have had many shocks since. At ten o'clock Tuesday night Carrie and I were fast asleep, but all of a sudden we felt ourselves torn from the bed by our aunt, who, fortunately, was in the room. At first we were half-dazed by the rocking of the house, shrieks of the people in the streets, and the falling of our walls, chimneys, ceilings, and furniture. The wall behind our bed fell, and only the very high head-board of the bed saved us. The gas went out, and we were left in total darkness.

Uncle L. was on the first floor, and called out to us now we were upstairs. Aunt K. called to him to come up. He cried out "I can't," because he could not find the staircase in the darkness and the confusion that was all around him. But in a second of so he was upstairs, and stood with us while Aunt K. and Con-in-J ran to take care of grandma. At last we were all together behind K's room, and she told us to hold Uncle L. resolve to take us out of the house. From our street door we could see fires burning all over the city, and two very near us. We went to Legare Street, where our neighbors were collected. We stood out there until nearly morning, and then came home, finding that the injuries to our house were not nearly so bad as many others had sustained.

During the next day we had many shocks, but none so bad as the first. Wednesday night we went in the large yard of one of our neighbors, where we had a tent made of sheets and shawls. A lounge and some mattresses were put inside, and there we spent the night trying to sleep. About midnight we all dozed off, but only for a minute, because an awful shock occurred that made the very mattresses shake under us.

Next day we had many shocks, which created such alarm among the people that many of them left the city. That night, which was Thursday, we had very shocks, which we do not think will be the last to be over; but we were mistaken, for Friday night there was one which was nearly as bad as the first. It was so cold that night that we were obliged to spend the night in a stable.

Saturday evening we had two slight shocks, but did not go out. After sitting up awhile, we lay down on mattresses in a stable, and now we have settled ourselves for the present in the lowest story of the house, and although strong quakes have kept still, and hope to be able to keep under shelter, as the exposure at night was making some of us ill.

The next morning we was split from top to bottom, so it will have to be taken down, and several others near us are almost torn to pieces. Our stool broke, because it was of wood and was so heavy, though quite tall. That our College is completely destroyed, and I don't know what our brother Fred will do, for he expected to go there next month. We are all in trouble and confusion, but are doing the best we can, and we think God will take care of us. If Charleston exists a thousand years longer, we think that it will be the most such a calamity as it has been and felt in the past week.

NONIE (one of the "Three Little T's").

CHARLESTON, September 6, 1886.

I want to tell you something about the earthquake too. Grandmother has lived eighty-six years, and she says it was the most terrible thing she ever passed through. It was a great disease that the cyclone.

Light sand bubbled up in our yard and all about. I send you a little to see; it is different from all the rest.

We have been sleeping out-of-doors at night, and we could hear the colored people singing and praying all night. I was so afraid to go out at night, I was just under the sky. The father of one of our little friends, who was with us, is a clergyman, and he prayed for us in the middle of the night.

We do not undress now to go to bed. We keep on our clothes, shoes, and all, day and night. We have no chimneys either on the first or second floor, and we are trying to get the holes stopped up so the rain can't pour down on us.

My shocks all the time, and we don't know when it will be over. We were frightened at first, but now we are so used to it we don't make a fuss.

We are going to try to sleep in the house, on the first floor now, and if the ceiling begins to fall we will creep under the dining-table. Our pretty room, where Nonie and I slept, is all torn to pieces, but we are thankful our lives were spared. It was awful to have to run out into the street, full of folks, that night, and the fires burning all over the city. I was so afraid of the tent that in the stable, and I took a bad cold.

We were glad Fred was in the mountains, and out of danger; he is our only dear little brother, and we are glad he is out of the city.

CARRIE (another of the "Three Little T's").

SENECA, KANAS.

On the evening of August 31, my daughter Blanche, ten and a half years old, fell into a well. She was striking some one else the stool of footing in leaning over the curb. The well is the old-fashioned kind, having a rope, pulley, and tap, and is six feet deep and three feet in diameter, with about two and half feet of water in it. She started in head first, but thinks she turned clear over in her descent. After she had been in the well for half her feet until assistance came, and a bucket was sent down to her, into which she climbed, and clinging to the rope, she was drawn out with no harm to her person other than a few scratches and bruises and a small cut on the head. While in the well she cried out to her aunt, who was waiting at the top, for assistance, and she was afraid she would never see her papa, mamma any more. As Blanche is a constant reader and a great admirer of HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE, she says you are a very good mother, and would be glad to learn of her narrow escape from death. It is regarded here as simply wonderful, and we thank you Heavenly Father kept her, without whose knowledge not a sparrow falleth. Yours truly,

J. H. JOHNSON.

I am sure that every reader, young and old, of the Post-office Box will join in congratulating little Blanche on the marvellous escape of which her father tells us.

HEALTH HOME, NEW YORK CHILDREN'S AID SOCIETY.

DEAR CHILDREN.—I wish those of you who preserve your numbers of HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE would look them over and find No. 25 of Volume I (August 28, 1884), and read again Mrs. Sangster's article on the "Health Home." It occurred to me, as I came across the paper the other day, that perhaps some of the dear readers who take so much interest in other little ones less fortunate than themselves, would like to help the poor little babies who go to the Home. For the first time, we do not have any more children of the Health Home. I would say it is for the use of New York mothers (too poor to pay board) who have their children under two years of age. Each mother remains one week, or longer, at the Home. The Home is situated at West Coney Island, and can be reached by Coney Island Point Railroad, from Culver's, Sea-Beach, or Brooklyn, Bath, and West End Railroad depots. The train stops at the Home, and visitors are welcomed at all times. This week there were at the Home about seventy mothers and one hundred and thirty children. Some of the babies are very ill, so that we treat many of them, and we have had very others at night. Some good strong baby carriages, little chairs, cradles, rocking-chairs, hammocks, etc., are regularly made, and we have had many a mother who has brought some of them from the gutter or cellar and get papa or mamma to send them; they could go by express direct, or by the Sea-Beach boat as freight. Every note is sent containing the name of the donor, it will be noted in the Annual Report of the Children's Aid Society, and if desired, also in the Post-office Box of HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE.

A FRIEND OF THE BABIES.

FINEY, MICHIGAN.

Some of the children who read HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE are trying to find long words. Mamma told me one which is quite long, it is honourific-benivolentiaulobosque. I don't know the meaning of the word, and I don't think it has any. I like the Post-office Box very much, and the paper too. Among the stories I like best are "Silent Pete, or the Stowaways," "Rolf Hounsen," "Nan," "Jo's approval," "The Falsest of Lies." We went out to Long Lake to camp; we staid a week, and had a very pleasant time, and I learned how to swim. My little brother Fred is five years old, and he learned how to row; it was funny to see him, he used his oars so nicely. This summer we went and spent the day, and had a very good time. "The Little Boat," ten miles from here, and is a very pleasant place. I have no pets except a dog, that is nine years old. I did have a cat, but it died, and a bird that flew away, and one that died.

RIITA L.

HACKENSACK, NEW JERSEY.

DEAR POSTMISTRESS.—I thought you would like to hear about our first experience in house-keeping. We are two little girls, aged twelve and thirteen years, and we have a very nice dinner on each other. Our names are Lottie and Edith. One day Lottie's mother went to the city. As their servant had left, Lottie was left alone with her grandmother, who is not very well. Lottie invited me to spend the day with her, to keep her company. After making some candy, we thought it best to go to lunch. We set the table in the kitchen, and had a very nice dinner. We prepared chops, Saratoga potatoes, cocoa, and other things. When all was ready, we called Lottie's uncle and aunt, and they came down to see us. When we were half through, the door-bell rang, and who should enter but Lottie's aunt and uncle from the city! Of course they had not had dinner, and as they were rather particular company, we were at our wits' end; but something had to be done. So we put on a brave face, and set the table in the dining-room, and prepared scrambled eggs, fried potatoes, corn, and cucumbers, and other things. Not letting the company know we had begun our lunch, we sat down and took the rest of our meal with them. While Lottie was putting the things on the table I went after some ice-cream for dessert. Lottie's uncle and aunt praised the dinner very much, and they were rather particular about the dinner, the dishes had to be attended to, and there were a great many, as there had been two tables spread. After Lottie had washed, and I had wiped them all, we were very glad to sit down and rest awhile. Lottie's mother was surprised when she came home and found there had been a dinner, and she was very glad to hear of it, and thought that we were very smart girls.

EDITH M. B.

LONG BRANCH, NEW JERSEY.

I am spending the summer here, in a cottage a short distance from the ocean here, and I have two and two canary-birds. The dogs I call Romeo and Juliet, and Laddie and Lassie; the birds, Jack and Jinx. I have had them for about six years, and I think it is charming in every way. I would like to belong to the Little House Post-mistress; I am fond of reading, dear Post-mistress, and I am almost fourteen. Good-by, with love.

FLORENCE N. K.

BALTIMORE, MARYLAND.

We have been taking this delightful paper for six years, and we are very glad, and my favorite author are Miss Abbott, Martine, and the little Lillie. I have the President's and Mrs. Cleveland's autographs. I am very anxious for September to come, as I like school quite well. I am one of your many readers.

FANNIE R. D.

ACRA, NEW YORK.

I live in Key West, Florida, but mamma was ill, so we came up here. I have a little brother named Will; he is four years old. We have very nice times playing around the yard here. I am thirteen years old, and I will be fourteen on the 29th of next December. I have taken HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE for three years, and like very much again received my subscription. Papa is the Superintendent of the International Ocean Telegraph Company. He is now in Cuba. We gathered some thistles the other day, and now that they are dry, they look just like pompoms. They are very prettier than Postmistress's, and like very much better in print. I will send you two puzzles with this letter. But I must now close, as I will be taking up too much of your time. M. S. H.

Thank you, May, for letter and puzzles.

CHICAGO, ILLINOIS.

I am a girl twelve years old. I go to school, and study German, spelling, arithmetic, reading, geography, and history. I have taken HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE since 1883, and like very much. "False Witness" is my favorite story. RINA J.

DEPAUL, NEW YORK.

I have taken HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE nearly six years, but have never written to you before. I have quite a number of pets. I have two birds, a cardinal and a robin; the cardinal is a splendid singer, and has beautiful plumage; the robin is cunning, but not very pretty. We have two cats, and a kitten. In these weeks, papa and I have had pretty blue eyes, and is coal black with a white collar. We have a colt, and when he sees a high brick or lumber pile he kicks up his hind legs. He is very nervous. My favorite authors are Miss Alcott and Mrs. Lucy C. Lillie. My favorite stories are "Rolf House," "Jo's Opportunity," "Silent Peter," and "The False Witness" so far. I enjoy reading the Post-office Box. I like HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE better than any other paper I have ever seen. Can you tell me nice places to visit in New York? I would like to see this letter in print, although it is pretty long. CLOVER (age thirteen).

When you visit New York, you will, of course, call on the Postmistress and see the great establishment where HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE is published. There are so many other interesting places in our great city that I think I must leave you to find out about them all when you come here.

EDGEWOOD FARM, INDEPENDENCE, IOWA.

DEAR POSTMISTRESS,—I have taken this valuable paper since March 9, 1884, and it has made me what I think Messrs. Harper Brothers for the benefit and pleasure derived from it. We (which includes grandparents, papa and mamma, and eight children) live on a farm called Edgewood, of two hundred and forty acres, one and a half miles from Independence. We children all go to school in winter, and almost all of us in summer. My sister and I both go to the same school, and study the same branches—arithmetic, reading, spelling, word analysis, writing, geography, grammar, and history. We have a good history and the civil government of the United States. I have five brothers, Herbert, Eddie, Willie, Laurence, and Harry, and two sisters, Marion (or Mamie) and Edith, all younger than myself. We used to live in Illinois until two and a half years ago, when we came "out West." My sister is taking lessons on our organ. We both took short lessons for two and a half terms last summer. We girls bought the organ with money that we earned ourselves—$5. I love reading, and my favorite stories in HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE are "Nan," "Rolf House," "Who was Paul Grayson?" "Jo's Opportunity," "False Witness," and "Walden." My favorite authors are Miss Alcott and Mrs. Lucy C. Lillie. I like Thomas Hughes, Mrs. H. B. Stowe, Martine Finley, and Anna Warner. MATTIE C.

Will some one send Mattie a receipt for angel-cake?

BROOKLYN, NEW YORK.

I am just learning to swim, and practise every day. I like it very much, but not when the water is cold. I would like to see you. I have a little cat named Minnie, and I like her very much. CHARLIE A. M.

QUEEN, LONG ISLAND, NEW YORK.

DEAR POSTMISTRESS,—This is my third summer in Quogue, and I am very fond of it. There are some very peculiar Indian names around here, such as Speenk, Quantie, Quomee, Aspatie, and a number of others. Quomee means, I think, H. C. (a great friend of mine) and I go rowing a great deal together. There is a small brook which we named "Asquim" (it means sparkling water) and we have lots of fun fishing there. There are several tennis tournaments going on, and my sister won one of the prizes. I seldom have nothings to do, and I like to be here. I like to be fishing, crabbing, and walking; and it is not often that I get a chance to read much. There is to be a fair at Helen C.'s house, and I am working for it. As it is a very rainy day, I took the opportunity to write a letter to the Post-office Box. My favorite authors are Sir Walter Scott, Miss Alcott, and I have not decided which others. Hoping this letter is not too long to print, I remain ever your devoted reader.

ELLEN V. B. M.

NORTH STONINGTON, CONNECTICUT.

I am a little boy of six years, and am learning how to read and write. I have some pretty pets, and I will tell you of them. I have a dog named Nero, and a pussy-cat named Spooks, also a birch-nick named Dickie. I like to hear papa read your stories, and wish they came often. My papa is a minister, and is very good to me, and brings me many nice playthings when he goes away and I am alone. I have some little sisters, and I ever have two letters from the same little boy? I want to learn how to write letters nicely. JOE C.

This little man also hails from Stonington:

I am a little boy of nine years, and have taken this paper ever since I was seven. My papa has two horses and one cow. The cow's name is Betsy, and she is just as gentle as she can be. My papa will not let me ride on any of his horses. There is a river very near my house, and I go rowing all alone. I have a dog, Pepper, and a little pussy cat, Tabby. WILLIE C.

These boys, Joe and Willie, are friends, but not brothers.

A third Stonington boy. Well done, Stonington!

DEAR POSTMISTRESS,—I am a little boy ten years old. I go to school every day in winter, and like it very much. I enjoy HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE very much; I like "False Witness" and "Silent Peter." I like to see the pictures in the paper, and had a very good time. I have a cat and a dog who live together peacefully. My dog's name is Rover, and he does many pretty things, such as a black-and-white. My cat's name is Snowdrop, and she is just as cunning as she can be. I like horseback, with the man William to hold me on. Do you ride? LATHAM H.

I hope you will soon be able to hold on to your horse by yourself. I am very fond of riding.

FORT STANON, NEW MEXICO.

We have a great many skunks here; papa lost one four and killed one. Night before last I got in the chicken-house and killed twenty-seven little ones. We have lost all but twelve or thirteen out of sixty. It rains every day now, and makes the creek very muddy. It is a very pretty place here. We are between the Appalachian Mountains and the White mountains; the latter are covered with snow from November till May. I think I will send HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE to a boy friend of mine in Denver, Colorado. Could you please tell me of some pretty name for our little baby, one month old? He is a very good boy. I like Mrs. Lillie's and Kirk Murray's stories best.

Would you like Claude or Gully? There are many pretty names which will occur to you for the baby brother. I name those two because I am rather fond of them.

I have taken HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE for a long time, and enjoy it ever so much. I am very much interested in "False Witness" now, and can hardly wait until the next number comes. I enjoyed the picture "The Young Naturalist," and some others in the magazine, and look forward to the illustrations almost as much as to the stories. I like to make and drawing lessons, and enjoy my drawing best. ALICE W.

GOLDSBOROUGH, NORTH CAROLINA.

I have been waiting to write for a long time, but I have been so busy playing. I live in Baltimore, and I am on a visit to my sister. My sister gave me HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE, and Edna, my niece, St. Nicholas. Edna staid with me all winter, and it was very nice, as we went to school together. HULDA E. (aged nine years).

SENeca, KANSAS.

We are two cousins, eleven and thirteen years of age. We take HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE, and like it very much. We thought "Jo's Opportunity" a very nice story. We have been in St. Joe, and through the cracker and candy factory. We are going to Omaha this week on a visit, and expect to have a nice time. BLANCHE and GRACE J.

LEONORE X: Thank you very much for sending your pretty story about Mollie's graduation, which, however, is too long for the Post-office Box. Her brother was a very cruel and bad boy, and it was well for him that he did not live with the Postmistress.—A. L. W.: In what part of England are you spending the summer, dear; and are you ending home in the autumn?—Mary Dean, of Washington, D. C., apologizes to the girls whose letters she cannot answer, as she has received over one hundred from little unknown friends. The Postmistress is of the opinion that hereafter it would be well for the girls and boys to correspond with each other through the Post-office Box only. In some instances these numerous correspondents interfere with home duties.

—MARY B.: I would prefer, my dear, your composing something expressly for the Post-office Box. The tragic tale of the "Two Laundry-men," though very clever, is not just what I want here.—JOSIE D. R., of Ridgewood, New Jersey: Thank you for describing the Albany Bicentennial. I could not include it in the Post-office Box, because last week we had a similar and even fuller letter of the same kind from two young visitors to the festivities at New York's capital. Many thanks to all the boys and girls who have sent copies of the verses about the poet who couldn't write poetry, Mr. Thinkleton Tennyson Tupper von Burns.

JOCKO GOES TO THE COUNTRY WITH US, AND, AS USUAL, GETS INTO MISCHIEF.

DITTY-BAG STORIES.

BY HOPE HOWARD.

A PATRIOTIC GOOSE.

WHEN our ship was down on the Potomac during the war we kept a number of geese on board, which we fattened for our table. A lame one among them attracted the attention of the sailors, who made a pet of it, and by degrees it came to have the liberty of the ship.

It made its way into the officers' quarters, winning their regard as well. When they were talking together it would walk up, with that movement of head and neck peculiar to the goose family, place itself between them, look from one to another as if studying their meaning, interject a "Qua, qua" here and there, and fill up the pauses with a gibberish which was irresistibly funny, and was always received with shouts of laughter.

The goose seemed to catch the subject of our talk. If it were serious, as indeed it often was in those dark days, all its intonations would be in a corresponding key, deep and guttural. If, on the contrary, we were discussing affairs of business, it would exhibit all the importance and circumstance of thorough business knowledge, giving advice, objecting to propositions, till we were almost inclined to think the spirit of a Rothschild was within the goose. But when we were spinning yarns, and relieving the tedium by some jolly stories, then the goose was in its element. It would fairly screech, and its gabble-gabble nothing could subdue. We came to look upon it as a familiar spirit as well as a disinterested friend.

We often threw it off the ship to give it a swim, and the first time with misgivings, thinking it might go ashore and escape us, but it always returned to the ship after a short absence.

After it had been with us some time it seemed to languish, and we thought it felt the loss of its goose-kin, and the goose-ponds with their growth of fungi, and the daily promenades with the dock, and the military drill. Who knew but it was the captain of one of those trainbands which we meet in our country rambles, every head and neck stretched out, as if all were bent on some grave and absorbing purpose? Sometimes when its head drooped, and we seemed to detect an expression of melancholy in the eyes, we thought it might be dreading a court-martial for desertion, and consequent punishment.

After holding a council of war over it, we agreed, painful as it would be to us, to part with it. We were about to leave on a three weeks' cruise to provision the ships and gun-boats along the line. We engaged a farmer, opposite whose homestead our ship lay, to care for it, and bidding it an affectionate farewell, sent it ashore at the last moment before we set sail.

Our round of duty completed, we returned to our old anchorage. The Potomac was at that time swarming with ships of every size and build. We would have thought it only a practised eye which would select one from many others gathered there. Judge of our surprise when, arriving within sight of the farmer's house, we discovered our pet about midway between the shore and ship, making for us with hot haste. Its joy seemed so ecstatic that at times it rose in the water and flapped its wings, making the spray rise like a water-spout.

When taken on board it went from one to another of the officers and crew, running its head into their hands, qua-quacking, gabble-gabble-gabbling, and saying in unmistakable language that it preferred a sea life to that on shore; that the time it had lived with us had convinced it that a life on the ocean wave and the society of the ward-room had elevated it above the corn-crib and the goose-pool, and its aspirations were for companionship of a higher kind, and a possible Admiral's rank in the bright future.

CARA'S PETS.

BY ELLA RODMAN CHURCH.

ON the veranda of a beautiful country home in Kentucky pretty little Cara stood watching something so intently that her aunt, Miss Dunleath, put by her work and came out to see what it was. Cara was Judge Dunleath's only child, and the joy of his life.

"What can Ezra have in that box?" she wondered.

Ezra Trail, the hunter, just then knocked the slats off the big box he had brought in his wagon, and the next moment two little fawns stood on the rich blue-grass.

"Oh, you darlings!" screamed Cara, running down the walk and clasping her arms about the surprised young strangers. "Papa, oh, papa!" she cried, "please buy these dear little fawns for me. See how pretty they are!"

"So they are," said her father, who had just appeared on the scene. "Where did you get them, Ezra?"

"You see, sir," said the man, "I went a-hunting yesterday, and shot a deer. I was about to drag her to my cabin, when here come these little fellows out of the bushes, lookin' sort o' wild like. Then I seed I hed killed their mother. I was sorry, but I must hev meat, you know. Well, I didn't see how I was to catch the young ones; but when I started with the mother, they followed as kind as calves. So I brought 'em down, thinking maybe you'd like 'em for the little miss."

"Poor little darlings!" exclaimed Cara; "to think they have no mother! Mayn't I have them, papa?"

"Indeed," said her father. "And what is to become of my cabbage bed?"

"Oh, never mind, sir," said the hunter; "they can't bother that for a long time to come." And Ezra went away with a crisp new ten-dollar bill in his pocket-book.

"Oh, thank you, papa!" said the delighted girl. Then with the chestnuts Ezra had brought Cara fed them and coaxed them to the house. She named them Nannie and Billie. They were lovely pets, with soft, bright eyes, and glossy coats of reddish-brown thickly marked with white spots, while underneath the color was all white.

Nannie was very gentle, but Billie was full of cunning antics, and Miss Dunleath did not think him altogether lovely. One day she stroked him behind the shoulders, when he reared up with a flash in his eye, and startled the lady. He was willing to be patted only on the head, Nannie could be touched anywhere, and Cara said that that child was a great comfort to her. They wandered about as they pleased, and the pat, pat of tiny hoofs on the veranda usually announced that Nannie was coming for a drink of water out of her young mistress's basin—the only way she would take it. Billie was not so particular, but would drink anywhere. As for eating, although his favorite food was chestnuts and rose-bush leaves, he didn't mind trying to chew up his tin plate; and one day Judge Dunleath took the chain of his gold repeater from the little scamp's mouth. Billie found it on a table, and wanted to see if it tasted as good as it looked.

"But he's so cunning, papa!" pleaded Cara; and Billie would lick her face and hair and hands, and look pitiful with his great brown eyes.

One day, after the usual chase among the trees and rocks, poor little Nannie was found with her right fore-leg doubled under her. The bone was broken, and hanging by a shred of skin. Cara was nearly beside herself with grief, and did all she could for her suffering pet. She sent hurriedly for the kind doctor she had known from babyhood. He came at once, and prepared to bind up the broken leg.

"Oh, doctor, must she die?" cried Cara.

"Not at all," was the reply. "If you are a brave girl, do just what I tell you, and she will soon be all right."

So Cara became a little woman at once, and was ready to help.

The servant-men held the patient in a firm but kind grasp while the doctor placed the leg in splints of strong pasteboard strips, and wound around them a linen bandage wet with common starch. This soon hardened and became as stiff as bone itself; but while it was still fresh and wet Nannie was released, and limped away on three legs, evidently feeling much better. Billie looked on at the operation with wide, curious eyes.

Cara was pale and trembling, but the doctor patted her cheek, and promised that Nannie would soon be well again. And so she would, for she learned to chase Billie upon three legs; but one night a dreadful fate awaited the poor little creature. While playing by moonlight with her big brother Billie some vicious sheep dogs jumped over the low white fence and chased the fawns. They were such pretty, dainty prey! Billie got out of their way with his long legs, but Nannie was lame, and could not run fast enough. She was found torn and bleeding. All day Cara attended her, giving her warm milk, and fresh green leaves from the rose-bushes. The doctor came again. He said the wounds might heal, but that the gentle creature had been too much frightened to recover. At sundown she died, and then the doctor found that her broken leg was healing rapidly, and said it was a pity she couldn't have lived to run about again. She was buried under the blue-grass where she had been so happy.

Billie was so lonely without her that for the lack of something better to do he began to destroy the vegetable garden. This sealed his doom. He was given to a kind minister, who had a large park fenced in all around. Here he became friends with a beautiful greyhound, and spent his days chasing him about as he had once chased his little sister Nannie.

A TRICK OF THE TRADE.

BY R. W. M.

THERE was worry and trouble enough that year; For the King of the French was ill, And his heart was torn with the ceaseless fear, That the end of his glorious reign was near, In spite of doctor and sage and seer, Of plaster and potion and pill.

He scolded all, both high and low;
He stormed at lord and groom;
He bade each old-time mate to go—
He brooked no word, no glance of woe—
And thus made every friend a foe,
His palace a place of gloom.

Yet a few faithful servants staid
To serve their wretched King;
One dulcet creams and jellies made
(The doctors and the nurse to aid),
And two the parlor organ played,
And ten or twelve would sing.

His pains would not to music yield,
And jellies were in vain,
And all the arts that doctors wield,
The King's disease would not be healed;
They told him that his fate was sealed,
And another King must reign.

The aching monarch shed no tear;
He was of no coward race,
He feared—but bravest men will fear
When unknown dangers hover near—
And, with a howl, said, "Bring the seer
I banished in disgrace."

Then to the seer the monarch said,
With strong, unshaken voice;
"Tell me a lie, you lose your head;
The truth, you live a Prince instead.
Say, when will your King be dead?
Now, wise man, take your choice."

The seer—he was a cunning elf,
As every quack must be—
Knowing how he could help himself,
With good things load his empty shelf,
And treasure boxes fill with pelf,
Thus charmed his Majesty:

“O King, thine end is nowise nigh:
Thou’lt live for many a year,
The date exact when thou shalt die
Is just a fortnight after I
Am borne beneath the sod to lie,
Freed from all mortal fear.”

The cunning quack lived royally
For many and many a day;
The King got well again, for he,
To keep the seer from danger free,
Drowned half his doctors in the sea,
And sent the rest away.

CHAPTER III.

THESE directions were so plain that the King could hardly mistake them, and as if to make matters still clearer, the kangaroo turned round and prepared to lead the way, while the cow and the rabbit came still closer to him, evidently quite ready to take their share in the business. The cow knelt down in order to make it more easy for his Majesty to mount, and the rabbit crept up within reach of his hand. Under ordinary circumstances the King might have hesitated to play the part assigned to him, but the circumstances were not ordinary, and his love for his lost Queen, and desire to regain her, were so strong within his breast as to leave no room for hesitation. Therefore without any delay he let go the reins of his horse, carefully lifted the rabbit from the ground, and seated himself astride on the cow in full view of his astonished courtiers. The cow forthwith stood up again on her four legs, and with a moan of evident satisfaction began to follow the kangaroo into the wood upon the other side of the track, and in a few moments the anxious lookers-on could see no more of their monarch and his strange companions.

The King, meanwhile, was naturally full of wonder and excitement. Accustomed from his youth up to ride upon a saddle, he did not feel particularly comfortable upon the bare back of his new steed, but being prepared to undergo some hardships for the sake of his Amabilia, he determined to make the best of it. On pushed the kangaroo, who had now ceased beating his drum, and in a short time the pine-trees were left behind, and the party came to a part of the forest where there were not so many trees, but only a few stunted oaks and beech, and a quantity of gorse bushes, and rocks embedded in a sandy soil. It was a part of the forest which the King did not remember to have seen before, but he had not much time to notice the scenery, being entirely occupied in observing the actions of his three companions. When they had arrived opposite one enormous square rock, which towered up like a giant amid its neighbors, the rabbit suddenly gave such a violent squeak as nearly made the King drop him.

Immediately the kangaroo stopped, the rabbit sprang to the ground, and the cow knelt down in a manner which showed the King that he was expected to dismount, which he did. Then the three animals ranged themselves in a row before the rock, and each playing on the same instrument as before, they began to sing the following words:

“Cock, cock, King of the Rock,
Show thyself soon, and the gates unlock!”

This they repeated in slow, measured tones six times over, and were just about beginning the same verse for the seventh time, when, without the slightest warning, a bantam cock appeared upon the top of the rock before which they stood, and interrupted their harmony with a loud and melodious “Cock-a-doodle-doo!” He seemed to have sprung out of the rock itself, for he certainly had not flown into his present position, with which he appeared to be perfectly content, and sat flapping his wings, shaking himself, and ever and anon repeating his cry in the most natural manner possible.

After he had done this several times, it appeared to strike him that he had something else to do than to sit and crow there like a common farm-yard fowl. So, ceasing to utter the sound which is so well known to mortals, or at least to those who are accustomed to wake early in the morning in any place near which such birds dwell, he spoke in the language of the country, and with some haughtiness of tone thus addressed the three animals who had called him thither:

“Speak, ye beasts of common stock,
What is your will with the King of the Rock?”

At these words the kangaroo gave a grunt, the rabbit a squeak, and the cow a smothered moo, but whether as a protest against the terms in which the cock spoke of them, or as an acknowledgment of his goodness in doing so at all, the King could not tell. Then they all gave a note on their different instruments, as if to make sure that they were in tune, and began to sing again:

“The cow, the rabbit, and the old kangaroo
Through the wide, wide world have been;
An old love is better than anything new,
And the King still pines for his Queen.
Brave cock, tell the tale which thou know’st to be true
To the cow and the rabbit and the old kangaroo.”

While the animals were singing, the cock drew himself up to his full height, and turned his head promptly to and fro, as if to invite the admiration of any one who might be looking on. As soon as they had concluded he shook himself once more, and then returned this reply:

“If the truth you would know,
It is far below
In the land of the fanny chief
That the Queen doth weep
To the briny deep
As she sits on a coral reef.
But how she got there,
That lady so fair,
Is very well known to you,
You rabbit who squeak,
And you cow antique,
And you frolicsome kangaroo.
A wizard so sly
Who had long had his eye
On the lovely and peerless dame,
As she sat by the oak
Played a practical joke
Which was serious, all the same.
With a laugh and a scoff
He carried her off
To a cavern beneath the sea,
Where the mermaids and elves
Have it all to themselves,
With their songs and their gambols free.
’Tis here that she sits
Half out of her wits
With fright and with grief combined,
And the mermaids’ tails
And their plaintive wails
She never appears to mind.
In moonlit night
And the gay sunlight
They merrily splash and sing,
But she only sighs,
And in sad voice cries,
“Oh, take me back to the King!”
But this, forsooth,
Is your task, and in truth

THE KING STARTS IN SEARCH OF HIS AMABILIA

If the thing you neglect to do,
You're a rabbit disgraced,
A cow double-faced,
And a culpable kangaroo!"

Then the cock ceased speaking, and it may well be supposed that the King heard his words with the deepest emotion. From them he learned much, though not all, that he wished to know. He now knew where his Queen was, and the agents to whom he must trust if he was ever to recover her. That she desired to come back to him, wherever she might be, he had never doubted, but the knowledge that she vainly uttered this wish and had no means of accomplishing it inspired him with a still more earnest determination to spare neither time nor trouble in her rescue. He was about, therefore, to address the three animals at once, in order to implore them to lose no time in giving their assistance, when, before he could do so, they all three struck up again and sang as they had already done, to the music of their instruments, and this was what they said:

"The cow and the rabbit and the old kangaroo
Are ready to do their task,
But the way to begin and the first thing to do
Of the friendly cock they ask.
There's a mystic word and a magic sign
Which are hidden within the rock,
But as sure as six and three make nine
They are known to the bantam cock,
And we ask him to tell them, loyal and true,
To the cow and the rabbit and the old kangaroo."

The cock did not hesitate a moment after hearing the request of the three animals. He did not speak, indeed, but uttering his "cock a doodle-doo" in a vigorous tone, stamped three times upon the rock, which immediately opened and disclosed a large passage, which, to the surprise of the King, appeared to be quite as light as if it had a sun all to itself, or some such substitute for a sun as gas or electric light. Then the cock spoke again, but this time in a grave and solemn tone:

"Within the rock, beneath the ground,
The magic sign and word are found
With which those creatures armed must be
Who seek the caves beneath the sea.
That sign to make, that word to speak,
Learn, and the Queen for whom ye seek,
Recover'd, King, shall soon be thine
By virtue of the word and sign."

As the cock finished speaking the cow again turned round and knelt as a signal for the King to mount, which he accordingly did, first taking up the rabbit in his arms as before. The kangaroo led the way into the rock, which immediately closed behind them, and the King and his three companions disappeared within the passage just as some of the courtiers came in sight, who, having somewhat recovered from their surprise, had pushed through the forest in order to see what would happen to their beloved monarch. They were very much astonished at what they saw, and raised loud cries of surprise and horror when they perceived the rock opening its mouth and swallowing up their King. They rode frantically to the spot, and doubled their shouts and cries when they arrived there. But it was not of the smallest use. The cock had retired, I suppose, from whence he came, the rock presented the usual appearance of rocks, and all the knocking and yelling of the bewildered courtiers produced no effect at all.

When they found that this was the case, they left off yelling and knocking, and rode back to join the rest of their party, to whom they imparted their extraordinary news.

WHAT IS HE?—BIRD OR NOT?

BY EESUNG EYLISS.

NEW SOUTH WALES comes up sharp and clear before my eyes when I look at this beautiful drawing, for that is the country where these strange little fellows live. Strange and odd they are, sure enough, and yet they are not much more so than almost everything around them when they are at home.

Doubtless many of you, in your reading, have learned what a wonderful region that land of Australia is, and how all the trees and the animals and the birds are entirely unlike any that we see. Did you ever see anything that appeared to be half bird and half beast? No, I know you never did; and yet here is a true picture of what you might find any day, or rather any evening, by watching, as I will tell you.

Close behind the town of Sydney comes the Parramatta River, winding around and entering the harbor. On the west side of it is a little stream called Leaf Creek. I do not know how it is now, but I will tell you what used to be there, and what you and I could find if we went out there together. We will start about sunset, for there will be but little use in going during the day. The little fellows that we want to find are in their burrows fast asleep almost always all day long, and come out only just at night. We will go perhaps half a mile up the stream, till we find a place where the trees are quite thick and make a heavy shade over the still water. Sit down now, and watch.

Before we have been there many minutes we see something swimming toward the bank, and as we keep perfectly quiet it comes up and creeps out close to us. It is a beautiful animal, about as large as a musk-rat and looking somewhat like one, the size, we will say, of a half-grown kitten. He is of a fine brown color above and lighter below, with very delicate soft fur. His legs are short and stout, but you see that he can run briskly, and if another comes up and they begin to play, as they are very apt to do, just as likely as not they will go scampering up one of the trees, almost like squirrels, for their claws are sharp, and yet their feet are webbed almost like a duck's. And this is not all, for they have a mouth which seems a perfect copy of a duck's bill, and, in fact, they have almost always been called in the books duck-billed platypus, though the English settlers here on the Paramatta always speak of them as water moles, while the natives of the country call them mullingong. Their scientific name, as you see in the drawing, is Ornithorhynchus paradoxus.

Now perhaps you think this drawing is only a fancy sketch; but you are mistaken, for I will tell you where you can find it. If ever you have an opportunity go to the Museum of Natural History, on the west side of the Central Park, in New York city. You will find the whole building filled with what will interest and instruct you of wonderful animals, birds, and insects, of which I would like to tell you, but cannot do it now: only this one thing—on the left-hand side of the room which you first enter you will see a large glass case, and Mr. Beard has simply made an accurate drawing of what you will see in the case.

These are the specimens of ornithorhynchus, prepared and stuffed with very remarkable skill. They look actually as though they were alive. One is rolled up, with his tail wrapped over his face, for that is the way in which they sometimes sleep, though at other times they sleep lying over on their backs, like that one up above, as you may probably have seen your kitten sleep.

One is climbing up over the branch of a tree, one is creeping down the bank, one is apparently swimming under water, though it is only glass which looks like water. There is the bank, too, with a hole broken into it to show the burrows which they make. These burrows are sometimes twenty feet long, and the outer part is high and dry, with a nice warm nest, while the other end opens under the water.

Now look down in the right hand corner. I am afraid Mr. Beard has put a little fancy into that. It is true he has drawn you a head of a duck and of a water mole, as well as a foot of each of them, which are all right. But he is a funny man, Mr. Beard is. Look at that duck up above that has caught up a poor ornithorhynchus by the tail. I am doubtful if Mr. Beard ever saw anything like that, any more than he did that old duck on this page, who is scolding away at such a vigorous rate at her four-footed relative who is coming up out of the water.

BITS OF ADVICE.

BY AUNT MARJORIE PRECEPT.

A HOLE IN THE POCKET.

DON'T go about with a hole in your pocket, Jennie, Jimmie, Artie; I am anxious on your account. I heard Jennie complaining that her allowance was all used up before the month was half through, and that where she was to get money for slate pencils and car fare and note-paper and charity, she did not know. Jennie's mamma is very wise, and she never comes to her daughter's relief at such times as this, because when the amount of the allowance was determined it was ample to cover all expenses. And Jennie is prohibited from borrowing, or I would lend her some money, so sorry I am for the poor penniless child.

"You are so fond of chocolate creams, dear," I heard Mamie say. Then I understood. The hole in Jennie's pocket was made by chocolate creams.

Jimmie, too, has a hole in his pocket. It is not a hole that you can feel, for his mother takes pains to sew every seam with double thread over and over, and the stuff of the pocket itself is very strong, as it may well be, such a collection of things goes into a boy's pocket. Jimmie never can keep a cent. He always wants to buy something—peanuts, or a new mechanical toy, or a knife, or a paper. Money burns a hole in his pocket.

In Art's case the hole in the pocket springs from another cause. Arthur is very kind-hearted. There are two words, benevolent and beneficent—long words from the grand old Latin tongue, meaning, the first, well-wishing, and the second, well-doing—which describe the highest type of character. Now Arthur has such kind impulses that I wish I could tell you that he was either benevolent or beneficent. In fact, he is neither. He does not like to see suffering, but he does not stop to inquire how he can best relieve it. He simply empties his purse into the hat of the first beggar who asks him, and then, for the next week or ten days, he has nothing to bestow on other poor people, but he cannot pay his own proper debts.

CHAPTER VI.

THE JOURNEY IN SEARCH OF FOOD.

AS the paddles flashed brightly in the moonshine, and the light craft in which René and Has-se were seated moved swiftly and silently down the broad river, the former related to his companion all the particulars of his leaving the fort, and the delays that had detained him past their appointed time of meeting. As he concluded his story, Has-se, who until then had remained silent, said, "Thou hast done well, Ta-lah-lo-ko, and thy success at the outset is proof to me that the Great Spirit favors our undertaking."

Réné was not so convinced of this as his companion, for he was not at all certain that he was acting rightly; but he did not seek to disturb the other's confidence, and only said, "Now tell me of thy escape, Has-se; for I must confess that I would have deemed it impossible, and am not a little concerned to find Fort Caroline such a sieve as thy easy leave-taking would seem to prove it."

Has-se was silent for some minutes, and then he said: "I would have no secrets from thee, my brother, and would gladly tell thee that thou askest; but I may not now, though at another time my tongue may be loosed. For the present I am bound not to reveal that which must needs be known were the manner of my escape described to thee."

Réné felt somewhat hurt at this answer, which seemed to imply a want of confidence in him; but he knew his friend's character too well to press the subject further, and so, smothering his curiosity, he turned the conversation to other things.

After they had travelled for several miles down the river, Has-se turned the bow of the canoe into a sluggish bayou, that wound, with innumerable turnings, amid vast limitless expanses of salt-marsh. This stream led into others that formed such a maze that it seemed to René impossible that they should ever discover a way out of it.

As Has-se kept the canoe to its course, never for an instant hesitating as to which way he should turn, they startled from their resting-places myriads of water-fowl and strange birds, that flew away with harsh notes of alarm. These were answered from the distant forest by the melancholy howlings of wolves and the cries of other night-prowling wild beasts, that sounded very fearful to René's unaccustomed ears.

At length their craft was run ashore at the foot of a small shell mound that formed quite an elevation amid the wide levels of the marshes, and Has-se said they would rest there until sunrise. After hauling the canoe well up out of the water, he led the way to a small hut, thatched with palmetto leaves, that stood half-way up the side of the mound. In it was piled a quantity of long gray moss, that formed a most acceptable bed to the tired boys; and throwing themselves down on it, they were in a few minutes fast asleep.

It seemed to René that he had but just fallen asleep when he was awakened by a light touch upon his forehead. Springing to his feet, he found Has-se standing smiling beside him, and saw that the sun had already risen. Running down to the beach, he bathed his face in the cool salt-water, used a handful of moss as a towel, and turned to the breakfast that Has-se had spent an hour in preparing.

When René saw what a luxurious repast the ingenuity of the young Indian had provided, he opened his eyes wide in astonishment. He knew that a bag of parched corn and several gounds of fresh-water had been brought along, and upon this simple fare he had expected to break his fast. Now, in addition to the parched corn, he saw fish, oysters, eggs, and a vegetable, all smoking hot, cooked to a nicety, and temptingly spread on some freshly cut palm leaves.

The fish were mullet, that Has-se had speared from the canoe as they swam in the clear water. He had cleaned them, wrapped them in fresh damp leaves, raked aside a portion of the fire that he had kindled when he first arose, buried them in the hot sand beneath it, and covered the spot with live coals.

The oysters had also come from the water, in a great bunch that Has-se had just been able to lift and carry to the fire. To cook them he had simply placed the entire bunch on the coals, where they had roasted in their shells, which now gaped wide open, offering their contents to be eaten.

The eggs were plover's eggs, of which Has-se had discovered several nests among the tall marsh grass. They also had been roasted in the hot sand from which the fire had been raked one side.

The vegetable puzzled René considerably, for he had never seen its like, and knew not what to make of it. When he asked Has-se what it was, the latter laughed, with a soft musical laugh, and answered:

"Dost thou not know thy namesake, Ta-lah-lo-ko? It is the leaf bud of a young palm-tree, and with us Indians it takes the place of bread when we have neither a-lee (the maize) nor kooonti-katki (the starch root)."

It was, indeed, the tender leaf bud of the cabbage-palm, roasted in its own husk, and to René it tasted much like roasted chestnuts.

From the shells on the beach he obtained a small quantity of salt that had been left in them by the evaporated water of some former high tide. This he wanted for both his fish and his eggs. Then the two boys sat down to their feast, and ate, and laughed, and chatted, and enjoyed it so thoroughly that one of them at least thought nothing had ever tasted so good to him before.

After breakfast, as there were no dishes to be washed, and nothing to be packed to carry with them, they were able to resume their journey at once. Until nearly noon they were hemmed in by the monotonous salt-marshes. Then they crossed a wide sheet of open water, and entered the mouth of a wild, dark river that flowed into it from the west. The rest of that day and most of the next was occupied in the ascent of this river, which ever grew darker and narrower as they neared its source. They worked incessantly at the paddles, and made such speed that Has-se said they must certainly overtake his people before they reached the land of the Alachuas.

Several times during these two days he ran the canoe ashore at places that his keen vision noted as having been the landing-places of other canoes. At each of these places he found the ashes and charred sticks that denoted recent camp fires, and each time after making such a discovery he returned to René with a puzzled and thoughtful expression on his face. His companion noticed this, and finally inquired the cause.

"What troubles thee, my Has-se?" he asked. "Thy looks betoken a worriment of some kind. May I not share it with thee?"

"Others besides ourselves are in pursuit of my people, and I fear they are enemies."

"What is thy reason for thus thinking?"

"Because I find that each halting-place of Micco's band has been carefully examined after their departure. I have also found the remains of several small but recent camp fires on opposite sides of the river from theirs, and around them I find the traces of but two men. One of these, men is very large, and he wears moccasins that were never made by my people. I fear they are enemies."

* Begun in No. 356, HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE.

"OTHERS BESIDES OURSELVES ARE IN PURSUIT OF MY PEOPLE."

"But why should they be enemies?" asked René. "May they not be some of thy band left behind like thyself? Or may not one of them be thus of thy tribe, and the other be one of the guests who attended the Feast?"

"That is easily answered," replied the young Indian. "If they were friends who for some reason had been left behind, and were now anxious to rejoin those whom they follow, they could have done so long since. Their fires burned at the same time with those of my people, and they have visited Mico's camps before the ashes of his fires grew cold. Besides, in each case their own fires were carefully hidden, so that they could not by any chance be seen by those who were in advance of them."

"Who, then, can be following so large a band, and for what purpose? Surely two cannot harm so many."

"That I know not; but I fear them to be of the outlawed Seminoles. If so, they are following my people for the purpose of picking up plunder, or of snatching the prize of a scalp, a thing they could only gain by a cowardly attack upon one defenceless, for they dare not seek it in open fight. Or it may be that one of them is he who has conceived a bitter enmity against those who never treated him with aught save kindness, and that he has joined with him another equally base."

At this thought Has-se's bright face became clouded, and for some time he remained silent. Finally the silence was broken by René, who asked,

"Who are these Seminoles of whom thou dost speak thus contemptuously?"

"Seminole, in my language, signifies a runaway. They are a band of thieves, murderers, and other bad Indians, who have been driven out of my tribe and other tribes on the north. They have gradually increased in numbers, until now they call themselves a tribe. They are always at war with all men, and against them my people have declared a fight forever."

"And who is he of whom thou speakest so vaguely as having conceived an enmity unjustly against those who have harmed him not?"

"One who should be well known to thee, Ta-lah-lo-ko. I speak of Chitta, whom I hope we may not encounter."

"It will be the worse for him if we do encounter him, and he ventures to interfere with us," replied René.

"Nay, Ta-lah-lo-ko; I have a feeling within me which warns me that a meeting with the Snake will be a sad one for us," answered Has-se, who, though as brave as a young lion, was inclined to be superstitious.

During this conversation the course of the canoe had been through a mere thread of a stream, and René now noticed that they were traversing the mazes of a dark swamp. The little stream connected a series of stagnant pools, or bayous; and just as they came into the open water of one of these, they caught a glimpse of another canoe leaving it on the opposite side. Even as they sighted it it shot in among the trunks of a dense cypress forest, and disappeared.

THE TALE OF A TUB RACE.

BY JOHN R. CORVELL.

ABOUT the most disagreeable thing Bobby Gibson had to do was to carry the "wash" clothes to and from the summer hotel at Middle Lake. The mere carrying of them was easy enough for such a sturdy boy, but it was not so easy to have to pass the city boys and keep the angry words back, when he knew by their smothered laughs and half audible jeers that they were making him the butt of their jokes.

The city boys had planned a tub race, and were in the midst of an animated discussion of the subject when Bobby came along, struggling manfully under the weight of his heavy basket. Frank Cummings, the leader of the hotel boys, noticed Bobby, and as he passed by said, with a careless little laugh,

"Perhaps he'd like to join the tub race."

"Why, yes," exclaimed Ralph Peabody, "it would be in his line."

"Clothes-line, you mean, I suppose," said George Sands.

"He could use his mother's tub," said Frank.

It was all cruel, though the boys meant it only for fun, and laughed accordingly. And perhaps they would never have known it was anything but fun but for that insult to the best woman in the world—his mother.

The big basket was dropped recklessly to the ground, and in a moment more Frank Cummings was on his back, prostrated by a stinging blow from Bobby.

For a second or two it really looked as if they were all to be routed by one boy; but the disgrace of that seemed to suddenly come to them, for they turned upon Bobby, and with one impulse knocked him down and rolled him and his newly washed clothes over in the dirt.

How much more they might have done it is impossible to say, for they were interrupted by a young lady with the indignant question, "Why, what are you doing?"

Then the boys, finding themselves unable to justify the unequal combat, looked sheepishly at each other, until a brilliant idea occurred to one of them, and he exclaimed, "Well, what does he want to come fighting around here for?"

"What's the matter?" asked the young lady, addressing Bobby.

But Bobby had not the heart to answer. He was picking up the pieces of soiled linen, thinking bitterly of the work his outburst of anger was going to cause his tired, worn-out mother; and then, too, the prospect that no more work might come from the hotel.

Fortunately, however, for Bobby's comfort, he had won a champion for himself, though he did not know it until the next morning, when he was surprised by a visit at the cottage from the young lady whom he remembered as having interfered in the fight of the night before. She saw him at the gate, and held out her hand to him, saying:

"Good-morning. You are Bobby Gibson, aren't you? My name's Grace Thornton. I inquired all about the trouble, and I think you did just right, and I came down to tell you so. But what I wanted to tell you most was that there's to be a tub race next Saturday on the lake. Did you ever paddle in a tub?"

"No, ma'am."

"Well, you must practise a little, then. Papa says it's easy enough if you only keep cool and don't try to go too fast. You see, I want you to go in the race and win. I'm sure you can. Besides," she added, carelessly, "the prize is ten dollars. I want you to beat the hotel boys. Will you try?"

Bobby might have refused anybody else after what had happened, but it was hard to say no to pretty Miss Grace, so he said he would try.

"That's right," said Miss Grace. "And remember, now, you must beat. I won't have anything else. And I want you to use your mother's tub. And be sure you practise. You just sit in the tub and paddle with your hands. Keep cool, and don't go too fast. Will you beat?"

"I'll try to," answered Bobby, laughing in response to the merry twinkle in her gray eyes.

Miss Grace had heard the taunts of the hotel boys the day before, and her womanly heart had gone straight out in sympathy for Bobby. She had planned the giving of the prize in the firm belief that Bobby, because he had been wronged, must win, and would thus have a poetical triumph over the hotel boys by beating them in the very tub they had derided him about.

A tub race is little else than a comical sight to the spectators, and so it was in the case of this one to all excepting Miss Grace, who, forgetting what her father had declared were essentials, wondered why Bobby did not put more vim in his strokes, so as to sweep triumphantly past the hotel boys. Bobby, however, had not forgotten his instructions, and was paddling carefully and safely along, while the more injudicious were on every side plunging headlong into the water amid shouts of laughter from the people in the yachts and along the shore.

But there were others as well as Bobby who evidently knew how to paddle the tub, and the most skilful of these was the very Frank Cummings who had been knocked down by him.

Gradually all dropped out of the race except Bobby, Frank, and two other hotel boys, and it soon became evident that the race was between Bobby and Frank. As soon as this fact was noted a new interest sprang up among the lookers-on, for it was now a race between the hotel and the village, and Miss Grace was nearly beside herself in her anxiety lest poetical justice should be defeated, for, with most others, she could not avoid seeing that Frank was gaining a little all the time.

Bobby too saw this, and had about given up hope, when, as he looked along the course ahead, he noticed a faint ripple, which told him, who knew the lake thoroughly, that a rock was hidden there. For a moment he thought to take advantage of the fact, but that thought was indignantly rejected, and swallowing his dislike of Frank, he said, in a low voice, "Look out for that rock right ahead of you, where that ripple is."

A few minutes later Frank Cummings was greeted with cheers as he paddled first past the winning-post, with Bobby second, and the two hotel boys not far behind.

Miss Grace was quite ready to cry, but her father, who had not been made acquainted with her project of dealing out poetical justice, stepped smilingly forward, and commenced a pleasant little speech of congratulation to the winner, when Frank, flushing fiery red, stopped him, and said, confusedly, "Ah—ah—thank you, sir; but—but I—I don't know if I—I am the winner, you know."

Then, with a boy's shamefacedness at doing a generous thing, he told of how Bobby had warned him of the rock, but for which, he said, Bobby would have won.

A murmur of approbation and of applause for the boy's generous spirit ran through the crowd, and Bobby at once awkwardly but vehemently began to disclaim any right to be called winner, when Miss Grace impulsively stepped forward, and with a smile and a sob mixed up as only girls know how to mix them, spoke out, "You two boys have just got to shake hands. There! Papa, you can arrange it this way: Frank is the best paddler, and would have won but for the rock; but Bobby would have won if he had not told Frank about the rock; so you call Frank the winner, but give Bobby the prize."

Everybody declared that nothing could be fairer, and consequently the honors were so divided, Miss Grace meanwhile beaming on the two boys as if she had half a mind to kiss them both. But it was just as well she did not, for boys don't like to be kissed—in public, anyhow.

THE ORIGIN OF THE GAME OF CHESS.

BY L. P. LEWIS.

MANY centuries ago there happened to be a powerful prince whose kingdom lay along the shores of the Ganges, and who took to himself the proud title of King of the Indies. He began to reign while very young, and before he had learned that a king should be the father of his people, and that the most sure and solid support of a throne is the love and loyalty of the subjects. So when the Brahmans and Kajabs (the priests and nobles) reminded him of this, he not only despised their counsels, but caused some of them to be put to death for venturing to give him advice unasked.

Left to the unsafe company of his flatterers, the King fell into every kind of excess, until his oppressed subjects resolved to free themselves. Then it was that an Indian philosopher named Sissa, the Son of Daher, undertook to open the eyes of the prince to the fatal effects of his folly.

With this intention he invented the game of chess, where the king, though the most important of all the pieces, is both powerless to attack his foes and to defend himself without the aid of his subjects.

The new game soon became famous; the King heard of it, and wished to learn it. Sissa was asked to teach him, and while explaining the rules and showing him the skill required to use the other pieces in the king's defence, the Brahmin taught him many truths to which he had hitherto refused to listen.

Endowed with a sound mind, the King took Sissa's lessons to heart, changed his way of life, and thus averted the evils which threatened his kingdom. Anxious to show his gratitude, he left to Sissa the choice of a reward, who requested the number of grains of corn might be given him which the number of squares on the chess-board should produce—one for the first, two for the second, four for the third, and so on, always doubling to the sixty-fourth.

The King, surprised at the modesty of the request, granted it instantly; but when his treasurer had made a calculation, he found that the King had engaged to perform an impossibility, there not being grain enough in all his storehouses to fulfil his promise.

From this, wise Sissa taught the King the danger of hasty promises, and the necessity of exercising caution even in dealing with those in whom one has the greatest confidence.

The game of chess was not long confined to India. The Persians looked upon it as a game to be used in every country not only to amuse, but to instruct kings, as the name they gave it signifies—schatrack, the game of the schah, or king.

The names of many of the pieces have no meaning except in Eastern languages. The second piece after the king is now called queen, but old French authors call it ferche and ferge (corruption of the Latin fericia, derived from the Persian ferz or firzin, signifying minister or vizier). From ferge it has been changed to vierge, virgo, lady, and queen. The resemblance of words made the change easy, and perhaps the more reasonable because the queen is placed near the king, and was at first of small consequence in the game. But the restraint upon the lady of chess was not pleasing to our forefathers, and they extended her steps and scope until the queen became the most powerful of all the pieces.

The third piece, which we call bi-hop, the French, fool, and Spaniards, alferez or sergeant, always bore in the East the figure of an elephant, and had that name. The fourth piece, or knight, has the same figure and name in all countries.

The fifth piece, which the English call rook, Americans, castle, and French, tour, is in Oriental lands represented in the form of a camel, mounted by a man bearing bow and arrows in his hand, and is called rokh. This name, common to Persians and Indians, signifies a species of camel used by the latter for mounting their light cavalry in times of war. The quick movements of this piece agree very well with the name, as it was the only one which was perfectly free in its course, but not so well with the figure of a tower which is usually given these pieces in Western countries.

The sixth and last piece is the pawn, or common soldier, which has never changed in form or in moves.

The Chinese, who are lovers of this game, have made many alterations by introducing new pieces under name of cannons or mortars, and by inventing new moves, increasing the difficulties of a game already so complicated as to be regarded by many as a severe amusement. But these additions have not been approved of in our country, and we still hold to the old manner of playing, each player having sixteen pieces, upon a board of sixty-four squares.

BINNAGER'S MULE.

BY JOHN HABBERTON,

AUTHOR OF "HELEN'S BABIES," ETC.

SOME people think animals cannot reason; some believe they can. I do not propose to decide between them, but merely to tell how a couple of animals who once were enemies became fast friends.

Binnager's mule was one of the characters of Red Hill Road—a country highway on which farm-houses were dotted along at the rate of eight or ten to the mile. The mule's owner was a drunkard, who seldom provided bread enough for his family; as for the mule, he seldom ate oats unless he stole them. He would have been sold long before, and the money turned into rum, had any one been willing to buy him, but he was so small and thin and ugly that no one wanted him; besides, all the farmers along Red Hill Road preferred horses. The mule himself had been known to signify a desire for better company than he had at home; while straying by the roadside—his usual pasture—he had tried to become acquainted with some of the horses who stretched their necks over barn-yard fences, but he was always snubbed, and when he went visiting at barns whose doors were open he was kicked in a manner which even his mulish intellect could construe as a hint that his company was not desired. Horses dislike mules instinctively; they seem to regard them as poor relations who have disgraced the family in some way; and of all the horses of Red Hill Road, the one who seemed most to despise Binnager's mule was Farmer Trudell's black horse Ben.

But there came a time when Ben was too busy to worry about mules or anything else but his own troubles. Just in the middle of ploughing-time his mate stepped into a hole, broke his leg, and had to be shot. His owner had not money enough to buy another, nor had he the time, for it is the fashion for a farmer to waste enough time in selecting a horse to earn the money that would buy him. As to borrowing a mate for black Ben, it was out of the question; no one ever heard of a farmer having a horse to spare in the ploughing season. So Ben had to drag the plough alone day after day, and although he was given extra oats and all the hay he could eat, he lost flesh; evidently he lost temper too, for when allowed to rest at the fence by the road, after turning up a hard furrow with the plough, and Binnager's mule attempted to rub noses with him, Ben always got out of the traces and began to kick down the fence so as to resent the mule's familiarity.

Black Ben grew thinner and thinner, and Farmer Trudell's face grew longer and longer as he looked at the ground yet unploughed, and thought of the crop he ought to raise to keep his family properly supplied. He talked about it to his wife, who became as troubled as he, and finally his two boys, Joe and Will, discussed the situation.

"IT WAS AN ODD-LOOKING TEAM: EVEN THE CHICKENS SEEMED SURPRISED."

They offered to help pull the plough themselves, as they had seen people doing in pictures of farm life in some parts of Europe, but their father said he hadn't yet got down to working half-grown colts.

Finally Will said, "Dad, why don't you work Binnager's mule alongside of Ben?"

Farmer Trudell laughed—it was his first laugh in a fortnight—as he replied: "Because in about two minutes I'd have to take Ben out of the traces to drag the mule's body home. Ben would kick daylight through the beast about as quick as a flash."

This was discouraging to Will, who had not enough new ideas to be willing to lose any of them. But he went on thinking about it, and as his mind had not much else to attend to, he devised a plan which he and Joe put into practice before breakfast-time next morning.

They caught Binnager's mule, hitched him to the plough, and while Joe led him, Will guided the plough once across the field. The furrow was but little straighter than a piece of rope thrown loosely on the ground, but the spectacle of Binnager's mule working at the Trudell plough made a profound impression upon black Ben, whom Will had tied on the opposite side of the fence, so that he could see what was going on. Ben stared fixedly; he did not stop staring; as Will said to Joe, "He looks just as if he was saying, 'Well, I never! Did you ever?'"

Back went the mule and the plough, though Will saw to it that the latter, instead of making a furrow, merely ran on its "heel." Then he ran another furrow right toward black Ben. It was hard work for the little gray mule, with his underfed body, but he was so glad to have any one notice him at all that he tugged honestly. As he neared the end of the field, Will shouted, "Lead him right up to Ben; see if they won't get acquainted now. Jump aside quickly, though; if they should get up a kicking match at that fence, a small boy between them wouldn't have much fun."

Joe obeyed orders. But there was no kicking; on the contrary, the mule stood quiet and meekly looked at Ben. As for the horse, he did not even lay back his ears; he stretched his long neck over the fence, looked critically at the mule for a few seconds, and then touched the mule's great broad muzzle with his rather slender nose.

"Let them talk awhile and get acquainted," said Will. "Rubbing noses seems the horse way of doing it."

So the horse, the mule, and the boys stood there for a few minutes, and the animals were so peaceable that Will said: "I'll tell you what, let's give dad a surprise. You lead Ben around to the barn-yard, I'll drive the mule and plough around there, and we'll hitch the two beasts together, and then invite dad out to see them."

Within five minutes it was done. Will watched the animals' heels carefully, while Joe kept his eye on their ears for alarm signals, but there was no trouble. Ben looked condescendingly down on the mule, who looked meekly up at Ben. It was an odd-looking team; even the chickens in the barn-yard seemed surprised; but the most amazed being on that estate was Farmer Trudell when the boys led him out and explained. "I don't know how they'll pull and guide, hitched together," said he. "I think I'll let each of you boys ride one, so as to guide them; but you must be ready to slide off and jump forward if kicking begins."

The boys were not at all frightened at the prospect; they were as much at home on horseback as village boys on a seesaw. But nothing unpleasant occurred; Ben graciously accepted the mule's assistance, and the mule was so delighted at being in good company that he persisted in trying to do more than half of the pulling. At noon he had a meal that astonished him, and although he stood right beside Ben, the horse did not attempt to kick him away. And that night at the supper-table Farmer Trudell exclaimed: "Horses have some sense. And," he continued, after a short pause, "so have some boys."

The Champion Jumper.

THIERE was a man in Hoppertown
Who used to jump so high.
He kept a cushion on his head
Lest he should hit the sky.

But still on jumping he was bent,
And one day jumped so far
He missed the path to Mother Earth,
And landed on a star.

Then, after resting him a bit,
He said, " 'Tis very plain,
The more I jump, the more I may,
So I will try again."

He spied the "Goat," and with a bound
He lighted on his back;
Harnessed the "Dragon" to the "Plough,"
Pursued the "Lion's" track.

On "Pegasus" he swiftly rode;
On "Aquila" he flew;
The "Ram" he captured by the horns;
Bestrode old "Taurus," too.

Like grasshoppers' his legs became;
His strength no limit knew;
I think each star he'll visit yet
That shines in upper blue.

And now, dear little girls and boys,
If you will use your eyes,
And not go to 'bed too soon,
You'll see him in the skies.

Why do they want to make a hen,
Or sheep, or cat of me?
Why don't they call me now and then Something I'd like to be?

I'd like to be an elephant,
Or eagle, or giraffe,
But when I tell them what I want,
They just sit still and laugh.

For, on these pleasant autumn nights,

What we call shooting-stars
Are but the leaps this man doth make
Who jumped from Earth to Mars.

ONE OF LIFE'S MYSTERIES. BY E. W.

Oh, life is all so very queer,
I don't know what I am!
Mamma calls me her little dear,
And grandma calls me lamb.

Papa says I'm his little puss,
Or sometimes little kid,
And brother tells me I'm a goose—
Yes, that's just what he did!

They call me kitten, fairy, chick,
Dove, and canary-bird,
And then they tell me I'm a brick—
It's certainly absurd!

THREE LITTLE MICE.

THREE poor little mice
Were caught in a trice.
Pray how did this come to pass?

Their home they forsook,
And just went to look
At a little red box in the grass.

Jenny Girl and Johnny Boy
 Heard the bluebird singing.
 "Spring is coming—spring is near,
 A pretty flower is budding.
 Off to meet her started they,
 With much merry laughter.
 Kitty Cat and Pappy Dog
 Trotting quickly after."

OUR POST-OFFICE BOX.

NAMUR, BELGIUM.

DEAR POSTMISTRESS.—I am an American girl twelve years old, and am in Europe to learn German and French. Mamma, my brother, and I came over in May. We were one week in Berlin, where we saw all of the royal family, and Prince Bismarck's grandchildren. We were then in dena-Thuringia. We have also been for several weeks in Baden, a beautiful place in the midst of the Black Forest. There are many lovely walks and excursions, and the costumes of the peasants are very curious and attractive, the different styles and colors indicating their grade in life. It was in Freiburg that a monk accidentally discovered gunpowder; he was busy mixing a remedy for the sick, and put charcoal, saltpetre, and sulphur in a mortar, which mixture was soon followed by an explosion. The tradition does not say whether or not he was killed. From Freiburg we were in Stuttgart—a very pretty but more modern town than most German places. In Nuremberg there are many queer, quaint things, it is impossible to describe the city; it is well worth a visit to one of the old cities of Germany. At the Town-hall, where the "Diets" were held, I sat in the chair the King used to preside in. In this hall is the stone lion that threw red and white wine over the people for three days after the close of the Thirty Years' War. I saw the old gates of the city, the house of Albrecht Dürer, the castle, and the royal apartments. We saw the instruments of torture, used, some of them, as late as sixty years ago; they are horrible. We came to Nuremberg to Karlsruhe—a famous place for "cures." I expect to go to school in Dresden this winter. I am afraid I have written you so long a letter you may not find room in the Post-office Box for it, but I hope you will try. I forgot to say we have had HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE since the first number, so it is as old and dear as loved friend. I have it sent me every week, and I prize it more and more after its trip across the waters. I am its and your friend, BELLE G.

CLEARWATER HARBOR, FLORIDA.

I have not written to you in so long a time that I thought I would write again. I have had HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE for five years, and like it very much. For pets, I have three dogs and six cats; we had eleven, but we got lost four, and one died. Last night a thief tried to break into a house near ours. I have one brother and one sister, of whom I am the eldest. I had three brothers, but two died. Your little friend,
 JAMES M. (aged eleven).

JACKSONVILLE, OREGON.

I am a reader of HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE, and like all the stories very much. I was very much pleased when I saw "Nippon Pete," but would have liked it better if Peter had lived and had a home. I would like one of the cireuhers George W. R. speaks of if George would be kind enough to send me one. I live in southern Oregon, and like it here very much. I have lived in a mining camp, and have picked up quite large pieces of gold in the hot rock. If any reader of my age (fifteen) would like to correspond with me, I should be glad to have her, and could tell my story about mining. I was born in Oregon, but mamma and I spent several years in Michigan, and I like Oregon the better of the two. I am a great reader. My favorite authors are Charles Dickens, Louisa M. Alcott, and Walter Scott. I agree with Adele Watson, and think Our Mutual Friend is very interesting; and if she could answer her correspondent, I should like to correspond with her.

 PIERRE L. KELLEY,
 Jacksonville, Oregon.

LONG BRANCH, NEW JERSEY.

I read Laura F.'s letter, and I am nine years old, and I read it and liked it. I go to school, and study arithmetic, spelling, and writing, and Third Reader. I have no pets, except my little sister of four, who is better than any pet I could wish for. I am going here for the summer in winter I live in New York. Sometimes I go down to the beach and gather shells. I have a very pretty bracelet, which I made myself with some of them. I send my love to you, and to—
 GRACE R. K.

For the first time I am going to write you a letter—not a long one, but only to tell you that I like HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE very much. I like the magazine for quite old young people as well as for the little ones. I am eighteen years old, but not too old to read it, for I have been enjoying it since I was five years of age. I have a sister and a girl in our family, and am often very lonesome, and reading over the Post-office Box makes me often wish I could know some of the other girls who write to it; so if any girls between sixteen and nineteen would like to correspond with me, I should love to have them write, and would answer every letter, for I love to write letters.
 F. B. D.,
 Box 179, Northfield, Minnesota.

WASHINGTON.

I am a little girl eight years old. I live in Washington, and have one pet; it is a kitten, and I have not named it yet. I have five sisters, all older than myself. I used to live in Bloomington, Illinois, and then we came here. As this is the first letter I have written, I hope it will be printed. A friend of ours sends us HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE, and I like it very much. He said I liked to read it, and then we came here. I like to read the stories. I have two dolls; one is named Georgiana Buttercup and the other is named Lulu Rockwood Oberly.
 EUNICE K. O.

TORONTO ISLAND, CANADA.

I live on an island opposite Toronto. I saw in the Post-office Box a letter from a little girl who lives at the same place that I do. We have lots of fun here rowing and bathing every day. I have four brothers and one sister. I know how to row and how to swim, and we have great fun in bathing and diving off our boat, which, when we go bathing, we take for that purpose. We have been here for three summers. In the winter we live in the city of Toronto, and have lots of fun tobogganing and sleighing, and we also go to a good many parties there. At the island we have a roller coaster, two switchbacks, a merry-go-round, and a cable coaster; we also have electric light here. I go to school, and learn English and French, and I am going to learn music. We have no pets except a cat and a dear little baby brother. We have taken HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE a good while, and have enjoyed them very much. When we get twenty-five papers, we send them to be bound. We all like the paper very much.
 MAB.

GENEVA, NEBRASKA.

I have taken your charming paper for over six years, and like it very much. I am eleven years old, and have a good many pets, and two girls of my age. My papa is in California at present. I have no pets to tell you about, but one of my little boys has a dog named Stanley. I had two canary-birds once, named Bob and Annie; they both died. Would you rather have the letters in ink or lead-pencil? I have two brothers, named Parker and Tom. Parker is seven, and Tom is fourteen. I have no sister. I am a great reader, and I have some very nice books: I have Faith and Courage, Uncle Tom's Cabin, Little Men, Diddle, Dumps, and Tom Sawyer, and many others. I hope you will print my letter. I wish I had time to tell you about a visit to Wyoming; I once took out my letter to it, but I am afraid. Good-by.
 MATTIE F.,
 Always use ink, if you please, Mattie, in writing to me, and tell of your little visit in your next letter.

TORONTO, ONTARIO.

Yesterday I caught a lot of crayfish, or brook crabs, and put them in a pan of water, and I found them at the bottom; but not knowing what to feed them on, they, much to my sorrow, one by one, died. I had a little tank, and I had made an aquarium like the one described in Mr. Beard's American Boy's Handy Book. Could any one tell me how to keep and feed the little fish?

I go to the Wellesley Public School. This was my first year at it, and I took the second prize in a book of poetry by Thomas Moore, and was promoted to the Junior Fourth Book. I came out ahead in the examination, but our session marks count in for the three prizes; if I had had five more marks I would have had the first prize. Thank I live in Canada, I am still one of Uncle Sam's boys.
 Your affectionate reader,
 HERBERT M.

Be very careful about having those marks all right next year. Some reader who has had experience may give you the information you require about your aquarium.

MORRAY VALLEY, NEW YORK.

I am going away to school soon, and my mamma will send the paper to me. I suppose it goes to a great many places in England, and I wonder if it goes to Stockton on the river Tees? My grandfather used to live there when he was quite young, and if any of the readers of HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE live there, I would like very much to hear from them. Perhaps they will write to the Post-office Box.
 GERTRUDE P.

NEWARK, NEW JERSEY.

This is the first time I ever wrote to you. I have taken this dear little paper for about five years, and I enjoy the stories written by Mr. Forman very much. I have been reading it many times, but I was born in bright, beautiful New York. I think L. M. P. very unkind to call me "my little ugly." I have neither sisters nor brothers, but I have a little girl, and I love her as much as if she were my sister. I have one pet, a pug-dog. I think I would like to correspond with some of the readers of HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE.

Adeline's present address is Lexington, Kentucky, and you may write to her if you choose.

DEAR POSTMISTRESS.—I have never written before. I am a little girl of eight years old. I have a little brother three and a half years old. I have only one pet; it is a kitten named Fanny. I think that this letter is getting too long. May I belong to the Little House-keepers' Club?
 EMILY B.

Yes, dear, and as vacation is almost over, I expect to ring one of my little bells soon, gather all my Little House-keepers, and begin some pleasant work in earnest.

CINCINNATI, OHIO.

I went to Chicago this summer, and had a very nice time. We went from Chicago to Milwaukee on the lake. In the morning the lake was just lovely, but about noon the wind came, and it began to grow rough, and by evening it was so rough that the water would come up over the front of the boat, and I had no one could get the front of the boat. I became sea-sick, and a good many others did too. We arrived at Milwaukee about six o'clock in the evening, and the city was so crowded that we went back to Chicago on the same boat. We staid in Chicago a few days, and then went to visit my aunt.

MARGARET G. E.

SAN SIMON, CALIFORNIA.

DEAR POSTMISTRESS.—I am a little girl eight years old. My sister takes HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE, and we all like it very much. I have five brothers, but about the same age as I am. My little girl, about eight years old, to write to me. We have Sunday-school and Band of Hope. I belong to the Band of Hope. My good teacher, Miss Kate C. W., teaches both.

ANNIE BELLE E.

MILTON, MASSACHUSETTS.

DEAR POSTMISTRESS.—I have found a word longer than inconspicuous, and I thought I might forward it, and that is philoprosopitiveness.

EMMA G. M.

BANDON, VIRGINIA.

My younger brother, Robbie Clifford, takes HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE, and we like to read the stories in it very much. I think "False Witness" a very nice story, and I think "The Non-combatant Boat Club" seems to me as good a story as just splendid. We live about a hundred yards from the river, and my brother Robbie Clifford has a little row-boat, it is not so pretty one, but I love it very well for Robbie and myself. As neither of us can row with two oars, and not so very well with one, we do not go out in deep water. I wish I had a boat with an anchor, as Uncle Gilesen, if she wants to.
 BELLE R. HARRISON.

I have written before, but my letter was not published, so I thought I would try again, and hope for better success. I read all the letters in the Post-office Box this week, and I would like to correspond with the girls in it, as I live in New Jersey. I am just her age. I will answer her letters promptly. I have been taking HARPER'S

YOUNG PEOPLE for almost a year. My favorite story is "Ride Home," "Opportunity," and I am very much interested in "False Witness." I think Fannie was a very mean girl; don't you? I would like to buy the book. For pets I have two cats, a goat, and a horse named Jenny, which I ride and drive. When school closed I received a gold medal for my good lessons, and was very glad to get it. I must close, dear Postmistress, with love. I remain your fond reader, Mrs. M. P. B.

MINNIE'S PURSE.

"Oh, isn't it pretty?" This expression was applied to a very pretty purse which Minnie Acree had just received from her aunt, Emma, in Brookville. Minnie was the oldest girl in a family of seven children, and she lived on a sheep ranch away out in Texas. It was her thirteenth birthday that she received the purse.

"What will you do with it?" asked Tom. "Put money in it," said Minnie, wondering how she could obtain some. "Where do you get it?" asked Tom. "I got it from my mother's purse called."

"Minnie! Minnie! come pare the peaches for dinner." At supper she started the family by asking her father how much blackberries would bring by the quart, and she looked pleased when he told her about eight cents. Then she asked him how much the peaches and pickling berries. At one o'clock she had the baskets, with a quart measure on top of one of them, all ready to get in the wagon on her way to the mill. As the wagon was going to the mill, three miles below the village, and had offered to take her as far as the village. At six o'clock, when Tom drove along, he saw, standing at the corner of the main avenue and the highway, Minnie, with empty baskets, and her arms full of bundles; for she had bought blue and orange and red wax for her mother, lace for mother, and candy for the little ones. Tom helped her in the wagon, and stowed away her bundles; and thus she leave Minnie and her first pocket money.

Edna M. N. (aged 12 years).

PHILADELPHIA, PENNSYLVANIA.

The first money a child earns looks larger and is enjoyed more than any money he or she ever receives. There are many ways of earning money besides that of picking berries. Did you ever earn any, little readers?

THE FAIR.

There were five little girls who were thinking of a way to earn money. They lived in Massachusetts. The names of these girls were Annie and Fred (twelve years), Montana and Annie Alr (thirteen), Lillie Barr (twelve), and Ella Hunt (eleven). None of these little girls were large; the oldest was only about twelve. They had had to work to do—lace, mittens, collars, stockings, handkerchiefs, and many other things. They met at one of their houses and worked for about two or three hours a day; they met three days in the week.

Finally the day for the fair came. It was a bright morning on the 1st of August, when all the people from the town came to see the fair. There were different colors of tatting at twelve cents a yard, lace collars from twenty-five cents upward, stockings at from five to ten cents, mittens at twenty cents, lace hoods and caps at fifteen cents, hats at fifteen cents, and pretty "crayon" patchworks sold at high prices. With the money they bought ice-cream and other necessary things which were needed. Finally they saved up money enough to be of use to themselves and to help the poor.

RIFFON GLEN, NEW YORK.

I am a little girl twelve years old. I am spending part of my vacation up here in the Catskill Mountains, but I live in Brookton. We have had a lovely weather here since I have been here, and nearly every day we go fishing and rowing. My friend Clara and I like to paddle in the water every week, and we do so nearly every day. I have a little brother four years old. For a pet I have a pug-dog whose name is Yum-Yum. I like the stories in HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE very much.

JESSIE L. B.

FOUR HAYS, KANSAS.

I have taken HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE for four years. It has come to me in Montana, North Carolina and in Kansas. I have been taking Golden Days for a year. I like both papers, but Young People is my oldest and best friend. It has come to me by my mother's name, and she has me housework, for she says that it is no more than right that I should know how to work about the house. I can make biscuit and cake, and can do many pretty things to help mamma a great deal. "Nan" is my favorite story, and I shall try to take Nan for a model, and I ask you to thank Mrs. Lillie for telling me about her. I have no pets. I did have a dog named Check, but he died because he was home-sick. I am twelve years old. Good-by, dear Postmistress. With love from one of your little girls, BELLE C.

BUFFALO GLEN, NEW YORK.

DEAR POSTMISTRESS—I am a little girl twelve years old. I do not live at Buffalo Glen; I am only spending my vacation here. I have two sisters, the oldest fifteen and the youngest four years old. All the stories in HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE were very much, and I think "Nan" and "Rolf Hove" were very interesting, and now I am very much interested in "False Witness," which I think is a lovely story. I like to read the letters in the Post-office Box also. I go to school, and study reading, writing, arithmetic, spelling, geography, grammar, etc. I wrote to you once before when I was quite little. My little friend Jessie is writing to you too. CLARA D. B.

THE BLUEBIRD.

A bluebird sat in a chestnut-tree. He warbled a song as sweet as could be. A hunter came under the chestnut-tree, and shot at his slender, as blue as looking as he. The hunter saw the bluebird there, and said it and another would make a fine pair; He raised his gun in the quietest way, and in a moment brought down the jay.

Into his game-bag he put him quick, For at that time he had time to pick. How he went with a hasty stride; "See what I have!" he loudly cried.

His wife a stew of the bluebird made, And with its feathers she made a shade. This is the end of my story, said the poet, In my song when you read it you can be well. ALICE MCL.

FRANK'S LESSON.

Frank Wilson was ten years old, and he was a very naughty little fellow, as you will know when I tell you what he did.

"Frankie," said his mother, "I am going away, and I do not expect to be at home to-day, and remember, do not go to skate on the river, because it is not strong enough to bear you yet."

"Yes, ma'am," answered Frank, with a sigh, because "Red Marshall had said that a whole lot of boys were going down to skate to skate that very afternoon, and they wanted him to go along. "I know they will laugh at me when I tell them I am not allowed," said Frank to himself, when his mother had gone. "Oh! I know just what I will do," he cried, suddenly. "Mother has gone now, and I will go down to skate, and get my new skates, and go down to the river, and nobody will know the difference."

So Frank came home from school, and threw down his satchel of books, got his skates, and was about to start off, when Mary, the girl, said, "Master Frank, did your mother say that you could go down to the river?" "What difference does it make to you," answered Frank. "What she said?" "Well," said Mary, "I don't think she did, because you know that she is very strict about going to skate on the river."

Frank's temper was up, and he said, crossly, "If you mind your business, I'll mind mine," and off he started.

"What kept you so late?" growled one of the boys. "I can't think so," chimed in another. "Here we hung around your front gate until we were almost frozen."

"Oh, I couldn't come any sooner," answered Frank, truthfully. "Oh, I guess his mother wouldn't let him," sneered a boy.

Frank did not answer, and somebody else did not enjoy himself as much as usual.

Meantime Mrs. Wilson came home, although she did not expect to, and not seeing Frank, she went to the room where he was, and Mary told her all about it.

"I suppose he did not expect me home, and he took the wrong time of my absence to disobey me," said Mrs. Wilson. "While Frank was skating around, he thought, 'I am so glad that mamma will be home to-day, and then she won't.' Suddenly the ice broke beneath him, and he felt himself go down, down, and down. He could not cry for help. Some of the boys saw him sink, and saved him. The next thing Frank knew, he was lying in his own bed at home, and his mother was bending over him. His mother forgave him, and he got well, but he never disobeyed her again. EDITH B. T.

HELDON, NEBRASKA.

Were you ever away out here in Nebraska? I have lived here over six years, and I have never been away. When we moved here, we had very few neighbors, and our post-office was ten miles away. Now there is a post-office two miles from here. I have had many letters, and I have been to town for about seven months. Three or four kinds of cactus grow wild on the prairie near here. One kind, the prickly pear, has very pretty yellow flowers on it; another kind, the pin-cushion, or crown, has red flowers. A good many people have some in their flower-garden. It is almost impossible to kill them. We used to live in town before we came here. I would much rather live in the country than in town. I have taken HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE since October, 1881. Of the stories, I like "The Talking Leaves" and "The Ice Queen" the best. I am almost seventeen years old, and I have had many letters. I have a doll that I think a great deal of, and I play with her sometimes, too; her name is Luzena. DALE.

LESON, MASSACHUSETTS.

DEAR POSTMISTRESS—We thought we would write to you and tell you about a little adventure that I had in the country. I live in the woods of Maine. We were a long distance from any habitation, and though our father had shot several deer, we had not killed one. So, since one of us had seen, while walking near the camp, the footprints of a deer (as we supposed at the time), we thought it would be fun to take one of the footprints and bring it back to camp without letting anybody know. Off we went. When we had gone about a mile the dog began to be uneasy, and looking carefully ahead, we saw a large moose some distance away had thought grazing near us. We both dropped on the ground and crawled to the nearest tree, and resting our guns on one of the higher branches, took a long aim and fired at the same time. We could not tell whether either of the shots had struck him, but afterwards found that both had taken effect. When the smoke cleared, we saw the moose coming for us with his head down. The tree that we were under being a large one, we scrambled up into its branches. But the dog was not so fortunate, and the moose tossed him, and the last we saw of him he was tearing toward the camp. Now we wanted the moose to leave us, but he sat down under the tree, and we saw that we were prisoners till help arrived. After about two hours we saw the dog coming toward us, and also we saw our father and two of the guides, who killed the moose; and we decided not to go out without a guide after this.

SAND SERPENTS.

THIS name was given by an imaginative traveller to the wonderful columns of whirling sand that are so frequently seen on the great plains of Central Asia.

Fancy what a terrible country to journey through! For miles and miles one unbroken stretch of dreary sand, nothing to break the monotony, nothing to rest the eyes, unless one of these fantastic exhibitions, which, knowing the discomfort and the danger, a traveller would rather not see, takes place.

The first signal is a puff of wind, followed by various slight disturbances in the loose soil roundabout; then it blows harder, and, as if a legion of evil things had been called from the centre of the earth, tiny columns of sand lift themselves, and grow larger and larger and rise higher and higher, like the misty giant Sinbad the Sailor loosed from the great caldron he found in the sea.

These columns have the form of serpents, and all the waying sinuous motions of those terrible creatures. Sometimes they will rise to a height of fifty, sixty, and, if we may believe the testimony of some writers, even two hundred feet. They sweep over immense stretches, sometimes singly, sometimes in groups, gathering size and force as they go, and then, as the wind lowers, diminish, and dwindle into nothingness.

But for the terror of being caught in one of these sand-storms, and being blown and beaten about, and having one's sight and hearing almost destroyed, the phenomenon would be almost as grand as any in nature. One could fancy the evil spirits of the world at play, writhing, twisting, wrestling, and exercising their mighty strength on the play-ground of the desert.

BEN'S BLAZE.

BY WILLIAM O STODDARD.

IT was a dry spring on the prairie. There had been almost a drouth since the last of February. The new grass had made a small start, but last year's grass stood above it, dry and brown, and above that nodded the tall heads of the dead rosin-weeds.

Mr. Carr Marrow said to his wife and to his son Ben: "It's going to be the best kind of a year for corn. There's rain a-coming some day. This 'ere dry spell is just the thing to get the ground in order, and to do your ploughing, and pop your seed in early. Now, Ben, my boy, we'll have some fun, and you needn't even call it work."

Ben knew what that meant. He rolled over on the floor, and took a look at Dusty. The look meant: "You're a dog that won't have any boy with him to-morrow. All that corn's got to be broken down."

It came out just so. The cornfields of that farm reached out from the fenced wheat fields near the house right into the open prairie. Beyond them stretched the swells and the levels, and these had not changed, except for new ant-hills, since the last drove of buffaloes left them.

Outside of Carr Marrow's ploughed land there was but one break in the prairie grass, and that was at Hiller's Grove, not much more than a mile away. Hiller's house was in the grove, and his farm was all around it, and neither Ben nor his father knew that "old man Hiller," as everybody called him, was already busy with his last year's corn stalks.

Ben remembered that he had had to reach up, in corn harvest, for most of the ears he had pulled from the tall stalks he had worked among. He had gone home every night, until snow came, with a great ache in his arms, and the memory of it came back to him. It helped to give him a feeling of pleasure when he and his father, with a span of horses and a long, heavy pole, went out after the next morning's breakfast to break down all those corn stalks. They were old enemies of his. They had robbed him and Dusty of many a good rabbit hunt, and now they were to be knocked over and burned up.

A horse was hitched to each end of the pole, and Ben and his father each drove a horse. It was no joke for the horses, and Carr Marrow was just the man to do all the work there was in one day. It took him and Ben two whole days' hard dragging to crush the tall ranks of all that corn. It was just what old Mr. Hiller was doing, but Mrs. Hiller drove his other horse for him, and said, "Sakes alive!" every time she saw a rabbit. The six little Hillers took turns in coming out to see the corn go down, but not one of them was big enough to have any real grudge against the corn stalks.

Ben Marrow felt that he had more grudge, rather than less, at the end of the second day. Dusty was also a weary dog, for he had barked in vain all the time. Either he had chased thirty-two rabbits or he had chased one rabbit thirty-two times, and he did not care a bark which.

Ben looked back at the long rows of broken stalks, and said to his father, "There'll be some fun in seeing 'em burn."

"They'll go like tinder, Ben. We must look out that the fire doesn't get away from us. There's an awful amount of rosin-weed in all that grass yonder."

Ben knew that, for he had scrooped an unusual supply of "gum" from the stalks of it. He had found some beads of rosin that were bigger than buckshot, and rosin will burn. He had touched off a great many rosin-weeds just to see them blaze, and they had never disappointed him. They all had burned successfully.

Mr. Carr Marrow told his wife to have breakfast early that third morning, and she did so; but when Ben awoke it was because Dusty had put his fore-paws on the edge of the bed and tried to pull away the pillow.

"Just so, Dusty," said Ben. "We've got to burn all that cornfield over to-day."

Dusty did not know what the fun was to be, but he danced away toward the cornfield. Mr. Marrow followed, with a wisp of paper in one hand, and Ben's mother followed with another wisp. She said to Ben:

"I do just want to see it get well a-going. There's a good wind, and it'll burn first-rate."

If Dusty had ever before seen corn-stalks on fire he had forgotten it, to judge by the way he tore around after the blazes began to creep along the down rows. He was a dog in a new business, with but a dim idea of the amount and kind of barking demanded. He therefore put in all he had and of every kind he knew.

"I'll plant some more fire, mother," said Ben, as soon as the first blaze was well a-going. "That one'll grow."

A corn-stalk with some husks on it made a good enough torch to plant fire with, and that was where the fun came in, and more than a little brisk work with it. The wind helped well, and drove the fire along the rows, but all scattered clumps had to be especially lighted, all scattered stalks had to be thrown into the blaze, and all skipped spaces had to be cared for, so that the field would be clean burned, ready for plunging.

Every kind of game got away from that field in a hurry, and Dusty had nothing of duty left him but his barking at that fire. Mrs. Marrow went back to the house after a while, saying something about corned beef for dinner, and she did not know that Mrs. Hiller was getting ready precisely that sort of thing, with pork and cabbage and turnips. There was plenty to eat among all the farms along that prairie, but the Hiller family were to have something with their dinner, and had not the ghost of an idea that there was anything coming.

A great deal of industrious burning had been done before ten o'clock, and the wide stretch of field behind Ben and his father was marked by long rows of gray-black ashes, with little stumps of charred corn-stalks sticking up, four feet apart each way. Ben said it looked, for all the world, like a great gridiron, and then he added, "Father, can Dusty and I go and fire the field beyond the road?"

"I don't care if you do. The wind's kind o' gone down. Only you just look out and see that it doesn't get away from you."

"Du-a-usty?" shouted Ben, and in an instant a quantity of ashes and hair, very much like a dog, came bounding across the smoking lines from the other side of the field. Ben broke off a stalk that had upon it the withered husks of two large ears close together. He lighted them at the nearest blaze, and sprang toward the outlying field that was as yet unscorched. Neither the road nor the cornfield had any fence to put in his way. Dusty picked up a stalk on his own account, but forgot to light it, and dashed away after his master.

From row to row, in quick succession, the little flames flashed up as Ben worked on. When he began, the air was almost still, and he said it was too quiet altogether for rapid burning. Perhaps it was, and it made him work so much the harder that he hardly noticed a sudden change that came.

He and his father had been raising such clouds of smoke that they had not seen how fast the clouds of another sort were gathering in the sky. A sudden puff of wind from the wrong direction all but blinded Ben, set Dusty a-sneezing, and made Mr. Marrow cover his face with both hands. Another from the opposite point of the compass caught the fires that had been lighted and whirled them fiercely away along the down rows toward the prairie.

"Look out for your fire, Ben!" shouted Mr. Marrow. "I've got to tend to mine. Don't let 'em get away from you."

Ben sprang to his work with a will, stamping out blaze after blaze, and Dusty barked like mad, but it was too late. One heavy row escaped them. Either it was drier, or more combustible, or more mischievous, for it carried its blaze as if it had been a racer. Before Ben even got near it the flashes were springing up and away before the gusts of wind, almost at the edge of the prairie. Right at the end of that row of cornstalks a thick clump of rosin-weeds stood waiting, nodding eagerly to the fire to hurry along.

"Father!" shouted Ben; but at that moment the nearest rosin-weed reached out and caught a finger of fire from a flaming bunch of husks, and in one great flash and flare Ben's work had gotten utterly away from him.

"Oh!" was all Carr Marrow could exclaim, until after a long breath, and then he added: "I was half afraid of it. Mine's getting away from me. Old man Hiller's place is right in the track of it. Just see it go!"

It was well worth seeing, for the rosin-weeds had lighted the long brown grass around them, and the varying, eddying gusts of the coming storm had carried the fire in all directions.

A widening wall of smoke and blaze higher than a man's head swept on over the prairie. Every here and there it bounded twice as high over bunches of tall grass and weeds, and it roared with furious delight at having so much freedom and such quantities of wind and rosin to work with.

Old man Hiller had said to his wife that morning: "We won't do our burning to day. I don't like the looks of the weather;" and when he saw the smoke rise at Carr Marrow's, he added: "Just like him. He'll fire the whole prairie if a gust comes."

He was sitting in the house mending a piece of old harness, when one of the small Hillers out at the door shouted "Father!" and the next younger screamed "Mother!" and the next older bawled "Fire!" and two others began to squall without saying what it was for; but Thomas Jefferson Hiller was twelve years old, and all he said was, "Good! it's coming right this way, too."

Mr. and Mrs. Hiller were out at the door in a twinkling. She lifted both her hands, and said, "Sakes alive!" twice; but her husband only pulled up his trousers an inch, and remarked: "It's Carr Marrow's work. It's got away from him. I'll save us any work with our corn."

"It'll burn us out of house and home," groaned his wife—"it'll burn us all up."

"Don't get down into the well just yet," said he. "Perhaps it won't do any hurt. It might, though."

Thomas Jefferson Hiller had three dogs, besides four puppies, and they all came out to stand by him and whine about that fire as the first smoke came drifting down the wind. None of the Hillers knew that back beyond that terrible rolling wall of black and red there was a dog too full of smoke to bark any more, and a boy half ready to cry because he could not break through and tell his neighbors that the fire was coming to burn them all up.

The clouds in the sky came leaning down to lock hands with the dense volumes of smoke from the prairie fire, and the wind drove them all forward vigorously.

"That's it!" shouted old man Hiller.

It was a vivid flash of lightning that went flickering in among the long tongues of rosin-weed flame just as Carr Marrow said, breathlessly:

"It's 'most there, Ben. There won't be a smitch left of Hiller's Grove. It'll roast 'em all alive!"

A crashing peal of thunder answered him, and then came down the rain.

"I never saw it pour so in all my life," said Mrs. Hiller, as she caught up her youngest child and hurried into the house. "Sakes alive!"

Thomas Jefferson Hiller dropped a puppy, and exclaimed: "My! But it's bad for the fire."

Not many minutes after that Ben Marrow came dripping along into the Hiller front door, and Dusty dripped just behind him, and Carr Marrow leaned over both of them to say:

"Well, old man Hiller, you've had the narrowest kind of a 'scape."

"Well, yes; I reckon so," said Mr. Hiller. "I was kind o' hoping it'd get to my corn-stalks before the rain came on, but it didn't. Is yours mostly done?"

"Mostly. But wasn't you afraid it might do some mischief?"

"Burn us up? Well, yes. Perhaps. So it might. Come in and get dry. I was thinking of the stalks. It'd have cleaned them, fine."

"Ben," said Thomas Jefferson Hiller, "you're awful wet."

"Yes; but wasn't that an awful fire? It got away from me."

"It was just fine! It stopped only three rods beyond our east fence, and right at the edge of our corn. Stalks all down and ready for it, too."

The rest of the Hiller family did not seem to feel like mourning over that fact, and their cat drove Dusty out of the house. There was no harm done, after all.

THE TOILERS UNDER THE SEA.

BY SOPHIE B. HEIRICK.

THE Pacific and Atlantic oceans, where the water is not too cold, are dotted over with myriads of islands of a very peculiar kind. Many of these islands can be found upon the map, but a great multitude of them are too small to be put down.

These are coral islands, and they are formed, little by little, by tiny living beings, some of them so small that you can only see them plainly by using a magnifying-glass. The Florida Keys, the Bermudas, and other islands near our Southern shores are the work of the coral animal, as well as the reefs along the Florida coasts. Many of the islands built up in this way are ring-shaped—round, or oval, or irregular—but enclosing a quiet lake. In some the ring is incomplete, and the water inside it is a land-locked bay; in others there is a row of islands which, if connected, would make a ring. The Bermuda Islands are such a row.

These curious islands are called atolls. They lie very low, and the curved strip of land forming the island bears a grove of feathery palms and beautiful flowering trees, bordered by a beach of pure white sand. Seen from above, an atoll would look like a gigantic green wreath floating on the bosom of the water (Fig. 1).

It must be a wonderful thing to be the first person who has visited one of the lovely, lonely atolls of the Pacific, whose only inhabitants are birds. Fifty years ago this was a more common occurrence than it is now, when the seas are so full of great ships and steamers, as well as smaller craft, that most of them have been at some time visited. Professor Dana, who went out on an exploring expedition some time ago, says that "on one atoll, where no natives ever dwelt, the birds were so innocent of fear that we took them from trees as we would fruit, and many a songster lost a tail feather as it sat perched upon a branch apparently unconscious that the world contained an enemy." They had never found out the vow of eternal enmity sworn against the birds by the boys. Poor little heathen birds! How they did need a missionary!

You may have heard of the coral insect, and of its wonderful industry in building up great islands in the sea, as if coral was built as honey-comb is. The coral animal is not an insect, nor anything like one, and it builds the coral precisely as you build up the bones in your body. It is a sort of flower-animal, shaped like an aster or an anemone or a daisy. It has nothing of the flower about it except a resemblance in shape, but is as truly an animal as an oyster or a fish. The coral polyp has a thick stem crowned by a row of petal-like arms arranged about a centre, or sometimes several rows so arranged. The stem is the body, and in the upper part of this is a hollow sac—the stomach. The centre of the flower is the mouth, and the petals are feeders to catch and draw in the floating food that comes within reach. Some of the sea-anemones do not make coral, and others do, but all are constructed on this simple flower plan (Fig. 2, a, b).

When you eat and digest your food, new particles of flesh are formed. These are pushed in between the particles already there, and at the same time old particles which are dead and of no further use to you are cast off. While you are growing, more new particles are made than old ones are cast off. When you are grown, those that are taken on are equal to those that are cast off. This constant change goes on in the bones as well as in the flesh, though more slowly.

Such a change is all the while taking place in the coral polyps. The coral is the skeleton of the polyp. Instead of the skeleton being all inside the polyp's body, as yours is in you (except your teeth), or all outside, as it is in the oyster, it is partly in and partly out. In the lower part of the stem of the coral animal, below the stomach, is the skeleton; as the polyp grows it keeps adding particles to its skeleton, and as it does not cast off any, the skeleton grows too long for the polyp, and is left behind as a solid stem, on the tip of which is the flower-like animal (Fig. 3, a).

The polyp, though an animal, is of a very low order. It is really only a stomach, a mouth, and feeders. Although it has no eyes, it can somehow tell when its prey is near, for it is quick to reach out its beautiful petal-like arms and draw it in. It has no ears, but the softest footfall will cause it to draw in all its petals and shrink down into a little brown knob which can scarcely be found among the sea-weed at its foot (Fig. 2, b). It cannot move about, for it is fastened tight to its coral stem, but it is provided with a wonderful contrivance for the capture of the prey beyond the reach of its arms. All along the beautiful petals are thousands and thousands of tiny pockets, and in each one is coiled up a long, slender thread. Let an unwary little fish come within range, and in a second hundreds of these threads are shot out, each turning itself inside out as it comes. The threads are barbed and poisoned, and woe to the fish who is hassoed. He is stunned, and soon dies. Then the victim is drawn into the innocent-looking flower. After the meal is digested, the flower turns itself wrong side outward, and so gets rid of any fish bones it cannot digest. Out of food so caught and digested the solid coral is formed. A single polyp would form only a small stem, but the polyps increase by sprouting from buds, or by one of them stretching and splitting up into two or three or a dozen polyps, till great branches or sheets of them are formed with the coral underneath. The shape of the clumps or branches is determined by the way they increase (Figs. 3 and 4).

FIG. 5.—HOW ATOLLS ARE MADE.
(From "Hooker's Mineralogy and Geology.")

Coral polyps cannot live in the depths of the sea, but when they lodge near enough to the surface, and in water which all the year round is never cold enough to kill them, they grow steadily, though slowly, and increase enormously in numbers. The land that lies under the ocean, as well as that above the waters, is full of hills and valleys, mountain ranges, and high table-lands.

Imagine such a country slowly sinking under the sea! The valleys would be filled up with water first; as the land sank lower, the parts showing above the surface would grow smaller, till finally only peaks here and there would show as islands in the sea. Now this is exactly what did happen in the Pacific Ocean; and every coral atoll now is the monument raised depth and the warmth are just right for them, they begin to grow, and spread. At the right depth from the surface they spread around the island in a ring, and build up and up, till finally the reef rises above the sea, and a ring-shaped island appears with a shallow lake lying right over the middle of the old island enclosed. In Fig. 5 you see a slice right down through such an island. The diagonal lines show the buried island, the straight lines are the water, and the dotted part is the coral rock. At a a it comes above the water; b b is the enclosed lake. In the middle of this lake is a peak of the

by the busy polyps above a buried island. These little creatures, besides multiplying like plants by budding and branching and dividing up; increase like animals by eggs. If these floating eggs sink to the bottom of the sea, they perish, but when they lodge on the side of a buried island, where the original island: which in this case was not quite sunken. Sometimes the corals build around an island which is not buried; then they make reefs, or flat coral beaches, around the high land, or a little way off from its sides.

In shallow seas corals often grow up in a sort of umbrella or mushroom shape, with a central stalk and a wide flat top. A great many of these will unite, and make an island held up by great columns below. Sometimes in the Pacific a ship has run aground on one of these umbrella-shaped reefs, the column has broken, and, to the surprise of the crew, the vessel has gone safely ahead.

Of course the continual beating of the waves upon the coral beaches grinds and breaks the coral. The result is a shore covered with white coral sand. In great storms the water is often milky, whitened by the finely ground coral; this falls when the waters quiet down, and gradually packs and hardens into a stone.

All this is not mere guesswork, but fact, which may be proved by visiting certain coral islands, where the dead reef is bordered with a living coral bed covered with myriads of the exquisite flower-like animals under the shallow water near the shore.

There are many other kinds of sea creatures which are helping to build up land in the bed of the ocean. Fish, large and small, when they die, drop their beautiful shells, or their skeletons, and these collect in the sea depths, and after a while become packed into a solid stone. In this piece of limestone (Fig. 6), see how closely the shells lie together; in other pieces there will be dozens of different kinds packed in the broken bits and dust made by thousands of other shells (Fig. 7).

The chalk cliffs of Dover, which gave to England her poetic name of Albion (from albus, white), are solid masses of tiny shells. At the bottom of the Atlantic there are to-day forming just such beds of chalk, not yet made into a solid mass, but on their way to be (Fig. 8), and if the chalk which was made ages ago and that which is making to-day are compared, they will be found to be very much the same.

BY MARGARET EMMA DITTO.

THE first thing needed to make doll-house bread is a little girl eight years old. She must have good sense; she must be tidy and patient and handy. If you are not that kind of a little girl, you cannot make bread until you are older. You will have to run about a few years before you can begin. The untidy girl would spill the flour and daub the batter, the impatient little girl would not wait for the dough to rise, the unhandy girl would use her hands so queerly that the dough would all stick to them, and she would cry for some one to get her out of it.

And this is the way to make doll-house bread:

Take six tablespoonfuls of sifted white flour—don't heap up the spoons as high as you can, but have each spoonful nicely rounded up. Put this flour into a little pan—one that is about four inches in diameter at the bottom; make a hole in the middle of the flour, and pile the flour up around the sides of the pan. Drop into the hole a pinch of salt—just what you can hold between your thumb and forefinger, then a pinch of sugar the same way.

Now you must take a teaspoon and put four teaspoonfuls of milk and four teaspoonfuls of hot water. Pour this milk and water into the hole in your flour, a little at a time, and stir it very gently around, so that the flour piled around the edges does not crumble down into the batter. Some of the flour wants to stay about the edges all of the time to make a little warm nest for the batter to stay in.

Now comes the yeast. Oh, this is very important indeed! It seems as if it was the soul of the bread; it is what makes it rise up and run over and bubble and cut up all kinds of lively capers. If you did not have yeast, there would be no bread at all—just a hard chunk as tough as the heel of your shoe. A cake of dolls'-bread yeast is just one-eighth of a small cake of Vienna Bakery yeast; it is just about half an inch square by one-fourth of an inch thick. The cook will fix you such a little cake, and do it up in tin-foil for you. You must take one-fourth of this little cake to a tiny cube one-fourth of an inch each way, put it in the teacup with a few drops of milk on it, and keep stirring it round and round in the teacup till it is quite dissolved. Now pour it into the batter, and work it very carefully through and through. Then gently spread the flour which was around the edges all over the top of the batter, or sponge.

Now the little beginning bread must be tucked up warm and comfortable in a nice place near the stove. You had better cover it with a soft old napkin or clean white cloth, and keep it covered from cold draughts. It has to stand this way for three hours. You must keep it just warm enough, but not too warm. It wants to be exactly as warm as kittens. If you had two nice little fuzzy kittens that would curl themselves around the pan and let you tie their noses and tails together, and would stay there till the batter was light, they would keep the bread just warm enough.

But, dear me! you cannot trust kittens with bread; they would run off and take the napkin with them the minute your back was turned. So you will have to tend the bread yourself. Here is where the patience comes in. Bread is sometimes very slow, and you cannot hurry it up. All you can do for hours and hours is to run out every few minutes and turn the little pan around, so that the side by the stove does not get too hot and the other side too cold. You know how bad it is when your face is burning and your back is cold. That is the way the bread feels, and it gets sick and cross and sour.

But if you attend to it carefully, after a couple of hours you will begin to see cracks coming in the floor of the top, and a little while later you will see the batter begin to peep through. Sometimes funny little streams of it will burst through the top of the flour and run off to the edges of the pan, like little creeks or brooks of batter. If you look close you will see these little streams have little holes and fine bubbles all through them.

This is a good sign. You can laugh and dance and clap your hands now, and tell your biggest doll that the bread is sure to be good, and she can bring her friends home to tea. Do not talk too long to her, for the bread now wants to be kneaded. You must have the cleanest pair of hands you ever had, with lovely white nails—I mean white in the places where they are usually black.

You must take the fingers of one hand and slide them gently down into the flour about the edge, and punch it into the batter. Keep on at this till all the flour is in. Then double up your fingers into a fist, and punch the dough. Keep your fist doubled up tight, and punch to the bottom of the pan every time. Pull your fist out pretty quickly, or it will get stuck to the dough, and keep at it, punching and poking, till the little loaf is quite smooth and firm and fine. When it is so good that it does not offer to stick to your hands, and it will stay any way you wish it to, then it is done. You make it into a round loaf, and pat it a little good-by, and cover it up close in a warm place.

The little loaf wants to be let alone awhile to get good. The first thing it thinks about—if it does think—is: "Oh dear! what a little thing I am! I want to be large."

You see, good bread is just like good boys and girls—it wants to be bigger than it is. So the little loaf begins to puff slowly up on top and to spread out at the sides till it becomes three times as large as when you set it away to think. It is wonderfully funny to see the bread grow tall and broad, because it is alive, and full of little bubbles of air that crowd and push one another.

Now you can work it over for the last time. This quantity will make one loaf three inches in diameter when baked, eight little biscuits as large as marbles when rolled out in the dough, but larger than the biggest alleys when baked, and eight tiny breakfast rolls. The rolls are great fun. You roll the dough flat, and cut out little round cakes, then put a bit of butter in the middle of it, and fold it over so that the edges do not quite meet. The little biscuits, rolls, and loaf have to go once more to the warm, quiet place, and stand awhile till they rise again quite puffy and light; then bake them a light brown, and they are lovely. Any little girl at eight years who can make this bread will make a good house-keeper when she is a woman, and make many persons comfortable by her skill.

"THE BOY WHO WANTED TO PLAY MARBLES."

BY MARY E. VANDYNE.

SOMETHING more than a hundred years ago, when the world was very much the same kind of a place that it is now, except that we had not half the conveniences and comforts that we now think necessary for the purposes of living, there was a poor boy who had to help his family by doing such odd jobs as the neighbors and people round about would trust him with. This boy's name was Humphrey Potter.

"I say, Humph, want something to do?" called out one of his comrades, as he saw the lad lounging about one bright morning.

Humphrey looked doubtful. He did want something to do; that is, he wanted to earn some money to help his poor father and mother with. At the same time it was so much pleasanter to play than to work, and at this particular moment his mind was especially bent upon a game of marbles. Some of the boys had beaten him lately, and Humphrey knew that it was only because he wanted practice. Just let him have a chance, and he could send an alley into the ring and knock a dozen others out as well as anybody. But what could he do if he had to work all day, while the "other fellows" were studying out all the possibilities, and training themselves into dexterity at their favorite game?

However, Humphrey was conscientious; he knew in what direction duty lay, and so he announced himself ready to go to work.

Now in these days the steam-engine was a very new thing. No less than a dozen people had invented it, beginning with the acolyte of Hero, and as many others had improved upon it. When Humphrey Potter wanted to play marbles it had got as far as a very clumsy machine, chiefly useful for working pumps. A heavy piston went up and down, and the valves had to be opened and closed by hand. This was the work that Humphrey was required to do.

Patiently he went at it. Seating himself on a bit of timber near by, he put one hand on the "steam-cock," as they called it, and the other on the "water-cock." With one motion of his fingers, into the cylinder went the steam, and up went the piston; then a pressure on the water-cock, and in went the water, condensing the steam, and bringing the piston down to fill up the vacuum so caused. But oh, how clumsy, and how monotonous, and how wearisome! And there were those fascinating marbles waiting to be played.

Humphrey looked at the engine, and then at the marbles. There was a conflict going on in his mind. His brow grew wrinkled, and evidently his boyish brains were laboring with some great idea. Presently a piece of cord was whipped out of his pocket. If that piston wanted those valves opened, let it open them. Why not? He could not waste his valuable time; he wanted to play marbles.

In the course of a little while Humphrey's employer came on the scene. There was the engine working hard, and there was Humphrey—playing marbles. The owner of the engine looked at the valves and then at Humphrey. I can't tell you just what he said, for no one seems to have recorded it, but then and there Thomas Newcomen's awkward, troublesome, uncertain steam-engine became a powerful automatic working machine. What the steam-engine is to day, with its wonderful variations and improvements, doing a great part of the world's work by its mighty power alone, all boys know.

Now how long should we have waited for that self-acting valve-opener had not Humphrey Potter been so anxious to play marbles, or if he had not been conscientious enough to see that his work was done before he allowed himself to give his attention to his favorite game? Yes, boys, after the discovery of steam as a motive power, the most important improvement in the machinery invented to utilize it was made by a boy.

Now wake up, some of you, and give us the "rotary engine" we have been waiting for so long. We have put up with the friction and loss of power in our cylinder engines long enough. Give us one where these difficulties are obviated, and the same immortality that is accorded to such names as Savery and Newcomen, Watt and Fulton, will be yours.

CHAPTER VII.

CHITTA BECOMES A SEMINOLE.

IN order to account for the presence of the canoe of which René and Hasse had caught a glimpse, as it darted in among the black shadows of the cypress forest in the great swamp, we must go back to the night that followed the Feast of Ripe Corn.

After Chitta struck Hasse the blow that stretched him stunned and bleeding on the ground, he sprang into the forest, and gliding swiftly among the stately trunks of the solemn pines, made his way to the river. On its bank were drawn up many canoes, over which Chitta glanced hastily, but with a practised eye. In a moment he selected one that promised to combine lightness with speed, noiselessly launched it, and stepped into it. Grasping a paddle, he headed the stolen craft down the river, and was quickly buried in the mist that rose from its surface.

As the unhappy lad pursued his solitary way down the river, neither knowing nor caring where he was going so long as he placed distance between himself and those whom he knew would shortly search for him, his mind was filled with bitter reflections. He felt as though he hated all men, but especially Hasse and the white lad, who, he felt certain, had taught the former the trick of wrestling by means of which the games had been won.

In destroying the great storehouse, with its winter's supply of provisions of his tribe, his desire had not been so much to injure his own people as the white men, whom he knew were also dependent upon it for food, and of whom Hasse's friend was one who would thus suffer. He had thought to escape detection after committing this wicked act, and that the fire would be supposed to be the result of an accident. This hope had been dashed by the unexpected appearance of Hasse, who had overheard his muttered threats; and now he knew that he must be an outlaw from his tribe forever, and that he would meet with a terrible punishment if he ever fell into their hands.

Of all his bitter thoughts the one uppermost in his mind was the desire for revenge upon the gentle but high-spirited Hasse, who had not only won from him his coveted position, but against whom he had just struck such a cruel and cowardly blow.

This is the way of the world with white as well as with red men, and with boys and girls as well as with grown people. The more we injure a person, the more bitter do we feel against him; and the more we help and do good to him, the more kindly do we feel toward him.

The deep scowl of hate had not left Chitta's face when he ran his canoe ashore at the foot of the high bluff upon which Admiral Ribault had erected the stone pillar engraved with the French coat of arms. Securing his canoe, and carefully concealing it from those who might pass on the river, Chitta made his way, by means of a narrow path through the tangled underbrush, to the summit. From here, by daylight, he would command a view of the river for miles in either direction, and would be able to detect the approach of any who should come in search of him while yet they were a long way off.

As it was still night, and nothing was now to be seen except what was disclosed by the moon, the young Indian gathered together a small heap of moss and leaves, and drawing his robe over his head, flung himself down for a few hours' sleep.

Tired as he was, Chitta fell asleep almost instantly; but it was fully an hour after he had done so that a tall Indian rose, without a sound, from a clump of bushes, concealed by which he had all this time been watching the motionless figure, and cautiously approached it. In his hands the tall Indian held a slender cord of twisted deer hide, in one end of which was a noose.

Without a movement that could arouse the lightest sleeper, he knelt by Chitta's side, and with great dexterity managed to pass the noose over both his motionless feet without disturbing his slumber. Drawing it as tight as he dared, the tall Indian made the other end fast to a sapling, and sat down beside the sleeper to patiently await his awakening.

At length, just as the sun was appearing in the far east, Chitta stirred uneasily, yawned, threw the blanket off from his head, and sat up. As his gaze fell upon the motionless figure beside him, he uttered a sort of a gasping cry, and sprang to his feet. He had hardly gained them before the noose did its work, and tripped by it, he fell heavily to the ground. The tall Indian had also sprang to his feet, and now stood over the prostrate form of his victim, with a cruel smile lighting his dark features.

Although wicked, Chitta was no coward, and finding himself thus trapped by an unknown enemy, he coolly asked, as he lay there, "Who art thou, and what have I done to thee that thou shouldst thus snare me like Petché?" (the pigeon).

For answer the tall Indian said: "I will first tell thee who thou art. Thy name is Chitta. Thou wast overthrown but yesterday at the Feast of Ripe Corn by the lad who wears in his hair the To-fa chat-te [red feather]. Thou art the who set fire to the storehouse of corn. Above all, thou art now, like myself, an outlaw forever from

* Begun in No. 356, HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE.

"WHO ART THOU?" HE ASKED."

thy people, for know that I am that Seminole called Cat-sha" (the tiger).

At this name Chitta gave a start of surprise, for though he had never before seen this Indian, the name of Cat-sha had been familiar to him from his childhood. It was one used by Indian mothers to frighten their unruly children and quiet them into obedience, for it belonged to the cruellest and most dreaded of the outlawed Seminoles.

When still a youth Cat-sha had, in a fit of ungovernable anger, struck one of his young companions a blow, from the effects of which he died. For this he was driven from his tribe, and from that day he had been an outcast, whose hand was raised against all men, and who had become feared and dreaded for his deeds of savage cruelty. He had gathered together and become chief of that band of Seminoles of whom Has-se had told René, and under his leadership it was rapidly becoming a scourge to all the more peaceful inhabitants of that country.

Evidently gratified at the impression the mere mention of his name produced upon his prisoner, Cat-sha continued: "For many days have I watched the place of the pale-faces from beyond the great waters. I hate them, and would gladly drive them back into the sea whence they came. It was to learn their strength and discover in what manner they might be most successfully attacked that I came to this place. Thy people, at their feasting and dancing, have I also seen, and I had thought to do with my own hand the deed accomplished by thee last night. Since thou hast relieved me of that labor, I am inclined favorably toward thee, and will spare thy life upon condition that thou renounce forever thy own people and become one of my band."

"Become a Seminole!" exclaimed Chitta. He had never thought, even amid his wildest schemes for obtaining revenge upon those whom he considered his enemies, to make one of this band of outcasts.

"Yes," answered Cat-sha, fiercely, angered by the tone of the other: "and why not? Art thou not already an outlaw and a runaway from thy people? Having thus left them forever, to whom else canst thou turn save to the brave and warlike Seminoles? Besides, if thou dost not join us, I will kill thee where thou liest, and none shall ever know thy fate. We Seminoles know but two kinds of men—those who are of us, and those who are against us."

Thus Chitta had no choice left him between making one of the band of outlaws whose name was a term of reproach amongst all good Indians, and meeting with a cruel death, from which he shrank. After a moment's silence he made up his mind and said: "So be it then, Cat-sha. From this hour call me Chitta the Seminole. From this hour the wisdom of the serpent shall be for them with whom he thus joins his fortunes, and henceforth his fangs shall be held ready for all who are their enemies."

Cat-sha's dark face was again lighted by a cruel smile of triumph, and releasing his new recruit, he said:

"Chitta the Seminole, I welcome thee gladly to our number. The time will come when we shall have increased to a great and powerful tribe, and when the name given us by our enemies shall be honored of all men. Let us go."

THE DANCE OF THE FAIRIES.

BY MARGARET DELAND.

IN my garden in the midnight,
In the misty shining moonlight,
Stand the lilies, swaying, bending,
Half afraid that they are lending,
By their sweet looks and sodate,
Countenance to hours so late.
(Yet they give a sidewise glance
At the Fairies' airy dance.)

O'er the grass, hand in hand,
Kiss and pass, fairy band!

Round about with the breeze,
In and out 'neath the trees.

Flow'r bells ring with soft chime,
Fairies sing, keeping time!

Laughing low, kissing oft,
On they go, stepping soft.

Steps so light, scarcely make Dewdrops bright gleam and shake.

But my stately lilies wear
Such a disapproving air!
Looking, with their sweet heads bent
On the Fairy Parliament,
Hoping their white dignity
Flippant Fays may chance to see!
(Yet I think from their shy glance
They would like to join the dance.)

FERRETS AS PETS.

BY ALLAN FORMAN.

ONE of the oldest Dutch engravings, copies of which are highly prized by collectors, is "The Rat-catcher." It represents an old man walking through a quaint Flemish street carrying a cage of ferrets. Though ferrets have been known in Europe for hundreds of years as expert rat-catchers, and are also used in rabbit-hunting, it is only within the past few years that they have been introduced into this country, and their first cousins the weasels, the martens, and the skunks have all been looked upon with disfavor by farmers, and active efforts are made for their extermination. Lately, however, considerable interest has been aroused in the keeping and breeding of these graceful little animals, and it may safely be said that American boys have found a new pet—a pet which gives but little trouble, and will more than pay for itself by its services in ridding the house and barns from rats.

It is true that the ferret is not an affectionate animal, and will never display the intelligence and faithfulness of a dog; but it is a pretty little creature, graceful in every motion, and playful after its own peculiar fashion. To see a family of them tumbling over each other in their fun, twining their long slender bodies in and out, one would almost take them for furred snakes; and indeed it is this snake-like shape and flexibility which make them valuable as rat-catchers. They can go anywhere it is possible for a rat to go, and will follow their game up and down, between the walls and under the floors, with the pertinacity of a blood-hound.

The ferret proper, or Mustela furo, as the naturalists call it, is a pretty white creature with shining pink eyes. It is very delicate, being extremely sensitive to cold, and subject to various diseases. It is largely used in England; but in America the cross breeds—those related to the mink, marten, or polecat—are preferred as being more hardy and better hunters.

The color of American ferrets therefore varies from yellow to brown, as the ferret, mink, or marten blood predominates. It is a very neat little animal, and absolute cleanliness in its pen is necessary for its health. A dry-goods box about three feet square and three feet high, the bottom filled with dry sand or sawdust, which must be changed once a day, is a good pen for a pair of ferrets if you are going to keep them in-doors.

For an out-door pen a compact, solidly built box, with a slanting roof, about six feet long, four feet wide, and four feet high, is recommended by the most successful breeder of ferrets in this country. It has a wire front, and two divisions, with a sliding door between. The smaller division is two, the larger four feet long. The smaller part is kept full of hay in winter, in summer half full, and has a door over the wire front. This is the ferrets' sleeping apartment, in which they can keep warm in the coldest weather. In the larger part, which serves for a yard, the ferrets can come out and take their exercise and feed. At the back of the pen are two large doors, so that you can get at the ferrets at any time. The hay should be changed every month or two, except during the breeding season, when the ferrets should be left alone. Any attempt to handle the little ones, or even watch them, should be avoided, as it is bad for both the young and the mother.

Like every animal, ferrets require patience, kindness, and good judgment in their treatment. They are not long-suffering, like dogs or cats, and the young owner of ferrets who attempts to lug his pets around by one paw, and man them about as the average youngster mauls the animals entrusted to his tender mercies, will find to his cost that the slender little rat-hunters are capable of taking very excellent care of themselves. They should be lifted by the tail, and handled by the back of the neck; though after they have become accustomed to their owner they will permit themselves to be handled to any reasonable extent, and often grow quite affectionate in their way, though it is never advisable to trust them too entirely, as they sometimes take offence on apparently small provocation. After their meals they are apt to be in better humor, and will submit to more handling than when hungry.

Great care should be taken not to overfeed ferrets. Two meals a day—one in the morning and one in the evening—are sufficient under ordinary circumstances; and when hunting, one light meal in the morning is all that should be given.

Rats, mice, rabbits' heads, chickens' heads, and small birds are the favorite food: raw meat—except liver—and bread and milk can be added to the bill of fare. After eating they go to sleep for an hour or two, and will be somewhat lazy until near the next feeding-time.

When hunting with ferrets they should always be started in the rat-hole on the top floor of a building, as they hunt down. If a building is infested with rats, it is well to have the entrances to the holes in the cellar guarded, as rats are afraid of ferrets, and will run and make their escape before the ferrets have an opportunity to kill them.

Their flexible bodies and small heads enable them to go anywhere that a rat can go, and when they tackle a rodent they kill and eat it without delay. In hunting rabbits, they drive them out of their holes, and feel abundantly satisfied if they are given the rabbit's head as a reward for their work. For exterminating woodchucks, prairie-dogs, ground-squirrels, and gophers they have no equal.

The little ferret will march boldly down into a woodchuck's burrow and drive out the clumsy inmate without the slightest hesitation. In hunting rabbits and out-door game it has been the custom to muzzle the ferrets, but this is a cruel and unnecessary practice. It is not fair to the ferret, for if he is attacked he has no means of defending himself, and he will rarely kill his game in the burrow. The ferret is a natural-born hunter, and soon learns that being taken out of its pen and carried off in a basket means a hunting trip, and the little creature looks forward to it with keen enthusiasm.

Some owners just tuck the ferrets into a coat pocket when starting on the hunt, but a small basket is just as convenient, and a safer way of carrying them. They can readily be taught to come in answer to a whistle, like a dog, and in a building they generally return to the pen of their own accord.

The golden rule should be applied to the treatment of all pets, and with ferrets this considerate firmness is imperative. "Do as you would be done by;" remember the natural disposition of the animals, and then try to put yourself in their place, and think if you would like to be teased as you tease them. Humor their natural inclinations so far as you can, but make them obey under all circumstances. Keep them clean, and feed them judiciously, and you will find that the graceful little ferret is a most entertaining addition to the list of pets.

BITS OF ADVICE.

BY AUNT MARJORIE PRECEPT.

A BEAUTIFUL ROOM.

"I THINK I could be good if I lived in such a beautiful house as this, and had so beautiful a room of my own."

The speaker was Amaranth, and she was talking to Pansy. None of us ever thought Amaranth specially naughty, but I understood what she meant when she looked around Pansy's pretty chamber, and fancied one just like it would help her to be good. For Pansy's room had Peace written all over it, not in letters, but in its expression. The carpet had a light ground, sprinkled with rose-huds; the soft gray tint of the wall-paper made the loveliest background for the pictures; and the curtains, looped back from the windows with ribbons of the most exquisite blue, made a graceful drapery.

Pansy's parents are rich, and they delight in spending money for their darling's pleasure. Then, too, little Pansy herself has what money of itself cannot give—an eye to see what is beautiful, and a quick, deft little hand to set things in the right places. Her colors never "quarrel" with each other. There is a general air of fitness and harmony which impresses every observer.

With Amaranth, sweet child, all the externals, or outside parts of life, are different. Her father died when she was a babe, and her mother's means are limited, so that she has a struggle to live comfortably and educate her children. Of course Amaranth's room is a contrast to Pansy's. The plainest, hardest place, she thinks it, with such a faded, horrid carpet, quite worn off in some parts and dingy in others, with old-fashioned hair-cloth furniture, and no curtains at the windows at all, only stiff staring white linen shades. Pictures! Well, if you call grandmother's sampler, worked in 1799, a picture—a green vine, with red triangles for strawberry leaves wandering round the edge of the canvas, the alphabet in three sizes between the clasping vine, and a rooster, a cat, and a dog surmounting "Martha Josepha Pratt, her name"—if you call that a picture, there is one. And if you choose to fancy the certificate that grandfather received when he became a life member of the Bible Society a picture, you have another. Amaranth's little face grows long when she looks at those works of art, and then—how can she help it?—she laughs; for you might as well laugh as cry when a situation is made for you, and you cannot improve it.

The question is, can you not improve it? That's what I said to Amaranth. We put our heads together, and this was the result: Mamma consented to let us take up the carpet, and Amaranth doing without a new dress for the season, we covered the floor with a cheap cream-tinted matting, and bought a cheap but pretty neutral-tinted paper for the walls. It turned out that the landlady, who came Mondays to wash for Amaranth's mother, knew how to put the paper on as smoothly as a regular workman. She did it for nothing. Amaranth is teaching her crippled boy to read, and Mrs. McClick was glad to return a favor. Then we bought cheese-cloth at five cents a yard, and made full draperies for the windows, tying them back with ribbons of gay scarlet. A plant or two in bloom, a bit of soft old veiling thrown over the sampler cornerwise, and an ivy trained over the certificate, and you cannot imagine how the room was transformed.

We are much in the habit of thinking that we cannot have pictures without spending a great deal of money for them. Never was a greater mistake. When the illustrated papers and magazines are brimming over with beautiful pictures, no boy or girl need go without them. Amaranth began to cut pictures from HARPER'S BAZAR and the WEEKLY, and to fasten them with pins to her wall, mounting them with a cluster of autumn leaves or a group of pressed ferns.

Robby brought a bird's nest, empty—of course Amaranth would not have taken it otherwise—and fastened it on a twig, with a little trailing moss drooping below and some bitter-sweet berries above. There was an ornament for a corner.

I cannot tell you any more now; but could you see it, you would agree with me that Amaranth has a beautiful room.

THE CAPTIVE QUEEN.

BY LORD BRABOURNE

(E. H. KNATCHBELL-HUGESSEN,

AUTHOR OF "PUSS-CAT MEW AND OTHER FAIRY STORIES," ETC.

CHAPTER IV.

WHEN the King and his companions had entered the rock, they perceived that the passage immediately before them sloped downward, at first by means of a number of steps, which the cow found it rather difficult to pass over without stumbling, and then by a gradual descent for a long distance.

I have already remarked that by some magical means or other the passage, though within the bowels of the earth, was perfectly light, so that the party, once down the steps, had no difficulty in making their way, which they did slowly and silently, without any particular occurrence for some time. Then all of a sudden they came to two massive bars of iron, which were stretched right across the passage so as to effectually prevent their going any further.

The King's heart sank within him for a moment when he saw this new obstacle thrown in his way, but it rose again when the kangaroo gave three taps on his drum, as if he knew perfectly well what he was about. So he apparently did, for no sooner had the drum sounded than a curious gray vapor appeared on the other side of the bar, in the midst of which there appeared a head without a body—or at least if there was a body which belonged to the head, it was so shrouded by the vapor that no one on the King's side of the bar could see it. I think there must have been a body too, from what presently happened, but all that the King saw at first was a head, and the most curious thing about it was that it seemed to be the very image of the old man who had appeared to him in his dream of the previous night. There was the furrowed face, there was the beard (as far as he could see for the vapor), and there, above all, were the piercing eyes which had impressed themselves so much on his memory. He could not be sure that the voice was the same, but that did not matter much. There was a voice, and it spoke at once in words which did still more to inspire the King with confidence.

This is what the voice said:

"Mighty King and creatures three
Who seek a Queen beneath the sea,
Hither eyes and ears incline,
Hear the word and learn the sign."

As the voice finished speaking a hand which no doubt belonged to the head was slowly raised up and laid flat upon the left cheek; upon which the kangaroo and rabbit immediately raised their paws in the same manner, and the cow followed their example, very nearly tumbling upon her nose in the attempt. As they did so one of the great bars disappeared from before them, as if it had been drawn into the earth by invisible hands, which was very likely the case. Then came from the same voice another sound, and in deep tones the word "Barley sugar!" rang through the air.

"THERE APPEARED A HEAD WITHOUT A BODY."

Each of the three animals directly uttered the same word, and hardly had they done so when the other bar vanished in the same manner, the head, hand, and vapor entirely disappeared, and the travellers saw the descending passage open before them. They at once advanced, and continued their descent for some way without further adventure. Down, down, down they went, until the King began to think the journey would never end, and then all of a sudden they came to an enormous gate of granite, with the biggest padlock upon it which you ever saw. The padlock was composed of one diamond, probably the largest in the world (if, indeed, it could fairly be said to be in the world), and as there was no key in it, nobody seemed to have much chance of getting through.

But the kangaroo winked in a knowing manner at his two friends, and then, laying one paw on the door, raised the other to the left side of his head—an example which the cow and the rabbit promptly followed, whilst all three at the same time uttered in their different voices the word "Barley sugar." Without the delay of an instant the granite door flew open, and closed again of itself as soon as the travellers had passed through it.

Where in the name of all that is wonderful had they got to? A large expanse of hard, glittering sand lay before them, studded with innumerable shells of different shapes, colors, and sizes. Above their heads was no sky, but a vast and apparently endless body of water, and the King, who was pretty well informed in matters relating to general information and natural history, felt tolerably certain that it was the sea at which he was looking up. It was a wonderful sight to see the fishes darting about above his head, and he could not imagine how it was that he and his companions were so perfectly dry when there appeared to be nothing between them and this great body of water. He remembered, however, that sometimes, when he had been standing on the sea-shore, he had been struck by the same kind of thought, and wondered why the sea should never come further than a certain point upon the land, and, after all, some similar cause might keep it from washing over people who were underneath it just as well as those who were on a level with it on the earth.

However this might be, his three friends and he felt no inconvenience from the waters above, and the kangaroo led the way across the tract of sand upon which they had entered as happily as if he had been born and bred there. Onward and onward they marched, and all that the King could see was a dark mass at some distance before them, which seemed to him to be a mountain.

They were, however, still some way from it when suddenly, as if he had dropped from the sea above (as, indeed, was probably the case), a figure appeared before them, standing right in their way. It was the figure of a man—and an old man—but of a very different sort to the venerable person who had appeared to the King in his dream. The old man whom they now saw had a head which very much resembled that of a codfish, his eyes especially being large and glassy like those of that creature when boiled. His body was of the hue of cooked salmon, his hands ended like the claw of a lobster, a crab shell served him for a cap, while a large eel was carelessly thrown round his neck by way of a handkerchief, and in his right hand he carried a huge stick made of sea-weed, with which he carelessly tapped his shark-skin boots as he stood in the way of the travellers, and regarded them with no friendly eyes.

"Now, ragamuffins," were his first words, uttered in a hoarse voice, "who are you, and where do you come from?"

It was the rabbit who raised his feeble voice in answer to this rude greeting, and lifting his head up from the King's knee, on which it had been quietly reposing, he said:

"We be travellers—one, two, three;
Prithee make way for my comrades and me."

But the strange old man who had accosted them was by no means satisfied with these words.

"Make way for you!" he exclaimed, in the same rough manner. "A likely story, indeed! In the first place, you tell a direct falsehood, since there are four of you, and not three, as you say; and in the second place, you have no business down here. I am the old man of the sea, and I don't allow tramps."

To these words the rabbit simply returned the same answer as before, cocking his head on one side at the same time in a somewhat comical manner:

"We be travellers—one, two, three;
Prithee make way for my comrades and me."

This seemed to put the old man of the sea into a great rage. "You impudent rascal of a rabbit!" he shouted. "I wish a weasel had you! But neither you nor your friends can pass here without my leave; so just go back!"

As he spoke he brandished his sea-weed stick, and looked as if he meant to dispute the way with the travellers. Then at once the kangaroo struck his drum three times, and thereupon the three animals made the sign which had proved so useful with the granite door, and uttered the word which they had been taught. The face of the old man of the sea changed at once.

"Then you've got leave to come!" he cried. "Why didn't you say so before? Of course any one who knows what you know can come down here, though I don't know how you found it out."

With these words he turned on his heel, sprang up into the sea above, and quickly disappeared.

"GOOD-BYE, OLD KAISER"

the cracker box. My father keeps a grocery and dry-goods store. I have two sisters; one is thirteen years; she is married, and has a little girl whose name is Edna; they live in Portland. My other sister is fifteen years, and I am twelve years old. JESSIE F.

WYANDOTTE, KANSAS.

I have taken HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE all this year, and like it very much. I like to read the letters. I am very kind and dandy here. I have just had my rain to speak of since the 26th of June. I have no brother or sister, but I have a neighbor who is deaf and dumb, and he goes to the institution at Olathe, but she is home on vacation. I am going to school with her, to stay a week. HEENE M. S.

HASTINGS, IOWA.

My grandma has sent me HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE ever since Christmas, and I like it very much. Like Howard Pyle's stories. I go to school, and enjoy reading, spelling, writing, geography, and language. For pets, we have a very large cat named Jack, a dog named Nig, and two little kittens named Topsy and Mailla. FRANK B. P.

ALLEGANY, PENNSYLVANIA.

I have just returned home from a month in the West. My uncle, aunt, and my cousin came here, and I went home with them. When they were in town they bought fire-crackers, and I bought four. We took them home with us, and my cousin put them on the porch. We boys were shooting fire-crackers, when one went off among the fireworks. The cracker caught a Roman candle, and the Roman candle caught the big shooting cracker. All the girls screamed, and I just stood still, but I caught myself again when I saw my cracker struck me in the leg, and I ran for my life. I thought the whole house was blown up. The booming kept up for about two minutes. Then we went back and got some things out of the fire, and set them off in the evening. My grandma gave me HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE for a year. I have had two years' benefit, and I like it very much. The cracker caught a Roman candle, and the Roman candle caught the big shooting cracker. All the girls screamed, and I just stood still, but I caught myself again when I saw my cracker struck me in the leg, and I ran for my life. I thought the whole house was blown up. The booming kept up for about two minutes. Then we went back and got some things out of the fire, and set them off in the evening. My grandma gave me HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE for a year. I have had two years' benefit, and I like it very much. I like Howard Pyle's books, and I like to read his Book of the River. I have no pets, but last summer I had a white rabbit. FRED S. M.

NEPESIN, LAKE SUPERIOR, ONTARIO.

DEAR POSTMISTRESS.—I am twelve years old. I like HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE, and I like Howard Pyle's stories very much. I like Howard Pyle's stories very much. I have two sisters and one brother; Aggie is the eldest, I am the second, Dixon the third, and Jessie the fourth. I hope you will find a corner to put this letter in; please do. I am like one of your little readers, JESSIE F.

BROOKLYN, NEW YORK.

MY DEAREST POSTMISTRESS.—I am a little boy nine years old. I have four brothers and one sister. We each take turn in taking HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE and this year it is mine. I have just come home from a visit to Stark Lake. I went out sailing, fishing, and rowing. A few days before I came home I went on a picnic to Hunting Ridge, and spent a pleasant day. I hope, dear Postmistress, you will see this letter in print, as I have never written before, and should be disappointed if it should be left out. Your true friend and constant reader, STUART G.

FOREST HOME.

I am a little girl ten years old, and I live in the Adirondacks, on Upper Saranac Lake. I have for pets two kittens whose names are Cotton and Topsy, and one dog whose name is Silent Pete. I like HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE, and I am very much interested in "Silent Pete." ALMA D. C.

WATERBURY, CONNECTICUT.

I am a little girl eleven years old. I have no pets except a large cat named Zachariah; he is very playful and intelligent, I think. I have written to HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE, but the letters never appeared in the Post-office Box, so I hope this one will. I think a great deal of my YOUNG PEOPLE, and I think I like Howard Pyle's stories best. I am reading "The Witness," and am so interested in Agnes, when I am in New York some time, may I call on you? ALICE M. C.

FORT ATKINSON, WISCONSIN.

I want to tell you how one day I went hazing. About ten of us, children and grown people included, got into a big boat, and started out toward the bottom of it. We rattled away down toward the marsh, which was about a mile off. We went through corn and barley fields until we reached the river, which was very prettily lit with flowers growing all along its banks. One of us had to get down quite often to open gates. As last we came to the marsh itself. We drove over to the top of the field, and then we started out of our "chariot." There were men at work all about us, some driving the horse-rake, some loading, and others driving the great loads of hay. Some of us started for the river to play, some to make nests in the hay and sit there quietly, and others to play on the haycocks near by. I closed my eyes, and I kept driving my rough seat and took the reins and started off as fine as could be; but I did not stay there more than ten minutes, for my seat, which was made of iron, was not very easy, and I kept driving my rough seat, which made it harder still to keep my seat. I soon let one of the men take my place, and went over to a haycock where some of the little ones were digging in the dirt. I asked them what they were doing, and they said, "Oh, we are digging down to China." About six o'clock we ate our supper, and played around for an hour longer, when we all got upon a great load of hay and rode home singing, and with great bunches of goldenrod in our arms. Don't you think that we had a very nice time? I do. I have started a correspondence through HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE with a girl in Toledo which I think will prove very pleasant. I should like to correspond with some girl abroad about my own age (thirteen years), and also with some girl in my own country. I expect to go to the lakes soon, and if you could go, I will write you all about it. I get home. MAY PLATT.

If you write as pleasantly of your excursion as of your haying frolic, I shall be very glad to hear from you again.

SCHELL CITY, MISSOURI.

I am a little girl eight years old. I have four sisters, two younger and two older than myself. Sister Edna has taken HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE for two or three years. We like it very much. My papa says he will let me take it next year. We live in Schell City, a very nice town, with about 1800 inhabitants. I have never seen a letter in YOUNG PEOPLE from our town. MAUDE W.

BEAULACRE, FLORIDA.

DEAR POSTMISTRESS.—I live on an orange grove in Florida, and think it is much nicer than living in the city, for we have plenty of freedom here, and we can do anything in the woods where we like; and they are such beautiful woods too, all draped with the gray Spanish moss, and full of squirrels and birds. I have three parrots and two cockatiels, and all have pet chickens. I have four Cochon China hens and five small chickens. My brother has a cabinet of curiosities from all over the world. Among them are a piece of olive wood from the Mount of Olives, and a flower from Jerusalem, and a piece of the Charter Oak. LEUZARDER S.

MERRIMACK, MASSACHUSETTS.

I wrote a letter last year, but it was not printed, so I will write again. We had a mocking-bird; it was a beauty, and as it was sent to us from Georgia we named him Georgia. One day he got out of the cage, and flew out of the window. We tried all the morning, but could not find him. At noon our mother and I went out and killed him. Puss was not thought much of or petted for about a week, but now we have pardoned her; she is a beauty; her name is Prudence. I have a bicycle and a set of tools. They are all named: one is the Nelly Bly, another Curie, Georgia, and the Magnifier. The English cutter Cable has been in our harbor, and she is a fine boat, and all the boys could see her. She was nine years old last March. W. OLIVER D.

SAN SIMON, CALIFORNIA.

I am a girl twelve years old, and have five brothers and one sister. I live on the coast near the Piedras Blancas Light-house. My uncle is the keeper of the light-house, and I am one of the best pupils in HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE. My teacher gave it to me as a reward of merit last Christmas. I like it very much; I can't hardly read it now. I go to school every day, and study in the Fourth Reader. We have no Sunday-school now, and miss it very much, for I was the teacher of the little boys. KATHIE J. E.

ST. CHARLES, MISSOURI.

I am a little girl five years old. My sister Fanny takes your good paper, and we all like it so much. I have five sisters and one brother, and they are all older than I am, so you see I am the baby. I have been here just one year, and we are all very much pleased with St. Charles. I had such a pretty Maltese kitten, but it was poisoned, and I was very sorry to lose it; I brought it all the way from Tennessee on the train with me. ROBERTA II.

DEAR POSTMISTRESS.—On Easter morning gave me two little chickens, the smaller of which died, because it was too young to live without its mother. The larger one was so lonely without the other one that I let it out of the large box I had for the house, to see if it could find anything to keep it company. It went over to the dog, a large Scotch collie, and now they are both the best of friends. When the dog is fed, the chicken will come and sit on the largest piece of meat. The dog will let the chicken as if it were a little pup, and lets it nestle down in his long hair. MARY T. G.

EAST CANAAN, NEW HAMPSHIRE.

I am a little girl nine years old. My papa has taken this nice paper for us ever since it was first printed. I have three brothers and one sister. I have four dolls and six to the nicest July 3, and I had a splendid time. I hope you will print this. Your loving friend, S. ADRIE B.

PLAINFIELD, NEW JERSEY.

This summer I was down at Asbury Park for ten days, and enjoyed my visit very much. I was on the beach quite a good deal. I will send you some pretty pressed flowers. My sister and I are trying to knit a sweater. I have three sisters and two brothers. One of my brothers has a museum, and is earning some money for the Fresh-air Fund. We live in quite a large place, and we have a summer home in our yard, and I want to see my letter in print, as it will surprise my papa very much. Two of my sisters and myself belong to the Sunshine Mission Band, and like it very much. ANNE KIR M.

Thank you for the flowers, dear.

DITTY-BAG STORIES.

BY HOPE HOWARD.

WE had been cruising along the shores of Alaska for about three years. The men who were never happy without pets had taken a cinnamon bear to bring up, while it was yet a cub, and had taught it to be as gentle as it was clumsy.

They had skylarked with it from its babyhood, and though its great strength led it at times to be more than a match for them in their bouts, a tap on the nose of Mr. Bruin would bring him to a proper use of his strength, and make him gentle as a nurse to an infant.

One of the bear's special fancies was to steal up to any man whom he saw looking over the ship's side, and gathering him in his embrace, press him against the bulwarks and hug him with a good will till the signal of the stroke on the nose told him that hugging-time was over.

One day a ship arrived from San Francisco bringing two new watch officers to take the place of some whose time had expired. One of these young lieutenants had the mind-watch, and having been on board but a few hours, knew nothing of Bruin's presence.

At about two bells, which you know is one o'clock at night, the young lieutenant happened in his rounds to stop for a moment and gaze over the gunwale. He felt himself instantly seized from behind in a powerful embrace.

He seemed to be enveloped in a warmth that one might feel if lying upon embers; he felt a hot breath upon his cheek, and the touch of a cold nose which, in his excitement, seemed like a coal of fire. He looked around to see who had hold of him, and met the eyes of the frightful beast gazing into his. At such a moment reason loses its power. He could not reflect that a ship's deck was not the bear's native soil, nor argue that it was a mere plaything for the ship's crew. From the beginning it has been man's nature to struggle in the embrace of a bear, and he struggled as for life. The more he struggled the tighter grew the grip upon him, for the bear thought he was skylarking with him.

The first I knew of all this I was startled by screams of a man, which no other man likes to hear. It was my watch also, and I fancied it came from the men's quarters, and concluded some one had a horrid nightmare. Then I heard cries of "Help! help!" Then a gurgling, choking sound, as if a man's life was being crushed out of him. I ran in the direction of the sound, and found the new lieutenant in the arms of the bear.

The watch officer was very angry, as he had a right to be. It was no trifle. If he had been a man of less strong mind, one might not have answered for the consequences. After I had felt him over, and found that no physical harm had come to him, I gave him a good rubbing, brought him a cup of strong coffee, told him about the bear and how fond we were of him, and what a good fellow he really was, and he agreed he would bring no action against Bruin provided the crew would promise to have him formally presented to all the new officers and men received on board from that time onward.

Seek out the Milky Way.

BOYS WHO BECAME FAMOUS.

BY DAVID KER.

THE STORY OF AFRICA.

"WELL, I used to think no one could do two things well at once, but that boy seems to have managed it, and no mistake."

So spoke an English traveller who was inspecting one of the great cotton mills in the west of Scotland, not far from Glasgow. And well might he say so. The lad whom he was watching a pale, thin, bright-eyed boy, employed in the mill as a "piecer" had fixed a small hook to the frame-work of the spinning jenny, and seemed to snatch a brief sentence from its pages every time he acted in the course of his work.

"Ay, he's jist a wonder, yon laddie," answered the Scotch foreman, to whom the visitor had addressed himself. "We ca' him 'Busy Davie' here, for he's aye readin' like ony minister; but he does his wark weel for a' that."

"And does he really understand what he reads?" asked the Englishman, looking wonderingly at the young student's book, which was a treatise on medicine and surgery that would have puzzled most lads four or five years older than himself.

"'Tis warrant he does that," replied the Scot, with an emphatic nod. "'There's no a quicker chief than Davie i' the hail mill."

And then the visitor passed on to look at another part of the works, and forgot all about "Busy Davie" for the time being.

But he was suddenly reminded of him two hours later, when the mill hands "knocked off" for dinner. Coming back across the yard when his tour of inspection was over, the traveller caught sight of a small figure in a corner by itself, which he thought he recognized.

A second glance showed him that he was not mistaken. There sat "Busy Davie," holding in one hand the big oatmeal "bannock" that represented his dinner, and in the other a soiled and tattered book without a cover, which he was devouring so eagerly that his food remained almost untouched.

The Englishman stole softly up behind the absorbed boy, and glancing over his shoulder at the book, saw that it was one written by himself a few years before, describing the most perilous of all his journeys through the wild regions beyond the Orange River in South Africa.

Just as the visitor came up, the little student, quite unaware that the author of the book was standing beside him, read half aloud one of the more exciting passages, following the lines with his roughened forefinger:

"The progress of our party was necessarily very slow, as we could only march in the mornings and evenings, and the wheels of the wagons often sank up to the very axle in the loose sand. In some places the heat was so great that the grass actually crumbled to dust in our fingers. More than once our supply of water ran out altogether, and men and beasts staggered onward over the hot, dusty, never-ending plain, with parched tongues and bloodshot eyes, silent and despairing."

At the thought of these difficulties, which he himself was one day to meet and overcome as few men have ever done before or after him, the boy's thin face hardened into the look of indomitable firmness which was its habitual expression in after life. But it softened into a smile the next moment, as he read as follows:

"In several of the places where we camped our chief food was a species of large frog, called by the natives 'mattlenotto,' which was kind enough to assist us in our hunts for it by setting up such a tremendous croaking that we could easily find it, even in the dark."

Here the boy turned over a leaf, and came suddenly upon a startling picture of a man lying prostrate on the ground, with a lion's fore-paw planted on his chest, and its teeth fastened in his shoulder, while several negroes, with terrified faces, were seen making off as fast as possible in the background.

"How would you like to travel through a country like that, my lad?" asked the explorer. "It would be rough work, wouldn't it?"

"I wad like weel to gang there, for a' that," answered the boy, "for there's muckle to be done there yet."

"There is indeed, and it's jist fellows of your sort that we need to do it," said the traveller, clapping him on the shoulder. "If you ever do go to Africa, I'll be bound it will take more than a lion in your way to stop you."

The whole world now knows how strangely those lightly spoken words were fulfilled twenty-eight years later, when that boy did actually come alive out of the jaws of the hungry African lion, which had broken his arm with its teeth, to finish those wonderful explorations that filled the civilized world with the fame of Dr. David Livingstone.

GEORGE BAKER'S FAMOUS KITE.

BY JULIA K. HILDRETH.

"GEORGE, are you busy?" said Susie, peeping into the little work-room near the barn.

George nodded his head without lifting his eyes from the long slender stick in his hand.

"What are you doing?" she asked.

"Making a new kite," replied George, slowly passing his knife down the stick.

"You are always making kites," said Susie, laughing. "I came to tell you something."

"Please don't disturb me, Susie," replied George, still whittling very carefully. "You see you might make me split this wood, and if it splits it is done for."

"But, George—"

"Wait," said George, hastily; "first hold these sticks for me; it is very important that they should be fastened together evenly. I told the boys in Barton that I could make as good a kite as they could buy in any store, but they do not believe it."

Susie held the sticks as she was desired, and watched George silently, while he passed the cord in and out and around the slender frame of the kite. Then she helped him paste the bright piece of tissue-paper over the cord. When this was done she said, "George, we are going to have a children's festival at the church on Monday."

"Are we?" said George, still looking at the kite in his hand. "That's nice."

"And," continued Susie, "all the girls in my class are going to bring some fancy dish."

"Are you going to take any?" asked George, snipping at a square of gilt paper.

"Yes, indeed," replied Susie, quickly; "and I want you to help me find some eggs, George."

"Yes," said George, undecidedly, "if I have time."

"I wish you would come now," coaxed Susie; "it is too late to fly that kite this afternoon."

George glanced out of the door, and saw that it really was growing late, so he said, "Just wait until I finish cutting out these letters, and I will go with you."

"Is it a name for the kite?" asked Susie, bending forward and watching him as he pasted the golden letters successively one by one across the upper part of it.

"Well, I hope it will turn out a success," laughed Susie, as George hung his newly finished toy on a nail above the work-table.

"I think it will," replied George, giving it a parting look as he followed Susie from the room.

They searched the barn with so much energy that before it was quite dark Susie had her small basket heaping full.

As they came out together a young man passed the gate. He had some tools in his hand, and was walking rapidly. When he saw George he nodded and smiled.

"Who is he?" asked Susie. "I never saw him before."

"He has only been here one day," replied George. "His name is Mr. Hunter, and he is a steeple climber."

"A steeple climber!" repeated Susie. "What is that?"

"A man who mends steeples," replied George. "There are very few in the business, because it is so dangerous, and they had to send a great distance for Mr. Hunter to come and fix the church, that was struck by lightning last summer."

"I heard some gentlemen talking about it in Barton to-day," cried Susie. "They said it ought to be mended, and that it was a disgrace to the village."

"It will be mended now," replied George, still looking after the young man. "This morning, when I was going to school, he asked me to show him where the blacksmith's was. I never met such a nice man. When I began telling him about my kite he was just as much interested as a boy, and told me ever so many kite stories, and how they were made very useful sometimes. He said they were often used to help make bridges."

"How?" said Susie, wonderingly.

But before George could tell her the tea-bell rang; so they both hurried into the house. The next day, as George and Susie passed the church in Barton, they saw Mr. Hunter at work.

"There he is," said George, pointing to a man's figure half-way up the steeple.

"What a dreadful trade!" exclaimed Susie, with a shudder, turning her eyes away.

"But think how brave he must be!" replied George, watching the man as he moved backward and forward on a narrow platform.

That evening, as George with his kite in his hand, and Susie with a small basket of eggs on her arm, stood by the gate, they saw Mr. Hunter again.

When he caught sight of the children he stopped and asked George how his kite was progressing, and spoke to Susie about the eggs in her basket.

George told him that the kite was finished, but as there had been no wind, he had not tried it yet, and Susie told him about the festival to be held in the very church where he was repairing, and how all the girls in her class were going to contribute something.

Before Mr. Hunter left them he promised to make some improvements in George's kite. And he kept his promise, and was always so kind and pleasant that the children soon began to watch eagerly for his appearance, and look upon him as a friend.

The day of the festival came at last, and Susie was happy, but George still stood in the little work-room, looking at his kite disconsolately, for it was not a "success" after all, and some of the boys even said that it was crooked and too heavy, and even laughed at it. But George had still a little faith in it, and wanted to give it just one more trial.

As Susie came running from the house, and calling, "Come, George, it is time to go," he gave an impatient shrug and turned away.

"Susie," said George, as she peeped into the work-room, "is there a good wind now?"

"I don't call it good," replied Susie, straightening her hat, "for just now it blew off my hat and mussed my hair."

"It is too bad!" muttered George.

"Yes," replied Susie, smoothing her hair with both hands; "but does it look very rough?"

"I don't mean about your hair," said George, quickly. "I was thinking how unfortunate that this high wind should come now, when I have to go to the festival. I have been waiting for it all the week, and, besides, I want to try my messenger. Mr. Hunter told me about that. None of the boys here ever put messengers on their kites."

"What is a messenger?" asked Susie, looking on the table.

"This," said George, pointing to a circular piece of pasteboard with a hole in the centre. "You slip it on the twine, and it travels up to the kite. The wind takes it, you know."

"But whom do you send the message to?" asked Susie, examining the pasteboard circle with interest.

"The man in the middle," said George, laughing. Then he added, quickly, "Did I ever tell you what Mr. Hunter said kites were sometimes used for?"

"No," replied Susie.

Just then their mother called them, and Susie ran out to join her, without waiting for the end of the story.

George lingered a few moments while he wound the twine closely around the stick, and slipped the messenger into his pocket, for he was quite determined to try the kite that day, festival or no festival.

All the way to Barton he kept his hand, with the kite in it, behind him for fear of being questioned.

The wind blew a perfect hurricane, whirling the dust into their faces, and whistling savagely among the budding branches of the trees, as though it had been March weather.

As they came in sight of the church Susie said: "Look, mamma, at the very top of the steeple. There is the nice man I told you about, who was so kind to George and me."

"It makes me shudder to think of him, poor man," replied her mother, turning her eyes away.

"He is safe enough, mamma," cried George, eagerly. "He told me he built little platforms to stand on; then he has ladders and ropes to climb up the steeple from the trap-door."

It was quite early when they reached the church; so George said: "Mamma, may I go out upon that hill just over the way, and fly my kite? I will be back long before all the children are in their seats."

"Well," said his mother, smiling and glancing at the kite, "I see you have come prepared; but be sure not to be late."

George ran off delighted. He had the hill to himself, for all the boys of Barton were going to attend the festival. But the wind was very strong up here, and seemed to grow fiercer every moment. Both hands were busy with his kite, when a violent gust swept his hat from his head. As George ran forward to recover it, a loud crash in the direction of the church startled him. He looked up, and saw that a great part of the scaffolding around the steeple had been blown away, and that the boards were sliding off the slanting roof in every direction, and at each new blast more poles, ropes, and planks came spinning through the air.

George hardly dared raise his eyes to where he had seen Mr. Hunter only a few moments ago. When he did so, however, the sight that met his eyes was almost worse than anything he could have thought of. For there, close to the great brass ball at the very point of the steeple, hung his kind friend, swinging backward and forward on a single narrow plank at every fresh gust of wind.

George threw down his kite, and rushed over the hill to join the crowd that came pouring from the church and along the road. On every side he heard cries of horror and pity. Presently he came upon a group of men talking excitedly.

"If there were time," said one of the men (a fireman), "we could send for another steeple climber or build up another set of platforms. But every instant I expect to see that bit of board he is on slip off. It is fastened in the frailest way."

"THE KITE ONCE MORE MOUNTED UPWARD."

"It is terrible," exclaimed another man, "to see a human being in such peril and be unable to assist him."

"I am awfully sorry," replied the fireman. "Nothing but a bird could reach him now. If we could get a rope up to him he would have a chance. But I don't see any way, for my part. He knows his danger, too, by the way he clasped his hands and looked down at me," added the fireman, sadly, turning his head away.

George listened until he felt the tears spring to his eyes, then he went slowly back to the lull, away from the crowd, and, crouching down upon the ground, hid his face in his hands.

All the pleasant things Mr. Hunter had said and done in the short time he had been in Barton came back to George as he sat there. He shuddered at every puff of wind that came over the hill, and buried his face deeper in his hands at every cry from the people around the church.

"He was always so ready to help others!" thought George; "why cannot some one find a way to help him now?"

At that moment something struck him a smart blow on his bended head. He looked up quickly, and saw his kite, which he had thrown down, swaying loosely about. The heavy ball of twine kept it from blowing quite away. It fell as the wind died out, and lay at his feet, the golden word "success" staring him in the face.

Somewhat, George never knew how, this word reminded him of what Mr. Hunter had told him of the use kites were sometimes put to.

George's back was toward the church, and the wind blew directly into his face as he pushed back his hat and slowly raised the kite from the ground. He wound the twine smoothly over the stick again, and thoughtfully straightened the tail.

Suddenly he uttered a low cry. "I will try, at least," he said, as he turned his face toward the church, and, raising the kite high in the air, let the twine glide through his fingers.

After flapping wildly about and making two or three sweeping dives in the air, the kite was suddenly caught by the wind and went soaring upward.

George walked slowly down the hill, his eyes fixed intently on the kite. His hat blew off; he did not notice it, but left it where it fell. At this moment Susie came running up to him.

"Oh, George," she whispered, "how can you fly your kite now? How can you be so heartless? I am so ashamed!"

"Don't bother me!" was all the answer George made, as he went carefully on.

He shoved his way through a crowd of children; they turned and looked at him, whispering among themselves; but George did not even see them.

A large boy sprang forward and snatched at the twine.

"Get back!" cried George, savagely, his eyes shining and his face very white.

But the boy held on firmly, and in a moment more the twine would have snapped in two had not the fireman, who was watching George's movements intently, suddenly strode forward and with his strong arm swept back the boy and the others that were pressing upon him.

"Out of the way! Give him room! The little fellow has an idea—that's more than any of you have," cried he, as he waved his arms about.

It was not long before every one in that great concourse of people was staring wonderingly at George and the fireman. But as the kite moved nearer and nearer the steeple a man was heard to say:

"That's a bright notion! I hope he will succeed."

Then little by little, and one by one, the spectators seemed to discover George's real intentions, and turned their eyes on the kite.

Every time the wind failed there came a smothered groan from the terrified throng. And when, after a wild plunge, the kite mounted upward joyously, as though it knew on what an errand of mercy it was bound, they cheered. Never before had such an excitement attended the raising of a kite.

As George stepped backward and forward, guiding his kite, his heart beat wildly, for he could now plainly see his friend clinging desperately to the rope that fastened his insecure resting place.

Presently the kite struck the steeple, far below the poor man's feet, and fell, as though weary of being buffeted about by the wind. For a moment a mist crept over George's eyes, for he thought that he had failed. But the kite once more mounted upward, and began at last to circle around Mr. Hunter's head.

"He is pushing it away!" cried the fireman, excitedly. "He don't know what it's for."

"Haul it up!" shouted the crowd.

Some faint sound of voices must have reached the poor man's ears, for he was seen to take the kite in his hand.

"Oh dear! oh dear!" cried George, suddenly losing all hope. "He does not know what to do with it."

"Send up the messenger he gave you," said Susie, darting out from the crowd, and standing by her brother's side.

George gave her a look of gratitude, as he pulled from his pocket the circular piece of pasteboard and wrote a few words upon it.

"Good!" exclaimed the fireman, as George slipped it over the twine. Then turning to people behind him, he said, "The little fellow is now going to send word to the man up there to pull up the twine when we give the signal."

The messenger went spinning upward, with all eyes fixed on its progress. There was a deep silence in the crowd, which seemed to be holding its very breath in suspense.

The twine was smooth and without a knot, and hardly two minutes elapsed before the wind had carried the message to Mr. Hunter.

"He is reading it," shouted the fireman in a loud voice. The crowd cheered in response.

"Now he is waving his hat," cried the fireman.

There was another wild cry of delight from the spectators. The twine slipped from George's grasp, and he sank upon the ground and buried his face in his hands.

Susie came close to him and whispered: "They're tying a strong cord to your twine." Then after a pause she added, "Now he is pulling it up, too, and they have fastened a thick heavy rope to the slender one."

"George! George!" whispered Susie again, "I cannot look any more, for he has tied the great rope to the steeple, and is coming down. But suppose he should fall, after all!"

George heard his sister sob, but did not yet dare to raise his eyes.

Suddenly a louder shout than ever came from the people around. Then George looked up, trembling all over.

"Is he safe?" asked Susie.

"Yes," said George, "he has reached the trap-door in the roof."

In a few minutes more he heard voices saying, "Where is the boy that flew the kite?" then he felt some one touch him on the head. Looking up, George saw Mr. Hunter standing before him. He stooped as if to say something, but before he could speak, George was raised high in the air and carried toward the church on the shoulders of two tall men. All the people, great and small, followed, cheering loudly.

It was many minutes before Mr. Hunter could find a chance to speak to George; but when at last he did so, it was with a trembling voice and tears in his eyes.

"How can I thank you, my dear boy?" he said.

"Don't try," replied George. "I am so happy! and oh how glad I am that I happened to remember what you told me once about kites being sometimes used to carry the first strand of a suspension-bridge over the river!"

The festival was a great success, but no one either thought or spoke of anything but the wonderful escape of James Hunter. And years afterward, even to this day, whenever any stranger admires the church steeple, the story of how George Baker saved James Hunter's life with his kite is told by some eye-witness.

The kite itself was carried off by an old gentleman, who after putting it under a glass case, with a written account of the feat it had performed, placed it in the museum in Barton, where it still remains.

THE FAMOUS BELLS OF THE WORLD.

BY MRS. F. G. DE PONTAINE.

It is not improbable that Tubal Cain, the sixth in descent from Adam, "an instructor of every artificer in brass and iron," may have known something of the art of making bells. Church bells originated in Italy, being formed by degrees out of the cymbals and small tinkling bells used in the religious ceremonies of the East as a means of honoring the gods. Although first introduced in the fourth century, it was not until the sixth century that they were suspended in the roofs of churches.

The hours of the day were first ordered to be struck by Pope Sebastian in 605, to announce to the people the time for singing and praying. Bells were often baptized and consecrated with great pomp, the priests anointing them with oil, washing them with water, and making the sign of the cross in the name of the Trinity. They were named as early as 968, the great bell of the Lateran Church at Rome being named by Pope John XIII. in honor of himself.

The largest bell in the world is in Moscow, the city of bells. It was cast, by order of the Empress Anne, in 1653. It is twenty-one feet four and a half inches in height, twenty-two feet five and a half inches in diameter where the clapper strikes; its circumference at the bottom is sixty-three feet, its thickness twenty-three inches, and its tongue fourteen feet long.

Fifty men were required to ring this monster bell, twenty-five pulling upon each side. In 1837 the Czar Nicholas caused it to be disinterred from its bed of sand where it was lodged during the conflagration of 1737, and placed it on the granite pedestal where it now rests. It was then consecrated as a chapel, the entrance to the interior being through a large fracture caused by falling timbers in the fire of 1737. The value of the metal is $330,000. It is said that at the casting of this bell nobles were present from all parts of Europe, who vied with each other in the value of the silver plate, gold jewelry, and other votive offerings which they cast into the furnace.

There are 5000 large bells in Moscow alone, 37 being in one tower. Whoever has visited Russia recalls the sound of the great bells which form a part of the religious worship, and are regarded by the Russians with such superstitious veneration.

The bells of China are next in size to those of Russia. In the suburbs of Peking is the largest suspended bell in the world. To ring it a huge beam is swung against its side. There are in Peking seven bells each weighing 120,000 pounds. At Nankin is a bell the weight of which is 50,000 pounds. The tone of these bells, however, is discordant and "pammy," like that of the Chinese gongs.

The bell of St. Paul's, London, weighs 11,500 pounds, that of the Cathedral of Paris 38,000, and of Vienna 40,000 pounds. The bell of St. Peter's at Rome weighs 17,000 pounds. Notre Dame Cathedral, Canada, has a bell larger than any in England, its weight being 29,400 pounds, while that of the House of Parliament in London weighs 28,000 pounds. When it is remembered that the largest bells heard in our American cities rarely weigh more than three or four thousand pounds, some idea may be had of the volume of tone which belongs to the monster bells above described.

The heaviest bell ever made in the United States was the alarm bell formerly in the City Hall in New York. It weighed 23,000 pounds. In 1867 it was broken, and recast in smaller fire-bells.

The most celebrated bell in the United States is that known as the "Liberty Bell" in Philadelphia. It was imported from England in 1752, cracked by a trial stroke, and recast in Philadelphia by Isaac Norris. On the 4th of July, 1776, this bell announced the signing of the Declaration of Independence. It was again cracked while being ring in honor of Henry Clay's visit to Philadelphia, and since then has been on exhibition in Independence Hall. It bears the following inscription, taken from Leviticus xxvth chapter, 10th verse, "Proclaim liberty throughout the land unto all the inhabitants thereof."

The "Great Tom" of Oxford, weighing 17,000 pounds, bears the following curious inscription, whence its name:

"In Thom laude resonat Bim-Bom, sine fraude."*

On the largest of the three bells placed by Edward III. in the King Edward, Westminster, are these words:

"King Edward made me thirte thousand weight and three;
Take me down and wey me, and more you shall find me."

On a bell in Durham Cathedral is inscribed:

"To call the folks to church in time,
I chime;
When mirth and pleasure's on the wing,
I ring;
And when the body leaves the soul,
I toll."

On a bell at Lapley, in Staffordshire, England:

"I will sound and re-sound to thee, O Lord,
To call Thy people to Thy word."

In Meivod Church, Montgomeryshire:

"I to the church the living call,
And to the grave do summon all."

The following motto may still be seen on some of the bells that have swung in their steeples for centuries:

"Men's death I tell by doleful knell;
Lightning and thunder I break asunder."

The motto of Schiller's ever-memorable Song of the Bell was common to the church bells of the Middle Ages, and may still be found on the great minister of Schaffhausen, and on that of the church near Lucerne:

"Vivos voco—Mortuos plango—Fulgura frango"—
(I call the living—I mourn the dead—I break the lightning.)

In the belfry of old St. Michael's Church, Charleston, South Carolina, there is a chime of bells with which there is quite a bit of history connected, and which have had a more romantic career than many more famous bells.

These bells, eight in number, were imported from England in 1764, at a cost of £581. On the evacuation of Charleston, in 1782, Major Traill, of the Royal Artillery, took them down under the pretence that they were a military requisite, belonging to the commanding officer. The vestry of the church applied to Lieutenant-General Leslie to have them restored, on the ground that they were paid for by subscription, and private property was secure under the terms of the capitulation. No answer was returned. Sir Guy Carleton, at New York, however, anticipated the wish of the vestry, and ordered the bells to be restored. Meanwhile they had been shipped to England. The vestry then applied to the Secretary of War of Great Britain, but without success. They were sold; and being purchased by a Mr. Rhinew, were generously reshipped by him to Charleston in 1783. They chimed their hallowed music thenceforward until 1863, when Charleston, being in a state of siege, they were removed to Columbia, South Carolina, and deposited in the State-house grounds. Here they were destroyed in the burning of Columbia, February, 1865. After the war they were again sent to England, and, strange as it may appear, recast by the descendants of the original founders, and returned to their old Revolutionary home, where they still mark the footsteps of the hours, and link with every tone the present with the tenderest associations of the past.

CHAPTER VIII.

ON THE TRAIL.

CAT-SHA, the Seminole chief, rejoiced greatly at having gained to his band so promising a young warrior as Chitta, who had so incurred the enmity of both the white men and his own people as to be obliged to fly from them for his life.

After eating together a meal of dried venison that the elder produced from his wallet, the two Seminoles sat, concealed behind a thick cluster of cactus, watching the river for any signs of pursuit, and forming plans for future action. Cat-sha told Chitta that he had left his band in their most inaccessible stronghold among the bayous and deep morasses of the great Okefenokee Swamp. He also said that, were it not for the presence of so large a number of friendly Indians in the immediate vicinity of Fort Caroline, he should bring his warriors to attack it; for he had decided that the chances were in favor of his success in so doing.

"Ha!" exclaimed Chitta, interrupting his chief at this point, "I may, in that case, be of service to thee, though I am as yet untried in battle." Then he told Cat-sha a secret that was known to but few of his people, and which he himself had only discovered by accident. It was the same that Has-se had declined to confide to René when the latter questioned him as to the manner of his escape from the fort, and it was indeed a secret of the utmost value to the enemies of the white men.

Cat-sha listened attentively, and when Chitta had finished he exclaimed: "Well done, my young brave! Thy serpent's wisdom is already proving of value to us. What thou hast just told me makes clear our plan of attack upon this nest of pale-faces, and removes one of the chief difficulties in our way. Having this information, I regard the fort and all that it contains as already in our power. We have only to bide our time. Well may the white man tremble; for ere many days the tiger, guided by the serpent, will spring at his throat."

As they talked, their attention was directed to a dark moving mass floating down the river, close under its bank. Cat-sha soon pronounced it to be a fleet of canoes filled with people, and they watched them with eager curiosity.

It was, indeed, the tribe from which Chitta had fled, moving, under the leadership of their chief Micoo, toward the land of the Alachuas, where food in abundance awaited them. At the outset of their journey they kept as close as possible under the river-bank to avoid observation from the white men in Fort Caroline, who, they feared, might oppose their departure if they learned of it. It was not until they reached the bold bluff from the summit of which the two Seminoles watched their progress that they felt they were safe from the eyes of the fort, and might strike boldly out into the river. Here, aided by the full strength of the ebbing tide, they proceeded rapidly on their way toward its mouth.

Seeing that the canoes which were thus passing beneath them contained, besides the warriors of the tribe, its women and children, and all of its movable property, Cat-sha concluded that it was a general movement of Micoo's people toward some distant place; and from the direction they were taking he guessed that their destination was the fertile land of the Alachuas.

"This is thy doing," he said to Chitta, who was regarding in bitter silence the departure of his people, toward whom he still felt drawn by old association in spite of what he had so recently done and become. "This is thy doing, my young Seminole. Thou hast destroyed their store of food, and thus compelled them to go in search of more. Now let us follow them, and when we have seen them at a safe distance, we will bring my brave warriors to the attack of the white men shut up in yonder gopher hole."

When the departing tribe was nearly out of sight down the river, the two Seminoles, drawing Chitta's stolen canoe from its hiding-place, started in pursuit. They so arranged their own movements that they ran no chance of discovery from those in advance of them, though they were never far behind. They carefully examined each camping place of the moving tribe to assure themselves that no person was left behind who might discover them, and they always placed their own little camps so that they should be entirely concealed from those whom they followed.

Cat-sha was much pleased to find that in thus following Micoo's tribe he was also journeying in the direction of his own band, who awaited him in the depths of the great swamp. He even meditated an attack upon them as they travelled, with their women, children, and baggage, before leading his warriors back to Fort Caroline.

It was these two, then, whose traces had so puzzled Has-se, as he and René de Veaux in turn followed them, and it was their canoe of which the two boys caught a fleeting glimpse in the great swamp.

"Look!" exclaimed Has-se, whose keen eye was the first to detect the vanishing canoe. "These are either my own people, whom we have thus overtaken, or those whom we know to be in close pursuit of them. Here is work for us, Ta-lah-lo-ko, or rather for me, for it is my duty to discover the meaning of this pursuit, and warn my people if danger is near them, while I am also bound to keep thee as far as possible from all harm."

"Nonsense, Has-se! It is well for thee to keep me out of danger so long as thou keepest from it thyself; but since I have thrown my fortunes with thine, thy friends are my friends, thy enemies are my enemies, and thy safety or danger is mine to share with thee. So say no more of my safety, save as it concerns thine as well; but lead on as thou thinkest best, and I will follow thee as truly as though I were enlisted beneath thy banner. Not that I suppose you Indians have such things as banners, or understand their significance; but you might well have them, and be none the worse for the having."

Although Has-se made no reply to this brave speech, he accepted it as an evidence of true friendship, and gave René a grateful smile, which the latter understood to mean, "Very well, Ta-lah-lo-ko, I accept thy offer of service as heartily as thou dost tender it."

Under ordinary circumstances Has-se's Indian instinct would not have permitted him to cross the open water of the bayou in broad daylight when he suspected that an enemy might be lying in wait for him on its further side. On this occasion, however, it seemed so impossible that the occupants of the canoe, of which he had caught but the merest glimpse, should have looked back and detected them at the same instant, that he decided to push on, and, if possible, discover more of it. So he and René crossed the open water as quickly and with as little noise as possible, and as they approached its opposite side Has-se gazed keenly into the dark lanes between the moss-hung cypresses. He neither saw nor heard anything to cause him alarm, and congratulating themselves that they had not been discovered, the boys pushed on over the waters of another extremely narrow stream.

This, to René's surprise, flowed, though with an almost imperceptible current, in the direction they were taking, or exactly opposite to that of the river they had ascended from the salt-marshes of the east. As Has-se had requested him to keep absolute silence, and on no account to speak, he restrained his curiosity for the present, but determined to seek an explanation of this phenomenon when an opportunity should offer.

He afterward discovered that the river they had ascended and that which they were now descending both rose in the great swamp, and that their head waters were connected by navigable streams, but that while one flowed east into the Atlantic, the other flowed west into the Gulf of Mexico.

In thus deeming themselves undiscovered by those in advance of them, the boys made an almost fatal mistake. The wily Cat-sha, accustomed to look for danger behind every tree, and almost expecting to hear the war cry of his enemies in every breath of wind, knew better than to leave open waters without looking behind as he did so. On this occasion the quick glance thrown backward at the instant his canoe entered the shadows of the cypresses detected the gleam of a paddle, and he knew at once that he and Chitta were being followed, even as they were following Micco and his people.

He said nothing until they were safely within the shadows, when he told Chitta of his discovery. The latter advised going into hiding at once, and awaiting the approach of their unknown pursuers; but the more experienced Cat-sha said no, for if they had also been discovered, that was exactly what they would be expected to do, and their pursuers would exercise more than a usual amount of caution in approaching that point. Once safely past it, they would advance more boldly, thinking that their own presence had been undetected. He therefore continued on down the little stream for nearly a mile, until they reached a point where the channel was so seriously obstructed by overhanging vines and stranded driftwood that only a passage barely wide enough for a single canoe was left open.

Here they drew their canoe from the water, and carefully concealed it. Then they took positions one on each side of the stream; and, hidden behind screens of tangled vines, with arrows held ready to be fitted to their bowstrings, they patiently awaited the coming of their unknown pursuers.

Toward this well-planned trap, that seemed to insure their destruction, René and Hasse advanced, cautiously, to be sure, but without a warning of what awaited them. At length they had approached within a quarter of a mile of the ambush, and one would have said that nothing could prevent their falling into it.

At this point Hasse whispered, "Keep wide open thy ears as well as thy eyes, Ta-lah-lo-ko"; and René answered also in a whisper:

"They are already so wide open that not the faintest hum of a gnat escapes them. What's that?"

The sudden snapping of a twig by some bird or small animal caused them to start, and listen for a moment with uplifted paddles. The canoe thus left to itself, unguided, drifted aside, and hung for an instant upon the upraised end of a sunken log. René reached his hand down into the water to push it clear of the obstruction, but suddenly withdrew it with a suppressed cry of pain and fright. At the same time a large water-snake, of the kind known as the moccasins, glided away, and disappeared beneath the slimy bank.

FLYING FIREWORKS.

BY ALICE MAY.

A CUBAN friend called on us one evening last week, holding in his hand a brown paper bag perforated with small holes. These "breathing holes" suggesting to our pet-loving children "something alive," the gentleman and paper bag were immediately surrounded.

The girls retreated upon being told that the bag contained "flying fireworks" that might "go off," but the boys boldly demanded a sight of the new fireworks.

A peep into the bag caused every boy to draw back with disgusted face.

"Ugh! only two dead beetles," one youngster muttered. "A mean joke, I say."

Here there was a scream from all the children, "The bag's afire!"

Truly the brown paper bag looked as if ready to fall on the floor a heap of flaming paper. But our Cuban friend, as he rescued it from being trampled on, coolly remarked:

"The beetles are just opening their stock of fireworks. Now put out the gas, and we shall have a fine display."

The gas was turned down, and by the intense, beautiful light that streamed from the paper bag our faces gleamed with a weird greenish tinge, and we could read the letters on the newspaper in papa's hand.

Those two ugly beetles were the managers of this pyrotechnic exhibition, for each carried on his shoulders two brilliant stars, from which shone a light almost supernatural in its intensity, and the beetles, constantly raising their wings, as if to fly, showed their soft bodies glowing like masses of living fire.

It seemed impossible to realize that no heat accompanied this radiant light, and the children were so afraid the bag would take fire that, by advice of our friend, a warm bath was provided for our new pets, already named Meteor and Comet. So they were gently placed upon a minnie pond in an oyster bowl, with a minnie rock island in the centre. It was a lovely sight, the water becoming a sea of liquid fire; and as the wonderful phosphorescent light struck against the rock (a quartz specimen), each diamond cut crystal flashed and sparkled with lovely prismatic colors.

When Meteor and Comet were tired of their bath they leisurely climbed upon the rock and went to sleep. Their lamps went out, and again they became ugly brown beetles, with only two flattened yellow beads on their shoulders to show where the light came from. These spots looked like glass, and the luminous body, when the beetle is awake, seems to shine through them like a flame through a glass window.

That night Meteor and Comet slept in a ventilated ice-cream box, and a lunch of banana and brown sugar was provided for them, in case they should feel faint during the night.

The Cuban gentleman told us that these beetles were claters, commonly called skip-jacks, click-beetles, snap-beetles, etc.—names given them because of a peculiar way they have of unjointing their spines with a clicking noise.

The legs of an elater beetle are so short that when turned on his back he is as helpless as a capsized turtle; but nature has provided for the poor bug a springing-machine. The "spine" fits into a socket, and by bending the head and thorax backward—a position somewhat similar to standing on its head—the beetle can withdraw the spine from the socket, a sudden jerk causing it to slip back with a sharp click, and with such force that the skip-jack is made to turn a complete somersault in the air, the beetle, like the "springing man" at the circus, expecting to fall on his feet.

The women in South America place several claters in a box with glass sides, and go about their work by the light of this living lamp, and Cuban beauties promenade in the evening with flaming beetles fastened in their glossy braids.

Meteor and Comet dearly love to sleep in the daytime, and always when we take out our ice-cream box to display the fire-bugs, we find our pets apparently dead. After several frights we have learned to place the rogues on their backs; and then it is funny to see them wake up, one leg at a time, until all the legs and antennae are waving desperately about, a fiery glow coming from the exposed body and bright shoulder lamps of each struggling victim. Then the skip-jacks will try to stand on their heads, and the children are always delighted to see our lady visitors jump as Meteor and Comet with a sharp click turn a somersault in the air, sometimes repeating this performance over and over again, until they come down right side up.

One evening we were all disconsolate at the loss of Meteor, who, having feigned death until we left him, had flown away. Fearing to miss a gleam from our pet's lights, we had turned out the gas, and the whole family were down on their knees, looking under chairs, tables, and couches. A shout from a child on an expedition under the piano brought us all to the spot, and there under the piano leg, snugly hidden against the caster, safe from broom or duster, glistened a "something" that not only dazzled our eyes, but gladdened our hearts. This something was a long-lost diamond that had fallen from a ring, causing a pretty maiden many bitter tears. The light shining on the diamond came, as you may have guessed, from the tiny fireworks on Meteor's shoulders, the runaway being hidden by its side.

That fire-bug more narrowly escaped a kissing than ever beetle did before, and he seemed to rather enjoy the situation, for he lighted up with such marvellous brilliancy that one little one with a strong imagination declared he blistered her fingers.

And so our flying fireworks have brought good luck with them, and to the children are a delight, never "fizzling" or going out. Rain makes them brighter, and repairs are never needed. The only expense for their maintenance is a tiny bit of banana and a drop of sweetened water.

THE CAPTIVE QUEEN.

CHAPTER V.

THE King and his friends at once pushed on, and after some little time approached the dark mass which has already been mentioned, and which turned out to be the base of a huge rocky mountain reaching up into the sea. Nearer and nearer they came to it, and presently a sight met the eyes of the King which filled him with the greatest astonishment.

Above his head the water was so clear that he could see for a long distance, and there were objects to gaze at which he had never seen before. He had already seen a quantity of fishes, some of them very curious and quite unknown to him until his visit to those strange regions, but he now beheld something besides fishes. Women with beautiful hair, charming of face and form down to the waist, and then tapering off into the scales and tail of a fish, were floating about in the water by the side of the rocky mountain. Women, I say, but of course this was only an idea which shot across the King's mind for one single instant, for he knew too much of natural history not to be aware that these were mermaids and nothing else.

Now although this learned King had read in his books about mermaids, and therefore knew that they existed, it so happened that he had never seen one, and at ordinary times he would have been filled with curiosity at the strange sight. But in justice to the good man I am bound to say that his thoughts immediately flew to his beloved wife, and that all that occurred to him was that if the bantam cock had spoken the truth when he said that the Queen was shut up in a cave where "the mermaids and elves had it all to themselves," the sight of these lady-fish seemed to betoken that she whom he sought was not far off.

All the same, he could not help observing the beauty, as well as the graceful motions, of the mermaids above his head. Some were, as I have said, merely floating, some were swimming, while several of them were diving, but driving such horses as the King had never seen before. One, lazily reclining in an enormous shell which had been converted into a carriage, was drawn by two large porpoises, cleverly harnessed with sea-weed, of which her whip also appeared to be made; another was driving a four-in-hand of turbot with singular skill; while a third had no less than twelve codfish, which, yoked four abreast, drew her along in a chariot which appeared to be made entirely of dried cuttle-fish. These all presented an extraordinary appearance to one who was unaccustomed to sea-life and the habits of mermaids, and at another time the King could, and doubtless would, have remained gazing at them for at least an hour.

The business upon which he had come was, however, of too important a character to brook delay, nor, had he wished to wait, would his three companions have been likely to approve. The kangaroo and cow came close up to the foot of the mountain, and the rabbit, leaping down, stood by their side. The King, following the rabbit's example, dismounted also, and then perceived for the first time that the sides of the rocky mountain were as slippery as ice, and that there seemed to be no way of ascending it, supposing that to be the intention of his friends. He could not imagine what they would do, or how they would get over the difficulty which stood in their way, but he was not long left in doubt.

Three taps on the drum from the kangaroo, a flourish on the sife from the rabbit, and a single tinkle of the cow's bells produced a marvellous effect. A path suddenly appeared upon the side of the icy rock, a broad path, and not only broad, but so closely strewn with sand that one could walk upon it without the slightest risk of slipping; and up this path marched the three animals in single file, as quietly as if they had been used to it all their lives, which, for anything the King knew, might have been the case. His Majesty followed without difficulty, and found that he could see from the gradual ascent of the path all the marine sights at which he had gazed from below.

But what seemed most singular to him was that although presently the party got upon a level with the sea, through which the mountain seemed to rise, no inconvenience followed, and they all kept perfectly dry. The path slanted first one way and then another, always bringing them higher and higher, until at last they found themselves upon a large level space where the mountain broke away on either side, and thence towered up still higher.

Here the three animals stopped, partly perhaps because they were tired, partly because of the beauty of the place, and partly for another reason which I shall presently explain. The first reason does not require explanation, if we think for a moment of the long journey which the travellers had already taken. The second reason will be easily understood when I tell you that on the side of the place on which they stood—that is to say, on the right, and immediately before them, for behind them was the path and on their left the sea—the rocks were cast about in the most lovely and fantastic manner, just as if they had been carved out by some mighty sculptor who had exhausted all his skill in their construction.

So, indeed, they had, but by a sculptor more mighty than one of mortal mould, for nothing so grandly magnificent had ever been formed by man. As they towered up grandly to the skies beyond the blue sea, the King could perceive a large opening in the side of the rocks, the nature of which he understood better afterward, but which appeared at the time as if it had been made by the constant beating of the waves against the mountain, though no waves then appeared to reach it at that point.

But the third reason for the halting of the travellers was of a very different nature. I have said that the mountain broke away on either side, and so indeed it did; but while on the right hand the path seemed to come to an end, and the rocks rose, rough and ragged, straight from the ground on either side of the open space at which they had arrived, it was not so immediately in front. There the path seemed to continue for a short distance, and led across a kind of rocky bridge some dozen yards wide, upon the other side of which there appeared to be a second open space, beyond which were some of those openings of which I have spoken, up to which the ground rose with a gentle slope. The way of the travellers clearly lay across this bridge, but there was that in their path which might well cause them to pause.

In the very middle of the bridge stood a figure, and one which seemed to be of no friendly character. It was the figure of a man, but, oh! of what a man! He was about eight feet in height, so that he might have been called a giant, if any one pleased to call him so. His fat, however, took off something from his height, for he was fat to a degree which made it unpleasant to look at him, just as one hates to gaze upon a prize bullock whose fat has destroyed the shape and symmetry which one might otherwise have admired. But his face was the worst part of him, after all. Cruelty, malice, and deceit were all visible in his eye (for he had but one); his nose, much too large for his face, was red and inflamed; his mouth large, and his lips coarse, while the unshaven condition of his chin and the dirty little red cap upon his head completed the picture of as villainous-looking a rascal as you will be likely to find in any company of such people from which you might try to select a specimen.

Nor was it only his general appearance from which his hostile feeling might be gathered. He had in his hand a short club, covered with knots which made it doubly formidable, and this he swung to and fro as if longing to bring it down upon somebody's head, and you may be sure it would have been a bad day for somebody if he had done so. He stood, I say, in the middle of the bridge, and as the travellers came up toward it he gave forth a kind of sound between a shout and a roar which was neither harmonious nor otherwise pleasant to their ears. Then, in a voice which was not much sweeter of sound than his first utterance, he said this:

"Wretches! who and what be ye
That seek the caverns of the sea?
Here stands the wizard of the cave
To take your life and dig your grave."

Nothing daunted by these terrible words, the kangaroo was the animal who, drawing himself up to his full height, thus repeated:

"Wizard, we know thee well, I ween;
No further news, indeed, we lack,
Thou from a King has stol'n a Queen;
Be good enough to give her back."

Then the wizard flew into a fearful passion; he raged, he tore off his cap, he sprang up in the air, he made the most awful faces. Then, brandishing his club, he began to perform a kind of frantic dance, to a tune of which the words ran as follows:

"Ye animals three, whatever ye be,
A wizard is stronger far,
And soon shall ye find ye are foolish and blind
With wizards to go to war,
I'm wanting a treat, and my favorite meat
(I soon shall enjoy it, too)
Is a rabbit to bake, and a good beefsteak,
And a chop from a kangaroo."

At these words the cow trembled all over, the gray fur of the rabbit seemed to grow white with terror, and the kangaroo's teeth chattered as if from fright. But this did not last for above a minute; the tinkle of the bells, the squeak of the life, and the soul-stirring beat of the drum chased away the momentary fear of the three animals, and the rabbit took his turn in the conversation, and in a shrill, squeaking, but clear voice returned this reply to the threats which had just been made:

"Old wizard, full soon
You'll sing a new tune,
And follow a different cue,
For the rabbit and cow
Will show to you how,
And so will the kangaroo."

Without a moment's hesitation the wizard, still singing to the same tune, thus answered these bold words:

"Cease, rabbit, to speak,
For you can but squeak,
And the cow can only moo,
And I don't care a jot
For one of the lot—
A fig for your kangaroo!"

Then the cow, justly excited by that which seemed to be a sneer at her usual pleasant manner of addressing her friends in particular and the world in general, broke in with her deep voice with the following words:

"You pestilent knave,
In vain do you rave
And make such a hullabaloo,

For the cow can fight,
And the rabbit can bite,
And scratch can the kangaroo."

As the cow concluded her verse the wizard gave a wild yell, and advanced upon the travellers as if he intended to make an end of them at once. Scarcely, however, had he made a step forward, when the three friends, instead of preparing to fight after the fashion which their words had seemed to imply, and which their enemy had probably expected, took quite a different course: each of them made the sign which they had been shown by the old man, and pronounced the magic word, "Barley-sugar."

The effect upon the wizard was instantly to be seen. His face grew pale as a sheet, his limbs trembled, his club dropped from his hands, and after a moment's hesitation he addressed the animals before him in quite a different manner from that which he had previously employed. His tone was now as ering as it had just been defiant, his sneering rhymes were changed into feeble prose, and he looked for all the world like a whipped hound.

"I did not know that you had a right to come here," he said, "or of course I should have been glad to see you. I hope you will not be offended at what I said just now. We do not often have people here, and we always try to keep the place quiet; but of course if I had known—"

Here the kangaroo broke in, somewhat roughly, still speaking in rhyme, which is known to be the safest plan when you are conversing with any such strange creatures as the one before him:

"Come, give us the Queen without any more row—
The work must be carried through;
The rabbit has sworn it, and so has the cow,
And so has the kangaroo."

Then he gave a rattle on the drum, and the rabbit and the cow sounded their instruments also, and looked fiercely upon the wizard. A dark cloud of baffled malice passed over the face of the latter, as he replied to the kangaroo in a sullen tone, though still in humble accents.

"The Queen is over there," he said, pointing toward the mountain behind him by jerking his right thumb over his left shoulder. "She is as jolly as need be, and I don't see why you should take her away; but if you must, you must. Follow me!"

So saying, he turned round and retreated across the bridge, upon which the three animals immediately stepped, followed by the King, who was now filled with hope that the success of his journey was about to be secured, and that his Amabilia would soon be with him again.

PULLING CANDY.

THEN little lads and lasses
Were so fond of molasses,
They eandy-man played,
And candy they made
Into large and beautiful masses.

You can see how happy and sweet
Are the little ones' looks as they meet,

Then pull, pull again,
These dear little ten.
Oh my! what an elegant treat!

Pulling eandy is very great fun,
But eating the candy after it's done
Is the very funniest kind of fun.

"The Story of a Ring," and "False Witness." My sister Annie and my cousin wrote some letters to you a few weeks ago. I have a letter which is sitting on thirteen eggs. She will probably have little chickens to-morrow. My sister and cousin and a friend of ours call. Our cat had a camp up in the woods. We are not allowed to sleep there all night, but have music bottles tucked with willow-wands up there. My pets consist of two cats ever come up here? My pets consist of seventeen or eighteen little chickens, and my little cousin Edith, who is very sweet. Your affectionate friend, F. E. L.

Which do you like the better, dear the darling cousin or the baby chicks?

GUNNISON, COLORADO.

I have not written to you since last winter, so I thought I would write again. I have caught a great many trout this year, and some very large ones. We are cutting the hay now, and there is about one hundred and seventy-five tons. I send you a few enigmas which I made up myself, and I hope you will print them.

GEORGE A. C.

By-and-by you will see some of your enigmas in the proper place, and meanwhile thank you for sending them.

EDINBURGH, SCOTLAND.

When lately looking over the Post-office Box in HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE, I saw that Carrie W. C., of Gravesend, Kent, England, wanted a recipe for making many-cakes. I got out my tin, and to make JOHNNY-CAKES—Take a pint of Indian meal, mix a little salt with it, and as much boiling water will form a batter; this was about half a pint. Beat it well for several minutes, then spread it to about an eighth of an inch in thickness on a smooth piece of board; place the board upright in front of a clear fire, and bake the cakes. When well browned, cut it into squares, split these, put butter between, and send them to the table as hot as possible. Time; bake one well browned on each side.

I am a little girl nearly eleven years old, and have just come home from a six weeks' holiday, having been in France, Belgium, Germany, Prussia, Switzerland, Austria, &c.

LUCY ELIZABETH G.

NEPESIN, ILLINOIS.

DEAR POSTMISTRESS,—I have been taking this beautiful paper for about a year. The last of this month it will close. I am very sorry, and I am trying to save up enough money to get it for another year. I have been attending camp-meeting, and on a very nice time. I will see you later in print. Good-by. ETHEL M. B.

And I hope Ethel will continue among our little readers for a long, long time.

DEMING'S BRIDGE, TEXAS.

DEAR POSTMISTRESS,—I am eleven years old, and have four sisters and two brothers. Our aunt gave us HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE for a Christmas present; and we are always glad when Wednesday comes, so that we can get it. I live in Texas, about five miles from the Colorado River, on the Prespaigales. We go bathing often, and I can swim very well. My papa raises cattle and sheep, and has some horses. I have a horse of my own named Sweet Lips. Sometimes I go riding with my two older sisters, and we ride to camp on horseback. One of my sisters and I have milk nineteen cows. I have a pet calf named Cynthia; I raised her on sweet milk and gruel, and fed her from a bottle. We have a great many ponies, but I am afraid I cannot say they get ripe; I dislike to have to pick them up.

OCE A. M.

TRENTON, MICHIGAN.

We live on the bank of the Trenton River. The house is surrounded by evergreens, maples, and horse-chestnut-trees. We live one mile and a half from Trenton. I haven't many little girls to play with here, the nearest live a mile from my house; their names are Grace, Katie, and Anna A. Grace takes St. Nicholas, and she lends it to me, and in return for her stuff and magazine I let her take some of my books. Good-by.

MABEL C.

HENNINGTON VALLEY.

My little brother and I have taken HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE for nearly three years, and think it delightful. We were impatiently for Tuesday to come, because it brings our paper. We are very much interested in the story "False Witness." I have only one pet, which is a lovely Irish setter dog, whose name is Sport. Lovingly, Dot C.

BOOKMAN, NEW YORK.

DEAR POSTMISTRESS,—I have taken HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE from the first volume, but I have not all the volumes, because I have lost two or three to the sick children. I am going to keep all the numbers of 1886, and have them bound. Like the author of "Nana," "Roif House," "Boy's Opportunity," and I hope "False Witness," I do not like to live in a city. I like to live in a "tyley," Mr. Stubbs's Brother," etc. I am now reading "Silent Pete, or the Stowaways." I do not live in Brooklyn; I am only here on a visit to my sister. I live in Camden, New Jersey. I have a little brother ten years younger than myself. We have no mother; she died two years ago. My father and I have five other children. I am fourteen years old. I hope I am not too old for my letter printed.

LAVINIA B. L.

YONKERS, NEW YORK.

I live in Philadelphia, and am spending a few weeks of my vacation at Yonkers. I was at Atlantic City three weeks before I came to Yonkers. One day I wanted something to read, and I went to the store and bought HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE. I have taken two numbers, and I am so much pleased with it that my father is going to subscribe for it.

WALTER M. L.

DEAR POSTMISTRESS,—I live in the country, seven miles from the village, and I thought I would write and tell you how I like HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE. My auntie gave me this delightful book for my birthday. It is very interesting and I am studying reading, spelling, writing, arithmetic, geography, music, and language. I have a little brother and my sister, and my father has a dog and a canary and a little kitten named Floss. She is brown, with white stripes. I will close with love from your little friend,

MABEL S.

ELBERTON, GEORGIA.

DEAR POSTMISTRESS,—I thought I would write you a few lines—and a few lines it shall be—about my poetry, if poetry it be. A good while ago I wrote part of this poetry, and I thought it was finished, and I happened to come across it again, and I thought I would fix it up and send it to you; so I corrected the mistakes, and put a head to it, and I have finished it. I hope you will not show me anything, and I let mamma see it, and she said it did very well for my first time, and my being only nine years old.

P. H. L.

Here it is, and I think it very good myself:

IN THE COUNTRY.

The sun is rising above our head;
The wind is as still as if it were dead;
The cocks are crowing for us to get out of bed,
Oh! she is so very lazy,
That girl they call Daisey,
And she says the air is doing,
The maids are up and doing,
And have sent to town to get some bluing,
While they hear the breakfast steaming.
The cooks a big dinner are getting,
While the boys the hens are setting,
But save one for their petting.

DEAR POSTMISTRESS,—I am a little girl almost ten years old, and I have written to HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE before. I have one sister, her name is Belle, and I have four brothers, and their names are Willie, Eddie, Frank, and Walter. We have no pets now. Once we had a little black dog, but he tramped down the garden so running after birds that we had to give him away. We have one nice black cow, but no horses. The cow's name is Beauty. We have a large five-acre lot for us to run and play in, and we have good times. I go to school and study geography, arithmetic, spelling, and reading. I like writing and drawing. I wonder if any of the readers of HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE ever enjoyed toogogging and drawing; we do. Above our house is a very steep hill covered with long, hard, dry grass, and we live children get barrel-staves and ride downhill, and it is lots of fun. We go up sometimes, and it were so interesting if we were not bothered with chinks or mittens.

MARY K. F.

DAVENPORT, IOWA.

DEAR POSTMISTRESS,—I am ten years old, and do not go to school, for I have been ill for five weeks. I take HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE, and have taken it for three years. I intend to keep on taking it. Now that I do not go to school, I can help you with the time. I have written "Elaine's Garden Party" and "The Kitty Cat" and "The Stork" were very nice.

LILLIE P.

PAS ADENCO.

DEAR POSTMISTRESS,—This is the first year I have subscribed for the paper, and I am very much pleased with it indeed. I live very near the city of Paris, which is a very nice little city. I go riding every day on my horse named Derby, which is my race-horse.

JOHN McLANE II.

SACRAMENTO, CALIFORNIA.

I live in Sacramento, the State capital, of which no doubt you have often heard. Every four years the Legislature meets in our city at the Capitol, and while here makes it quite lively. I should delight in telling you all that happens here, but for fear of your letter I will not dwell on the subject any longer. I hope that more very interesting letters from Hawaii will come soon, for I do love to read them, and almost wish I were with those who write them, that I might enjoy seeing the strange customs of the people there also. One thing above all, that I should most like to see, is to see some of the same kind of my age (fourteen) from any part of Europe, Hawaii, West Indies, or any part of the United States far from me. My unchanged reason for wishing it would be that I have to hear of the grand sights in the places which I have not had the opportunity to visit; therefore if any girl would like to be one of some fine places in California, I will readily inform her, if it is in my power, with the desired information, in exchange for theirs; we would then interchange news of our country for the good of hers, and so make it quite interesting. Would not some little girl love to hear of the Golden State? Helene Grossvult's "New Cassiopea" was very nicely written, and I could assure her that it was read, re-vised, and enjoyed by me, and should delight in having her as one of my correspondents. I have painting, and although I have never taken lessons, I am able to do quite well with the help of my outfit for oil-painting.

SOPHIA PRICE, 821 Eighth Street.

I thought I would write to you, because I never wrote to any paper before. I have taken HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE three years, and this is the earliest time that I have ever written to you very much indeed. I live in Northfield, Vermont. I have a pleasant home, I think. I have no brothers or sisters, and I am lonesome sometimes. I have many pets, including two dogs and two croquet sets—one for out-doors and one for in-doors. I like to play croquet very much. I have flowers, and also many beautiful flowers, and we have rose-bushes. MARY C. O.

A GEOGRAPHICAL ROMANCE.

Once upon a time my cousin a river in Scotland and a river in Ireland and I went on an excursion. A river in Scotland's mother. Mrs. river in Scotland, also, and I am able to do quite well. On our way we found a branch of the Yellowstone River, and filled it with a branch of the same river in a city in Arkansas. We bought some mountains in southern California, and also some (lake in western Nevada). At last, after counting a river of Idaho, we reached our destination. After starting our mountains in northern New Mexico, we started for home. On our way we met a fort on the Missouri, in Dakota, after which we stopped and took in Cousin Jack on the northern shore of Great Salt Lake, who could speak (peaks in southern Colorado) fluently. In about half an hour we arrived safely at home.

JOCKO, IN HIS THIRST FOR MISCHIEF, SERVES THE COOK A GOOD TURN.

With great intelligence, courage, and strength, the elephant, one might suppose, would not be easily scared, and yet it needs a very trifling thing to put him almost out of his wits with fright.

Fire is one of the things an elephant is afraid of, and he will always avoid it if he can. Shrill cries he does not like, and will usually turn back from. The negroes of Africa know these two facts, and make use of them to frighten off the herds of elephants which sometimes rush upon their villages in the night.

But the one way to thoroughly scare an elephant is to show him a little mouse. Not very long ago an elephant came near destroying a whole museum and menagerie, all because of a little mouse. It seems that a tiny white mouse in the museum saw a chance to escape from its cage, and of course took advantage of it and ran out. Just then somebody discovered the little white creature on the floor, and tried to catch it. Master Mouse, however, was in no mood to give up his liberty yet, and consequently, in mouse fashion, looked about for a convenient hole to disappear through. One of the holes in the elephant's trunk, which was dragging on the floor, seemed made exactly for the purpose, and into it darted the frightened mouse. My! a spark in a barrel of powder could hardly cause more commotion. The elephant became wild in a second, and, with a terrific shriek, rose on his hind-legs, waving his trunk frantically in the air. He tugged at his chains till they nearly snapped; he flung himself about in a perfect agony of fear and madness, and all the time his strange cries rang through the building.

The alarm was taken up by all the other animals, and a perfect Babel of appalling roars, howls, yells, and screams filled the menagerie. The keepers hardly knew which way to turn. They did not even know what the cause of the trouble was; but they did know that if the elephant were not quieted he would soon burst his chains and probably break through the walls of the building. A brave dog belonging there tried to do his duty, and sprang at the elephant, but the monster paid no heed to his puny onslaught, and it began to look as if a bullet would have to be sent into the mad creature's brain, when to the astonishment of the keepers the little mouse, tired of the uncomfortable quarters, dropped out of the trunk and ran away. After that, peace was restored.

Elephant trainers think the fear is the result of a dread lest the very small creature should run into the trunk, just as the white mouse did.

FRIGHTENING A GIANT.

THE lion is called the king of beasts, but he is nothing of the sort; for the tiger is his master, and the elephant lords it over both of them. Indeed, when it is not being hunted by the tiger and the lion, the elephant is also one of the

LITTLE BLUEJACKET

BY MARGARET E. SANGSTER

THE old sweet music hither blown
On winds that sweep the open sea,
Its bevering breath, its haunting tone,
Its "Follow 'follow" fills mine ear;
It woos thee with persuasive art,
And none who once its pleading hear
Thenceforth in peace possess their heart.

Not mine to thrum at eve and morn
To that low murmur borne from far,
For me no Triton "winds his horn"
Beyond the tossing harbor bar.
I better love the bending grass
Than all the rolling emerald sea,
That, weaving with its mystic pass,
Would draw my sailor lad from me.

Still, sturdy little mariner,
'Twere ill to hold thee from the life
Which hath such charm the pulse to stir,
Such fearless freedom, gallant strife.
The nurse of hardy souls and brave,
Of child-like heroes, lad and true,
Old ocean chants in every wave
The psalms of her jackets blue.

Our thought that swiftly backward wings
Recalls the ships of fair Phœnix,
Or, caught in Homer's measure, springs
To seek the longed for golden fleece.
The rare Genoua's daring prow
Cleaves once again the trackless sea,
To find the mythic world which now
Is home, sweet home, to thee and me.

Then speed thee, Little Jacket Blue;
Thy bark shall touch at Isles of balm;
The tempest's wrath shall test thy crew,
Sore swaried with the tropic's calm.
In languid heat or sullen cold,
In darkest night or stormiest day,
Keep yet a courage high and bold,
And bear thee nobly on thy way.

Look alway to thy polar star;
For He who rules the rolling spheres,
Whose own the circling planets are,
Great Sovereign of unmeasured years,
Will shield thee with His hand of might,
Ten thousand thousands praise Him true,
Who keeps forever in His sight,
Thus safe, my Little Jacket Blue.

FLOWERS IN THE WINDOW.

BY GEORGE R. KNAPP.

AS the pleasant days of summer pass away, our young folks will sadly miss the beautiful flowers which have helped to make life more enjoyable through the long days. But if we are willing to devote a little time to the work, our windows may be easily transformed into beautiful gardens, where we may have an abundance of bloom and fragrance throughout the winter.

I will endeavor to show the readers of HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE how they may enjoy these beautiful flowers by observing closely the simple directions here given in the selection of varieties and in culture. It is not necessary to have rare and costly exotics to make a good display. The writer derived mostly more pleasure from caring for the few geraniums, fuchsias, and roses—less than a dozen plants in all—which was his first attempt in window gardening, than in after-years when it was his privilege to enjoy the beauties of some of the finest private and public conservatories in the country.

In the selection of a window one facing to the south, or a double window facing to the east and south, is the most desirable. Let us say, here, however, that, contrary to the general opinion, flowers can be successfully grown in a northern window, if due attention is paid to the selection of varieties.

Let us look first at the single window facing the south. To this window a plain pine board may be fastened, extending to the extreme edge of the window-ledge at either side, about six inches wide at the ends, and double that width in the centre. It can be easily fastened by two screws at each end, and made stronger by a light iron bracket, or even two, underneath. It is best to have a light piece of wood fastened to the edge as a sort of railing, to keep the falling leaves and dirt upon the shelf. On either side of the window we may fasten one or two swinging brackets, into which set trailing or drooping-leaved plants.

On the shelf, which will hold ten or a dozen plants, we would place a few geraniums—General Grant, single; Henry Cannell, double (both beautiful scarlet); May Queen and Madame Thibaut, single and double pink; and snow-flake, white; a heliotrope; one or two fuchsias—a most beautiful and graceful plant, easy of culture. To these we would add a few pots of mignonette, sweet alyssum, candy-tuft, and carnations. In the brackets described nothing can be more beautiful than oxalis—a pretty drooping plant, whose graceful tendrils and lively blossoms add vastly to the beauty of a window.

We will now consider for a moment the necessary points to be kept constantly in mind if we would be successful in the window culture of flowers. First of all, we must ever remember that our plants have life, and must be cared for and fed just as faithfully as we would care for a pet bird, dog, or cat. The young cultivator may be ignorant, and as a result lose some plants; but if the necessary care is given, a knowledge of what the plants require is soon gained, and the greatest difficulty overcome; and yet, strange as it may seem, plants are oftentimes killed by too much care. By this I mean too much air, water, or heat, as the case may be.

The four essential things to be observed in the cultivation of plants in-doors are ventilation, cleanliness, heat, and water; if the grower will properly attend to these things, success is almost assured. In giving the plants ventilation, it should always be done from the top of the window; sudden draughts of cold air are injurious, and often fatal. It is just as important and necessary, if we desire healthy plants, to keep them clean as it is our bodies. A sponge filled with water about the same temperature as the room will be found of great advantage in washing the leaves of the plants occasionally; in addition to this, and the regular sprinkling afterward described, an occasional sprinkling of the foliage with a syringe or small brush filled with moderately warm water will be found beneficial.

I have always found that the temperature in which plants succeed best can be correctly gauged by my own comfort. For example, if I am comfortable—neither too warm nor too cold—in a room where the temperature is 70° to 75° during the day, and 45° to 50° during the night, such a heat will exactly suit my plants. If cultivators of flowers would consider that in many ways their pets resemble themselves, many disappointments might be avoided.

No established rule can be given for watering plants; water them whenever they need it, and not oftener; plants are as frequently lost by the use of too much water as the lack of it; the soil on the top of the pot will show when the plant requires water, which when given must be done thoroughly. Do not use cold water; add enough warm to take off the chill, and use a small sprinkler, putting on sufficient water to go through the soil from the top of the pot to the saucer. As the sun gets warmer, more water will be required.

A soil composed of rich loam and sand is the best that can be obtained for general use; it should be well enriched with fine manure and thoroughly mixed—about two parts of loam to one part each of manure and sand. Pulverize it well, and remove all stones and large lumps of earth. It is well to keep for use a small box of earth prepared as directed, and renew the top soil in the pot occasionally.

If plants are kept in a healthy state, we have but little to fear from insects. The most annoying ones are the red spider, green fly, and scale. I have found the general treatment as follows very effectual in destroying the insects named. The use of tobacco-water for destroying the green fly is very effectual, and much more pleasant than the old method of tobacco smoke. Fill a pail with tobacco stems, pour over them all the water the pail will hold, and let it stand about twenty-four hours. In using, put a half-pint of the tobacco-water to a pail of clean lukewarm water. Take the plant which is diseased, turn downward, place the left hand over the top of the pot, and plunge the foliage in the liquid once or twice, afterward rinsing it in clean warm water.

The leaves and stems of the plants affected with the scale should be frequently washed with kerosene or sweet oil. The use of the oil, and an occasional plunging of the plant into the prepared tobacco-water as directed, will destroy the red spider.

We will now turn to the bow or bay window, which will allow us to greatly increase the number of our plants, and also favor us with room for better arrangement. I would not advise, simply because he has the room, that the young cultivator branch out into the culture of plants which require any more care or knowledge than do those already named for the single window. Especially do not make this mistake the first year of your work; simply increase the number of geraniums, fuchsias, and the other plants named, and the result will be much more satisfactory than if you should attempt to meddle with orchids and other rare plants.

The beauty of the window garden depends to a great extent on the arrangement of the plants. The varieties named, and all soft-wooded plants, should be placed nearest the light, and the hard-wooded or smooth-leaved plants in the background. Plants naturally grow toward the light, and on this account we must frequently turn the plants around, so that every side may have its share of the light. This will prevent that leaning appearance seen in so many plants.

If a larger number of varieties is desired for the bay-window, I would advise for climbing vines ivy, Madeira vine, smilax, and the beautiful rose Marshal Niel, yellow. For standard or dwarf growers among roses I would select Agrippina; beautiful and fragrant crimson; Bon Silene, carnine; La Marque, white tinged with lemon-color as it expands; Abutilon (flowering maple) is a most desirable plant for window culture; begonia, flowering (not Rex or tuberous-rooted), is one of the most desirable plants for the window, easy of culture, and a free bloomer. For the hanging basket or bracket we might add the beautiful London-pride. For a larger display the cultivator may select from the following varieties, all of which are very beautiful, and do not require any special culture: hibiscus, chrysanthemum, stevias, and primrose.

For the window having a northern exposure the best success is had with pelargoniums or Lady Washington geraniums. The flowers are large and very beautiful, with deep blotches on the upper petals and bright spots on the lower. The best varieties are Favorite, pink with dark blotch, L'Avenir, striped white and crimson, and Beauty of Axton, rich maroon color.

In placing the soil in the pots, a few broken pieces of pots, shells, or stones should be placed in the bottom of each pot for drainage. Be careful on this point, and also use the proportion of sand in the soil as directed; if loam or leaf mould alone is used, the soil will become sour, the roots rot, and the plants die.

We trust that every one who reads these lines will try a window garden this winter. No work of art can adorn a home like beautiful flowers, and young and old alike will feel an increasing pleasure in taking care of the plants, as they become more familiar with their new beauties.

A DEAD LETTER.

BY MARGARET EMMA DITTO.

BMURDERED A. He did it very easily, by just wrenching out the cross-bar that has kept A from being knock-kneed since the Christian era, and hitting him on the head with it. A was killed as dead as a door-nail; he dropped dead everywhere at once. There was a terrible time in Alphabet-town. The twenty-three chief citizens who had not been murdered flew about in a wild way. It was the worst of them all. She puffed and gasped and went into spasms, trying to speak her own name and say that she was A's widow. The chief citizens rallied around the dead body.

"I reckon he is only stunned," said one.

"Nothing but the wind knocked out of him," said another.

"Not much but wind to him—two-thirds puff," said a third.

"Get the bellows!" "Blow him up!" "Toss him over!" "Roll him on two logs!" "Keep him going!" "Don't let him die for wind!" "There's plenty of it!" "He feels cold!" "Fire him up!" "Get hot bricks!" "Put something to his feet!" "Hold on to him!"

These activities were proposed by the Wide-Awakes, who crowded together on one side of the body, and fired themselves off like a Gatling gun of advice.

The Half-Asleeps stood on the other side and fired back.

"No, no!" "Keep the wind off of him!" "Put him down!" "Keep him perfectly still!" "Let him be!" "No violence!" "He is fixed out for quiet comfort!" "He's got the right to die!" "If it suits him, it ought to suit us!" "Don't meddle with Providence!" "Let him be!"

Nobody was hit.

"We might call his name," said the Professor, who belonged to no party, and stood on the fence while he explained the Roman custom of calling the name of the dead at funerals. The chief citizens joined hands about the corpse, other people crowded up and looked over their shoulders. The Professor gave the word.

"One! two! three!"

Alphabet-town and the rest opened its mouth and uttered a deal of queer breath, but all of them together could not say A. They did not know why. So they tried it again, and harder. This time there was no sound but the snapping of vocal chords and the bursting of wind-pipes. They tried it a third time, the Professor giving the word as before.

"One! two! three!"

And now the silence that followed was so solid and tremendous, so unearthly, that it flew off from the world in a tangent and went bang up against the sky. It burst like a rocket, and clunks of silence came falling heavily down on everybody.

The Orator, not being hit hard, was the first to speak. He mounted a pair of skids that had been brought to lay the body over, and made an address; that is, he tried to. But the dead A's were as mute as deaf and dumb preaching, and the consonants—those hard-listed citizens of Alphabet-town—rattled and rustled against one another like a crumpled programme at a symphony concert.

"Fellow-citizens," he began; this sounded all right. He went on:

"This is 'n awfully s'd occasion." He had meant to say "An awfully sad occasion," but it sounded like "n awfully s'dotion." If the words had been toads in his mouth they could not have startled him more. He cleared his throat; he wiped his clammy lips with his handkerchief, and looked to see if there was anything on it. The people, who had not understood a word, called "Louder!" "Louder!"

The Orator went at it again, and this time he worked his pronunciation pumps till they squeaked in his windpipe.

THE MURDER OF A.

"Fellow-citizens, I m'y s'y 'g'n it is ' p'ainfully—n'y, 'n'wfully s'd oc'asion." He meant to say, "I may say again it is a painfully—nay, an awfully sad occasion"; but the consonants crushed cruelly together like the serrated spears of sixty successful thistle-sifters.

"I m'ysygn itsp'ainfully—nynwfully s'dot."

The people yelled and hooted; the Orator turned pale; great beads of sweat stood on his face. Well he knew that if he could not talk, nobody could—no, nor ever could. If he gave it up, "English as she is spoke" would pass out into everlasting silence. He stood at the portal of English speech, like Leonidas at Thermopylae. He lifted his ghastly face heavenward; he threw up his frantic arms entreating help; he clutched at a quotation. Oh, shade of Robert Burns, stand off!

"Ye ' m'n's ' m'n for ' th't. Wh't m'n l's done m'n m'y do."

"Yumsy yum, frtlt," mocked a shrill-voiced boy in the crowd.

"Mum sdn-munkado!" jeered another. But the Orator went valiantly on:

"Wh't m'n c'n t'lk—I s'y 'g'in, wh't m'n c'n t'lk with-out 's—"

These words were spluttered out as if the Orator were a bottle, and India-rubber bubbles were being shaken out of him. At the last effort he fell in convulsions, foaming at the mouth.

Alphabet-town now began to see what a sad case they were in. They could not get out a warrant to arrest B; they could not advise his widow, nor administer the estate, nor draw up resolutions. They had no law or lawyers; no trial by jury, no Magna Charta, no habeas corpus.

That is, nobody had any habeas corpus but A. He had one—one apiece all around—but he had nothing else but that, and he did not know what to do with it. All Alphabet-town could not make a grave; they could not get up a vault; they could not even cremate the body.

"Bury it, then," said a solemn old citizen.

"Burying is not good form; it is quite gone out," said a Woman of Style. "You ought to respect the poor fellow's feelings; he used to be stylish to the top of his bent."

"Undoubtedly burying went out with the Nglo sasons," said the Professor. He had meant Anglo-Saxons; he choked at the queer word, and wiped a tear for the missing vowel, for he had his feelings.

"Burying is now entirely gone under," he went on. "It is but low business. No one submits to it of his own desire. It is, however, our one resource with our poor friend. It is the best opening for him." He sighed and went on: "Now post mortems or coroners' inquests we could get up; there is nothing in the spelling to hinder."

"I don't see the good in them," said the Woman of Style. "It would be mere compliment."

So the matter was dropped. Poor A, lying there so still and stark, seemed no longer amenable to earthly honors. They buried him in a coffin, for all Alphabet-town could not get up a burial case or a casket. They could not ask the old person to preach, but had to request the new minister to perform the service; and with all his theology, he had a hard time dodging the words that had a's in them, and the speech rattled in his throat so that his voice was raspy forever afterward. He had to use somebody's troches, and he wrote a letter to the troches man without any a's in it, and got his troches cheaper after that.

This was only the beginning of troubles. Half the wells in Alphabet town fell to pieces, and had to be thrown out into the backyard, because the a's were dead, and the other half had to do more work than they were used to.

You could not have read the daily paper the next day after the murder. The editor himself did not pretend to read it; he said it was as much as he could do to print it.

The school-books were too queer for anything. The School Board had a meeting, and voted to give up learning to read; they put the teachers on half-pay, and had the children spend all their time counting. Some of the boys and girls liked this because it was easy; but the teachers knew that the end of the world had come.

They had to call the place Lphbet-town, and the post-masters all around the world got terribly mixed over it. All the letters with the dead a's in the address were lost along the road. Some of them had money orders in them, with pension money for poor widows.

At last the citizens called an Assembly to organize a new plan of talking. Every one had a right to speak at this meeting, but as soon as a speaker said a word with an a in it he had to sit down.

The first class of the Boys' High-School, who were not suspected of knowing how to spell, were the umpires. They sat in the gallery, and sharpened their voices on whetstones, though some of them used files.

The Professor talked the longest and said the least. He had a wide wealth of words, though what he said with them folks generally did not know. There were people in Alphabet-town who said he had invented a sieve which would let all the dead-a words go through and keep the rest, and that the Professor stirred these up with a pinch of salt and no wetting, gave it a dry bake, and that was his speech. There seemed no end to it, except the first end; it rambled on and on in a wonderful way, but it tripped up at last on the word dear.

"THE ORATOR MADE AN ADDRESS"

"THE FIRST THING THEY SAW WAS THE GHOST OF POOR A"

A short boy versed in silent letters, who was in the habit of writing notes to a tall girl in the graduating class, knew how to spell that word—especially when she looked up at him from down-stairs.

Oh, but he blared it out like a trumpet; all the gallery joined in. Up went the pea-shooters. The boys had their pockets full of dead a's—little stiff corpses harder than stones—which they had picked up in the streets and backyards. A terrible hail of dead a's came pelting down on the poor Professor. The boys had him now; he had been cruel to them—made books with words in them, you know. Now they were cruel to him. You would have been sorry for him if you had seen him jumping wildly up and down, throwing out his arms as if he were fighting wasps. At last he rushed from the stage all cowering over in a bunch, trying to get his head between his shoulder-blades for protection. The Assembly laughed as well as it could without any a's. The Professor had never been half so amusing before.

Many of the speakers were very angry at B. Some proposed hanging him. Of course they went down on that. Others were for lynching him, and others for life imprisonment. But the people who clamored for vengeance could not say much, on account of getting excited and making mistakes. Then, of course, the pea-shooters came to the front.

"I do not uphold B," said the Eloquent Man, who had prepared his speech with great care. "But I do most solemnly protest it will do no good to execute B. This would not help us. We should be even worse off with him gone. Let but one more be missing from our number, then we must give up everything. The words then left would die of overwork. Our lusty dictionary-books would be nowhere. Webster's superb monument of toil would shrivel. Yes, my friends, it would shrink into thin decrepitude. Its empty covers would lie upon our shelves like the prehistoric birds' nests upon our trees. History would be wiped out with one fell swoop. Poetry would melt into silence or—poor convict in irons—would go hobbling down the corridors of Time unwept, unhonored, unsung. Philosophy, the glory of thought, would cr'ish to toms—"

"C-r-r-r-sh to Toms!" echoed the faithful gallery. "C-r-r-r-sh to Toms! c-r-r-r-sh! c-r-r-r-sh! c-r-r-r-sh to Toms!" every boy made a watchman's rattle of his throat, and brought his pea-shooter into range.

The Eloquent Man beat a retreat, but the boys beat him worse than he beat the retreat. Everybody began to see how dangerous it was to go on to the stage, or rather to get off of it. Nobody dared to begin a speech, for fear of getting stage-struck and having to end it.

At last one humble old man took his life in his hands—what was left of it—ascended the steps, and came resolutely to the front of the platform.

"My friends," he began, "it is useless for us poor helpless beings to discuss this subject further. We find ourselves in trouble. We've got to be helped out. Yes, we've got to be helped out by Jupiter. You try him. He could bring our brother to life. He could, and he would too. You try him, my friends."

Here the old man stopped abruptly, and stepped down from the stage. This was the only speech that died a natural death. Perhaps for this reason it had more weight than any other, and it determined the action of the meeting. The Assembly decided to send delegates to Jupiter, with the request that the dead letter might be restored to life, and furthermore, to prevent the recurrence of this trouble in the future, the delegates were instructed to ask that all the chief citizens might be made immortal.

D, M, and J were appointed delegates. The first thing they saw on reaching Mount Olympus was the ghost of poor A. He was a little new ghost, very white and shivering. He looked lonesome, as if he had not got used to going around loose without his body. He braced up pretty straight, though, and walked totes out. Cadmus, a shade of long standing, had the little fellow by the hand, and was taking him round. A did not seem much interested, but the moment he caught sight of his old companions from Alphabet-town he called out with a loud voice,

GENERAL REJOICING IN ALPHABET-TOWN.

"Ay, ay!" Then he sprang up, and clasped his arms about their necks, and vowed to be taken home.

"There is not a single fellow that knows me here," he sobbed. "I am the only one of my kind. Speak to me."

Here they all yelled together, each one calling his own name; they flew into one another's arms, embracing and dancing in couples; they joined hands and danced four hands around, and so they whirled away to the throne of Jupiter. As good luck would have it, the throne was empty.

Jupiter, when he sits upon his throne, is a mighty fellow; he has an eyebrow that you could go to sleep in and think you were sitting on a hay-cock, the locks of his hair are like the locks of a prison, his eyes flash lightning, and his eye-winkers are made of darning needles.

He wears a thunder cap made of a cyclone, the other end up. If he had known that the delegates were coming, he would have been in great shape to receive them. But as it was, he had just had a tight shave on his head—the best of men and gods are often left to do that in dog days—and he had taken off his cap—the Titans were that very minute spinning it point downward over the States of Wisconsin and Iowa.

So Jupiter, caught napping, was fast asleep in a hammock that swung like the Brooklyn Bridge over running water to keep his Majesty cool. The delegates had a terrible time getting up the piers, but they managed it, and then swung themselves down from the guy-ropes and landed on his small toe, walked up the entire length of his limbs and body, until they reached his ears. M and A sat in one ear, and D and J in the other, and thus they yelled their petitions with united voice.

"Shoo! shoo!" said the great Jupiter, in a voice that froze the marrow in their bones, but they answered boldly: "We can't shoo; we won't shoo; we did not come here to shoo. We want life; we want immortality—to live forever—forever, do you understand? Forever! live forever!" shouted the delegates, who had learned diplomacy from the mosquitoes and buzz flies.

"Yes, yes; don't bother me," said Jupiter, sleepily. "You may have anything if you will go away." Here he turned heavily in the hammock, and the delegates went off in a lively way, being tumbled out into the meshes of the hammock, and from thence into the water below. They were now immortal, and nothing could hurt them. Up they came from the foam, all sparkling and flashing. Away they galloped over the waves and upon the winds till they came home to Alphabet-town.

Shout! shout! shout! How everybody shouted! The little dead a's jumped up like corn in a popper and got into the words again. All the chief citizens laughed and hugged each other till broad A was squeezed quite flat, and had to go to Boston to get puffed up. He got into the public schools, and now holds his own soundly.

Outsiders of Alphabet-town did not know what had happened. Only those persons who study in the middle of the night missed the a's out of their books; they supposed they had been dreaming, or that their lamps burned dim. Such a sad event can never happen again, for all the letters are now immortal.

FISH THAT CLIMB TREES.

WHEN Jack Downing returned from India, whither he had accompanied his father on a business trip, he not only had a great many stories to tell the boys of the wonderful things he had seen in that strange land, but nothing amazed them more than the account he gave of a fish that he had seen climbing trees. Jack was so full of the subject that he told the boys as follows:

"I was once in the city of Calcutta, but as he had left me in the morning of his departure, he lay on the shore of the Ganges, and in my mind one morning that I would while away the hours he spent in town by a fishing expedition. There were no boys in the family, nor anybody who could be supposed to take an interest in such amusement; so, without saying anything to the people of the house, I sammered off, cut a good stout reed for a pole, rigged up a hook and line, and armed myself with a number of good sized flies for bait. The river was close by, and finding a cozy cove, I sat down and began lazily to whip the stream.

"It was no use. The fish of the Ganges either did not understand American methods of fishing, or else they were too wary to be caught. At last I became discouraged; but just as I had about concluded to give up the sport and go home, what was my amazement to see a fat little perch deliberately swim to the shore, and then proceed to mount the bank toward the spot where I lay.

"The situation was too comical. My first thought was that this queer specimen of a fish felt so much sympathy for my disappointment that he was actually going to come up and beg me to put a hook in his mouth. If he could walk, why should he not talk?

"But no; that was not in his mind. He was clearly an accomplished pedestrian, used to the exercise, and about to take his usual constitutional without any reference to my feelings in regard to the matter.

"I watched him with immense interest, and soon perceived that he had a couple of comrades. Ah! perhaps it is a walking match, I thought. On they came, their locomotive power being apparently invested in a series of spines that grow out from the fins and tail. Those nearest the head are firmly fastened in the ground; then, after the manner of the inch-worm, the tail is drawn up, and one step is made.

"Not content with terra firma, presently the party began to climb a tree. I watched them until they located themselves comfortably on the branch of a palm-tree some five feet from the ground. This was too much. Forgetting all about my rod and line, and indeed everything else, I rushed home to demand an explanation from my missionary friend of this extraordinary performance. From him I learned all about the anabas, or tree-climbing fish of India. It belongs to the perch family, and though small and bony, the natives look upon it as capital food. It is not exactly amphibious, in spite of its taste for land, but is very much given to sauntering about the shore and airing itself in high places.

"After lunch I went down to the river again, and was just in time to see a fat pelican make a meal off of a number of anabas that were out for a walk. Whether my three friends were among them I don't know."

THE FLAMINGO FEATHER.*

BY KIRK MUNROE,

AUTHOR OF "WAKELLA," ETC.

CHAPTER IX.

A TRAP AVOIDED AND FRIENDS DISCOVERED.

AT René's cry, suppressed though it was, Hasse turned quickly, and in time to see the moccasins glide away through the water. He also noted the spot of blood on his companion's finger, at which the latter was gazing with a look of horror.

Without a word the young Indian sprang to René's side, drew the little sharp-pointed dagger from its sheath, and firmly but deliberately enlarged with it the minute wound made by the fangs of the snake, until the blood flowed freely from it. Then raising the hand to his own mouth, he sucked all that was possible of the poisoned blood from the wound, stopping several times during the operation to rinse his mouth with water.

* Begun in No. 536, HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE.

When this was done he took a handful of slimy river mud and placed it over the wounded place, bidding his friend hold it there. Then, seizing his paddle, he turned the bow of the canoe up-stream in the direction from which they had come. He paddled back to a small lagoon that emptied into the stream, and in which he had noticed a peculiar species of water-lily growing as they passed it on their way down. Pulling a handful of these up by the roots, he selected one of the bulbs attached to them, pounded it until it was a mass of fibre, and washing the river mud from the wounded hand, he replaced it with this.

The hand had already swollen and become very painful; but the application of the bruised lily root acted so like a charm that René's face showed an instant sense of relief, and he expressed his gratitude to Has-se.

"It is nothing to do," replied the other. "It is but the remedy of my people for such things." Then he added, with a sort of pride: "The pale-faces are wise in many matters that we poor red men know nothing of; but we have at least learned that for every evil there is a remedy close at hand, and that wherever poisonous serpents are found there also grows a plant that will render their poison harmless. In a short time thy hand will be as sound as before it laid hold of Chitta-wewa, the great water-snake."

"Tis marvellous!" exclaimed René; "and if thou wouldst return with me to France, bringing with thee a few of these simples and thy knowledge of their application, thou wouldst become a great medicine man, and obtain much honor of my people."

Has-se only shook his head and smiled at this suggestion. Then he said: "For a time thou must be perfectly quiet, and keep that upon thy hand wet with cool water. Meantime I will carry out a plan of which I have just conceived the idea. Near by, from the head of this lagoon, there runs a narrow trail by which a great bend in the stream is cut off, and a point much lower down upon it is reached. If thou wilt remain here and nurse thy hand, I will cross to the lower stream by this trail, and it may be that I will thus gain more speedy information concerning those whom we follow."

René at once agreed to this plan, and was soon left alone to nurse his hand and meditate upon his present strange position. From his savage surroundings his thoughts ran back to the uncle whom he had left in Fort Caroline to battle with sickness, and possibly with starvation and the upbraids of his own men. The boy's heart was full of tenderness for the brave old soldier who had so promptly assumed the part of a father toward him; and had he not been restrained by the consciousness of the vital importance of the mission he had undertaken, he would have been inclined to return at once and share whatever trials were besetting the chevalier. From him the boy's thoughts sped to France and the old château in which he was born. He almost laughed aloud as he imagined the look of consternation with which old François would regard him if he could now see him, lying alone in a fragile craft, such as the old servant had never imagined, in the midst of a terrible wilderness of great moss-hung trees, queer-looking plants, black water, and blacker mud.

From these reveries he was suddenly startled by the sound of a slight splash in the water and a subdued human voice. Raising his head very cautiously above the side of the canoe, René caught a glimpse, at the mouth of the little lagoon in which his own craft was concealed, of another canoe, in which were seated two Indians. It was headed up-stream; but its occupants had paused in their paddling, and, from their gestures, were evidently considering the exploration of the very place in which he lay hidden from them. In one of them René recognized the unwelcome face of Chitta (the Snake), but the other he had never before seen.

With a loudly beating heart, and almost without breathing, he watched them, thankful enough for the shelter of broad lily leaves that raised their green barrier in front of him. He was fully conscious that upon the result of the conversation the two were holding, in such low tones that he could not distinguish a word, depended his own fate. He knew, from what Has-se had told him, that Chitta regarded him as an enemy, and he knew also that for his enemies an Indian reserves but one fate, and will kill them if he can.

Thus it was with the feeling that he had escaped a mortal peril, and a long-drawn sigh of relief, that he saw the discussion come to an end, and the strange canoe continue on its course up-stream. It disappeared in the direction from which he and Has-se had come before encountering the moccasins. Then he became furiously impatient to leave a place that seemed so full of danger, and he longed eagerly for Has-se's return.

Although René watched anxiously for Has-se, he also cast frequent glances toward the stream, fearful lest Chitta and his companion should again appear. Thus he was not looking when his friend emerged from the forest, and did not hear the light tread of his moccasined feet. Nor was he aware of any presence near him until a low laugh, which so startled him that he almost upset the canoe, gave the first hint of his friend's return.

"Oh, Has-se!" he exclaimed, in a whisper rendered hoarse by his excitement, "glad am I to see thee once more. Chitta is in pursuit of us, and with him is an evil-looking an Indian as ever I saw, but large and powerful wial." "

Then he related the whole incident of the appearance of the strange canoe, to which Has-se listened with grave attention.

When René had finished he said: "Has-se also has something to tell. Far down the river, on the side opposite the end of the trail, he heard the sound of many voices, and he knows his people are there. Let us go to them."

"But if we venture out into the stream, will not Chitta and the one with him see us?"

"If they do not until we float on the river, they must prove themselves swifter than Ha-la-lah" (the wind) "to catch us before we reach friends. How is thy hand? Is the sting of Chitta-wewa still painful?"

"Oh! my hand? Why, no; I had no thought of it until now. Thanks to thy application, the pain and the swelling seem alike to have been removed."

"Then let us go, and if it comes to meeting Chitta, we will see if we can render his sting as harmless as that of his namesake Chitta-wewa."

Very cautiously the two boys paddled their canoe out from the lagoon, and headed it down the narrow river toward the place where they hoped to find friends.

Having reached the stream in safety, they were about to congratulate each other on their good fortune, when suddenly a wild scream, such as is made by an enraged panther, came ringing down through the dark forest glade behind them.

"It is the yell of Cut-sha the Tiger, chief of the Seminoles!" cried Has-se. "For the Snake, with the Tiger to aid him, we are no match. If those white arms of thine have strength in them, now is the time to prove it, Ta-lah-lo-ko."

With this the two boys bent over their paddles and plied them with such energy that their light craft fairly hissed through the water, and flew past the gray motionless columns of the eypresses. Not far behind came their pursuers, also straining every muscle, and already exulting over the prize that was so nearly within their grasp.

Cat-sha and Chitta had become impatient of waiting in their ambush for those who failed to come, but who they knew had been following them, and they finally decided to cautiously retrace their course in order to learn what had become of them. At the mouth of the lagoon in which René had awaited Has-se's return they paused undecided for a moment. From the very trail taken by Has-se there branched another, which led to the distant Seminole fastness in the heart of the great swamp. Cat-sha at first thought they would do well to examine this trail, for if it should prove to be some of his own band of whose canoe he had caught a glimpse, he would surely discover traces of them here. Chitta, however, said that those who had followed them might chance to pass on unnoticed while they were in the lagoon. It would be time enough to examine the trail after they had been back as far as the bayou, and made certain that nobody was between them and it. Happily for René de Vaux this counsel had prevailed, and they had gone on up the stream.

It was while on their return from the bayou that they had caught sight of the two boys just leaving the lagoon, and that Cat-sha had uttered his war-cry with such startling effect. Even at the distance they were, both he and Chitta had seen the flamingo-feather braided in Has-se's hair, and had also recognized the peculiar costume worn by him whom they knew as the son of the great white chief.

Faster and faster flew the two canoes in their race of life or death down the narrow stream. That of the two boys was the lighter, but the other, impelled by the powerful strokes of the gigantic Cat-sha, kept pace with it from the outset, and at length began slowly to gain upon it. Foot by foot, closer and closer, it came, and as the labored breath of the panting boys came shorter and quicker, while the perspiration rolled in great beads from their faces, it seemed as though they were moving at a snail's pace, and they knew that the unequal struggle could not last much longer.

Suddenly Has-se paused from his labor for an instant, and placing a hand to his mouth, uttered a long, tremulous cry, so wild and shrill that it roused the forest echoes for miles around.

He had hardly resumed his paddle, after a quick backward glance that showed the other canoe to be fearfully near them, when his cry was answered by one precisely similar, uttered only a short distance ahead of them.

In another minute an arrow from behind whizzed so close to Has-se's head that it cut the red feather from his hair, and passing on, buried itself in René's shoulder. At the same instant a canoe filled with Micco's warriors appeared around a point ahead of them, and the two hunted and exhausted boys, seeing it, knew they were saved.

THE PIGEON FLIERS OF MODENA.—DRAWS BY J. CARTER BEARD.—SEE PAGE 814.

THE PIGEON-FLIERS OF MODENA.

BY CHARLES FREDERICK BOLDER.

A TRAVELLER who was passing through the rich vineyard country of Italy, on his way to the south, stopped to rest a few days in the quaint old city of Modena, so attractive for its historical associations. Among the points of interest was the famous "Emilian Way," a great street passing through the heart of the city, the work of the Countess Matilda in 1099, nearly four hundred years before Columbus discovered America. Here, too, was the Cathedral of St. Geminian, with its lofty crypt, and facade still showing the ornamental sculpturing of the workers of the twelfth century, and a bell tower that rose 315 feet, and contained a wooden bucket captured by the Modenese from the Bolognese in the year 1325. All these things and many more attracted the attention of our traveller; but what caused him the most astonishment were the actions of a man by whose side he found him on one day in the tall tower. The object of his curiosity was a tall, dark youth, a native Modenese, in a picturesque costume that proclaimed him, at least in dress, a peasant.

When first observed he was leaning far out of the stone window, his face exhibiting a variety of emotions denoting excitement and pleasure. In his hand he bore a long staff, upon the end of which was a colored flag, with which he seemed to be signalling to some one in the distance, and soon our traveller distinguished upon the roofs of various houses in the vicinity several figures, all of whom were evidently engaged in answering the signals.

For some time the stranger watched the performance, unable to understand it, as all the flags seemed to be in motion at once; but finally they were all withdrawn with the exception of that held by one man.

He stationed himself upon an eminence on the roof, raised his staff high above his head, and from about his feet sprang into the air a vast flock of birds. Up they rose, higher and higher, into the heavens, waving and turning, the morning sun glistening upon their varied colors as they exposed themselves in different positions to its rays. When almost out of sight, and like dark spots against the sky, they turned, and, like a living cloud, a motor of wings came rushing down with a roaring sound audible for a great distance, and nearing the house-tops they rose gently, and amid the fluttering of countless wings again alighted about the tall figure on the lofty roof.

Hardly had this been accomplished when another figure rose, and another flock darted upward. These were pure white, and resembled flocks of silvery cloud as they swept about, forming a great living circle. Around they went, encircling an area of several acres, glistening, gleaming, and finally alighting again. These manoeuvres were repeated two or three times, the birds always returning in obedience to the waving of the flag.

This was followed by four other flocks, all of different colors, and all going through manoeuvres unlike the former. It was evidently an introductory salute for some grander performance, which very shortly commenced. At a certain signal from the men the different flocks of pigeons, for such they were—rose high in air, and passed to and fro with rapid flight, evidently in obedience to the movements of the flags. Now an entire flock would be arrested in its downward flight, and by a sudden motion rise again, separating into columns or halves, flying away in opposite directions, only to join again and alight at their owner's feet at the proper signal.

"Is it possible," asked the traveller in Italian of the Modenese youth, "that these birds are moving in the air by signals?"

"Oh yes," was the reply of the peasant, who had seated himself during a cessation of the exhibition. "Have you never heard of the trigianca? It is one," he continued;

"and it is a term that has been used for many centuries in our city to distinguish the pigeon-fliers. The pigeons are called trigianca. They have been bred and trained from the earliest times, and are the most remarkable birds in the world; so, at least, we think. In this city there are fully one hundred flocks, composed of several hundred birds each, trained so perfectly that they obey the slightest movement of the flag, just as the soldier understands the signal in battle. We also use the whistle for certain calls in this way"—and placing his two forefingers in his cheeks, he produced a whistle that immediately caused a flutter of excitement among a flock of birds on a neighboring roof. "In the olden times," continued the pigeon-trainer, "in the fourteenth century, our ancestors used the cornet. The sport as carried on to-day is almost exactly the same as then, and is merely a pleasure to the owners—just as you train dogs in your country. If you will come with me," he added, "I will show you how implicit is their obedience."

The Modenese passed down the stairs, and soon led the traveller upon the neighboring roof.

"They are perfectly tame, you see," said the owner, picking up a bird and tossing it into the air, while the others crowded about him, some alighting on his head and shoulders as they did at the recall, "and that is the first essential of success. The birds must have faith in you, and you in them. The game or sport is carried on in different ways. First we may have a performance in mid-air, as you have just witnessed. The birds in flight will obey every motion of my flag; will return without the slightest hesitation, stop, whirl, or rise higher—in fact, are as completely under my control as if I had a flag attached to each.

"This is, of course, merely ornamental. A second plan is to declare war against a neighboring flock. I so direct my birds that they will, by manoeuvring, capture birds from a neighboring cote, in which case the owner has to pay for the captured bird, or the captor wins a prize. In olden times these battles were carried on with great cruelty. Thus a bottle or flask of powder with a fuse was attached to a trained bird that dashed into a neighboring flock, where the torpedo would explode, killing large numbers of the birds. This is now done away with, and the captures are all made in pleasantry."

The science of pigeon-flying is not confined to Italy alone, as in nearly all the cities of northern India it has been carried on from the earliest times, and in the old histories of India there are pictures and descriptions tending to show that it was first brought there from some country in northeastern Asia.

ASHORE AT ST. HELENA; OR, A FAMOUS BOY AND A FAMOUS MAN.

BY DAVID KER.

"WELL, Master Willie, here's St. Helena for you at last, and now you'll have a chance to go ashore a bit."

There it was, sure enough, that grim mass of black basaltic rock standing gauntly up out of the smooth shining tropical sea, with its splintered crags, and mighty precipices looming out against the bright morning sky like threatening thunder-clouds. But gloomy and savage though it looked, the lonely islet was a welcome spectacle to the storm-tossed passengers of the homeward-bound Indian, being their first glimpse of land since they lost sight of Cape Town and Table Mountain several weeks before.

The "Master Willie" to whom the Captain was speaking was a tall, slim, bright-eyed boy, with a homely but very honest and kindly face. His sallow complexion and somewhat languid movements would have told to any one who observed them—even without the presence of the turbaned Hindoo servant who stood behind him in a spotless white tunic and scarlet sash—that he had lived some years in India, and needed a little fresh sea-air to brace him up after the scorching heat of Bengal.

In truth, if sea-air was what Willie wanted to restore his health, he seemed likely to have enough of it. A voyage from India to England was no joke sixty or seventy years ago, when ocean steamers had not yet begun to exist, and when bare-limbed Arab robbers were prowling over the waste of drifting sand through which the Indian and Australian steam-packets were one day to carry hundreds of passengers at a time along the Suez Canal. Nowadays one may run out from England to the East Indies in four weeks; but in the time of our grandfathers it was considered a wonderful feat to accomplish the voyage in as many months.

As Willie happened, by a very rare chance, to be the only child on board, he was, of course, a great pet both with the passengers and the ship's company, who little dreamed that some of them would live to see their young playmate one of the most famous men in Europe, and to recognize their own likenesses in the Anglo-Indians whom he described so well. His especial friend, however, was a British officer belonging to the garrison of St. Helena, whose promise to "show him the great curiosity of the island" Willie eagerly claimed the moment its cliffs were sighted. So the boy, the officer, and the Hindoo servant all went ashore together.

Willie was greatly amused with the sight of Jamestown, the queer little toy capital, jammed into the mouth of a narrow valley that sloped downward to the sea, from which a stair of eight hundred steps, cut in the face of the rock, led up to the barracks on the hill above. But he thought the long walk over bare black rocks and stony ridges very dreary indeed, and was glad when it ended at length in a pretty little green valley dotted with trees, in the midst of which lay a small garden, where a man was walking restlessly up and down a grassy lawn, with his head sunk moodily on his breast.

At the first glimpse of him Willie was strangely reminded (without knowing why) of the caged tigers that he had seen in Calcutta; and, indeed, this man was little else than a wild beast in a cage. Only a few years before, he had been the mightiest monarch upon earth, with millions of brave men ready to die at his lightest word; now he was an exile and a prisoner, dying of a mortal disease. The stern face which had been unmoved amid the roar of battle was now haggard and sunken as that of a corpse, and the eyes at whose flash kings had quailed were now heavy with the glassy blankness of despair.

Halting under the shade of a tree that overhung the palisades of the garden, the Hindoo servant pointed to the man who was pacing the lawn, and said, in an awe-stricken whisper: "There he is, Uilleen Sahib" (Master William). "Do you see that man? That's Bonnapart" (Bonaparte). "He eats three sheep every day, and"—sinking his voice still lower—"all the little boys that he can get hold of."

Willie—who could believe anything of the terrible man that bore the name of Napoleon Bonaparte—drew back, and sheltered himself behind his two companions.

"Ay, that's all that's left of him now, poor old fellow," said the English officer, pityingly. "You see, Willie, my boy, that men who make a great name in the world sometimes have to pay pretty dearly for it, after all."

"It must be a grand thing to be famous, though, for all that," answered the boy, thoughtfully.

Years later, when the name of that boy was known and held in honor throughout the whole civilized world, he told this story to his friends, ending with a sigh which showed that the fame so eagerly desired by little Willie had not brought much happiness to William Makepeace Thackeray.

THE CAPTIVE QUEEN.

BY LORD BRABOURNE

(E. H. KNATCHBULL-HUGGESSON,
AUTHOR OF "Puss-Cat Mew and OTHER FAIRY STORIES," ETC.)

CHAPTER VI.

THEY had all passed safely over the bridge, the wizard slowly leading the way, and were approaching the side of the rocky mountain, when their attention was attracted by a sound which came from the sea hard by. It was a very pleasant sound, like beautiful music, and it stole over their senses in a marvellous manner, so that they could not help stopping to listen. Voices were singing to the music, and singing in such sweet tones and with such exquisite feeling that the King, who was passionately attached to music, and had a private hurdy-gurdy of his own, thought he had never heard anything so perfectly melodious. And these were the words which fell upon the listener's ears:

"The rocks are coral beneath the sea,
And we sisters gather there,
And sing to the waters merrily,
As we comb our golden hair,
And we find the times both merry and good
For the loving mermaid sisterhood.

"We swim where we will through the waters clear,
Or we harness our slaves, the fish,
For nothing beneath the waves down here
Can withstand a mermaid's wish,
And no sea creature would, if it could,
For they love the mermaid sisterhood.

"We sit by the lone sea-shore sometimes
And sing our sweetest strain,
And the mortal who hears our tuneful rhymes
Will pine to hear them again;
But if he would do so best, he should Come and live with the mermaid sisterhood.

"Oh, list to the tones of our plaintive air,
Ye mortals who hear our strain,
Come listen our songs and our joys to share,
In our home beneath the main;
For who that has seen them has ever withstood
The charms of the mermaid sisterhood?"

The whole party had stopped, almost without knowing that they did so, to listen to the enchanting music by which these words were accompanied. Enchanting, indeed, it was, and the extraordinary part of the business appears to me to be the fact that the cow, the rabbit, and the kangaroo did not know that it was enchanting in the worst sense of the word. They were evidently wise animals, who knew more about magic than common beings of their kind, and whatever might have been the case with the King, one would have supposed that they would have been upon their guard, and would have known the danger which lay within the notes of that sweet music. If, however, they knew, they had certainly forgotten it at the moment, and, as I say, they all stopped still to listen, when, no doubt, their wise and proper course would have been to go straight on without paying the least attention.

In the present instance the travellers had not long to wait before they discovered the mistake into which they had fallen. They had stood still for about a minute, when they suddenly perceived that a total change had come over their enemy the wizard. A malicious joy gleamed from his eye, the previous expression of disappointment and fear had passed from his countenance, and turning round so as once more to face the party, he addressed them in a voice the sound of which had changed again from abasement to defiance.

"No! no!" he shouted, with a terrible voice, and then commencing a dance similar to that in which he had before indulged, he sang again, and his words and tones were less agreeable to his hearers than those of the mermaids.

"You scoundrels three, what fools are ye,
Who bringer to me domestic life."
But I've got you now, you stupid old cow,
With the rabbit and kangaroo.
You shoo to remain, and list to a strain,
Which ye know ye ought not to do;
So you're ad in a scrape, and you can't escape,
"Cow, rabbit, and kangaroo!"

As he spoke he advanced toward his arms outspread, making hideous the travellers with faces, and evidently intending mischief. Without a moment's loss of time the three travellers made the sign and said the word which had been so useful before, but these had apparently lost their power. The wizard, indeed, uttered a frightful yell, but it was rather one of triumph than of alarm, and he shouted back in return:

"Your silly old spell
Once did very well,
But now you require one new.
The cow shall be killed,
And the rabbit be grilled,
And we'll strangle the kangaroo."

With these words, to the unspeakable horror of the King, who stood watching to see what would happen, but felt himself perfectly helpless in the matter, the wizard advanced upon the kangaroo as if about to execute his threat. The kangaroo, evidently feeling that he was no longer a match for his foe, trembled so much that he dropped his drum, and the rabbit did the same with his life, and in the very act gave a wild squeak of anguish as if he also knew that his fate was upon him. The cow made no sign, and the wizard, pausing for a moment, raised both his arms above his head and began to pronounce a magic word which I suppose would have rendered his adversaries entirely helpless, and enabled him to complete their ruin at his wicked will.

He began the word, I say, and the King distinctly heard the first part of it, which was "Petrapaulokime-noparahelliconasteron"—but here he was interrupted, and the rest of the sound shut out from the listener's ears by such a moo from the cow as had never been heard before. It was not a bellow, but a moo, and not a common moo either, but one which, beginning low, gradually rose and swelled into a volume of sound which completely deafened the by-standers, altogether drowned the wizard's voice, and reverberated along the sides of the mountain, and even through the waters of the sea with such a mighty roar that the mermaids rushed about, splashing hither and thither, under the evident impression that an earthquake or something like it must have happened, and the fishes contradicted the common delusion that the finny tribe cannot hear by darting away in every direction as fast as possible, as the awful sound penetrated even below the waves.

The King himself stood aghast; but if he had been surprised at the action of the cow, he was still more astonished at what followed. Rushing across the bridge from behind the party came another figure upon the scene—silently, but so quickly that almost like a flash of lightning it stood by the side of the kangaroo. It was the figure of an old man, whose long beard, bright eyes, and venerable appearance at once revealed him to be the same who had visited the King in his dreams, had given the word and sign to the three animals, and who had evidently not yet exhausted his power.

It is impossible for anybody who is a mere mortal to be quite sure about things which have to do with magic and magical people, but I cannot help thinking it very likely that if the one-eyed wizard had used a shorter word, so as to have finished it before the arrival of the other, he might and would have prevailed over his foes then and there. If so, it is evidently a lesson to us all not to use words or make speeches which are longer than may be absolutely necessary, but perhaps the wizard could not help it, and there may have been no shorter word which would have served his purpose.

However this may be, it is as certain as possible that he never finished his word, for he stopped short just as if he had been shot as soon as the other old man arrived upon the scene. Once again his countenance changed, and though in the case of such a particularly ugly visage you might have well believed that any change must be for the better, you would have been obliged to allow that the pallor which came over it, and the look of disappointment and baffled rage which appeared thereon, rendered it even uglier than before. His adversary gave him no time for reflection, but rushed straight upon him, and a furious struggle began.

The one-eyed wizard, it will be remembered, had dropped his club at the first sight and hearing of the word and the sign, and was therefore unarmed, and the new-comer did not appear to be any better provided with weapons. They used their hands and feet, however, to some purpose, and having closed at once, raised such a cloud of dust as made it almost impossible to see what they were doing.

The King, lost in amazement, but with hope once more springing up in his breast, watched the combat with deep though silent interest. The three friends, recovering from the state of alarm into which they, or at least two of them, had recently fallen, were not so silent. The cow sounded her bells again, the rabbit played wildly on his fife, and the kangaroo, once more seizing his drum, beat loudly, as if to encourage the new ally who had come to the rescue of himself and his companions.

For a few moments none of them could tell what would be the result of the battle, but I do not suppose it was ever doubtful for a moment. The friendly wizard was evidently the stronger of the two, and when the dust, after a short time, cleared away, he was seen sitting upon the prostrate body of his foe, of whose nose he had taken forcible hold with his right hand, and was wringing it as if he meant to deprive its rightful owner of it altogether. His left hand grasped the other's right arm, whose left was bent underneath him, so that he lay helplessly at the mercy of his enemy, and appeared to have resigned himself to the fate from which he saw no means of escape.

"Wretch!" exclaimed the victorious wizard, in an exulting tone, "at last I have caught you, and you shall receive the reward of all your crimes." And as he spoke he gave another furious tweak to his victim's nose, which produced from the latter a sound something between a yell and a groan.

With some apparent difficulty he presently found his voice.

"Oh dear! oh dear!" he cried, in half-stifled tones. "I didn't mean it. I didn't do it. I'll never do it again. O-o-oh!" and he broke off into another cry of anguish at another tweak.

"No, I'll take good care you don't," savagely replied his conqueror. "You a wizard! Why, you're a disgrace to the very name. With the power which was given you to do good, you have done nothing but mischief ever since you had it, and now, not content with your last crime, you queen-stealing vagabond, you have humbugged the kind mermaids, who are always friendly to mortals, into guarding your prisoners, and have done your best to destroy the three honest animals who came to rescue her. No punishment can be too severe for such a rascal."

A VERY CURIOUS CLOCK.

YOU have all heard of the wonderful clock at Strasburg, and the ingenious mechanism by which its heavenly bodies move in their orbits, the bells ring out the day and hour, and the processions of angels and apostles come and go. There is also a smaller clock with a number of similar curious contrivances at Lyons, in France, and indeed it seems as if the mechanicians of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries were never tired of exercising their inventive wits over clocks, so many strange and ingenious contrivances in the way of timepieces are still to be found in the older cities of Europe.

But for an amusing clock, a laughter-provoking clock, a kind of negro minstrel of a clock, one made by a man named Droz something like a century ago certainly takes the palm. When it was completed, the proud inventor carried it to the palace of the King of Spain. His Majesty was pleased to examine the clock, and when set up ready for exhibition it was found to consist of a dial beside which sat a negro, a shepherd with a basket of apples by his side, and a dog. When the hour struck, the negro drew his bow and played six times on a violin, after which the dog, endowed with a taste for music, rose and caressed him.

"Should it please your Majesty to touch one of the apples in the shepherd's basket?" suggested the clockmaker. The King put out his hand to take an apple. Determined to protect his master's property, the dog flew at the royal hand, biting and barking, until a "really truly" dog in the room took up the strain and began to bark too. The King laughed heartily, and so, I think, would we have done had we been there to see.

OUR JAPANESE SCREEN.

BY EMMA A. OPPER.

QUITE the funniest things that I ever have seen. Are the pictures all over our Japanese screen. There's a plum-colored cloud in a lavender sky: There's a three-cornered house which is not half so high As the very strange bird standing just at the door; There's a tea party sitting curled up on the floor; There's a gentleman dressed in a bed-quilt, I think, Catching fish that are blue in a lake that is pink; There's an indigo stork standing right in the air; There's an odd-looking baby, without any hair Except one little wisp on the top of his head; And the people are all dressed in purple and red, And their clothes are too big, and they're cross-eyed and queer. I'm awfully glad they don't live around here. They're the funniest things that I ever have seen, Are the pictures all over our Japanese screen.

THE TWO "KITTIES."—FROM A PHOTOGRAPH

"MISS."

BY MARGARET VANDEGRIFT.

PEOPLE who were told that her name was Miss generally said one of two things: either, "I beg your pardon," thinking they had not heard quite right, or, "Miss—what?" thinking they had only heard half.

But strange and even impossible as this may seem, Miss did not own a last name, or, indeed, any name at all, for "Miss," as every one knows, is not a name, but a title.

Perhaps it would have been different—indeed, I am almost sure it would—if she had been brought to the children when she was a kitten, but on the eventful evening when Cousin Jack pulled her out of the deepest pocket of his ulster, and set her down on the rug before the astonished and delighted family, she was fully half grown, and looked as if she thought herself a little more than full grown.

Such a clamor as arose!

"Where upon earth—"

"What will you do next, Jack?"

"Oh, the lovely, lovely dear!"

"She's as black as a coal."

"Her tail is half a yard long."

And in the midst of all this hubbub Miss sat coolly down in the middle of the rug, lifted up her right fore-foot, and began to wash her face in an absorbed, concentrated sort of way, with an expression of countenance which seemed to say,

"That man who carried me in his pocket smokes, and I don't believe his gloves were clean at all."

She looked so utterly prim and proper and elderly that the children declared she had never been a kitten in her life; that she was born grown up.

"But she's only half grown up now," said Cousin Jack, "so, if she grows the other half, you'll be obliged to believe that she grew the first."

But no; they gave in far enough to admit that she might have been born half grown up, but as to her ever having been a kitten, and played with that long, thin tail, that was too much for anybody to believe.

When Cousin Jack had a chance, he told how and where he found her. She was clinging piteously to the top of a round, smooth hitching-post, while two newsboys encouraged a big dog to spring at her.

"She could not have held on much longer," concluded Cousin Jack, "and I've no doubt the dog would have made mince-meat of her; so I just put her in my pocket, and then administered a slight moral lesson to those boys. I took them by the collar, one in each hand, ran them out of breath, and pitched them into a snow-bank."

"Oh, Jack! Jack!" said the other head of the family, laughing and frowning at once at him; "I'm thankful it was dark; if it hadn't been, we should have seen a startling paragraph in to-morrow's paper: 'Sudden and violent insanity of a young and promising artist.'"

"And how that would have made my pictures sell!" said Cousin Jack, pretending to sigh. "But, alas! it was dark, and I didn't meet a soul while I was running amuck. As for the victim, she never stirred from the time I put her into my pocket, and even in her dire extremity on top of the post she was maintaining a dignified silence. Madame and Sir, I appeal to all your finest sensibilities: you'll not turn her out to be hounded to desperation by a heartless world, this section of which is full of snow-drifts? She may stay by this happy fireside?"

Madame and Sir laughed, and gracefully yielded; but Cousin Jack was solemnly assured that he must take the next "hounded" animal he resented to his own studio, and he as solemnly promised that he would.

Then the victim must needs be named at once.

"She's Miss something or other," said one. "She doesn't look as if she'd like us to call her by her first name."

One name after another was suggested to follow the Miss, but none of them gave satisfaction; it was ten minutes past bedtime; Cousin Jack said he must go, and so they reluctantly agreed that until a suitable "last name" could be found the victim should simply be called Miss. This would, at least, show that they meant to be respectful.

Miss grew more and more friendly by degrees, although she never lost her condescending manner. She liked to be petted in a quiet way, and singled out the little daughter of the house as her especial favorite.

"It must be just because my name is Kitty," said the favored member of the family, modestly.

Be that as it might, into Kitty's lap alone would she jump uninvited; against Kitty's legs she rubbed, purring loudly, when the little girl had been away from her awhile; by Kitty's chair she always established herself, in dining-room or parlor. Who could be proof against such delicate flattery as this? But all the family liked her. She came when she was called, plainly showing that she knew her name—a point where most cats are painfully deficient. She had a very good purr, strong and deep, and it was really delightful to see her wash herself. She would appear to have quite finished, and then, with a sudden start, and a look which said as plainly as words, "There! if I didn't forget all about the back of my neck!" would go to work with fresh vigor, until the children said it was really a wonder she hadn't scrubbed all her hair off. On the contrary, her hair grew thicker, finer, and blacker every day, although, much to the children's regret, it did not appear to flourish on her long tail, which was unpleasantly snake-like.

Now this is the first part of the story of Miss, who, by the way, never attained to a "last name." For the second part I do not vouch. The main facts of it, the outside, as it were, became known to the children; they told this outside to Cousin Jack, and he wove it into what follows, when all, alas! was— But let me not anticipate.

It was a great comfort that Miss, as she grew acquainted with her new home, developed no bad habits. To be sure, she would have been basely ungrateful if she had stolen, for she was carefully fed at least three times a day, but that would not have kept her honest if she had been what Biddy called "a natural-born thafe." She did not appear even to know that there were two canary-birds in the house. She never scratched, she never "meowed," except in a sort of whisper, which made everybody laugh, for, with her mouth wide open, and a deeply earnest expression on her face, she could only just be heard. The head of the family—who happened to be a doctor—declared that she must have laryngitis, which so distressed Kitty that he made a careful examination of Miss's throat, and pronounced it perfectly sound.

All at once a strange, vagabond cat began to prow around the place; then he was seen sitting upon the low stone wall at the foot of the garden, talking to Miss, who sat on the ground beneath. And this is what he said:

"Oh, come, now! I can see you're having a very stupid time here; I'm going on a prowl this afternoon, suppose you come along. Did you ever taste spring chicken?" And the vagabond cat chuckled.

"Yes," replied Miss, "we had it for dinner to-day, and I haven't finished all the lovely bones the children gave me, yet—I can let you have a few if you like. I hid them under the gooseberry bushes."

"Bones!" said the V. C. contemptuously; "I don't eat bones, thank you! Look here—you seem friendly, and I can see you've a spirit of your own, so I'll tell you the whole thing. There's a coop full of little yellow chickens in a yard I've been watching, and if you'll come along I'll go shares with you. What do you say?"

"But that would be stealing," said Miss, looking very much shocked and startled.

"Fiddlesticks!" said the V. C.; "just let me explain—" the chickens belong to the old hen, their mother, don't they?"

"I suppose they do," said Miss.

"Very well, then. The farmer's wife is going to take them away from their mother and kill them, and send them to market just as soon as they're big enough, so it's not stealing for us to help ourselves to a few first."

"But the old hen belongs—" began Miss, feebly, yieldingly.

The V. C. laughed. He felt sure of his victory now. A little more flattery and coaxing, and she agreed to go with him.

They were not caught that time, nor for many times afterward. The children took a great dislike to the wild, fierce-looking gray cat who coaxed Miss off on long tramps, from which she returned with soiled and roughened fur, and a guilty look upon her face.

Then something very shocking happened. Bidley left a large piece of meat on the kitchen table, while she went to the cellar, and returned just in time to see Miss bolt through the open window, dragging the meat with her.

Miss came very near getting her "walking ticket" that time; but the children implored, with many tears, that she might have "One more chance—just one."

"I'll not do that again for you nor anybody," said Miss, angrily, as she threw down the piece of meat before the V. C., who was waiting for her.

"Oh yes, you will," replied the V. C., calmly; "for if you don't, I shall watch my chance, and catch Kitty's canary-bird. I can easily reach it through the wires, and scatter the feathers about your bed in the cellar."

Miss was silent with horror. She really could not think what would happen to her should this dire threat be fulfilled. How she wished now that she had withdrawn from all association with the V. C. as soon as she began to suspect his real character! But it was too late to wish that now. So she began to steal very cautiously, and managed not to be caught again; but she saw that she was suspected and watched, and her yellow eyes had always now a furtive, guilty look.

And soon, very soon, came the dreadful end. A woman who came once a week with eggs and poultry, and who lived on a farm two or three miles from the town, came one morning and asked to see Kitty.

"I wanted to ask you, dear," she said, "if you'd seen that black cat you call Miss since yesterday."

"Why, no, Mrs. Holt," said Kitty, anxiously. "We've called her over and over this morning and she doesn't come. Have you seen her anywhere?"

"I'm afraid I have, my dear. Is this her collar?" and Mrs. Holt drew from her large pocket a pretty new red morocco collar. Alas! there was no doubt as to its ownership. Cousin Jack had brought that collar to Miss only a week ago.

With many tears Kitty heard the rest. Mrs. Holt had been missing little chickens and ducks and turkeys for some time, until at last Mr. Holt said he would watch and see if a weasel were the thief. He watched; he saw two stealthy creeping forms approaching the chicken-house; he fired a bullet from his pistol at each; both fell dead. One was the vagabond cat, and the other was Miss.

Mrs. Holt was very kind; she sent her son George to take Miss's body to the children, and they buried it in the lot where reposed the remains of the opossum who had declined to live in captivity, and sundry birds and mice.

"And the moral of that is," said Cousin Jack, as he concluded the funeral oration, which he had made by special request, and which had included the story just told, "that a boy—a cat, I mean, of course, is known by the company he keeps, or as the poet has beautifully expressed it:

"Tell me with whom you go,
And I'll tell you what you do."

LAST WORDS IN THE SADDLE.

BY COLONEL THEODORE A. DODGE, U.S.A.

IN my last article* I promised to tell you how to "make" a horse's mouth. If you have ridden several of the average ponies, or if your Don has not an exceptionally good mouth, you have probably been often annoyed by a habit of hard pulling on the bit. Now colts uniformly have soft "sweet" mouths. Pulling or boring is the result of bad training or bad management. Under some circumstances it is considered by many an advantage to have a horse pull. Trotters who have to be steadied to keep them from breaking into a gallop may perhaps be better for a reasonably hard mouth. Hunters who "take hold of you" are often preferred by rough-riders, or by those who like to support themselves a trifle by the rein; and for any but a very skilful rider this may not be altogether amiss, for a severe jerk on a very soft mouth might often get both horse and rider into a peck of trouble in a ticklish place. And it is just these places where one's seat gets unsteady and one's hands are apt to jerk. But the ideal saddle-horse, for road or park riding, must have a perfect mouth, for a horse cannot be trained to any extent unless his mouth has been made as sensitive as your finger-tips.

A colt properly broken will always keep the sweet mouth Dame Nature gave him, and even the very worst mouths can by skill and patience be made soft and good. To tell you how to do this in the very best way would require a small volume; indeed, hundreds of books have been written on the subject. But I can perhaps give you in a few words a hint or two which will be helpful if you will study what I say so as to understand it. Remember, however, that unless your seat is so firm that your hands are light, you cannot possibly give a horse a soft mouth.

Suppose now you stand at Don's near shoulder, and taking hold of the curb reins at the withers, give a steady, gentle pull. Don may attempt to back, but you must check this inclination with the voice. The pressure of the curb chain will soon make him bring down his head, open his mouth, and arch his neck. As soon as he does this, pat and caress him, and in a second or two release the rein, and let him have his head a moment to rest. Try the same thing again and again, very gradually keeping the neck arched a bit longer each time, but never so long as to tempt him to resist, which he will do by pulling on the bit, or throwing up his head, or backing.

So long as he chumps the bit and seems comfortable, keep on at this drill for, say, about half an hour a day. In a week or two you will find that Don will arch his neck at the slightest indication of the bit, and keep it arched for a long time without fatigue. When he does this easily, try the same thing for a few days mounted and standing. And later still go through the exercise for a week or two while Don is walking. Never try to force his mouth; coax him with hand and voice; and never keep him at it so long as to tire him so that he will hang on the curb, for this will surely spoil his mouth.

After some weeks you will find that Don will keep his neck arched, his mouth open, and a light hold of the bits at any gait. This is what we call "in hand." At first you had better alternate between keeping him "in hand" and letting him carry his head his own way, so as not to weary him too much. And if your hands are light, and you do not jerk or worry him, you will be surprised to see what a soft mouth Don is acquiring. The same thing can now be accomplished with the snaffle-bit, but in lieu of a steady pull you may have to give little gentle jerks on the rein till Don opens his mouth and arches his neck.

The next thing to teach him is to bring his head around to the right or left without moving his feet. Stand at his

* "More Words in the Saddle." HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE, No. 343.

A FIVE MILE GAIT.

near shoulder, take hold of the left curb rein with your left hand not far from the bit, and with your right hand gently pull the right rein across his withers so as to coax him to move his head toward his right shoulder. So soon as he does this a little, caress him and release his head. Try again, and by-and-by you will find that Don will bring his head well round to his side, with arched neck and champing bit. Then do the same thing on the other side, and by-and-by in the saddle, standing still. All these exercises supple his neck and help to make his forehead light, as I will soon explain to you. I have often taught my horses to put their heads around in this way by holding out to them a bit of sugar or apple on my toe when mounted. But this fails to teach them what the pressure of the bit means.

After this simple fashion, by patient and intelligent instruction for a few weeks, Don will have learned to open his mouth, arch his neck to the bit, and hold his head in any desired position at will. Now what is the good of all this? you will very naturally ask. Well, to begin with, the horse that will open his mouth will rarely lean on the bit; and if he learns that the little gentle jerks of the snaffle or pull of the curb mean that you want him to open it, he will, with every horse's natural tendency to obedience as well as to avoid the pressure, be almost sure to do so. By the drill above described the horse learns to so hold his head that his bits will rest easily in his mouth, and if you will not pull on him, neither will he on you. It is not to be supposed that a horse likes the pain which is given by pulling on a bit; he has simply imagined from his trainer's or owner's management that he was required to do so. He will be delighted to find out his mistake.

OVER THE WALL.

More important still is the effect which this softening of the mouth produces in his action. You have all noticed how heavy in his movements a horse who lugs his bit is apt to be. He may be fast and courageous, but he is not well balanced. Now just as soon as a horse learns to hold his head in a light and easy way, this lightness is communicated to his entire forehead, or that part in front of the saddle, and he instinctively exerts himself to become quick and handy in his gait. This is much the same thing as you would do if, instead of carrying a heavy bundle, you should walk along balancing a stick on your finger. The one effort would make you heavy and awkward; the other would oblige you to be light and spry. And thus the second effect of Don's learning to come "in hand" is to make his whole forehead light and active.

You may again ask, Of what use is it to teach a horse all these things? The answer is because all this training makes a horse obedient as well as clever, and renders him so tractable and docile that often the most nervous and high-strung thorough-bred may be safely entrusted to the weak—if skilful—hands of a woman to manage, and because any training which enables us to control so strong an animal by the use of the least muscular force must of necessity be good.

If you have ever seen a lot of fine horses let out from the stable into a pretty pasture, you will have seen how very proudly they bear themselves, and what beautiful steps and gambols they execute. Under saddles they will not do any of these things if trained by the usual method. Nor must they ever be allowed to do so of their own volition, because they and their riders would be all too apt to part company if they suddenly took it into their heads to "lark" a bit. But by the high-school training a horse may be taught to do all these things, and more, at the will of his rider, and they are not only very beautiful in the performance, but to learn them makes the horse extremely light and docile.

Now, while Don has been learning how to come "in hand" properly, you may have noticed that he has carried his head a trifle too low. To correct this you can raise your hands somewhat; and whenever a horse gets his head too high, the hands should be lowered.

Having thus taught Don to come "in hand," you want to go back to what I told you about the croup flexions, so as to teach him to "collect" himself. You will have already trained Don to move his croup away from the spur a step or two to the right or left; and you will now gradually teach him to move one or two steps of the hind-feet to the right, and then at once back again, without having moved his fore-feet. He will soon learn this;

THE CROUPE.

THE CAPRIOLE.

and you will notice that he is apt to first move the foot on the side to which you apply the spur. This has another use, of which anon. Now, as I hinted in my second article, teach him, by gently closing both heels upon him, to bring his hind-feet a trifle more under the saddle than he usually holds them, and without moving his forefeet. In this position, with head "in hand," he will be "collected," as we call it; i. e., light forward, and with his hind-legs where they can quickly sustain the entire weight if necessary, and respond to your call for any step or action. This "collected" condition may be kept at any gait, and is what enables one to control a horse thoroughly.

FULL CRY.

About the walk and trot there is much more to be said; but I must leave these gait to your own discretion, in order to tell you a few things about the canter. You have no doubt noticed, or, if not, then watch him until you do notice, that Don sometimes canters with one shoulder in the lead (i. e., thrown forward further and later, and sometimes with the other; and that if he turns to the right when cantering he is apt to change to a lead with the right shoulder in advance, if not already so leading. This is a natural thing for the horse to do, but it will be useful to teach Don to lead as you wish. This you may accomplish by cantering him round in a circle to the right, all the while keeping your left heel near his flank. He will by nature lead with the right shoulder, and will gradually get to associate your left heel with his right lead. After a few days canter him in a circle to the left, with your right heel near his flank; and later in a figure 8, with alternate heels pressed in as he is about to make the turns.

If you want Don to start into a canter from a stand or walk or trot, with right lead, you apply the left heel in the same way at the moment you lift your reins to make him take that gait. There are two reasons for this: one, that he has got to associate your left heel with his right lead, and the other, that your left spur inclines to make him advance that foot first, as I above told you; and if he starts the canter with the left hind-foot he will be leading with the right shoulder. When you have studied the anatomy and motions of the horse as closely as I have you will understand this better. Every step of a horse has to be understood before you can undertake to train him to a high degree of intelligence.

When you have discreetly followed out what I have told you I am sure that you will have all become excellent riders for boys and girls. You will have a good seat; your hands are light; Don can walk, trot, and canter well "collected," and can start with either lead, or change lead in the canter; he can take a few side steps with forehand or croup at will; and he can jump handsily. He is already much further advanced than most horses, and well prepared for almost any work. If you want to study the art further, I shall be glad to tell you more about it.

I will now say something to you about the illustrations. Forty years ago it required nearly five minutes to take a daguerrotype; ten years ago it took half a minute for a photograph. But you have all heard that photography has advanced to such an extent that a picture can to-day be taken instantaneously, in, say, the thousandth part of a second, or even less. By this process we get a faithful picture of an animal moving. All the illustrations of this article, except the "Croupade" and "Capriole," are exact copies of such photographs. The first is my dear old horse Patroclus, whom I am glad to introduce to you, ambling a five-mile gait along the road. Nothing but the rider's face has been changed. I have put this in to show you what a good position in the saddle should be. This is just right, and as it is exactly reproduced from life, will show you that a man may practise what he preaches. The next is the same horse clearing a wall. Notice the seat, the rider leaning well back and perfectly close and secure, and the reins loose but well in hand. Again we have old Pat, carrying his rider safe through a bullfinch, as we call a hedge overgrown with young trees. I give you this to show you the side view of the seat in a jump. The foot might perhaps be thrown a trifle further back, but the seat is firm, and Pat is well in hand for landing. Notice how he has tucked up his hind-legs, and now he is gradually straightening his fore-legs so as to land safely on one after the other, first the left and then the right, to be followed in quick order by the same hind-legs.

These three photographs are from a series which were taken for me by Babie, a Coolidge, of Boston. The big picture is an exact copy from a photograph taken at the Country Club of Boston, by Allen and Rowell, and shows you very well the various ways in which a horse leaps.

The other two pictures show some of the "airs" which by haute école, or high-school training, a horse may be made to perform. In the "Croupade," the horse, at the will of his rider, springs high into the air, tucks all his feet close up under him, and comes down in the same place with all four feet at once. A succession of "Croupades" makes a very brilliant show, and you can hardly imagine the delicate condition to which a horse must be trained in order to execute at will this very difficult feat, and to understand by the bit and heels just what his rider wants. For there are a great many of these "airs," all differing one from the other. The "Capriole" differs from the "Croupade" only in that while in the air the horse lashes out with his hind-feet held close together; and though he looks as if he was making a twenty-foot leap, he will actually come down not more than twelve inches in advance of where he rose from the ground.

As I told you before, there is no particular utility in these "airs" per se, but the course of training by which the horse learns them makes him very tractable, and to know how to teach him to perform these requires a very high degree of horsemanship. Now horsemanship is the profession of some men, such, for instance, as cavalry soldiers. Have you ever seen two men fencing? If so, you have noticed how very exact and skilful a man has to be in order to cut, thrust, and parry well, and how his position on the ground must be as perfectly balanced as a rope-dancer's to do his work. The cavalryman has to use his weapon in the saddle, and you will see that unless he can instantly shift his horse into such positions that he is firm in the saddle and that the saddle is in just the right place to enable him to deliver his cut or thrust, or parry his enemy's, he cannot fight to advantage. And it is only by such a course of training as I have hinted at that horse and rider can be educated to do this work to perfection. It is related of Guardsman Shaw that in a cavalry mêlée at the battle of Waterloo he disabled more than twenty French horsemen before he was himself wounded by a bullet. This was the result of very great skill both as a swordsmen and a rider, and it cannot be doubted that his trooper was as highly trained as himself.

CHAPTER X.

MUTINY AT FORT CAROLINE.

DURING the progress of the exciting events related in the preceding chapters, troublous times had come to Fort Caroline, on the banks of the Great River of May. Above it hung the three black clouds of starvation, mutiny, and war.

Before the sudden departure of René de Veaux on his journey in search of food a party of the men had been sent out by Laudonniere to explore the country to the south of the fort, and discover, if possible, the mountains of gold that were supposed to exist there. For more than a month they had traversed broad sand barrens, crossed deep rivers, and been lost in the mazes of dark swamps. They had discovered rare birds of gorgeous plumage, strange and beautiful flowers, and many wild animals whose nature was unknown to them, but no trace of the gold of which they were in search.

Keenly disappointed, ragged, sick, and hungry, they at length came to a village of Indians who had never seen nor heard of white men, and who fled at their approach. The famished soldiers rushed into the lodges, took whatever they could find to eat, and, building a fire, proceeded to cook for themselves a feast. While they were thus busy, their carelessly tended fire crept to one of the tinder-like palmetto lodges, and in a few minutes more the whole village was in flames.

From their hiding-places in the surrounding forest the savages, witnessing what they supposed was a wanton destruction of their property, discharged a cloud of arrows at the white men, by which one was killed and several were wounded. Flying from the place, the wretched soldiers started for Fort Caroline, followed by their unseen foes, from whom they did not escape until four more had paid with their lives for their carelessness. When, some days later, the five miserable survivors of this unfortunate expedition dragged themselves into Fort Caroline, it was only to bring the news of their failure to find gold, of the death of their comrades, and of the fact that they had stirred up all the southern Indians to war upon the whites.

Laudonniere, who had taken René's departure keenly to heart, and who had grieved over the lad as though he were lost to him, had also suffered great anxiety on account of the scarcity of provisions within the fort. Now, added to these troubles, came these latest tidings of ill, and, as a result, the fever against which he was struggling overcame him, and he was confined to his bed.

To many within Fort Caroline the serious illness of their chief brought great sorrow; but others, seeing in it an opportunity for the carrying out of their own plans, rejoiced accordingly. These others were those who were dissatisfied with the present aspect of affairs, and despairing of a change for the better while remaining at Fort Caroline, were secretly planning a mutiny. Its object was to compel Laudonniere to abandon the fort and the New World, and lead them back to France in a ship which they proposed to build from such materials as they had at hand.

The mutineers were headed by no less a person than René's old friend Simon the Armorer. He had always been inclined to grumble and growl, and his feelings had been deeply wounded by being arrested, confined in the guard-house for one day, and finally discharged, because of the necessity for his services, with a sharp reprimand from Laudonniere for having, though unconsciously, aided René's departure. The old growler had always secretly sided with the mutineers, and after this he openly took part with them, and soon became their leader.

It thus happened that as the good Le Moyne, who, during the illness of Laudonniere and most of the other officers, was acting as lieutenant in command of the fort, sat writing one morning there came to him Simon the Armorer, followed by most of the garrison. The old soldier gave a military salute, which Le Moyne returned, and then he said, "We have come, Master Le Moyne, these good men here and I, to make certain propositions that we desire should be laid before his Excellency the commandant."

"Well," said Le Moyne, in a tone of mild surprise, "have to them without further delay, and return quickly to thy duties."

"It may be," replied Simon, "that we will return not to them at all; at least not in the sense meant by thy use of the word. We are starving."

"Ye have not overmuch to eat," 'tis true," said Le Moyne; "but we hope for better things."

"We are dying of the fever."

"To a certain extent this is also true."

"We are threatened by an enemy."

"And have stout walls behind which to defend ourselves."

"We are abandoned and forgotten, and our bodies will rot in this place ere succor is sent us."

"Admiral Jean Ribault is never the man to abandon or forget those to whom he has promised succor," replied the artist, with a flush of color in his pale cheeks.

"This country yields no gold, and is unfitted for human residence."

"Yet Micco's people live and thrive here, and have a plenty of the best raised from its soil. As for gold, the mere fact that it has not yet been discovered proves nothing against its existence."

Without replying to this, Simon continued: "These be our grievances, and to remedy them we pray his Excellency to allow us to construct here as speedily as may be a vessel such as will suffice to carry us back whence we came. We also pray that he will in person lead us from this evil place back to our own country, always supposing that his health permits."

The good Le Moyne was much disturbed by this bold proposal, and attempted to persuade the men to abandon their wild scheme and return to their duties, awaiting patiently meantime the arrival of the promised reinforcements from France. They insisted, however, that they would not take their leave of him without hearing from the commandant himself, and Le Moyne was finally forced to comply with their request, and deliver their message to Laudonniere.

Upon receiving a report of what had occurred, the chevalier was highly indignant; and but for the extreme weakness which the fever had laid upon him he would have arisen and gone out to the mutineers. As this was impossible, he sent answer to them that he could not for a moment consider their proposal. He and they had been sent to take and hold possession of that country by their King, and here he should remain until he received other instructions from the same source. As for them, his orders were that they instantly resume their duties, and use all diligence in strengthening the fort, and preparing for an attack which might at any moment be made upon it by the savages from the south.

When Le Moyne returned to the soldiers with this answer, Simon, still acting as spokesman for the rest, said: "Thy message from the commandant is much as we expected it would be, Master Le Moyne, and in return thou wilt kindly take to him word again that for the preservation of our lives we shall certainly exert ourselves to repel any attack that may be made against the fort. At the same time we shall as certainly take active measures to insure our own and his speedy departure from this unhappy country, in which we have thus far gained naught but ill."

With this speech, and once more giving Le Moyne a stiff military salute, the old soldier turned and marched away, followed by the rest of the mutineers.

As soon as he was once more alone, Le Moyne made his report to Laudonniere, and so excited did the sick man become on hearing it that his fever took a sudden turn for the worse, and he was soon raving deliriously, and calling upon René de Veaux not to desert him for his enemies the Indians.

Meantime matters proceeded so rapidly outside that the keel of a small vessel in which the mutineers hoped to cross the ocean to their own country was laid that very day, and the labor of collecting suitable material for ship-building was entered upon with the fierce energy of men who believed they were working to save their lives.

So actively did this work proceed that in less than a month the hull of the little vessel was completed, and she stood ready for launching.

At this time parties were out in several directions from the fort, some securing pitch from the pine forests for use upon the vessel, others searching the cypress swamps for suitable spars, and still others making unskilled efforts to secure a supply of game and fish for present use, and for salting down to provision their ship during the proposed voyage. These last were the most unsuccessful of all who were out, owing to their limited knowledge of wood-craft. They were at the same time the most anxious to succeed in their quest; for the supply of corn in the fort was now wholly exhausted, and its garrison was subsisting almost entirely upon fish; and the leaf-buds of the cabbage-palm, which they had discovered how to prepare.

On the day that marked a month from the date of René de Vaux's departure, the working parties whose duties took them into the forest were suddenly attacked by great numbers of savages and driven in the greatest confusion back to the fort, after sustaining severe losses in killed and wounded. The advance of the savages, who followed them closely even up to the very gates, was only checked by a heavy fire of artillery, which so alarmed them that they fled in a panic to the shelter of the forest, nor stopped until they had retreated to a most respectful distance.

Toward evening a body of the enemy were seen gathered in plain view on and about the great shell mound upon which the feast of Ripe Corn had been held some weeks before. The sight of them so enraged Simon the Armorer, who was now generally recognized as commandant, that he determined to sally forth at the head of a strong party and bring about a decisive battle, which he had no doubt would result in a victory for the whites.

Although he could muster but about fifty able-bodied men, so sadly had fever and lack of proper food ravaged the garrison, the old soldier, who held the fighting qualities of the savages in great contempt, deemed this number amply sufficient for his purpose, and marched forth confidently at their head. They met with no enemy until they had nearly reached the shell mound, and were preparing to charge upon the savages, who still remained gathered about it.

Suddenly the whites found themselves completely surrounded by a great number of Indians, who seemed to spring, as though by magic, from every bush and from behind every tree. So secretly had their approach been made that the first notice Simon and those with him had of the ambush into which they had fallen was a vast discharge of arrows and spears into their ranks. These were accompanied by such blood-curdling yells that they affected the white men almost as fearfully as the roar of their own artillery had terrified the savages in the morning.

Rallying from their first panic, they made a desperate attempt to force their way back to the fort, and struggled like men who knew their lives were at stake. In spite, however, of their bravery and the terrible execution of their swords, they were being overpowered by numbers, and it seemed impossible that one should escape alive.

As, completely exhausted by the terrible and unequal struggle, they were about giving way to despair, a most welcome and unexpected diversion was made in their favor. A great cry arose beyond the line of savages, and they were so suddenly and fiercely attacked in the rear by an unseen foe that they fled in terror in all directions.

Not even waiting to learn who had lent them this most timely aid, the soldiers hastened to regain the fort, and seek shelter behind its ponderous gates.

As they did so they heard, or thought they heard, from the depths of the forest, a clear voice crying, "France to the rescue! France to the rescue!" and they marvelled greatly thereat.

- TOO LITTLE TO HIT.

BY MARY F. VANDYKE.

"PLEASE, can't I come in?"

"Who are you?"

"Dicky Wattles. Please let me come in."

The answer to this pathetic appeal was a burst of laughter. How could they help it? Certainly anything more laughter-provoking than this tow-headed, freckled-faced little object, with its tear-stained cheeks and tattered clothes, was rarely seen.

A party of blue-coated men, some of them quite dazzling with gold lace and glittering shoulder-straps, were gathered under the hospitable canvas of Captain Dudley. The conversation over the prospects of a battle had languished, and several of the party were yawning amid the silence, when one of them called out, "What's that?"

At first it looked like a mass of tow thrust in by some one through an opening in the tent. It proved, however, to be the head of a small boy.

When the owner was inquired of as to the object of his visit, he answered with the sad appeal just quoted.

"No; go away," was the answer from one of the blue-coats.

"No room for such rubbish," came from another.

This provoked a second burst of laughter, which had scarcely died away when the sound of a prolonged sob was heard.

"There! you've set the youngster bawling." This came from Captain Dudley himself, and as he said it he rose and walked to the door of the tent. "Come back, you, and show yourself."

The boy was only too glad to respond to the appeal. With his head hanging down on his breast, and a slouching gait, he entered the tent.

All hands began at once to tease him.

"Who's your tailor, young man?"

"And your barber?"

"Stop crying, and sing us a song. You ought to know 'Way down South in Dixie' pretty well. That's your native country, isn't it?"

"Let him alone, boys," interrupted Captain Dudley. "The poor little wretch is in trouble. Come here, young man."

Dicky Wattles rushed to his protector's side, and looked at him with a wondering air.

A very few minutes sufficed to draw the boy's story from him. He had run away from his miserable home determined to get with the army. He had seen a regiment pass his door once. The thrilling sound of martial music, the tramp of the horses, the glittering uniforms of the men, had excited his imagination. Where these people were, heaven must be. From that time he had but one object in life, and that was to find the camp and remain in it.

But what a miserable little specimen he was! What could be done with him? Nothing, apparently. At least no one tried to do anything. And so Dicky hung round the camp. How he lived no one knew. Sometimes bits of food were flung to him, and these he eagerly devoured. His clothes grew older and more tattered, but the weather was warm, and this did not disturb him.

But miserable as his life seemed, Dicky had an object in it. That was to keep as close as possible to Captain Dudley. It was Dudley that had befriended him in the first instance, and while he took no special trouble in regard to the boy, he now and then did him a kindness. On one occasion a generous slice of pudding from the Captain's table found its way to Dicky's grimy paws; and in one supreme moment Dudley actually patted him on the head and thanked him for some trifling service.

Usually Dicky was promptly ordered out of the way by the Captain's body servant, but occasionally rare bits of happiness came to him. Once he found a pocket-book that the Captain had lost, and received warm praises for his honesty. Once he was sent on quite an important errand, and after no little fatigue and danger, delivered the articles safely into the Captain's hands.

The day finally came when the army was no longer quiet. There was a great bustle of preparations going forward. A forced march had been ordered, and the brigade was to move on to a point some twenty miles away, where a battle was expected. Dicky was overwhelmed with what he saw going on about him. The experiences were all new. Now there was work even for him. He ran here and there, sent on errands by everybody, and once he was even spoken to by Captain Dudley himself.

When the regiment began to move, Dicky followed close behind. He ran and walked until his little legs ached under him, and he grew faint with the heat.

But he saw it all. He saw the troops move into position and form a square; he heard the booming of distant artillery; he saw the foe approach, and heard the first shots fired into their ranks. Presently a man fell near him. With a shriek, he watched the blood flow. This was terrible; he had had no idea of such scenes as this. Was this what all those bright uniforms and glittering weapons meant? Did these men dress and live in this way simply to kill each other?

Presently word came that the enemy had retired, and the regiment must change its position. Captain Dudley rode up to lead his men forward. "Wait, boys," he cried, "until I ride ahead and see the outlook."

He did ride ahead. The men saw him two hundred yards in the distance. Suddenly a fierce booming of cannon was heard; columns of smoke arose in the air; bullets fell like hail.

"He's down!" cried a private in the ranks. The second officer in command rode up.

"Stay where you are, men. The enemy are on the hill."

Not one among the men dared to follow their Captain. To do so would be to disobey orders and to incur certain death. But there was one follower of Dudley to whom no orders could apply.

"I'm going to him," screamed Dicky Wattles.

He was held back by a grasp on his collar. "You'll go to your death, boy. Stay where you are."

"Never!" shrieked Dicky. "I'm too little to hit, and I'm going."

He darted forward. They saw him pass through the fiery hail and reach Dudley's side. Sheltering himself under the horse as best he could, he laid his little head on his idol's breast.

The battle went on for hours. Before long the firing ceased on the part of the field where Dicky lay, but it was night when the men could go forth to find the body of their fallen commander. When the party of brave fellows reached the spot they found the boy still lying with his cheek pressed to that of the man he loved so well.

As they spoke to him he tottered to his feet. He watched them lift the dead form carefully up, and then followed quietly as they bore it away.

"He was too little to hit," said one of the men.

Dicky heard the remark, and pressed his hand to his side.

When they laid the Captain on the rude bed prepared for him within the lines, Dicky crouched down beside him in the old position. One hand he laid on the Captain's breast, the other was still clasped to his side. Arrangements were made for removing the body again, and the men tried to draw Dicky away. He made no resistance, but as they raised him by the arm, his little body hung limp and lifeless in their grasp.

He had not been "too little to hit," and in the silent watches of the night Dicky had gone to meet his friend.

THE CAPTIVE QUEEN.

BY LORD BRABOURNE

(E. H. KNATCHBULL-HUGGESSON.)

AUTHOR OF "PUSS-CAT MEW AND OTHER FAIRY STORIES," ETC.

CHAPTER VII.

WHEN the wizard had uttered the words which closed the last chapter he let go the nose of the unfortunate person to whom they were addressed, and with great quickness drew from his breast a small black book with very large silver clasps, at the sight of which the one-eyed wizard gave another fearful moan, but appeared to be not only unable to speak, but also to move, for when the other now rose from the ground and stood upright, he remained perfectly motionless. He who held the black book now unclasped and opened it, and proceeded to read from its pages words which, as nearly as the King could hear, were as follows:

"Bolberry-Parno-ractum siff,
Gampersy-pobenus nimjogrif,
Stonaplanblugh panginvo, Allipapanymerecarolo."

He spoke very slowly, but as he did so a wonderful change came over the wretch who lay prostrate at his feet. His face grew paler and still more pale, until it was quite white and colorless; his legs and arms grew rapidly stiff and rigid, his head sank gradually in between his shoulders, his body lost the outline of a human form, and as the last word left the lips of the speaker every semblance of a man had left the miserable creature, and before the eyes of the travellers there lay nothing but a shapeless block of inanimate stone, which no one would have guessed to have been ever possessed of life and breath.

"There!" exclaimed the infliker of this terrible doom: "I don't think you'll steal any more Queens, my friend, but we'll make it quite sure, and then leave you to yourself."

So saying he walked three times round the stone, stood upon it for a moment, and then, after mumbling some words to himself in a low tone, turned round to the spot upon which the King and the three travellers were standing.

"Well," he said, "you three servants have made a pretty muddle of it altogether! How came you to be such fools as to stop and listen to those fish-women? You ought to have known better, and may thank your stars that I happened to be on the lookout—another moment and I should have been too late!"

The cow gave a low and grateful moo on hearing these words, the rabbit uttered a plaintive squeak, and the kangaroo grunted gruffly; but none of them said anything. Then the old man addressed the wondering King.

"Sire," said he, "I am truly glad to be able to render you a service. Just one hundred and eleven years ago your Majesty's great-grandfather gave me half a crown when I appeared at the palace gates in the disguise of a beggar. It was a bad one, to be sure, but I do not for a moment think he knew it to be so, having doubtless received it in change from one of his ministers. From that moment I vowed that I would do a good turn to his family if ever the opportunity offered, and this has now been the case. That rascal (and here the old man pointed to the block of stone near him) has been a thorn in my side for the last fifty years or so, knowing just enough of magic to make it serve his own vile ends, and not sufficient to understand the great and good purposes to which it may and ought to be devoted. Now at last I have been able to pay him out for all his misdeeds, for as soon as he ventured upon the crime of carrying off a Queen, who had done nothing to deserve it, and who would much rather have been left alone, he put himself within my power, and has had to feel it. You may now follow me, and I will lead you to her for whom your soul has been so much distressed."

So saying, the speaker turned round and marched up to the opening in the mountain-side, followed at once by the eager King, behind whom came the faithful three who had been so useful to him in his search.

At the mouth of the opening the friendly wizard paused and beckoned to the King, who came up to his side, and gazed upon a scene such as he had never even imagined in all his life. At a little distance from where he stood the rocky mountain slanted down, as it were at right angles through the sea as far as his sight could reach, and in its sides were continuous caves, larger and smaller, the mouths of which glittered with precious stones and curious shells of varied hues, while in front of them the mermaids were sporting and playing in a hundred different attitudes, all more graceful than can be fancied by any one who has not seen them.

The nearest cave had a mouth large enough to allow the King to look into it, which he immediately did, and was astonished as well as delighted at what he saw. Upon a rock of the purest crystal, very near to the entrance, was seated his own Amabilia, more beautiful than ever. Her magnificent hair was streaming down her back, her hands were clasped over her knees, and her eyes, bedewed with recent tears, were fixed upon the water before her, as if expecting that from this quarter deliverance would come. Around her were several little elves, engaged in doing nothing in every possible way, while in front of her the mermaids kept passing and repassing, ever and anon kissing their hands to her as if in admiration of her surpassing beauty.

So far as the King could see the floor of the cave was entirely paved with rubies, emeralds, and diamonds, while gorgeous scarfs, magnificent shawls, and other costly articles of apparel were scattered about here and there in wondrous profusion.

But it was not upon such articles as these that the King fixed his eyes. His Queen, his own, his beloved and long-lost Amabilia, was before him, and his eager and enraptured gaze was for her alone. At the same instant her upturned eyes caught sight of the figures which stood in the opening, and although the singing of the mermaids and the dash of the waters against the rocks drowned her voice, it was evident that she spoke, as she unclasped her hands and stretched out her arms in an imploring attitude.

Without one moment's thought or fear the King would have leaped down into the waves in the direction of the cave in which, amid the treasures of the watery deep, he saw her who to his loving eyes was the greatest treasure of all. But the ancient wizard laid a restraining hand upon his arm.

"Stambersy maxon," he said, which, as all students of magic lore will be aware, is as much as to say, "Stop a minute."

The action, if not the expression, was clear enough to the King, and not without difficulty he refrained from taking the leap. Then the wizard put his hand into the pocket of the cloak which he wore, and drawing out of it a flute, put it to his mouth and began to play, if that could be called "playing" which produced such a discordant sound that it compelled the King to stop both his ears, while the three animals uttered in their several voices melancholy groans which showed that they were exposed to more than common misery.

The effect, however, upon the mermaids was still more extraordinary. They one and all stopped singing at the first note of the wizard's flute, and fled right and left with such speed that in the space of a minute or so there was not one of them left in front of the Queen's cave. The old man grimly smiled as he saw the result of his performance, and then, making some curious passes with his hand, produced another result quite as extraordinary as the last.

A piece of the mountain-side by which they were standing quietly detached itself from the rest, formed itself into a coveyed way, and lightly fell across from the opening to the entrance of the cave, forming a perfectly dry channel by which the King and his companions could pass into the latter. As the wizard now no longer prevented him, the King did not lose a moment in taking advantage of the means thus placed at his disposal. He rushed at once into the passage, and in another moment was clasped in his Anubilia's arms.

What the fond couple had to say to each other may be better imagined than described, and I should not write another word if they had been the only persons with whom our story had to do. Neither should I think it necessary to say any more about the wizard, because, in the first place, everybody can imagine his history as well as I can tell it, and in the second place, it is never very safe to talk about such people, who, for anything we know, may be listening to us all the time.

The mermaids, of course, were sorry to lose the Queen, but it was only by the power of the one-eyed wizard that they had been deceived into keeping watch over her, and as they are a people who are really very well disposed toward mortals, it will easily be understood that they rejoiced to see the King and Queen so happy in being once more reunited. It is therefore only necessary to speak of the three animals which had played so important a part in our story.

I have searched the records of that country with great care to find out all about them, especially as I know there was a report that the cow never left the mountain-side after the wizard's performance on the flute, and that the proverb about "the tune that the old cow died of" had its origin in her melancholy fate. I have ascertained, however, beyond all doubt, that this is untrue, and that she, together with her two faithful companions, returned safely with the King and Queen to their own country, and that the Great Council proposed to give a grand banquet to their honor, to which all the courtiers and fashionable people were invited.

But upon the very day of this entertainment the court was alarmed by a tremendous thunder-storm, and after the thunder had rolled with tremendous sound for more than an hour, the lightning's vivid flashes had lighted up the horizon from end to end, and a terrible wind had uprooted many of the largest trees in the forest, there suddenly followed an intense calm, and presently, amid the breathless stillness of the air, music was heard which attracted the attention of the whole court, who hurried out to the main track in the forest, from whence it seemed to proceed. When they had arrived there the music seemed just the same, neither louder nor less distinct than they had heard it at first, and it very soon became apparent from whence it came.

In slow and solemn procession the three animals of whom we have heard so much were marching, not down, but up, the hill; and as they went, the clear-sounding bells around the cow's neck, the shrill life of the rabbit, and the rattle of the kangaroo's drum rang through the air so as to be clearly heard by all. And as they advanced, the three friends sang to the old tune words which somewhat resembled those which they had sung before:

"The cow, the rabbit, and the old kangaroo
Go marching up the hill,
They said that the Queen to the King had been true,
And they're ready to say so still;
Farewell! we have done what we had to do—
The cow and the rabbit and the old kangaroo."

THE FAREWELL OF THE COW, RABBIT, AND KANGAROO.

The whole court stood gazing with astonishment at the procession, and listening to the music and words until the animals had reached the crest of the hill, the last point at which they could be visible from below. There they stood for one moment; then the music sounded once more, after which the cow lifted up her voice and gave one long-sounding melodious moo. This was evidently by way of a final farewell, for as soon as the last echo had died away the mortals upon the hill-side looked up, and saw nothing. The three animals had vanished as entirely as if they had never been there, and from that time to this I never heard that they were seen again by any of the people of that country. This, then, is the true history of how the King released his Queen from captivity by the aid of a cow, a rabbit, and an old kangaroo.

THE END.

BY MARY EWILKINS.

THE CLOCK.

THERE it stood in the Baron's hall—
"Tick—tock!"—
As a soldier, straight and tall,
Capped with a polished brazen ball—
The clock.

And its pendulum swung in its stately way—
"Tick—tock!"—
Whether the people were grave or gay,
Upon a wedding or funeral day—
"Tick—tock."

When the Baron set out with the Queen to ride—
"Tick—tock!"—
When the Baron's daughter became a bride,
And the heir was crowned by the country-side—
"Tick—tock."

When death rushed in through the Baron's door—
"Tick—tock!"—
And the bearers trod on the oaken floor,
And one went forth to return no more—
"Tick—tock."

But one and all, from the proud young heir—
"Tick—tock!"—
And the blessed bride and her bridemaids fair,
To the mourners, passed with a fearful air
The clock.

And Betty and James from the servants' hall—
"Tick—tock!"—
Declared that they dared not pass at all,
After the shadows began to fall,
The clock.

And when it solemnly struck the hour—
"Tick—tock!"—
From the pantry up to my lady's bower
They counted the strokes with terror o'er—
"Tick—tock."

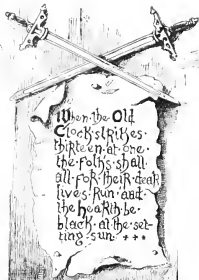

For all on a morsel of parchment writ—
"Tick—tock!"—
By some old scholar of mystic wit,
Was a dark prediction concerning it,
The clock.

*"When the old clock strikes thirteen at one—
The folks shall all for their dear lives run,
And the hearth be black at the setting sun!"*
"Tick—tock."

Two hundred summers had passed away—
"Tick—tock!"—
And a Baron was feasting his friends one day;
There were lovely ladies and gallants gay—
"Tick—tock."

The red drops over the goblets run—
"Tick—tock!"—
There were songs and sallies of sparkling fun,
When solemnly struck thirteen at one,
The clock.

Then guests and servants, with terror pale—
"Tick—tock!"—
Scurried, like leaves on an autumn gale,
Out of the hall, with shriek and wail,
"The clock!"

The Baron stopped not for his treasure chest—
"Tick—tock!"—
And my lady, all in her velvets drest,
Rushed wildly out before her guest—
"The clock!"

Then they stood aloof in their pallid fright—
"Tick—tock!"—
Nor dared to enter the hall that night,
And the hearth was black at the waning light—
"Tick—tock."

And thus the prophecy had come true—
"Tick—tock!"—
Then they kindled the fire on the hearth anew,
And there was an end of the great ado—
"Tick—tock."

WAITING FOR AN INTRODUCTION

OUR POST-OFFICE BOX.

THE OLD AND THE NEW

WITH this number ends our SEVENTH VOLUME. As to whether it has been more interesting, more attractive, in every way better, than the sixth volume and its predecessors, the final verdict rests with you, our readers. We, its conductors, think that it has in no respect fallen behind, and we feel that we have redeemed our pledge to make it better than any of the volumes that went before it.

As to what it contains, you have heard and from work to week need not to be told; and those who shall see it for the first time in its completed form, bedecked in the handsome suit of green and gold which is now familiar in many thousands of households throughout this broad land, we venture to think that they will lose no time in making themselves acquainted with its varied and attractive contents.

We may safely assume, however, that you favored ones who have enjoyed the volume that is now closing will be eager to learn what you may expect in the new pages that you will begin to turn next week. In the new volume we shall not desert our old friends. "The Flamingo Feather" will not break off abruptly, because there has not been time to finish it in the present volume. It has several weeks yet to run in the new one. Another old friend will soon appear with a new story, for Mr. MEXRO's serial will be followed by one from the pen of the most popular of writers for girls. The title will be "The Colonel's Money," and the author Mrs. LEE C. LUCE. Some of our readers felt aggrieved because the last two serials by this author were, as they thought, too short. In truth, Mrs. LUCE had a story to tell, and when it was told she ended it. In "The Colonel's Money" she has more to tell, and so it will be longer in the telling. In fact, it will be longer than any of her preceding serials, and we venture to think her better.

As for the other story tellers, FRANK R. STOCKTON the most original of American writers of short stories; WILLIAM D. HOWELLS the most famous of American novelists; and MISS LOUISA M. ALBERT of whom it is faine enough to say that she wrote Little Women; will contribute short stories to our Christmas numbers; H. C. BENNER will furnish a comic opera; W. LAM O. STODDARD will write a stirring tale for Thanksgiving Day, JOHN R. CONVELL a story for New-Year's; and HOWARD PALE (surely a familiar name to quaint tale of a Twelfth-Night long ago) will also continue his series of amusing fairy tales.

A marked feature of the present volume has been the articles on outdoor sports, written for the most part by persons who had won distinction in their respective fields. This feature will be especially prominent in the new volume. Colonel DONOR, a brave officer, a brilliant horseman, and a fascinating writer, will follow up his series of articles on horse-back riding by two or three articles on driving, an art in which but few of those who practise it excel. Mr. H. P. WELLS, a practical sportsman, and the author of that excellent work "The American Salmon-Fisherman," will have several articles on camp life and fishing. Mr. J. A. HODGE, JEX, will contribute hints on training for athletic exercises, as well as an article on foot-ball. Mr. J. MACDONALD OXLEY, of Ottawa, Canada, will write about those distinctive Canadian sports, tobogganing and snow-shoeing.

Returning to summer pastimes, lawn tennis will have two articles by Dr. JAMES DWIGHT, the most famous player in the country, and withal the person who most thoroughly understands the game. Sailing and canoeing enthusiasts will be at once entertained and instructed by Mr. JOHN HARBERTON and Mr. KRIG MCKROE, and other summer sports will receive due attention from experienced hands. In-door amusements will come in for their share of attention, and neither the girls nor the boys will have cause to think themselves neglected in that respect. The girls, by-the-way, should be on the lookout for a series of short papers, called "Chips from a Yule-Log," by several writers, which will begin very soon.

So far we have spoken only about the lighter matters—fiction and amusement, and indeed it is with your lighter moods that we are mostly concerned, and to the happiness of your leisure hours that we would contribute. We have no wish to intrude upon the domain of the professor or the "school-ma'am." Nevertheless, there is much to be learned from our papers, though indeed you hardly suspect the fact. You will be very much surprised to find how much you know about certain famous men's lives, for instance, and you will at last recall that you learned it from Mr. GEORGE MAKEPEACE TOWLE'S STORIES OF "THE HEROES AND MARTYRS OF INVENTION," which will begin in an early number. Or you will find many interesting nature invested with a new charm because you have learned so much from Mrs. HENRIK'S articles on geology, Miss COOPER'S talks about animal life, or Professor HOLDEN'S short papers on the curiosities of natural history.

All that we have told you about what you may expect in the new volume is merely a taste. We have no room here to tell you about the many short stories, poems, anecdotes, music, and other good things that will crowd our pages, and we have not said a word about the illustrations. However, pictures tell their own story at a glance, and so long as we retain our old corps of artists and engravers, and are frequently adding to their number, you may be sure that there will be no falling in of that respect.

And now we must prepare to make our bow to our old friends, since our year is ended, trusting that ere the wheel of time brings us to the close of another year, we shall have delighted all our old friends and gained thousands of new ones.

GREENVILLE, SOUTH CAROLINA.

MY DEAR POSTMISTRESS.—I write to give you an account of the recent earthquake which took place in Greenville on August 21. A few friends were spending the evening with us, and we were outside when it occurred. It was a very unusual event, which at first was attributed to the churning of ice cream, but when the chandeliers began to rattle and the windows to shake, we all ran to the piazza, and my father spoke the terrible word, "Earthquake," which pale the faces of the children who fear, though the elders made light of it. Along the streets we were passing, shouting that "Gabriel's trumpet had been sounded, and that soon the earth would melt away." People were rushing into the houses in their night clothes, and we found out next day that we were among a very small minority which did not run to the streets for safety. After the first shock was over we returned to the restaurant provided, and one of the ladies sang Lockwood's "Farewell," at a very fitting moment, for the earth was trembling under another slight shock. Next morning we were filled with anxiety on hearing of the disasters which had befallen Charleston, and that we were cut off from communication with the outside world by relatives, and our former home, even by telegraph with the exception of one wire. Wild and fearful were the rumors that were circulated of the extent of damage done to the historic city. By some it was averred that there was a great tidal wave sweeping down everything before it, and that what remained were only the bare, sulphurous steams; that there was a great fire burning at Charleston and Summerville a little town twenty miles distant, which was filled with red-hot lava. Great was our relief when we received a telegram telling us that our relatives were "safe, but houseless," the houses being all destroyed, and the inhabitants barely escaping with their lives. We Greenvilleans were only thankful that our shock gave us but a faint idea of the quakes which Charleston tremblingly endured. Great deeds of bravery were done that night by Charleston's sons and daughters, when Mother Earth writhed in terrible convulsions, and they felt that moment would be their last. One act which showed real presence of mind was that of an employe on the South Carolina Railroad. An excursion train from Columbia was derailed by the quake, and the engine, which had just started, and the young man, feeling the quake, and knowing that the track must be injured, ran up the road and put torpedoes on the track. He came the train, until it struck the torpedo, which exploded under it, and thus warned the engineer that there was danger ahead. He stopped, and found that the rails ahead the rails were twisted into the shape of an S. Thus, through this young man's prompt action, many were saved from fearful destruction. When I read of the train, and the young man, the "City by the Sea" under its overwhelming trial, I can but exclaim, in my admiration, "When can his glory fade?"

MARGARET H. MANGERS, AUCKLAND, NEW ZEALAND.

DEAR POSTMISTRESS.—I am fourteen years of age, and live in the north of New Zealand, very near the beautiful city of Auckland. I do not take in YOUR PEOPLE yet, but my brother-in-law, who has just returned, has promised to take it in if I pass my examination for the Standard, so I must study very hard. I belong to the Mankin Cricket Club, first eleven. I am the only girl on the club, and have played several matches, but we were not very successful. I was captain of the school eleven till I came to this school. When I read of the breaking of the season, we have a grand "Breaking of the Girls' Ball." In the streams we can have very good fishing, as great quantities of American and English trout have been introduced into the streams in addition to the native fish. What I should most like to do is to explore in the bush. The Auckland forests are very lovely—full of ferns (New Zealand ferns are the best in the world), little streams breaking here and there in fairy-like cascades, towering trees with closely matted tops form a pleasant shade, while the beautiful clematis connects the trees with its snowy festoons or wavings in the breeze. Many pretty little birds abound in the forests, among them the fantail, which I have seen in the city of Auckland. It is very pleasant feeding these birds, cut a thin cane and fasten a berry on the end, and wave the cane gently, imitating the call of the bird. You will soon see the little birds about, and they will dart at the quickly moving berry. If it is fastened on tightly, it is very amusing to see the birds peck at the berry, and in pulling at the tempting food. The tin and bell birds are the best singers; the latter strikes a note as like a funeral bell tolling. I wish you could come to see our birds. My nephew is telling you about the fearful volcanic eruption which did so much damage a little while ago. HERBERT HENRY DANIEL N.

HANOVER, GERMANY.

In taking your paper for a year I have not seen any letter from Hanover, and I think perhaps YOUR American readers would like to hear from a little American girl, who is thirteen years old and is studying in Hanover. I have been here almost a year now, and go to school where I speak only German. I also take music lessons, and my sister says that I am getting on very nicely.

We live out near Herrenhausen, and it is very beautiful. I have seen the Herrenhausen, you know, is the former residence of the King of Hanover, has no King now, but is governed by the Emperor of Germany.

I want to tell you about the white horses which the King used to drive. He had a most beautiful large gold carriage, and with eight pure white horses harnessed in red leather and gold harnesses, with red satin rosettes and drappings, he used to drive out on certain days. The harnesses and carriages were all made to order, and were all made with twelve or thirteen white horses, just like those he used to drive. They were also eight or nine feet high, and were all made of the King only in the world. Horses like those the King used to drive with dark blue and gold harnesses. You cannot imagine how heavy these harnesses are. I tried to get a part of one, but found it too heavy. The Harpersians still feel very sadly over the loss of their King.

My two sisters older than I am, and we have very nice times together. They take riding and I take swimming lessons. ALICE H. B.

HERNDON, NEW YORK.
 DEAR POSTMISTRESS.—I saw a letter from Elina S. and Edith C., wanting some suggestions for Christmas gifts. One very pretty thing to make is a splasher, to put up on the wall behind the head. If Edna and Edith liked the wall behind New York, they could get them in Fourteenth Street, stamped with a pretty pattern, for twelve and a half cents each fringed, and get cottons of a color, a plain color, or a variety of colors. You work them in common outside stitch, and fringe the edges and over the top with dark green or red raveling. Doyles are pretty made this way on fine linen. The simple sashet bag, oblong in shape, is pretty. Take two oblong pieces of fabric, one of different color, the sew seam all around, except at the top; then it round the top, stuff it with cotton batting thickly sprinkled with sashet powder, and the top edge with a row of ribbons held together as one of the colors of the sashet bag. Finish off the top with lace. Tie-top holders of satin, with flowers, and ribbons, and outside with three thicknesses of cloth inside, and finished off around the edge with a heavy silk cord or a ribbon binding, leaving at one corner a loop of cord to hang the bag by. For a baby, hoop-sticks covered with ribbon, and about eight long ribbon ends fastened together at the top of the stick, and at the end of each ribbon a little bell make a very pretty rattle. I hope these hints will prove useful to not only Edna and Edith, but to other girls beginning Christmas preparations now. AMELIA J.

MANGARA, AUCKLAND, NEW ZEALAND.
 I am nine years old, and live with my uncle and aunt. My uncle teaches a public school, and I attend the Bible school. I would like very much to take in a magazine as soon as I could read books to myself, so I chose HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE, which I like very much. I have a Waterbury watch.

On the 10th of June there was an eruption in the Lake District, about one hundred and twenty miles from here, where there are many fine lakes, rolling springs, and volcanoes. Mount Tanawera broke out, and threw up quantities of stones, mud, and volcanic dust. Some villages very near were destroyed, and a number of people, both Europeans and Maoris, were killed. The country for miles round was covered with the mud and dust. Some of the houses were buried in the mud, the cattle were starved, and the trees were broken down by the weight of the mud. The lovely pink and white terraces, which everybody admires, have all been destroyed. The people had to keep their lamps lighted till two o'clock in the afternoon. Thinking you might like to see some of the pictures, I have sent you a small part of it. At one time there used to be a great many volcanoes about here. I have been up on the top of one of the extinct volcanoes. I have seen many within a mile, and I have been ten miles from Auckland, and four from Onehunga. I hope to go into Auckland to see a football match between Auckland and Sydney. We can see the steamers go to Otago.

OVERBROOK, PENNSYLVANIA.
 One month ago I was visiting in Uxbridge, near New York. I was with my uncle's, and I had five little cousins. They have a stable, and we used to play in the hay. They keep a cow, and they bring it into the stable six times a week. I was used to go down to the river to fish. The river flows through a field where the cow was in the daytime. When we went to fish, we caught one or two each. I had a fish which was very fat and had a very nice time; and I also had a nice time coming home in the "sleeper." When I was going on I saw the Brooklyn Bridge. I wrote to HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE was sent to me, and when I opened one number I found my letter. I was very glad to see it. I had a letter from you, and I saw your bright-colored birds in Florida when I was there last winter. I saw some bluebirds, and robins, and wild-ducks. I did not hear the magpies, but I saw them. I did not notice them. I saw a little white bunny; my friend had it for a week, and they had a great many across the street. My friend had a squirrel too, but it ran away. You asked if the oranges tasted better in the grove, as they were picked from the trees, than anywhere else; they do taste better—sweeter than any others. But there had been a heavy frost just before I got there, which killed some oranges, but not my trees. They have hardly ever had such a frost in Florida as they had last winter. I did not notice the old and new moss spoke of between the old and new moss that grows on the trees, but I will look at it more carefully if I go again. I feel very glad to see my children in Charleston and other places in the South who have no houses to sleep in, on account of the earthquake. Now I am at home to stay. I enjoy my paper very much. I go down every evening to see the cows come in to be milked. Sometimes I have a ride with a little boy who takes the milk cans in a wagon from the dairy to the house, and I have a doll's school in mamma's room every day. The dolls have had vacation, and have become very fat. I had a good day, dear Postmistress. I am afraid I am writing too long a letter. With love,

 MARY C. W. (aged seven years)

The Postmistress thinks this letter from a little Southern boy very pleasant and graceful.

HAMMOND, LOUISIANA.
 I do not find many letters to you from this dear old State of Louisiana, and I know there are many boys and girls here who ought to tell you what a treasure HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE is to them. I am twenty years old, and every Thursday morning we are on the look-out for it, waiting for the mail-train. I live in a small village on the line of the Illinois Central Railroad, fifty miles from New Orleans. Our vacation is nearly over, but I want to tell you of our nice exhibition, when the school-children of the summer. Everybody says it was very fine. For the last piece we had the pretty opera taken from the Christmas number. Do you remember it? My smaller children took part in it: was Prince Fortunio—she had a magnificent stage, drop curtain, foot-lights—everything to make it look like, and our mamma dressed us in such pretty fancy costumes! It was really wonderful, and we shall never forget it. I would like to tell you about my pets, for I have several, and am very fond of them. First among them is my pony, whose name is Pot. I enjoy riding very much, and can go all about the country by myself. I have also four pretty white rabbits, will pink eyes. I am very fond of them, and they are good to care for, keep me quite busy. I love my Southern home. There is no day in all the year in which I cannot gather beautiful flowers, and garden, and my garden, and my garden doors almost every day. I often wish you could come and see me. I would take so much pleasure in trying to make your visit a happy one. I have a very nice dog, and a very nice dog, though our Post-office Box, and want to be one of your little friends. SAM M. C.

ORANGE, NEW JERSEY.
 I am not the youngest of the family, but am, however, the oldest. I think my position has its disadvantages as well as the advantages, for of course the little ones think whatever "sister" does they may do also. Still I find it very sweet to have them look up to me with such faith and trust. My father is in business in New York. I have numerous pets, etc., that I had when you were a baby, and I have many more now. My children, except my two canary birds. Much love to the Postmistress from

COAL VALLEY, WEST VIRGINIA.
 We live in a coal-mining region. If you will print this, and any of the letters, I will be very glad to mine. I will write again. My papa is a lawyer. We live a few hundred feet from the Kanawha River, and about nine miles from the beautiful Kanawha Falls. The country is a beautiful country, and rich in coal. We have no pastor now; our church is closed, because our minister has gone to live in Baltimore. I have more than I do. BECKLEY W. M.

I will answer for the boys, and you may tell them all you can about the mine.

PHILADELPHIA, PENNSYLVANIA.
 DEAR POSTMISTRESS.—I send you a VERY good recipe for chocolate icing, and a very good recipe for well-made spread between the top and bottom of the cake. KATIE W.

BAR HARBOR, MAINE.
 I have taken this lovely paper since it was first published. I am passing my summer at Bar Harbor. I generally go to Newport. In winter I live in New York. For pets I have a Shetland pony, a collic, and two cats. I should like to see my letter in print, as this is my first. I have a doll that I am dressing for a fair; she is as big as a real baby. I wish that you would tell me some nice name for my pony. My favorite story is "Silent Pete."

 CLARA G. (aged twelve).

Have't you named the poor pony yet? and is there a prettier name than Pet?

BROOKLYN, NEW YORK.
 My favorite authors are Miss Abott and Mrs. Lillie. I enjoyed "Jo's Opportunity" and "False Witness." I have over a hundred books, and love to read them. I was ten years old last August. I had a lovely birthday, and very handsome presents, among them a beautiful boat and pen pencil, etc. I am writing a story, and it is great fun. FLORENCE T. H.

WATSKA, ILLINOIS.
 This is the third year we have taken HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE, and we all, even mamma, enjoy it very much. I am nine years old, and live with mamma, Wilbur, and Edna here in Watska. Brother Wilbur is eleven and sister Edna is seven. I go to school, and study reading, writing, spelling, arithmetic, geography, language, composition, drawing, moulding, and music. I am learning some kinds of house-work, and would like to join the Little House-keepers' Club. I will send a receipt for leather-cake some time. My favorite writings are those of Miss Louisa M. Alcott, John Hubbard, Mrs. Lucy C. Lillie, Kirk Munroe, William O. Stoddard, and Charles Dickens. I also like the stories about Mr. Thompson and Miss Angeline. I must not forget to mention Jacob Abbott's beautiful histories, some of which I have read. Our only pet are four canary-birds; they are all yellow except one. I wish you could see my dollies, Rosemary, Marguerite, and Bessie. I have a cradle and a carriage for them. Mamma is going to teach me to sew for them this fall. EMILIE W.

SUPPOSING

BY MARY N. PRESCOTT.

SUPPOSING the grass should forget to grow,
And the way-side rose should forget to blow,
Because they were tired and lazy;
Supposing children forgot to be kind,
Forgot their lessons, forgot to mind—
Wouldn't the world seem crazy?

Supposing that strawberries ripened on trees,
And robins and thrushes swam in the seas,
While mackerel flew in the air;
Supposing the stars in the meadows grew,
And the sky was green and the leaves were blue—
What a topsy-turvy affair!

PORPOISE OIL.

WE were lying in the harbor of Havre for a month or so, undergoing repairs, when one day the gunner's mate reported to the ordnance officer that the supply of oil for cleaning the small-arms was low.

"It's the best kind of 'puppuss' oil, sir," said he, touching his cap, "that we use for the small-arms."

"Porpoise oil?" said the officer. "Are you sure it's porpoise oil?"

"Yes, sir; I'm sure it's 'puppuss' oil. It says so on the cans."

The officer sent in all directions for porpoise oil, but could find none. He made inquiries himself at many places without success, and finally left instructions to be notified as soon as any was received by the dealers.

After some days he had word from a wholesale house that they had received an invoice, and would accommodate him with the quantity he wished.

The officer ordered the needful amount, which arrived in bulk, and as it was being poured into the empty cans it came into his mind to ask the gunner's mate to show him one of them.

He brought one, and thinking the officer still a little doubtful, pointed triumphantly to a label in red lettering on the front of the can, and said, "There, sir, you can see for yourself; it's 'puppuss' oil."

The officer took the can, and this is what he read:

THIS OIL IS TO BE USED FOR THE SMALL-ARMS, AND FOR NO OTHER PURPOSE.

I need not explain the officer's amusement at having turned Havre inside out to procure porpoise oil, nor that of the gunner's mate when it was shown him how he had been deceived. I fancy that neither of them for many a day saw the word "purpose" that the incident of the porpoise oil did not come to mind to amuse them, and that the gunner's mate thereafter paid as much attention to small words as to small-arms.

"Ha! ha!"

"Ho! ho!"
